One of the most important of these "technical" changes is that which would redefine "employee." Under the Fansteel decision, though not under the law itself, a striker convicted of violence or some other unlawful act growing out of a strike loses his status as an employee and thereby his right to reinstatement. The Smith committee would amend the definition of "employee" to take the right of reinstatement from any employee "who a preponderance of the testimony taken shows has wilfully engaged in violence or unlawful destruction or seizure of property in connection with any current labor dispute or unfair labor practice . . . or in connection with any organizational activities." Now under the Fansteel decision a striker convicted in a court of law loses his right to reinstatement. Under this proposal the Labor Board itself would have to determine whether violence or property damage had been committed. It would thus be converted into a kind of national police court, its duties enormously enlarged, its power to reach a decision hopelessly slowed up by the employer's power to bring charges of this kind against any number of strikers. It should also be noted that while the Fansteel decision dealt with strikers, this proposal also applies to rights of employees not on strike who accuse their employer of some unfair labor practice or some interference with organizational activities.

Another "technical" change of the greatest importance is that which would apply ordinary rules of evidence to Labor Board cases. The purpose of these rules is to guide the presentation of material to juries of laymen. Where legal proceedings are carried on without juries, as in courts of equity, far greater latitude is allowed. These rules of evidence have never been applied to proceedings before administrative bodies, where they would serve only to obfuscate and entangle. There are some ninety different exclusionary rules, and every infraction alleged could itself be the subject of an appeal. The potentialities for delay and costly litigation would be immensely increased by this change. Similar in effect is the proposal to apply the "clearly erroneous" rule to appeals from board decisions. This would make it possible to retry every case in the Circuit Court. Further delay is implicit in the proposal to divide the powers of the board with an administrator, the latter to investigate and prosecute, the former to try Labor Act cases. The board would try cases, but its decision, as now, would not be enforceable until the administrator took it into a Circuit Court of Appeals. The administrator would become a key figure. It would rest with him alone rather than with the board whether to investigate or prosecute complaints, and it would rest with him whether to move for enforcement of board orders. A bad administrator could make the Wagner Act a dead letter. The case for division of the board's powers in this way rests on a constitutional bromide about "separation of powers" too complicated to discuss at this point, but the proposal itself derives not from abstract considerations but from the fact that we have a vigorous Labor Board. If we had an able pro-labor administrator we should no doubt hear him denounced as a "dictator," and it would be proposed to cut down his powers and enlarge those of the board. We must note among the "technical" changes, finally, the redefinition of collective bargaining which would no longer require an employer to bargain in good faith and to present counter-proposals to his employees.

The Smith committee's best strategy is to distract attention from these obscure but crucial proposals to debate over the question whether Congress is to "encourage" or "protect" collective bargaining, and whether employers should have the right of "free speech." The latter has great possibilities as a smoke screen, particularly since the Civil Liberties Union has been rushing in where many other liberals fear to tread. We believe that to give an employer the right to discuss questions of unionism with his men is to throw open the door to coercion in fact, even though one provides that the discussion may not be accompanied by threats of discrimination, intimidation, or coercion. No open threats are necessary where the employer, who can hire or fire, talks "abstractly" with the employee about the virtues of this or that union. The tone of voice may be enough, or a raised eyebrow, or a sharp glance. None of them can be taken into court and read into a record.

The Joads' Neighbors

NOT all their neighbors joined the Joads in the trek to California. Even poverty has its aristocracy, and there were some who had no jalopies. Four out of five families edged off the South's land by the tractor crowd into the slums of the nearest city, living as they can between the meager jobs to be obtained at planting and harvest time. A continuous process adds to their ranks. Year by year more farmers become tenants and croppers, more tenants and croppers find themselves pushed down to the bottom status of day laborers. The base of the South's agricultural economy grows broader, the mass of the dispossessed and landless widens, while the number of the landowners grows smaller. When a multiplying number of have-nots confront a dwindling number of haves, the wise take warning. We wonder how many members of the Senate's Committee on Agriculture will prove to be in that category.

The plea made to the committee last week by the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union contained specific proposals for amendments to the Soil Conservation Act, successor to the AAA. But the issues involved transcend mere questions of how farm relief shall be administered. The ultimate success or failure of the New Deal farm program in the cotton belt depends upon the answers, and the fate of democracy in the South will be determined by them. For the dispossessed, the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union wants a start at subsistence farm homesteads and minimum-wage protection. For the tenants and croppers still hanging on, the union wants safeguards against the grasping planter. It proposes that Farm Security Administration and Federal Housing Administration cooperate in establishing at least one subsistence-homestead project where with government aid families driven off the land may make a new start. It wants crop subsidies refused to planters who pay less than 25 cents a hour; the present wage ranges from 50 cents to $1 a day, and the day from twelve to fourteen hours. For the tenants and croppers it makes two requests, both of them revealing. The first is that benefit checks be mailed direct to the tenant or cropper instead of to the county agent, who is almost always under the thumb of the planter. When a planter gets a tenant's check first, the amount which goes to the tenant usually depends on the planter, and some of the stories told by union officials remind one that the South was the scene of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The other request is that not more than $5,000 be paid in crop benefits to any one individual or corporation. The union, with 40,000 members, prides itself on having recovered $100,000 in crop benefits during the last two years from greedy planters. The figure is in illuminating contrast with the $10,000,000 which our largest "farmer," the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, last year received from the Department of Agriculture. The more money paid to big corporate farmers, who do not need protection, the less there is left for the small farmers and tenants who do.

The New Deal has alleviated the immediate need of the South, but at the expense of intensifying its long-range problems. Increased prices for cotton have encouraged production abroad, which cuts into foreign markets that once absorbed half our crop. Benefit payments have eased distress in one way and increased it in another. They have supplied the planter with cash, and the cash has made possible the purchase of machinery. The more machinery, the fewer hands he needs. If he has a tenant or cropper he must share the benefit payments with him. It is more profitable to push the tenant or cropper off the land, hiring him when needed by the day, and keep the benefit payments. Assurance of certain benefits has encouraged landed interests to increase their holdings—the more land the more benefit payments. The Department of Agriculture prides itself on the democratic nature of its regulatory program, on the elaborate schemes of local election of control committees. But in the South control committees are controlled by the planter, and even though there are no poll taxes or grandfather clauses to make a mockery of these elections, there are other ways to keep the small farmer and cropper, particularly the Negro, from voting. Throughout the South planters dominate the farm program in local administration as they do in the councils of the Democratic Party and in Congress. Unless that control is shaken loose, the South will continue to head for a new irreconcilable conflict. The Southern Tenant Farmers' Union and its program, regarded in this perspective, is not the dangerously revolutionary force the planters think it, but one of the constructive agencies at work in the South to erect a bridge between haves and have-nots as well as between blacks and whites.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 349

EDITORIALS:

AXIS OVER FINLAND 351
WHITTLING AWAY THE WAGNER ACT 352
THE JOADS' NEIGHBORS 353
LABOR'S NEW FRIENDS by Kenneth G. Crawford 355
MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT.
II. THOMAS E. DEWEY by John Richmond 356
GÖRING'S PROPHECY by Frederick Kuh 360
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 364
IN THE WIND 365
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 366

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

BLACK NATIVE SON by Margaret Marshall 367
WATCH OVER HELLHOUNDS by Rustem Vambery 368
HEALTH FOR THE MILLIONS by Hugh H. Darby 368
AUGUSTAN WORLD by Louis Kronenberger 370
SHORTER NOTICES 370
DRAMA: "THE FIFTH COLUMN" by Joseph Wood Krutch 371
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 372
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 373

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

◆

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Labor's New Friends

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, March 11

ORGANIZED labor, with the help of the New Deal, has stood its ground against all comers through the long winter of ownership's discontent. It has had little trouble holding off such enemies within the gates as Big Bill Hutcheson and such enemies without as the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers. But the spring thaws have come now, and labor must take on, in addition to its old foes, a formidable force of volunteer friends. These new friends will not be easy to fight, for they are intrenched behind money bags and led by Chairman Howard W. Smith of the House Committee Investigating the National Labor Relations Board, Chairman Glenn Frank of the Republican Program Committee, and Chairman Ernest T. Weir of the Republican Finance Committee.

Ever since the act was slipped through Congress in the confusion of 1935, its destruction has been the primary objective of thinking reactionaries. They realized from the start that strong unions would be harder to get rid of than government reforms when the march back to "normalcy" began. Yet every frontal attack, regardless of the intensity of advance propaganda barrage, failed miserably. With some 8,000,000 workers organized into unions, most of them under the protection of the Wagner Act, few Congressmen were willing to proclaim themselves enemies of labor. A change in tactics was indicated. Came then the new friends of labor.

Smith qualified as nouveau laborite by announcing in a radio address, shortly after starting his investigation of the National Labor Relations Board, that he had undergone a change of heart. He voted against the Wagner Act, to be sure, but he had now decided that labor was entitled to government protection in the exercise of its right to organize without interference and to bargain collectively for improved wages, hours, and working conditions. He assured friends of the law that he was one of them—that some perfecting amendments would have to be adopted but only to fend off destructive attack by the predatory Republicans. He was so persuasive that some of the more gullible of the bona fide labor sympathizers in Congress were taken in. What Smith wanted was a unanimous report from his committee underwriting his amendments. Thanks to hard-headed Abe Murdock of Utah, who persuaded Arthur Healey of Massachusetts to join him in filing a minority report, Smith's scheme fell through.

What he and his majority called perfecting amendments turned out, as anticipated, to be plausible but tricky. Where they came from is anyone's guess. Since John Lewis showed up the old A. F. of L. amendments as products of collaboration between Joseph Padway, Federation counsel, and a group of Wall Street lawyers, no guess as to origin would seem too fantastic. The amendments finally incorporated in the confused and abstruse Smith bill, in so far as they had any correlation, suggested the editorial hand of the committee's labor-badgering counsel, Edmund Toland.

The procedural amendments attracted most attention and were, in all conscience, bad enough. The substantive amendments were more forthright and more dangerous. The so-called Garrison amendment, although it had been tentatively indorsed even by Chairman J. Warren Madden, by forbidding the board to settle jurisdictional disputes over bargaining units would give employers a chance to avoid responsibility by the simple dodge of fomenting jurisdictional disputes between plant majorities and minority craft groups. The amendment limiting back-pay liability to six months would encourage discriminatory discharge of "agitators" and provide employers with another handy coercive weapon. The average case, if not settled in advance of a decision, is before the Labor Board for a year. It may spend another year or two in the courts before it is finally settled. A worker discharged for union activity might be out of work for years before he was reinstated and then get only six months' compensation.

But it was in his definitions that Smith wielded the ax with most telling effect. No employee would be subject to reinstatement if he had "wilfully engaged in violence," for example. Thus if a striker were attacked by a company guard and fought back he would automatically forfeit claim to his job. Then there was the definition of collective bargaining, as nice a joker as ever emerged from a Congressman's sleeve. "The terms 'collective bargaining' and 'bargaining collectively' shall be deemed to include the requirement that an employer or his representatives shall meet and confer with his employees or their representatives, listen to their complaints, discuss differences, and make every effort to compose such differences, but shall not be construed as compelling or coercing either party to reach an agreement or submit counter proposals." This would, in effect, invite employers to talk interminably with union committees, knowing that nothing would be settled.

The strange thing about Smith's bag of tricks was that it contained no fish to throw to the A. F. of L. except the ripper amendment abolishing the present Labor Board. William Green opposed some of Smith's proposals before they came out. Smith made no adequate provision for fostering the A. F. of L.–C. I. O. split or the A. F. of L.–N. A. M. alliance. Right there he may have stubbed his toe. United opposition from rival factions of organized labor probably would prevent enactment of the amendments at this session—if not in the House, then in the Senate or the White House. The President is reported to have told Sam Rayburn that he would veto a destructive bill. He doubtless would go through with this threat if all of labor were behind him.

Assuming, then, that the amendments will not become law before the Presidential election, Smith will shortly be supplanted as commander of the save-labor-from-itself forces by Frank and Weir. The essential fraudulence of the Frank report was nowhere so plain as in the labor section. The whole thing was based on the phony premise that the Wagner Act has increased industrial strife. Frank offered as proof statistics of 1937—a banner year for strikes because employers, acting on advice from the Liberty League's unofficial supreme court, systematically defied the law until the official Supreme Court declared it constitutional that spring. The report generously conceded that the federal government should protect collective bargaining but urged a long list of amendments. Among these was the old N. A. M. favorite preventing "coercion from any source," but with a nice feeling for semantics Frank changed the language to "unfair practices by whomever committed."

Weir changed his spots overnight by subscribing to the Frank report. But it is doubtful whether Weir and Frank will fool anybody. The issue will be fairly clear in the Presidential campaign. The danger is that this, the major issue confronting the electorate, will be submerged by foreign affairs and political oratory.

Men Who Would Be President

II. THOMAS E. DEWEY

BY JOHN RICHMOND

APART from his youth Thomas Edmund Dewey hasn't much more to recommend him for the Presidency of the United States than boundless energy, striking good looks, and a successful record of nine years in public life—three of them spent as the most high-handed District Attorney New York City has ever had.

Aside from his skill and success in sending criminals to prison, virtually nothing is known about Dewey. Up to the time he began his Presidential campaign he never had come out with a platform, a program, or a policy other than "crack down on crime." He had not spoken an illuminating word on taxation, relief, labor boards, social security, or any other important public issue. A scrutiny of thousands of clippings buried in newspaper morgues concerning the thirty-seven-year-old racket buster yields no sign of an underlying philosophy—political, social, or economic. Even on current issues in his own city and state Dewey has consistently refused to commit himself.

At the moment Dewey is acutely aware of the fact that his youth, considered one of his chief assets six months ago, has become one of his greatest handicaps. The war turned it into a factor that must be minimized, in view of the prevailing sentiment that "in these troubled times an old and wise head is needed in the White House." Dewey's publicity handouts try to circumvent this issue by painting a dazzling picture of the multifarious problems and duties that he copes with in a typical day as District Attorney. But these efforts have served only as a spur to cartoonists to lampoon the youthful candidate as "Old Man Dewey" in contrast to "Kid Garner." In what amounts to Dewey's campaign biography, "Attorney for the People," Rupert Hughes compares his subject's youth and ability with that of Alexander the Great, Napoleon, and William Pitt, but no such flight of fancy has yet succeeded in turning to advantage Tom's thirty-seven years. Even though it may bother him, however, Dewey is not above capitalizing on his youth when circumstances permit. Asked for his opinion on capital punishment the day after he was elected District Attorney, Dewey cagily replied, "After all, I'm still young. You can't expect me to solve all the problems of the world."

Dewey's is a neat little success story. He was born on March 24, 1902, in an apartment over a general store in Owosso, Michigan, a town of about 8,000. His family was always in modest financial circumstances, his father's annual income as postmaster never climbing above $1,800. At the age of thirteen young Tom had a dozen boys working under him peddling the periodicals of the Curtis Publishing Company and the Detroit Daily News. When the United States entered the first World War, he secured a job on a neighboring farm in need of man-power. He entered the University of Michigan at seventeen, and while he did not distinguish himself there as a student, he did take up the cultivation of his voice. His net gains from his college career included a victory in a state singing contest, his B.A., and a music scholarship in Chicago. The vocal career looked promising, and when he completed his course his teachers advised him to go on to New York to continue his singing lessons, which he did. To help pay his way he sang on the side as a baritone in church choirs and, with the aid of phonetically spelled lyrics, in synagogues as well. At the same time he attended Columbia Law School, chiefly because he had enjoyed the year of law he had taken at college.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
[illegible], Cal.

People who knew Dewey the law student paint a not too flattering portrait of him. He was cocky, self-assertive, strongly inclined to take command of all situations, and brimming over with energy to the point of being annoying. He became more and more absorbed in the law, and when he received his LL. B. in 1925 it was a toss-up between the bar and the concert stage. The issue was decided when despite an infected sore throat he was forced to go through with a previously announced concert. The law won, and Dewey soon secured a job in the law office of Larkin, Rathbone, and Perry, where he worked for fourteen months at the modest salary of $1,800 a year. At the end of that time he shifted to the firm of McNamara and Seymour, where his legal talents were more handsomely rewarded—so handsomely in fact that by 1928 he was able to marry Frances Hutt, once a member of his singing classes, and later in the cast of George White's Scandals.

During his early career at the bar Dewey made his acquaintance with local Republican politics, spending many a spare hour trudging through his election district, punching doorbells, canvassing for votes, and acting as a watcher in polling places. He had to wait only two years to get the break that was to change the course of his life and direct his energies irrevocably into political channels. Assigned to a particularly complex case, Dewey suggested that outside legal talent be called in and recommended George Z. Medalie, a Republican, who had been Assistant Attorney General of New York and who in private practice had defended such distinguished underworld clients as Arnold Rothstein and Legs Diamond. The choice was a ten-strike for Dewey, for in the middle of the trial Medalie was appointed United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York. He had taken to Dewey and urged him to join his staff. So, early in 1931, at the age of twenty-nine, Thomas E. Dewey first took public office, becoming Chief Assistant United States Attorney, with a staff of sixty lawyers working under him. He had never tried a criminal case in his life and few cases of any kind for that matter, but he put on a bold front. He scored several quick victories, chief among them his conviction of the bootlegging beer baron, Waxey Gordon, and in 1933 when Medalie resigned, Dewey was sworn in to take his place, the youngest man ever to hold the office. His career as United States Attorney was brief, flashy, and profitable. In the same year he resigned and hung out his own shingle. The publicity he had won as the dashing young federal attorney enabled him to earn $50,000 in fees in two years.

In 1935 when a grand jury bolted because of the clumsy maneuvers of Tammany's District Attorney, William C. Dodge, Dewey was suggested to Governor Lehman for special prosecutor. After hesitating because of his youth, the Governor appointed him at a salary of $16,695 a year, plus $122,000 for expenses, and gave him orders to smash the ring of racketeers whom Dodge had treated with such obvious tenderness that the newspapers felt called upon to demand his removal. Immediately Dewey selected four assistants—William B. Herlands, Jacob J. Rosenblum, Murray I. Gurfein, and Barent Ten Eyck—all under thirty and all fervent, able, and fearless. They broke up the rackets in poultry, trucking, restaurants, and baking; they cracked down on the loan sharks and the organizers of policy games and prostitution. Dewey normally put in a day of ten to twelve hours besides toiling three or more nights a week, and he demanded a similar spartan regimen from his staff.

As special prosecutor Dewey amassed a brilliant record in the number of convictions he managed to attain, but many of his devices were of a kind to disturb people who are vitally concerned with the preservation of civil liberties. Some violated state law, others brushed aside the canons of professional ethics of the American Bar Association, and many were flagrant abuses of civil rights. Phony grand-jury subpoenas were used to pull in witnesses when the grand jury was not even in session; material witnesses were jailed under high bail and refused their legal fee of $3 a day unless they testified favorably for the prosecution; people were held incomunicado in the name of protective arrest and for no specified crime; defense attorneys were forbidden to speak to witnesses before trial; all manner of rewards were offered for favorable testimony; searches and seizures were made without warrant and material so gathered was freely used as legal evidence.

Whatever his methods, Dewey piled up the greatest record attained by a special prosecutor in New York in twenty years, and his reward came when the united anti-Tammany forces picked him as their candidate for District Attorney in 1937. Before Dewey accepted the nomination he outlined the conditions under which he would consider running. His terms were harsh, but his sponsors listened because they had no better candidate to offer. He insisted that there be no restrictions on the conduct of his office or the development of his unique methods of prosecution. And he tacked on the unusual request that the large sums he received from weatlhy reformers to aid his prosecutions might be used without the necessity of accounting for their expenditure.

When the campaign started, the G. O. P. bosses got a real taste of Dewey's political tactics, and they haven't forgotten them to this day. They outlined for Dewey a perfect campaign for a crusading prosecutor and advised him to discuss the causes of crime in cities, the conditions that breed crime, and also the forces responsible for racketeering. But he had his own boyish ideas and he stubbornly carried them out. His campaign consisted largely of galloping around the city scaring and thrilling people by telling them ten-cent-detective-magazine stories of his experiences with crime and the underworld. Dewey was right and the party hacks were wrong. The public lapped up this new and amusing type of campaign and cheered him to an easy victory. The party leaders were grateful for a victory, but they put Tom Dewey down as a pompous and arrogant whippersnapper.

Thomas E. Dewey

Installed as District Attorney, Dewey continued to operate on the principle that any means are justified by the ends. When he prosecuted Charles (Lucky) Luciano, whom he accused of heading the vice racket, he relied upon the testimony of three prostitutes: Mildred Harris, Cokey Flo Brown, and Nancy Presser, and also on that of Joe Bendix, a lifer at Sing Sing. Mildred was given a letter by one of Dewey's assistants promising her immunity for current misdeeds and "for any other offense"; Nancy Presser was promised a trip to Europe; and on behalf of Cokey Flo and Mildred a deal with Liberty magazine was made by the Dewey office after the trial whereby their "life stories" were purchased by that journal at the rate of $2,500 each. Joe Bendix was promised a pardon. In summing up to the jury Dewey vehemently denied promising Nancy Presser a trip to Europe. However, in the appeal motion for a new trial the defense attorney caused something of a sensation by flashing a letter from Nancy Presser addressed from London: "Dear Mother and Dad: I wrote you a letter from the ship. The Dewey office asked me not to talk and I didn't. The office is to pay all our expenses but it turns out to be different once their case was won. They don't care now. We went first class to England. We were their little darlings. But now we are coming back tourist class. That's funny too. They didn't keep their word at all. I didn't think they would." Dewey unhesitatingly admitted that he had, in fact, sent this girl to Europe, but it was merely to keep her from being harmed by gangsters in New York. Bendix, however, fared badly. Dewey was unable to get him the promised pardon and feared to send him back to Sing Sing, lest he get vengeful and tell all. So now Joe languishes in an old, unused city jail, held for further action; he is allowed certain weekly liberties under guard.

In 1938 Tom Dewey ran for Governor in a campaign that still remains a nightmare to the G. O. P. chieftains who drafted him. Again he insisted on the cops-and-robbers technique which he had formerly used so successfully. Again, ignoring all advice, he barnstormed up and down the state telling the people about crime and how he had wiped it out in New York City. He tripped, however, when he tried to tie up Albany beer runners with George Z. Medalie, the man who had given him his first opportunity in public office, and he changed his tack only when Frank Gannett, Republican owner of an influential chain of upstate newspapers, cracked down on him with a caustic warning. Chastened for the moment, Dewey switched to taking pot shots at the New Deal, charging that it "kept millions of workers out of jobs by a spirit of hostility and quarreling toward business." But after a few such speeches he returned to the crime-does-not-pay theme, delivered with lush melodramatic overtones. This brought exciting applause while the anti-New Deal speeches only provoked polite handclappings. The election was close, Dewey losing by 64,394 votes. For all his vaunted appeal he had raised the Republican vote by only 4 per cent over the 1936 election.

Returning to his office of District Attorney, Dewey plunged into his job and obtained the conviction of Jimmy Hines, the grafting Tammany leader, who escaped conviction in his first trial through what is generally regarded as an elementary legal fumble on the part of the District Attorney. The court declared a mistrial when Dewey in cross-examining a witness insisted on referring to an unrelated crime. So certain was Tom that he had committed no error in legal judgment, however, that he stubbornly announced to friends that, given the same opportunity in the second Hines trial, he would follow the same line of questioning. Fortunately for the taxpapers of New York the opportunity did not occur.

"Mr. Dewey," his press representatives will tell you, "never grants personal interviews." He will permit, instead, a fifteen-minute off-the-record chat, with the clear proviso that no quotations either direct or indirect are to be attributed to the Great Man. This is the best that any journalist gets regardless of the size or importance of his publication. After stating the rules of the game to me for the dozenth time, Dewey settled down to the business of my visit. He was cordial and pleasant, and his attractiveness as a figure to present to the public was not lost on me. The photographs hardly do Mr. Dewey justice. His high, broad forehead, his sharp, pointed nose, his coal-black neatly trimmed mustache, his quick, darting brown eyes fringed with long lashes, his carefully combed thick, black hair are all handsome features. It was easy to see, moreover, why he had recently been named one of the twenty best-dressed men in America by a national tailors' association. Nevertheless, the total effect, emphasized by his plumpish cheeks, is one of smugness, even foxiness.

After listening to Tom Dewey for fifteen minutes the reason for his silence on so many issues becomes startlingly apparent. It is not, as many people suppose, that he completely lacks knowledge or even opinions on national problems. The truth is that Dewey is definitely conservative-minded and shrewdly prefers that the public does not become fully aware of this. He constantly stresses the viewpoint of business and the seemingly unjust regulations which its spokesmen believe have been imposed upon it by the Roosevelt Administration. I got the unmistakable impression that he felt these regulations must be revoked before the unemployment problem could be solved, for his emphasis was almost wholly on the pre-1929 benefits enjoyed by business. Dewey's convictions favor the industrial rugged individualism of pre-New Deal days, slightly modified of course. Not only would this reversion to fundamental principles bring a revival to business that would revitalize the entire United States, but all other governmental problems would be almost automatically solved if American industries could find themselves thus untrammeled.

To intimates Dewey has stated with certainty that eighteen months after a Republican President gets into office (preferably, by implication, Mr. Dewey) at least half of the unemployed will be back at work. How this miracle is to be achieved he has never explained fully or convincingly. His liberal friends say that he is willing to retain many New Deal measures but add that he feels they must all be amended. He believes they are now much too severe. While he acknowledges the necessity for social legislation, he thinks it should be instituted slowly and without boisterousness. No one has ever heard Dewey express any ideas on foreign policy, but he is believed to be a Henry Stimson interventionist. He believes the farm problem will be solved when the government adopts a more friendly policy toward big business. When unemployment is wiped out, surplus crops will cease to trouble us. Until complete recovery solves the farm problem, however, Dewey favors applying virtually the remedies employed by the present Administration. His eight-point agricultural program differs very little from measures now in operation. But Dewey feels that under his guidance the agricultural program would function more efficiently.

In public Dewey is an ardent budget balancer. He boasted in a recent speech in Massachusetts that the Republican Legislature of New York State reduced Governor Lehman's budget "without impairing a single essential service." The reduction in question cut $10,000,000 from the educational budget by eliminating day classes in English and citizenship for over 8,000 adults, depriving about 15,000 of the same group of evening classes, and wiping out school community centers which had served to keep children off the streets; and it also slashed the food budget in state hospitals to 21 cents per day per person. This may provide a clue to what Tom Dewey considers an essential service. On his recent swing out West he pleaded in Helena for a balanced budget and reduced spending; the next day at Spokane he promised to complete the $394,000,000 Grand Coulee project, Roosevelt's pet undertaking, and even added, "I hope to have a part in advancing the great work you are doing here." He was ill-advised enough, however, to attack public power projects in a part of the country where public power has attained wide popularity. No wonder the Oregon Labor Press, state A. F. of L. paper, tagged him with the headline, "The same old Hooey—that's Tom Dewey."

In Nebraska he even was tactless enough to insult party leaders. When he caught State Chairman Kenneth Wherry waving to the crowd from the window of the Dewey car, he stopped him at once, saying, "Let us handle things our own way." Later when A. W. Jefferis, candidate for the Republican nomination for Senator from Nebraska, spoke a few words at one stop, Dewey demanded that he make no more speeches during the rest of the trip. "I won't have anyone else," he said, "using the people who come to hear me."

Among his professional colleagues, Dewey is considered just a fair criminal lawyer. He has achieved a dubious fame for crafty—and infuriating—courtroom tactics. In summing up he almost invariably resorts to a running fire of innuendo. "I can't tell you what this man was doing at that time or in that place . . . of course I know," he will say; and the record is full of such irate protests of defense counsel as "I resent with all the vehemence at my command his dirty, nasty insinuations"; "Mr. Dewey poses like God in this courtroom." Outside the courtroom Dewey has a reputation for having written some of the most comprehensive briefs extant. He is also responsible for the revision by Stanley H. Fuld, one of his assistants, of more than 100 old, redundant legal forms used in criminal indictments.

Dewey possesses a remarkable memory which enables him to sop up information overnight, and this ability is unquestionably a political asset of a high order. No one knows this trait better, perhaps, than the industrial and financial leaders with whom Dewey frequently lunches at the Bankers' Club. He has received and taken many suggestions and much advice from them. At first they were inclined to shy away from him as "a housebroken liberal," but as he proved himself more and more receptive and advanced to a proud defense of big business in terms of their own opinions, they gradually became sure that they had nothing to worry about in Tom. Among the more prominent contributors to his gubernatorial campaign fund were J. P. Morgan, Eugene G. Grace, Mrs. David Bruce, daughter of the late Andrew Mellon, Solomon, Simon, Harry, and Murray Guggenheim, E. Frazier Jelke, and F. Trubee Davison.

Dewey's campaign managers, J. Russell Sprague, Republican boss of Nassau County, and Ruth Hanna McCormick Sims, daughter of the late Senator and an old hand in party politics since 1896, try hard to sell their candidate as the most liberal among the Republican hopefuls. The groundwork for Dewey's speeches is prepared by his brain trust, consisting of Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., Elliot V. Bell, formerly assistant financial editor of the New York Times, and Representative Bruce Barton, advertising tycoon, who in 1938, when Dewey was running for Governor, sounded the keynote: "The next national campaign will not be fought between a liberal party and a reactionary party. There is no place in America for a reactionary party. The next national campaign will be between a Republican liberal party and a Democratic radical party." But for all their efforts, Dewey remains a conservative even within the ranks of the Republican Party. The Old Guard split with Kenneth Simpson, New York leader, because of the deals he made with the American Labor Party in 1938. Dewey concurs with the oldsters, including Hoover, and has never patched up his quarrel with the man who told the press: "The people will return to the Republican Party only if they are sure it is not under the domination of Mr. Hoover, the Liberty League, and some of the reactionary forces of the past. If we turn that way, we might as well fold up." That is the kind of statement people expect from Tom Dewey, but there's not much chance that he will make it, either publicly or privately, as long as he travels in the company he keeps at present.

The old wheel horses in Dewey's party realize full well that he is still unripe for Presidential picking, but they know too that he is one of the best fruits in the meager G. O. P. orchard. They know that besides being young he is shockingly inexperienced in national politics and extremely hard to handle. But they also know that they haven't anyone around with one-tenth of his vote-catching glamor. Gallup polls on the subject have shown Dewey's popularity among Republicans rising from 30 per cent in November, 1939, to 56 per cent in February, 1940, with Vandenberg trailing feebly and Taft a tired also-ran. However, there is no indication that the party is prepared to fling the nomination into Dewey's lap by default. While he has been piling up popular acclaim among the voters, his attempts to secure the backing of G. O. P. bosses and their delegates have met with indifferent success. His failure to win the solid backing of the New York State delegation has encouraged other states to hold out on him. Compromise offers of the Vice-Presidency or the job of Attorney General have already been suggested, but Thomas E. Dewey so far has shown no interest. His eye is still on the main chance.

Göring's Prophecy

BY FREDERICK KUH

London, March 1

IF SOME observers are surprised that Field Marshal Hermann Göring, commonly hailed as the great moderate among the Nazi chieftains, favored an accommodation with Bolshevik Russia, I am not. I first met Göring, then a retired captain, parachute salesman, and one of twelve National Socialist Reichstag deputies, in the summer of 1930. We sat on a cafe terrace on Berlin's Kurfürstendamm chatting about the manner in which Baron von Richthofen, Germany's leading aviator in the last war, had met death. The conversation veered to current politics, and grinning broadly, Göring said, "Don't be frightened if I tell you that I'm a National Socialist." I assured him that politicians of his persuasion were familiar to me; I had first attended Hitler's meetings in Munich in 1922 and had acquaintances among the other eleven Nazi deputies. "Do I look scared?" I asked, and he dropped his Big Blond Wolf role.

A few weeks later we again met. This time he lunched alone with me in a Dorotheenstrasse restaurant of his choosing, five minutes walk from the Reichstag, of which he was ultimately to become—president. The waiters clicked heels, bowed, and dusted his chair with a napkin as he entered. In the center of the restaurant was a table laden with hors d'œuvres, lobsters, luscious cuts of cold meat, and other delicacies. But to Göring the restaurant seemed shabby, and he was apologetic. I remember that there were only two men, seated at another table, in the entire dining-room. "I used to come here often during the monarchy," he explained, "and in those days this was a restaurant. Now it's dilapidated, verschlampt.

Nobody comes any more. What you see on that table isn't worthy of being called food. Once it was a delight to eat here."

During our meal, which turned out to be an excellent one, he unfolded his major plan for Germany's future: an arrangement between the German and Soviet armies by which they would jointly attack and overrun France; after which, he said, the Reichswehr would polish off its Red ally. This idea, he confided, had been germinating in his mind for many a year. The ultimate pact with Russia, signed more than nine years after that conversation, came as a bombshell to the world, but it fell far short of Göring's bold designs. That is no indication, however, that he had abandoned them.

Göring never lost sight of his objective, although—as I shall point out at the end of this article—his tactics and strategy wavered and changed. It was he and Hjalmar Schacht, endeared to cartoonists by his lofty collar, who made the first significant Nazi overtures to Moscow. The late S. Parker Gilbert, partner of Pierpont Morgan, once remarked to me while he was chairman of the Reparations Commission in Berlin, "Schacht is a master of his craft, but just a shade too crafty, even for a banker." Göring and Schacht were foremost among the Nazi leaders who sporadically approached the Soviet government during the three and one-half years preceding the German-Russian pact, always with a view to an economic agreement, though occasionally with a political innuendo.

A long time is likely to elapse before the Soviet and German Foreign Offices open the relevant archives, but authentic information makes possible, even now, a reconstruction of actual events, as well as of the play of forces which culminated in the signing of the pact on August 23, 1939. Hitherto undisclosed facts, coupled with those we know, and all obtained from responsible, official sources, supply missing pieces of the jigsaw puzzle. I am here concerned with a chapter of history, mostly unwritten until today, and not with judging merit, demerit, guilt, or innocence. That task had better wait a while, though the reader may form his preliminary opinion.

Moscow's coldness toward Berlin first began to thaw ominously in the six weeks following Hitler's occupation of Prague on March 15, 1939. Vital economic negotiations between the Reich and Russia started in the first half of May after Litvinov's dismissal; in the character of these discussions was implied the Nazi government's hope of a future political understanding. The real political negotiations, according to the best available indications, began in July. And on August 3, as a climax of two days' frenzied consultations in Berlin, Hitler himself decided to conclude the treaty with Moscow.

Concrete evidence casts doubt upon the accuracy of a prominent Soviet diplomat who told me that the Russo-German political negotiations started only when the Anglo-French military mission arrived in Moscow on August 11. Even farther off the mark is the widespread impression in the Allied countries that Russia was conducting secret, parallel political talks with Germany during almost the whole five months of the Anglo-French-Soviet parleys, which opened on March 17 last year. That impression has been strengthened by a misreading as fact of certain rumors chronicled in the official French Yellow Book.

The Yellow Book really tells us little on this subject. Its dispatch from the French Minister at Sofia, Ristelhüber, to Bonnet on December 16, 1938, has of late been mentioned often and quite naively as indicating that the Bulgarian government had received a tip about the Soviet-German pact nine months in advance of its signing. Ristelhüber quotes the Bulgarian Premier, Kiosseivanov, as having said that he did not exclude the possibility of a reconciliation between the U. S. S. R. and the Reich. "Such," Kiosseivanov added, "has always been the dream of part of the German general staff." This remark, citing a fact familiar for eighteen years, suggests that Kiosseivanov lacked any new or startling information and that he was speaking from sheer intuition. Indeed, were he not the distinguished Prime Minister of a sovereign state, one would say that he just had a hunch. I have it on the authority of a high representative of the Bulgarian government, who discussed these questions with Kiosseivanov on July 20, 1939, that even at that late date—about one month before the pact was concluded—Kiosseivanov possessed no information of an imminent German-Russian understanding.

Then there is the Yellow Book's message to Bonnet from the French ambassador at Berlin, Coulondre, dated May 7, 1939, conveying information "from a personality . . . particularly well stationed to know the intentions of the Führer and his principal lieutenants." This French embassy tipster foretold that "the Führer will reach an understanding with Russia." But many persons, including myself, said that after Litvinov was sacked, though they spoke on the basis of deductions which might have proved false and not on the basis of fact. Coulondre's additional quotations from the Führer's confidant scarcely indicate more than that, after Litvinov's resignation, the Nazis' hope of agreement with Russia was rising.

The Yellow Book does not offer a particle of hard evidence of Berlin-Moscow political conversations before the startling announcement of their result. Coulondre's message to Bonnet of June 13 mentioned the possibility of a German agreement with Russia and the destruction of Poland by partition between the Reich and the Soviets, but for such cautious augury did not pretend to adduce anything more tangible than German hopes. Coulondre's June 13 report does not go beyond the negative assertion that "Ribbentrop has not yet renounced that idea. He will not abandon it until the signing of the Anglo-Russian accord intervenes."

What, then, actually happened?

From the end of 1935 Germany repeatedly offered to open economic negotiations with Russia, showed a readiness to grant Moscow a fresh, big commercial credit and to enlarge trade turnover, and at times even hinted that economic talks, if fruitful, could be followed by political discussions. It was on these and subsequent German fishing expeditions that Göring and Schacht were prominent anglers. At intervals in 1936, 1937, and 1938 attempts to refloat German-Soviet trade were renewed. Those efforts were interrupted for long periods after an especially vehement anti-Soviet outburst by Hitler, an anti-Nazi sortie by Stalin, or similar disturbances. The Reich's annexation of Austria and the Munich conference also interfered. But the crushing of Czechoslovakia gave Berlin a new instrument of pressure. Russia had been receiving big arms deliveries from Czechoslovakia, and after Hitler's promenade to Prague they stopped abruptly.

Evidence is available that on March 19, four days after the occupation of Prague, the Soviet government was still hostile to Germany. On that day Litvinov handed the German embassy in Moscow a tart note, condemning the seizure of Czechoslovakia, refusing to recognize Germany's action, and branding it "arbitrary, violent, and aggressive." The Russian note was couched in stronger terms than the corresponding British and French protests to Berlin. On March 17 Litvinov had proposed to the Chamberlain and Daladier governments a six-power conference in Bucharest, including Poland, Rumania, and Turkey, to consider measures against German aggression. Britain had rejected the idea as inopportune and counterproposed a four-power declaration to resist further German excesses beyond the Reich's frontiers. Moscow remembered, moreover, that after the famous Munich meeting Britain and France had guaranteed survival of Czechoslovakia's remnants, Bohemia and Moravia. On October 4, 1938, burly, red-cheeked Sir Thomas Inskip, Minister for Coordination of Defense, had told Parliament that "His Majesty's government feel under moral obligation to Czechoslovakia to treat the guaranty as being now in force. In the event, therefore, of an act of unprovoked aggression against Czechoslovakia, His Majesty's government would certainly feel bound to take all steps in their power to see that the integrity of Czechoslovakia is preserved." As Britain and France—France being committed not only by this guaranty but by its mutual-assistance pact with Czechoslovakia—did nothing when Germany carved up the republic six and one-half months later, Soviet leaders began to scratch their chins.

The first sign of Soviet cooling toward the Allies in the Moscow-London-Paris talks is recorded in the report of the British ambassador, Sir William Seeds, to Lord Halifax on his April 1, 1939, conversation with Litvinov. Litvinov reproached Britain for summarily dropping both the Soviet conference proposal and the British suggestion for a four-power declaration. "The Soviet government has had enough," Litvinov told Seeds, "and will henceforth stand apart, free from any commitments. . . . In any case, we can pursue our own policy; the Soviet government will stand aside—a course which might possibly be in our best interests."

Diplomatic reports from Moscow, reaching a government on amiable terms with Russia, suggest that at the end of April or at the very beginning of May Litvinov's government gave him one more chance to make appreciable headway in his negotiations with London and Paris. On April 16 Litvinov had presented to the British and French ambassadors the first Soviet offer of a tri-power pact of mutual aid. The Anglo-French replies had not arrived by May 4; Soviet impatience and doubts had grown; and on that day Litvinov was dismissed. Not until May 27 did Britain and France communicate their agreement in principle to such a pact, and Moscow considered their answer unsatisfactory.

Then something happened in Berlin. The Anglo-French hare had enjoyed, rather grimly enjoyed, a few weeks' start when the German tortoise entered the race for Moscow's favor. Moscow was anxious for renewal of arms deliveries from German-occupied Czechoslovakia. Berlin took the initiative to reopen negotiations on this question; they started early in May and in about ten days led to an agreement for resumption of the suspended armament shipments. Hitler, Göring, Schacht, and other Nazi policy-makers undoubtedly had in mind the gold or foreign currency which these arms sales would bring in. But the Nazi government would probably not have supplied valuable war material to Russia just then had it not hoped that this bait would tempt the Bolsheviks to a political understanding. In the latter half of May the American embassy in Moscow alertly reported to Washington that Russo-German economic negotiations were proceeding very favorably and, if successful, would probably be followed by political negotiations. When Washington received this report, agreement had already been reached for resumption of armament sales to Russia by the German-controlled industries of Bohemia.

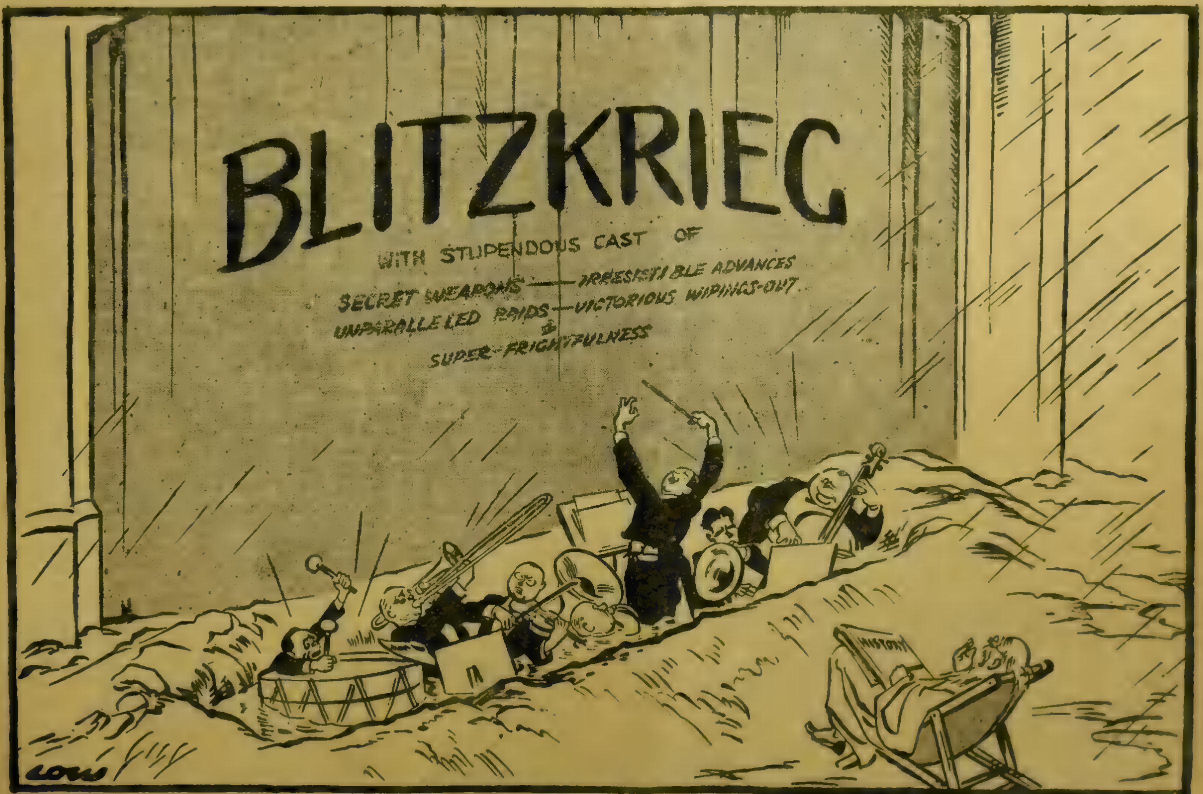
Speaking to the Supreme Soviet on May 31 Molotov, then Commissar for Foreign Affairs as well as Prime Minister, gave the Allies a veiled warning, the importance of which they may have underestimated. "We do not refuse to improve our trade relations with Germany," he said, and added that Soviet-German commercial negotiations, recently carried on, were at the moment interrupted. "But there are signs that negotiations may be resumed."

In mid-June negotiations for a Soviet political and military alliance with Britain and France were moving at the pace of a crippled snail. Then two diplomats met one afternoon. One of them was a tall, lank, slightly stooping gentleman, His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—Lord Halifax, honest, devoutly religious. The other was a short, squat Siberian with high cheekbones and slit eyes that move with darting rapidity, the Soviet ambassador to the Court of St. James's—Ivan Maisky, kindly, cynical, and irreverent. Complete contrasts in mentality and physique, both were men of charm and intelligence. Acting on his government's instructions, Maisky visited the Foreign Office to quicken the sluggish tri-power negotiations. He told Halifax he had reason to believe that if His Lordship were to visit Moscow he would be assured of a very cordial welcome. Halifax replied that he would bear the suggestion in mind. As far as the Soviet government knows, he is still bearing it in mind. Made orally but unmistakably, the invitation was never answered. This not only hurt Moscow's vanity but, probably quite unwarrantably, fanned the flames of suspicion regarding Britain's earnestness in the whole negotiations. Soviet officials say that the absence of any reply to this invitation may well have been the final incentive leading Moscow to open political negotiations with Germany in July.

In July, too, Germany resumed discussions with Moscow for a more extensive and durable contract to replace the May agreement for selling Czechoslovakian munitions to Russia. An accord was reached under which Bohemian armaments and industrial machinery were to be supplied on Russian financial terms, which German business experts considered highly unsatisfactory. In July, however, financial profit had ceased to be the principal German motive. Russia's benevolent neutrality, if not its aid as an ally, was the stake.

Toward the end of the same month, as Germany was accelerating preparations for smashing Poland, Hitler received news which made him gamble more heavily on his Russian card. He learned definitely that he would have to undertake his Polish expedition without active Italian support.

On August 2 the counsellor of the German embassy in Moscow, Gustav Hilger, reached Berlin slightly out of breath. Two days previously Chamberlain had announced in the House of Commons that Britain and France were about to dispatch military missions to Moscow. The race for a treaty with Moscow was now on in earnest. Hilger is reliably known to have hurried home with a now-or-never message and to have told Ribbentrop on the day of his arrival that the clock stood at a split second before twelve. He emphasized that unless Hitler decided at once to conclude the political pact with Russia, Moscow would probably sign the alliance with



BLITZKRIEG
WITH STUPENDOUS CAST OF SECRET WEAPONS — IRRESISTIBLE ADVANCES
UNPARALLELED RAIDS — VICTORIOUS WIPINGS-OUT.
&
SUPER-FRIGHTFULNESS HISTORY
LOW

INTERMINABLE OVERTURE

Britain and France. On August 3 Ribbentrop engaged in long consultation with the German military chiefs, and late at night the Führer decided to close the deal with Moscow. Hilger promptly returned to the Soviet capital to settle details.

One week after the event Hilger's mission, its purpose and result, was known to at least one foreign statesman in London. If the members of the British Cabinet did not know of the German-Soviet negotiations and of the imminent conclusion of the pact, it is hard to believe that they were completely taken by surprise. I have been told credibly that the gentlemen in Downing Street received many a report about the off-stage whispering between Berlin and Moscow, but that they remained skeptical to the last.

It is in this light that one must view the August 22 visit of Sir William Seeds to Molotov, to whom—on instructions—he expressed "the astonishment of His Majesty's government that the Soviet government should have concluded such an agreement with the German government at a moment when the tripartite negotiations had gone far toward successful conclusion, and that they should have carried on the negotiations with Germany without a single word to His Majesty's government or to the French government, with whom the Soviet government were already in treaty relations." In his bitter interview with Molotov, Seeds described this as an act of bad faith.

Göring has not always clung to the idea he sketched for me on a summer's day in 1930. He has toyed with interchangeable plans. In 1930 he visualized a German-Russian campaign against the Western powers, or at least against France, after which the Nazis would turn on their Bolshevik ally. But in 1935, 1937, and 1938 he strongly hinted to Poland's leaders that he wished an alliance with the Poles against Russia. On his visit to Warsaw in January, 1935, he told the Polish Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Count Jan Szembek, that Poland was the link between the Baltic and the Black Sea and that great opportunities awaited it in the Ukraine. In February, 1937, he told Marshal Rydz-Smigly that Russia, whether monarchist, liberal, or bolshevist, was a menace to both Poland and Germany, and that in this vital respect Polish and German interests dovetailed. In February, 1938, he told Rydz-Smigly that he held a poor opinion of the Red armed forces and that it would not be difficult to defeat the Soviets in war, again stressing the common concern of Germany and Poland to meet the Russian political danger.

Now that he has the Nazi pact of friendship with Russia, will he and Hitler try to transform it into a full-fledged military alliance? And has Göring abandoned that lunch-time dream of war upon the West only as a prelude to a German march on Moscow?

Everybody's Business

By KEITH HUTCHISON

Profits Without Honor

WALL STREET these days is completely listless. For months past—ever since the brief September spasm in fact—price movements have been extremely narrow, and the volume of business has been so contracted that a million-share session has ranked for headlines. If the stock market really reflected the condition of industry, as many Wall Streeters claim that it does, we should expect to find business practically stagnant.

When we turn, however, from stock quotations to corporate accounts we get an entirely different picture. Last year, it appears, saw a really sensational expansion in profits, and the current outlook, in the opinion of many corporate executives, is by no means unfavorable. Although the war boom failed to materialize last fall, the final quarter of 1939 showed a steep rise in industrial production and a much steeper one in earnings; so that even those industries which had been lagging in the earlier part of the year were able to report good results for the whole twelve months.

According to the current bulletin of the National City Bank, the combined net profits of 960 leading companies in 1939, after deduction of taxes and the deficits shown by about one-tenth of the total, amounted to approximately $1,281,000,000, as compared with $647,000,000 in 1938. On the net worth of the group as a whole this represents a return of 8.4 per cent as against one of 4.2 per cent the previous year. The following figures from the Wall Street Journal show the results of some of the more important industrial and commercial groups for 1939 and 1938, together with the number of companies included in each classification and the percentage change:

	1939 Earnings	1938 Earnings	Percentage of Increase
Autos and trucks (6)	$224,424,424	$120,439,882	86.3
Auto parts and equipment (35)	23,257,755	3,719,042	525.3
Building supplies (38)	59,720,745	31,943,244	86.9
Chain and dept. stores (16)	62,988,505	54,712,209	15.1
Chemicals (11)	121,627,460	69,469,644	75.1
Electrical products (17)	78,446,174	46,836,575	67.5
Farm equipment (7)	27,791,301	35,405,136	21.5*
Food products (44)	83,932,468	78,577,029	6.8
Mining and metals (19)	38,246,781	25,884,499	47.7
Steel and iron (36)	137,021,344	8,129,360†	—
Tobacco products (16)	89,147,332	86,270,126	3.3

* Decrease. † Net loss.

Turning from this evidence of capitalist resilience to the Stock Exchange, we note that the Dow-Jones average of industrial stock prices is practically unchanged from a year ago. Or, if we pick out representative dividend-paying stocks, we see that many of them are priced at a far lower ratio to earnings than in March, 1939. Can we avoid the conclusion that today in Wall Street profits are without honor?

Of course it may be argued that last year's results are water under the mill and the market is discounting the future. That is to say, the figures indicate a period of poor business ahead and a falling off in profits for 1940 as a whole. I hesitate to compete with so impersonal an oracle as the ticker-tape, but it is worth while mentioning that at this time last year market behavior was regarded by many experts as forecasting a business slump. Moreover, if we forget Wall Street and take a broader economic survey, it is hard to find any other facts pointing toward a really serious recession. It is true that in the past two months there has been a falling off in industrial output, and for the first three months of this year the Federal Reserve index of production is expected to average about 110, as compared with an average of 124 in the final quarter of 1939. For the first quarter of 1939, however, the average was only 99, for 1939 as a whole 105.

Reports from the key industries suggest that the recent setback has been most marked in steel, which was operating at nearly 100 per cent of capacity in December and has now dropped back to around 65 per cent. This ratio, it may be noted, is far higher than a year ago and is well above the break-even point. Among other industries the railroads are expected to experience their most profitable first quarter since 1930; automobile output is estimated at the largest for the period since 1929, with earnings substantially better than a year ago; the demand for copper has sharply increased; chemicals are maintaining the high level of activity achieved in late 1939; electric utilities continue to mark up new output records with earnings for January and February estimated at 8 per cent higher than in 1939.

It would seem, therefore, that a fair degree of industrial activity is being maintained despite the fact that there is little visible evidence of new capital investment—the factor on which most economists lay particular stress as a pillar of recovery. Certainly the behavior of the stock market is not such as to encourage investors to put new money into industry, but it is probable that a certain amount of expansion is being financed out of corporate reserve funds. Moreover, although there has been no war boom, there has been a sharp rise in exports during the past three months, and this seems likely to continue. The immediate economic effects of increased sales abroad, unaccompanied by an equivalent advance in imports, is very similar to that of an increase in domestic capital expenditure. That is to say, it makes for a rise in purchasing power, through the payment of additional wages, without immediately adding to the stock of consumable goods. Thus the greater amount of employment offered by the aviation, machine-tool, and other export industries is being translated into a better demand for food, household equipment, automobiles, and so on.

However, Wall Street today cannot arouse itself to consider development of this kind, for it is too engrossed with the political trees to see the economic woods. Robert Laffan, in the Wall Street Journal, tells the story of a security salesman who called on a country client recently and heard the usual lament about the country going to the dogs. He then produced figures, such as I quoted earlier, showing the tremendous gain in profits during 1939. Said the client, "I don't believe it." The state of mind illustrated by this anecdote is so widespread as to suggest that if Wall Street really wants to stimulate business it should sack its economists and engage a few good psychiatrists. I cannot help suspecting, however, that the immediate concern in that quarter is political overturn rather than business turnover.

In the Wind

TESTIFYING BEFORE the La Follette committee on the West Coast recently, Joseph di Gorgio, a fruit magnate, described the publicity fund he had raised for the Associated Farmers. He explained why he had boosted the salary of the publicity man employed from $3,000 to $5,000 by saying: "I don't think a man can live on $3,000 a year." The same hearings disclosed that workers on the Earl fruit ranch, a subsidiary of di Gorgio's, had struck because their wages were cut from $3.50 for a nine-hour day to 25 cents an hour.

A CONCERTED DRIVE against liberal textbooks in the schools is under way. Although protests against Harold Rugg's books in particular and other progressive texts in general have appeared "spontaneously" in various communities, they have two main sources. One is the Advertising Federation of America, which says liberal texts "smear" advertising; the other is Merwin K. Hart (and co.). Hart's weekly news letter foreshadowed the campaign weeks ago.

WHILE THE "independent left" which Granville Hicks and others projected last fall has gone into eclipse, Hicks himself is carrying on an extensive correspondence with unaffiliated radicals. He sends out a mimeographed letter at intervals to more than a hundred persons and publishes their comments. One wrote thanking him for conducting a "correspondence column for Marxist lonely hearts."

FACTS IN REVIEW, a Nazi propaganda bulletin, recently quoted the glowing tribute to Nazi troops paid by Sister Bogumila, an American nun who was in Poland during the invasion. "The German soldiers," according to Sister Bogumila, "brought to us the dead and wounded children that they had picked up on the road." The bulletin didn't mention who had killed the children.

THIS ADVERTISEMENT appeared last month in the Caswell Messenger, a newspaper published in Yanceyville, North Carolina: "NOTICE—I forbid anyone to hire or harbor Herman Miles, colored, during the year 1939. A. P. Dabbs, Route 1, Yanceyville."

DESPITE NEWSPAPER denials there is authentic basis for reports of a rift between Chief Justice Hughes and Frank Murphy. Hughes feels that Murphy hasn't been taking his work seriously enough, and Murphy, reliable sources insist, isn't too happy as a Supreme Court justice.

". . . FROM HIS train window the American [Sumner Welles] saw huge black signs in letters twenty feet deep on private homes and factories, proclaiming Italy's sympathies, 'Viva Il Duce,' 'Heil Hitler,' and 'Asse Berlino-Roma' [Berlin-Rome axis]. Welles retired immediately to his hotel suite and rested."—A cable from John O'Donnell to the New York Daily News.

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Will Hitler Strike at England?

A JOURNALIST of high standing who has just been in Canada writes me that many well-informed men there do not believe that the Germans will undertake a great offensive against England this spring. They argue that it is to the Germans' advantage to wait, since they are not wasting their substance as England is and are steadily getting stronger. Why, they ask, should the Germans any more than the French begin to sacrifice man-power at a ruinous rate? It is, of course, anybody's guess as to what will happen in this war, which in its character is so unprecedented. But from my point of view, based as it is on my trip to Germany in October and November, it is impossible not to believe that the Germans will make a mass attack upon England. That will not involve, as these Canadians seem to think, a tremendous loss of life on the part of the Germans. I believe that the officers with whom I talked in Germany meant what they said when they declared that they had nothing to gain from an attack on the Maginot Line, which, they admitted, would cost them not less than one million lives.

The question is simply this: Will Germany attack England with a huge air force, a great flotilla of submarines, and also with surface ships in March or April, while acting strictly on the defensive on the Rhine? I do not see how Hitler can fail to do this, for since the first of January he, Göring, Goebbels, Hess, and Dr. Ley, the head of the Workers' Front, have all made speeches announcing that England will be smashed this year by the overwhelming might of the German sword. They have proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of their country that the British Empire is to be destroyed. How can they possibly fail to make good their boasts without being tremendously weakened with their own people? Who among the masses of the German people will believe them the next time that they broadcast their views about what is to happen? I know the reply that will be made. It will be said that Hitler has already broken innumerable promises made to the German people, that he promised them peace and led them into war, and that he gets away with these contradictions and false statements.

To this my answer is that Hitler does not get away with it, that the increasing unrest and unhappiness in Germany are largely caused by the increasing recognition that he does not keep his word and that he is totally inconsistent. Every German knows that he is at war, for every German is suffering in consequence in the blacked-out cities of the Reich. He cannot forget the war for a single moment. He cannot enter a store without being aware that there is war, or travel on a train, or listen to the radio without hearing of it. And there is nothing that the average German longs for so much as for peace. Therefore the leaders who have made these distinct and specific promises as to England, notably Dr. Ley, have placed themselves in a position where they simply must make good or admit that they have misinformed and misled their people. Some of the people may not hold the Russian alliance against the regime—though I met no one who would say a good word for it; they may feel that there were hidden reasons that made the alliance necessary; but the specific pledges of Hitler and his four chief lieutenants that England is to be destroyed cannot be talked away. The people will know it if their leaders fail to make good and will realize that they are in for a long war or for defeat. If another winter comes without any dent having been made in England's armor, the stock of the Nazis will take a terrible fall. So I believe what the military men told me in Berlin, that there will be a terrific drive against England this spring when the weather makes it possible.

There is still another reason for this belief, one which the Canadians whom my friend quoted have overlooked. It is the power of the blockade. The British are carrying out their policy of economic encirclement, while the German campaign against British and neutral shipping by submarine and bomber is still far behind the record of 1917. The loss of twenty-five warships, costly in valuable lives as it is, is insignificant in comparison with the total strength of the British navy, plus the 1,700 auxiliary ships which Churchill says have been put in commission. The most startling news of the war has just appeared and, if it is verifiable, has not been played up properly by the American newspapers. It is that Rumania will refuse to supply the gasoline that Germany demands. That means the loss of absolutely essential gasoline supplies. Without the flow of Rumanian oil Hitler's time in which to beat England is severely limited. If the report is true, then more than ever the logic of the situation will drive the Nazi brigands to make one desperate effort to win the war and save their own positions and lives.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Black Native Son

THE Negro in America is confronted by two attitudes. He is treated either as an inferior and an outcast or as the member of an oppressed race who is therefore owed special consideration by "enlightened" whites. These opposite attitudes are in fact the two sides of the same coin of race prejudice, since both deny to the man who happens to be colored his standing as a human being—to be accepted or rejected as such in his relations with other human beings. This is the real tragedy of the black man in America, and this is the basic theme of "Native Son" by Richard Wright (Harper and Brothers, $2.50).

With a boldness entirely justified by the result Mr. Wright has chosen for his "hero," not a sophisticated Negro who at least understands his predicament and can adapt himself to it, but a "bad nigger," a "black ape," who is only dimly aware of his extra-human status and therefore completely at the mercy of the impulses it generates. Bigger Thomas, a twenty-year-old colored boy, lives with his family—a meek, religious mother and sister, and a younger brother who worships him—in a grisly tenement room on the South Side of Chicago. Bigger hangs out at pool halls with a gang of friends who go in for petty robbery and spend their idle hours planning "jobs" and talking about white folks, about cars and airplanes and all the symbols of power in free America which are forever flaunted yet pretty consistently forbidden to 11,000,000 of its "native sons."

In the first part of the book one gets a picture of a dark world inclosed by a living white wall to which the black inhabitants react according to their natures. Bigger's mother and sister are humble; Bigger and his friends are resentful; all feel powerless and afraid of the white world, which exploits, condescends to, and in turn fears the race it has segregated. Against this psychological and social backdrop, which hangs over the reader like an overcast sky, the terrible story of Bigger unrolls. He is removed from the WPA to be given a job as chauffeur and handy man in the establishment of a rich white real-estate operator who owns the tenement in which the Thomas family lives but who has contributed millions to Negro philanthropies. Bigger's first task is to drive Mary, the daughter of the house, to a lecture. Instead she orders him to take her to a rendezvous with her lover, Jan, a Communist, whose views she shares after the romantic fashion of the college revolutionist. In their "proletarian" exuberance Mary and Jan insist that Bigger eat and drink with them. Bigger, who is terrified of "reds" and regards the strange friendliness of Jan and Mary as only another expression of white scorn, sullenly complies. At the end, drunk and confused and frightened, he carries the girl, who cannot walk, to her room; and out of fear, when her blind mother enters, he smothers her to prevent an outcry and his own discovery. From there on the sands run out fast. Faced with the evidence of his unpremeditated murder he burns Mary's body. Then, driven by an inexplicable sense of power and release which his crime has given him, he evolves a stupid scheme for extracting ransom money, forcing his girl Bessie to act as his accomplice. When suspicion falls upon him, he kills Bessie in order to protect himself. After a police hunt during which race feeling rises and innocent Negroes are persecuted for his crime, Bigger is caught and tried while troops guard him from the anger of the mob. A Communist lawyer, Max, takes up his defense but pleads in vain, and Bigger is condemned to death.

The tale is sheer melodrama, but it is no Grand Guignol in black and white. For Mr. Wright has laid bare, with a ruthlessness that spares neither race, the lower depths of the human and social relationship of blacks and whites; and his ruthlessness so clearly springs not from a vindictive desire to shock but from a passionate—and compassionate—concern with a problem obviously lying at the core of his own personal reality that while the reader may recoil he cannot escape from the conviction that this problem is part of his reality as well. It is not pleasant to feel at the end that one is an accessory to the crimes of Bigger Thomas; but that feeling is impressive evidence of the power of Mr. Wright's indictment with its cutting and accurate title of "Native Son."

As narrative the story of Bigger Thomas carries its own dreadful fascination. Bigger's world is made real and terrifying; the theme is developed with such passion and honesty—Mr. Wright plays so directly upon the sense of guilt that is inevitably part of the white American's attitude toward his black fellow-citizens—that the critical faculties tend to be held in abeyance while one reads his book. Only afterward does one take stock of its defects as a work of art. And here, too, it is Mr. Wright who forces one's hand, for he would be the first to scorn indulgence.

The defects have to do with characterization and style. Aside from Bigger, the characters are too lightly sketched. Bigger's friends are real; the girl and her father are not; the Communist lawyer, Max, is only a voice, though a stirring one. In the case of Bigger Mr. Wright has not solved the admittedly difficult problem of projecting in terms of an ignorant and confused, though intelligent, Negro boy the forces that motivate his actions. As a result the author often ascribes to Bigger thoughts of which he is plainly incapable. The situation is saved because Bigger's behavior is authentic and because Mr. Wright's analysis of the roots of that behavior is so patently true.

Mr. Wright's style often reminds one of a stream "riled" by a heavy storm. Its element of Biblical rhetoric is not out of place since it is part of the colloquial heritage of the Negro in America, but there is in addition a bookish quality, often encountered in the self-educated writer, which should be weeded out. Mr. Wright's boldness in choosing to develop his theme through the story of a "bad nigger" is all to the good, but his flair for the melodramatic could bear curbing.

These defects cannot be described as minor, but they are extenuated by the wealth of evidence in "Native Son" that they can be overcome by a writer whose talent and seriousness are apparent on every page, who displays a maturity of thought and feeling beside which the eloquence of "The Grapes of Wrath" grows pale. And Mr. Wright's youth demonstrates once more that maturity is not necessarily a matter of years. MARGARET MARSHALL

Watch Over Hellhounds

THE STORM BREAKS. By Frederick Birchall. Viking Press. $3.

ACCORDING to a story current in pre-war Vienna, a newspaper correspondent knocked at the gate of heaven but was refused entrance by St. Peter for having served the truth of Mammon instead of the truth of God. In his despair he turned to hell, but was not admitted there either, since the gatekeeper was afraid his articles would imperil Satan's dictatorship by stirring up the evil spirits. So the errant journalistic soul settled in purgatory, started a newspaper, and—the story went—in a few days was granted a free pass both to heaven and to hell.

Mr. Birchall, not an errant soul, but a very brisk and lively correspondent of the New York Times, has had in these last eight years a "front seat" at all the prologues to hell. Moving, as events moved, from one spot to the other, he watched "the Cavalcade of the Thirties" as he captions the burning of the Reichstag, the storming of the workers' houses in Vienna, the Dollfuss murder, the Hitler blood bath, the Czechoslovak tragedy, and the rest, for his job was "to provide not opinions but news." That this job from the newspaper standpoint was brilliantly done needs scarcely to be said.

Mr. Birchall has a keen sense for the picturesque, and his vivid, colorful, dramatic narratives never bore the reader. Out of gratitude for his admirable descriptions we might even overlook such slight slips as his reference to Thomas G. Masaryk as an "American school teacher," though Masaryk was perhaps the only real statesman of post-war Europe whose biography would be worth knowing. In the first chapter "the proud Magyars" fight against Nazi ideology, but in a later chapter "minor beasts of prey, Hungary and Poland are . . . jackals who share the corpse of Czechoslovakia." I don't think jackals are, as a rule, very proud.

From a chapter dedicated to the memory of a "good dictator," we learn how much Pilsudski did for the poor Polish peasants, who "now even had a little money in their banks . . . and were able to eat meat at least once a week"; but at the funeral of the good dictator the same peasants, gathered spontaneously along the two-hundred-mile route of the funeral train, were "poor beyond any estimate of poverty in our richer countries." And now we know, of course, how usefully the Marshal spent the poor peasant taxpayers' money on showy armaments. I am afraid no such thing as a "good dictator" is conceivable, because all dictatorships are bound to be militaristic and if they are large in scope are bound to become an international menace, for they always need an external enemy upon whom to blame their economic troubles. The dictator himself may of course be a man who is abstemious, loves children—even illegitimate ones if there are plenty—and lives up to his own moral standards, as both Mussolini and the Führer unquestionably do. However, since the author is a journalist and does not teach political science, such mistakes are easily condoned.

Mr. Birchall thinks that the events he watched were "the forces that wrecked the peace" of Europe. It was not Hitler who produced Nazism, but Nazism that produced Hitler, and the forces behind Nazism were the hopeless quandary of the middle class, which had failed to make the war a profitable enterprise, the hopeful efforts of the victor powers to back reaction in the defeated countries, and the Bolshevik scare, which made them complacently overlook German rearming while MacDonald's pacifism lulled British public opinion into the mood of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

If the same danger did not threaten after the present war, we should gladly share the author's wishful thoughts that "free people will then have the task of . . . putting together a shattered world"; but what we know of history rather substantiates Mr. Birchall's opposite yet apposite maxim: "Optimism may be incurable, but it should have limits." However, neither the pleasure which the reading of an extremely well-written book gives us nor the author's optimism is limited. He apparently wants to use his journalistic free pass not only to hell but also to heaven. May God grant his heart's desire. RUSTEM VAMBERY

Health for the Millions

THE PATIENT'S DILEMMA. By Hugh Cabot. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

HEALTH IN HANDCUFFS. By John A. Kingsbury. Modern Age Books. 75 cents.

IT MUST be fairly obvious to readers of The Nation that the relation between the doctor and the public is at the present time under serious scrutiny; but this is not the only phase of medicine that faces change and reorganization. Hospitals and other public-health facilities have recently been the scene of new and vital undertakings. In the past few years a number of surveys have been published on medical facilities, both local and national. Many of these surveys have been backed, at least temporarily, by large organizations. In addition, Paul de Kruif and James Rorty have dramatized certain phases of our present medical insufficiency. Despite these efforts, however, there has been no general awakening, even in liberal minds, to the immensity of the problem of national health. When the organized forces of conservatism descended on Washington with the avowed purpose of scuttling the Wagner bill, no liberal opposition was encountered.

Seeking an explanation for this general public apathy, I recently asked Stuart Chase for his opinion. His reply was that the urgency of the problem of unemployment seems to overshadow everything else. This view is interesting, as it echoes a remark made by Josephine Roche in 1934, apropos of a certain health project for the underprivileged. Miss Roche expressed the view that it seemed futile to cure these people when they had neither jobs to go to nor the wherewithal to maintain their health. These opinions show how faintly the problems of national health have touched even our most social-minded citizens.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

In "The Patient's Dilemma," an efficient and highly respected doctor explains to the public some of the problems, both medical and financial, that medicine has to meet today. Dr. Cabot's account is thus an inside story. "Health in Handcuffs" is from the pen of a noted investigator and one-time head of the Milbank Memorial Fund's investigation into the costs of medical care. Dr. Kingsbury's many years of fact-collecting in this difficult field were so successful that the A. M. A. found it expedient to have him removed. Granted the premise that national health is an important public issue, both books should be considered in some detail.

After describing many of the separate functions of medicine, Dr. Cabot remarks that the reader no doubt is confused, but this is inevitable, because the subject itself is in a confused state at the present time. That point is not as widely recognized as it should be. Medicine, like everything else, is developing—becoming less and less an art, and more and more a science. It has achieved a fairly good separation from its background of magic, but the change from art to science is of necessity difficult. The A. M. A. would have medicine remain an art, and at times you can even see the robes of priestcraft. The A. M. A.'s doctor, with his all-sufficient black bag, is completely exposed by Dr. Cabot, who cites the necessity of X-ray equipment for both diagnosis and therapy, and the increasing use of quantitative and qualitative chemical tests that require laboratory facilities and trained technicians.

With the advance of medicine both diseases and treatment have become more specific, and honest physicians, feeling unable to cope with the entire field, have specialized in certain branches; but since the patient has to be treated as a whole, groups of these specialists have banded together to do it. This type of medical organization has come to be known as "group practice." The most famous of these groups, of course, has been the Mayo Clinic, of which Dr. Cabot is an outstanding member. He is therefore well qualified to discuss the value and necessity of group practice in its proper perspective. The A. M. A. fought this new unit in medical organization so bitterly that it was finally indicted in Washington in 1938. Dr. Cabot reveals that whereas an immense amount of knowledge is available for the alleviation of suffering and the elevation of national health standards, it is not being used, primarily on account of costs, and secondarily because of a conservative political group that has control of the A. M. A. Dr. Cabot is in favor of a general medical council, federal in nature, to maintain standards and to study new problems as they arise. He thinks medical care should be under state control, with federal aid, but is strongly opposed to state establishment of standards. The present system of independent standards for each state has produced such incongruous results as the following: Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island, taking advantage of what is known about the prevention and control of smallpox, had not a single case from 1933 to 1937, inclusive. In these states vaccination is compulsory. Montana, however, without such a law, had 2,467 cases during the same period. Compare the populations and do your own arithmetic. Remember also that there is no law preventing the inhabitants of Montana from engaging in interstate travel.

One of the ways in which the A. M. A. has attempted to chastise its liberal members has been to deprive them of hospital affiliations. Perhaps in so doing the A. M. A. has inadvertently done medicine a good service, by calling public attention to the doctor-hospital relation. It is not generally known that many medical men who have passed their examinations and are practicing do not have access to a hospital where they may treat their more serious cases, even when hospitalization is absolutely necessary. Previous to the A. M. A.'s use of disbarment from hospital practice as a political tool, the reason for disbarment from a hospital was usually incompetence, although there have been other reasons. In cases of incompetence the doctor is forbidden to practice in association with his fellows, yet retains his license to practice on an ignorant public outside the hospital. Federal standardization would take care of both of these abuses. The properly qualified physician would not find himself without a hospital in which to care properly for his patients, and the doctor too poorly trained to practice in affiliation with a hospital would be eliminated from private practice as well.

"Health in Handcuffs" is in the main a summary of the findings of various committees that have worked on the costs of medical care. After firmly basing his position on the need for change in the medical system, Dr. Kingsbury proceeds to carry the war to the A. M. A. It is true that the A. M. A. has today changed its stand on a few issues, but I do not think that the changes have been important enough to weaken any of the accusations or facts presented by Dr. Kingsbury. In fact, the action of the association during the hearings on the Wagner bill shows that it has not changed its stripes in the slightest. The A. M. A. frequently stated that British medical men are completely out of sympathy with the nation's health-insurance system. Dr. C. G. Anderson, medical secretary of the British Medical Association, branded this as a gross misrepresentation:

> Chiefly the A. M. A. and its members who oppose national health insurance allege that it has proved to be a failure and detrimental to the interests of both profession and public. Nothing could be further from the truth. As a matter of fact, most of our physicians are eager for panel service. From the viewpoint of the public, the insurance act has been equally successful, and any attempt to represent it as being otherwise proceeds from a misapprehension of the facts.

A detailed analysis of Senator Wagner's National Health bill is given, followed by a report of the Congressional hearings, at which organized medicine did its best to kill the bill. The connection between the Gannett publications and the A. M. A. is given in factual form, for the reader to draw his own conclusions. Since this bill is not dead, but is to be resubmitted, there is yet time for liberal assistance to be lined up behind it.

Much of the awakening in England to the need of health reforms was brought about by public-spirited scientists, especially those working in the field of nutrition. If we had strong departments of public health in our universities, we might depend on their leadership to carry on the battle here. But our public-health professors have been a queer mixture of medical artist, politician, and faddist, and have been mostly anti-New Deal. If public health in the United States is to be bettered, an aroused public will have to do the job itself by supporting such bills as those presented by Senator Wagner, which had the benefit of extensive study by the Public Health Service. In conclusion, let me point out that there is no field where additional labor could be better used than in the various branches of hospital service, both in nursing care and in technical laboratory work. A sizable contingent of the army of the unemployed could be trained and absorbed in this field, with distinct benefit to national health.

HUGH H. DARBY

Augustan World

CAROLINE OF ENGLAND. By Peter Quennell. Viking Press. $3.75.

THE present life of George II's consort follows swiftly (and avengingly) on the heels of R. L. Arkell's dreary "Caroline of Ansbach." Miss Arkell sought to restore Caroline's celebrity, but in vain, for all she did was to turn an obscure queen into a dull one. Mr. Quennell now makes clear—what any reader of Hervey's Memoirs already knew—that Caroline was anything but dull; that she was shrewd, courageous, and worldly; that she played the wife of a strutting and clumsy fool with magnificent good sense; and that she exerted over affairs of state a greater influence than any other queen consort of modern England. Nor has Mr. Quennell merely recreated Caroline: he has lighted up that world, at once brilliant and stodgy, that Caroline inhabited, and introduced those odd, capable, conspiratorial people among whom she moved. His book, subtitled An Augustan Portrait, may claim many of the merits of Augustan writing. It is neither straight history nor straight biography, but a mesh of both; and though it has rather more polish than weight, on its own terms it is a delightful job.

In reviewing Miss Arkell's book a few months back, I ventured to characterize Caroline and to suggest what she suffered in the way of a father-in-law, a husband, and a son. I need therefore not rehearse those matters here, or dilate upon the notorious quarrelsomeness of the early Hanoverians; it is enough to say that Mr. Quennell has hit off Caroline very well and her husband even better. But something should be said of the son they detested, Frederick Prince of Wales, since Mr. Quennell has been at special pains to reinterpret him. On the subject of "Fred, who was alive and is dead" the history books have been extremely harsh and unfavorable; Mr. Quennell plausibly contends that the history books took their cue from Hervey, who loathed Frederick, and that the Prince was less a villain than a weakling. Certainly he was much sinned against by his family, though Mr. Quennell is no better able than anyone else to account in full for Caroline's almost psychopathic abhorrence of her son.

With far more feeling for the period than Miss Arkell, and a far better knowledge of its facts, Mr. Quennell has vividly evoked its social life and sketched in its culture. His scenes of the court are done with style; his pictures of the courtiers, the conspirators, the unattractive German mistresses, the engaging English maids of honor, with gusto and wit. He pushes Pope into the limelight, touches on the Bolingbrokes and Lady Marys, is solicitous for Chesterfield. But the greatest object of his interest—someone who really shares the honors with Caroline herself—is that greatest source of his material, Lord Hervey.

Of all the figures satirized and reviled in an age of satire and vilification, Hervey has assuredly come off the worst. His foppishness and effeminacy were, and still are, a joke; there is an anecdote (which Mr. Quennell does not repeat) of Hervey being asked at dinner if he would have some beef, and replying: "Beef! Faugh, don't you know I never eat beef, nor horse, nor any of those things?" A silky and sinuous fellow, he was not unreasonably distrusted and disliked; he had a spiteful tongue and a waspish pen—a pen that has brilliantly if unreliably preserved the court life of his time. He was clever enough to exchange sallies with Pope, and got sufficiently the better of him to win his undying hatred: in the character of Sporus—"that mere white curd of Ass's milk"—Hervey lives on as hero of the most violent piece of abuse ever written by the greatest master of it. But despite his

> Beauty that shocks you, parts that none can trust,
> Wit that can creep, and pride that licks the dust,

Hervey was a man of uncommon intelligence and, despite his womanishness, of remarkable efficiency, and he served during many years as a sort of adjutant to Caroline and Walpole. Mr. Quennell, fascinated by the man and aware that Pope's ferocity was unfair to him, has played him to the hilt and produced a most lively figure.

One might wish that Mr. Quennell had dealt as brilliantly with a far more important figure, the most important figure, indeed, of his time. But to do justice to Robert Walpole, one must study in all their complexity the political movements of the age, which does not suit the scheme of Mr. Quennell's book. His Walpole is accordingly rather the burly Norfolk squire who talked dog-Latin to George I and filth to Caroline than the great Prime Minister whose virtue was to make England prosper and whose sin was to make her love prosperity too well. Mr. Quennell, by keeping things largely on a personal plane, has filled his book with absorbing personalities, some of whom he elucidates in an epigram. What could be neater than that Chesterfield's wordliness "was as earnest as other men's saintliness," or that to George II "adultery was a duty, marriage a pleasure"?

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Shorter Notices

THE IDEA OF A CHRISTIAN SOCIETY. By T. S. Eliot. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

The liberal democratic world, declares Mr. Eliot in a book which will commend itself even to hostile readers by the chastity and economy of its style, has no faith which it can set against the demonic faith of the new political religions of blood and soil. In so far as it has a religion, it is the worship of profit; and that is a faith even less acceptable than racism. It is, in fact, so unacceptable that the liberal world practices its worship surreptitiously while outwardly conforming to a "Christian" past. There will be many who will profit from Mr. Eliot's interesting diagnosis of our ills, even if they find his cure irrelevant. His cure is an Anglicized version of the Catholic conception of a society which is prevented from worshiping itself, its instrumentalities, mechanisms, and subordinate values, by being officially committed to the worship of God. A group of Christian élite will see to it that the implications of this worship are implemented in social action. Mr. Eliot thinks that the abuses which this kind of official Christianity developed in the Middle Ages can be obviated; but are they not inherent in the system? It is well to remember that, whatever the superficialities of so-called "liberal" culture, it was, on its creative side, a needed and successful protest against the religiously sanctified social injustice of the feudal order. General Franco's Spain reminds us that it is as impossible now as then to give religion political power without corrupting it.

THE NEW WORLD ORDER. By H. G. Wells. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

Quick communication and mechanical power have produced a dislocation between the real nature of the world and the obsolete framework of organization which is rapidly carrying us toward world revolution. The only possible alternative to collapse is socialism—not of the Marxian variety—based on law (the Rights of Man) and knowledge. Though not new, the Wellsian argument appears in fresh perspective, newly implemented by events.

THE LANGUAGE OF LOGIC. By James MacKaye. Dartmouth College Publications. $3.50.

An exceptionally clear analysis of the nature of meaning, the technique of definition, and their relation to the nature of existence. The author simplifies the popular question of semantics by demonstrating its basis in traditional logic.

DRAMA

"The Fifth Column"

"THE FIFTH COLUMN" was written and published in play form by Ernest Hemingway. It was "adapted" by Benjamin Glazer and has now been performed by the Guild at the Alvin Theater. If a consensus of reviewers' opinions is sufficient evidence, it is a fine play and ought to be a great success. In my judgment, however, it is not quite the first nor very likely to become quite the second.

Mr. Hemingway's report on the war in Spain begins well. In fact, the first of the two acts is, in its entirety, tense and absorbing. But the expectations created by that first act are never fulfilled, and despite sincere, perhaps even brilliant acting and staging the very subject matter itself seems to elude the authors, and what had begun as a complex picture of life in a war-torn city ends stagily as the love story of a hard-boiled hero whose grandiose gestures may be authentic but are too familiar and expected to carry very deep conviction. The fault does not seem to lie where one would have been most inclined to expect a fault, for the writing in the first act at least is not only vivid and terse but little marred by that tendency toward exhibitionism which is its author's besetting sin. He does not wear his lack of heart on his sleeve; he is

Hungry Children Drawing by Kathe Kollwitz

REMEMBER—THE SPANISH CHILDREN

We have just received the following cable from Eric G. Muggeridge, our executive secretary:

Paris, France.

"MADE ARRANGEMENTS FOR POLISH CHILDREN TO ENTER OUR COLONIES ONE BOY ELEVEN YEARS OLD WALKED FROM WARSAW TO PARIS PLEASE AMERICA ALSO REMEMBER THE SPANISH CHILDREN."

War in Europe has intensified the suffering of the Spanish Children. France has a million additional refugees today. Word comes from our nine children's colonies in and around Biarritz, France, telling us of the pressing need of the Spanish children outside our gates. We have the facilities to care for these children. We need your aid. At the moment only Spanish children may be "adopted"—but funds are needed immediately to rent new houses and furnish them for the Polish children.

Your "adoption" today means the taking of a child out of a Concentration center. The child is placed in our children's colonies immediately. Perhaps, if you cannot "adopt" a child by yourself, you might ask a group of friends to join in the "adoption." An "adoption" costs $9.00 per month.

You will receive a photograph of your Foster Child along with its history. You will also receive personal letters and drawings from the child. You will, of course, want to correspond with your Foster Child.

If you cannot afford to "adopt" a child, your contribution, no matter how small, to help these children will be truly helpful and appreciated.

Our funds are cabled directly to our colonies in Biarritz, through the Chase National Bank. Safe arrival is guaranteed. The doors of our colonies are open to all children.

EDNA BLUE, Executive-Chairman.

PARTIAL LIST OF SPONSORS AND FOSTER PARENTS

Helen Hayes
Dr. Mary E. Woolley
Thomas Mann
Archibald MacLeish
Lillian D. Wald
Emanuel Feuermann
Booth Tarkington
Eleanor Roosevelt
Efrem Zimbalist

Walter Bluh, Treasurer
FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN, INC.
55 West 42nd Street, New York City

A. I wish to become a Foster Parent of a Spanish Child for one year. If possible, sex .... age .... I will pay $9.00 per month for one year. Payments to be made quarterly ...., yearly ...., monthly .... I enclose herewith my first payment $............

B. I cannot "adopt" a child but would like to help by donating $..............

Name..

Address..

City.............................. State............ Date...........

not, to revive the familiar taunt, too overwhelmingly aware of the hair on his chest. But he does abandon a complex and difficult subject for one that is relatively easy and already stereotyped, with the result that the spectator finds his interest declining step by step after the mid-point of the play has been reached and as the themes which had been brilliantly suggested in the first half of the piece recede farther and farther into the background.

These themes are all concerned in one way or another with the difficulty of reconciling the aims of a holy war with the methods which it must inevitably use, and with the contrast inevitably apparent between the cause for which one is fighting and the individuals in whose name the cause is fought for. It is not merely that the hero, a young American correspondent who has been drawn by his sympathy for the Loyalist government into the dangerous business of counter-espionage, cannot fail to realize that the drunken electrician of the hotel in which he lives is no very inspiring specimen of that proletariat for which he is endangering his life; it is also that his superior, the officer in chargė of espionage, has been completely dehumanized by the process of fighting for humanity, and that the ruthlessness which he himself believes to be necessary remains nevertheless debasing when it is translated into a concrete instance—when, for instance, he has to bully a frightened boy wrongly suspected of treachery or shoot a fat German general in the back when the latter, a captive, will not walk fast enough. But these themes, brilliantly suggested, are never fully treated, and they are, I think, left undeveloped, not because they are not what the author is really interested in, but because it is plainly so much easier to develop instead the easily managed story of the hero's love affair with an American girl and his final decision not to follow her out of Spain to safety. Probably both original author and adapter are familiar with the fact that puzzled critics of the drama often fall back upon the statement that a play under discussion "doesn't come to a focus." The trouble with "The Fifth Column" is that it does—at the wrong place. In the opening scenes several themes are in solution, and it is the least interesting of all that crystallizes.

In the past, when Mr. Hemingway has been beset with doubts he has sometimes seemed to imply that the sensible thing for any modern man faced with a difficult problem to do is just to forget all about it and go out and kill someone, or failing that, some animal—even if it is only a lion in Africa or a skilfully tortured bull in an arena. In the present instance there is little suggestion of that attitude, and he ends instead with a careful debate in which the girl who argues that Americans should leave dying Europe to wallow in its own blood is answered by a German refugee who explains that fascism cannot be fought with any chance of success except upon its own frontier. But the difficulty with this last conclusion is simply that by the time one has got around to it in the last few minutes of the performance the whole play has become so artificial that the argument has ceased to seem very real and has become merely the inevitable end of a play.

Franchot Tone plays the hero with great sincerity; Lee Cobb, the German equally well. Katherine Locke is also excellent in the faintly drawn role of the girl, and Lenore Ulric does what is required as the inevitable child of nature turned prostitute.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

"THE FIGHT FOR LIFE" (United States Film Service Production) is for many reasons the most exciting picture I have seen since I began conducting this column. Its theme, childbirth in the slums of our great cities, seems at first unsuitable for movie treatment because the industry, in imposing limits on its own work, has curtailed as well our expectations. Two pictures, "The Grapes of Wrath" and "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet," have recently broken down these limits to a certain extent. "The Fight for Life" offers a new and even more striking example of how effective a medium the screen may become once the purely commercial principle of "nothing but entertainment" is left behind.

Pare Lorentz, director of the United States Film Service, whose film "The River" set a high standard for the American documentary, wrote, directed, and produced "The Fight for Life," taking the material from one chapter of Paul de Kruif's book of the same name. By combining elements of film drama with straight camera reporting he has created a new genre which is inadequately called semi-documentary. There are actors and non-actors—"doctors, students, nurses, women of the city." There are staged scenes and unstaged ones. But one is never aware of the difference, and one has to look at the program to distinguish the "women of the city" from the actresses who impersonate some of them. Here is a genuine documentary minus the dead moments of straight reporting—the best non-fiction picture yet produced.

After a childbirth which is fatal to the mother, a young interne (played by Myron McCormick, who is excellent in his earnest, taciturn simplicity) joins the staff of a maternity center in Chicago. Here pregnant women receive advice and medical care, and from this center doctors and nurses rush by day and by night into the slums to deliver babies and to fight against the principal causes of death in childbirth—uncleanliness, malnutrition, ignorance. We learn with the young interne the exciting business of bringing children into the world; and the picture gives in an unobtrusive way a tremendous amount of information which no future father and no expectant mother can afford to ignore. It protests powerfully, by simply showing the truth and without once descending to the propaganda level, against shameful conditions, and at the same time celebrates the men who fight them.

Technically the picture is excellent. Hollywood could not have done a better job. Artistically it is full of unforgettable moments. Notice, for example, the dramatic use of the black-gloved fingers of the doctor counting the heartbeats of the unborn child. Dorothy Adams as the young mother and Dorothy Urban as the grandmother in the terrific scene in which a mother is saved by means of a blood transfusion give performances of unsurpassed power. Again, as with "The River," the United States Film Service and Pare Lorentz have made film history.

I am sorry not to be able to call "Abe Lincoln in Illinois" (RKO) a great picture, though it bears evidence of the efforts which have been made to produce a film worthy of the theme. Robert E. Sherwood himself adapted his successful stage play for the screen, but many values of the play have been lost in the process and nothing essential has been added. Too much space is given to background scenes which should have been lightly sketched in, and likewise Lincoln's inner life and development have been neglected. Raymond Massey is convincing as the mature Lincoln in the latter part of the picture, but from the first moment he seems too conscious of his future important role as President of the United States. The direction is straight and unimaginative. There are many good and interesting scenes, and the picture is worth seeing, though it only makes one realize that the real picture about Abraham Lincoln has not yet been done.

The French picture "The Baker's Wife," based on an incident in a novel by Jean Giono, directed and produced by Marcel Pagnol and featuring the great actor Raimu, is a most humane, entertaining, and delightfully frivolous comedy. Its witty dialogue is often untranslatable, but John Erskine's English titles will enable anybody to enjoy what is in many respects the best film of its kind to come across the Atlantic. FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

TOSCANINI'S new set of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony (M-640, $8) offers one of the greatest performances ever put on records, for which posterity will thank Victor. But I doubt that it will thank Victor and N. B. C. for the hard, wooden sound which the performance has on these records because of the unfavorable conditions under which the recording was done.

For several years we have heard about a recording of the second-act duet of "Tristan und Isolde" by Flagstad and Melchior; and some of us have hoped that the gala occasion would be used to give us on records what we never hear at the Metropolitan—the entire duet without cuts. On five records we could have had it; but of the actual five records of the Victor set (M-644, $10) two are devoted to Brünnhilde's Immolation from "Götterdämmerung" and one to the Liebestod from "Tristan," leaving two which give us the second-act duet only from "O sink hernieder," and this with the Metropolitan's cut between Brangäne's two warnings; and whereas the first time the warning is sung by an unnamed singer, the second time, when Brangäne's voice should interrupt the duet, only her orchestral accompaniment is recorded (which leads me to suspect that the unnamed singer, who is heard only faintly the first time, is Flagstad herself). This is bad enough; and in addition, instead of a balanced recording in which the orchestra is heard as clearly as the voices, there is the effect of microphones close to the singers—the effect, that is, of an orchestra subordinated and obscured. And the reason is simply that this is not primarily a recording of Wagner's music but primarily a recording of Flagstad's and, to a lesser degree, Melchior's voice.

The improvement in recording in the five years since Flagstad's first record of the Liebestod is evident in her new one. One hears it in the greater distinctness and sharpness of the s's and t's in "Seht ihr's nicht," and in the similar

64 TO 1
You're right with LAFAYETTE'S
Radio Line

Is it a portable? . . table model for office, den or "upstairs" . . . car radio . . . magnificent phono-combination? Lafayette has it. 64 distinct—and distinctive—models to choose from. All different in style and purpose, yet alike in this: dollar for dollar, Lafayette is finer in tone, superior in performance, greater in value than any other radio of your acquaintance. We invite you to visit our showroom nearest you for convincing proof of this statement. Or write for free catalog NC3. You can spend more, but you cannot buy a better value than Lafayette.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, [illegible] J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

You may buy

BOOKS

through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

AMERICA'S LIVELIEST QUARTERLY presents unpublished work by

D. H. LAWRENCE

DELILAH AND MR. BIRCUMSHAW, a story (Spring 1940)
THE MARRIED MAN, a full-length play (Autumn 1940)
THE MERRY-GO-ROUND, a full-length play (Winter or later)

Other items for Spring 1940 and later:

Work by HAVELOCK ELLIS—BURTON K. WHEELER—OWEN LATTIMORE—BRUCE BLIVEN—PAUL V. MCNUTT—PHILIP MURRAY—VINCENT SHEEAN—ELIZABETH MADOX ROBERTS—HAMILTON BASSO—JOSEPHINE W. JOHNSON—JOHN REED—JULIAN HUXLEY—SEAN O'CASEY—HENRY HANDEL RICHARDSON—RUTH PITTER—and others.

$1 TAKE ADVANTAGE OF THIS SPECIAL OFFER—$1 WITH THIS COUPON WILL BRING YOU A 9-MONTHS SUBSCRIPTION IF YOU ARE A NEW SUBSCRIBER—AT ONE-THIRD THE REGULAR PRICE.

THE VIRGINIA QUARTERLY REVIEW N
Charlottesville, Virginia.

I am enclosing a dollar for your special offer. Begin with the Spring 1940 number.

NAME...
ADDRESS..
....

A Spring Offering

which saves you

$4.00

A Year of:

THE NATION
Regular Subscription Price $5.00
HARPERS MAGAZINE
Regular Subscription Price $4.00
CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS
Regular Membership $3.50

—All for only $8.50

As a reader of The Nation, richest weekly source of information about the American and the world scene, you will enjoy Harpers, the leading monthly in its field. You will profit by membership in Consumers Union, which brings you both the unabridged monthly CU Reports, and the annual Buying Guide.

•

Or, you may combine

1 Year of The Nation & Harpers Magazine or 1 Year of The Nation & Consumers Union

for only $6.50

Subscriptions to these combinations may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Upon request, attractive gift card will be sent.

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.
3-16-40

I inclose ☐ $8.50 ☐ $6.50

Please send:

The Nation to: ....

Harpers to: ....

Consumers Union Reports to: ....

Extra Postage: Foreign—Nation, $1; Harpers, $1; C. U., 50c. Canadian—Nation, 50c; Harpers, 50c; C. U., 50c.

distinctness and sharpness in the reproduction of the voice, which make it amazingly and confusingly lifelike—confusingly, since hearing the more lifelike reproduction one may think one is hearing the more beautiful voice; whereas in fact the voice that is so lifelike on the new record is one which has lost the soaring opulence in its upper range that is reproduced with less distinctness and sharpness on the older record. In this range it is worn thin, with a strong tremolo; but the lower range is still sumptuous. The same confusing improvement in recording and a worse deterioration in the voice itself are to be heard in Melchior's singing on the new records of the second-act duet when they are compared with the corresponding record he made with Leider years ago. In the duet Flagstad's voice sounds as it does in the Liebestod; but on the two records of the Immolation Scene her upper range is rounder and steadier, and if her singing here is not all that I can recall in the past it is still quite wonderful. The fact is that even with its losses the voice retains enough of its extraordinary quality to make the records treasurable—and this not only to a person interested in the voice but even, despite the cuts and other defects, to a person interested in the music. But no less treasurable are the earlier records of the music with Leider, Austral, and the younger Flagstad; and I hope these will remain available.

There have been, all along, persons who have insisted on the distinction between the mere beauty of Flagstad's voice and the musical and dramatic art of singers like Lilli Lehmann, Ternina, Fremstad—to say nothing of Frida Leider and Lotte Lehmann. To demonstrate this distinction one of the readers of this column has had the International Record Collectors' Club (318 Reservoir Avenue, Bridgeport, Connecticut) send me its re-recording of Fremstad's 1911 record of the Liebestod, with Verdi's "O Don Fatale" on the reverse side (No. 158, $2.25). From this re-recording the scratch and noise emerge very strong, the voice rather weak, the wheezy orchestra so weak as to leave the vocal line almost without the orchestral context that gives it continuity and, at times, sense; and while I hear evidence of a voice that was clear and strong, and phrasing that imparts continuity to the vocal line, I do not hear the subtleties of coloring which constituted the art of Fremstad, and which even this re-recording may recall to those who heard her sing in 1911. One gets a better notion of her impressive style in "O Don Fatale."

More successful is the re-recording (No. 5004, $1.75) of Muratore's 1916 record of "Elle est à moi" from "Monna Vanna" (awful music), on which his superb voice and style as I recall them are re-created in sufficient degree, I think, to be appreciable even to someone who did not hear him; but the reverse side, with an excerpt from Messager's "Fortunio," is very poor. And best are the original 1906 Eames-De Gogorza recordings (No. 20, $2.25) of "Là ci darem la mano" from "Don Giovanni" and "Crudel! perchè finora" from "Figaro"; but the voices sound different on the two sides, which were made a month apart in different studios. De Gogorza's, especially, has a brightness and color in the "Figaro" duet that it does not have in the other, and the finish and style of his singing are more impressive. Eames's voice is clear and agreeable, but no more than that, and her musical taste is not impeccable.

B. H. HAGGIN

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Letters to the Editors

Curbing Japan

Dear Sirs: The editorial on our relations with Japan which appeared in your issue of February 10 puts quite fairly the case for positive action against Japan. Your statement as to the extreme improbability of war with Japan resulting from firmness on our part seems to me sound. As you say, it is not possible to state that war cannot happen, if we, for example, impose an embargo on the export of war materials to Japan. It is also impossible to say that war will not come if we encourage the Japanese army to believe that we will stand for anything and consequently encourage it to proceed to extremes which might inflame even our peace-loving people.

From what I have learned here I am not disposed to fear that our government will make any agreement that will impair our rights in China or compromise the Chinese government, but I share your fear that complete inaction on its part may be the policy for a time, and that this will do harm to our interests.

You are quite right in believing that the Japanese government cannot depend upon its army to carry out any agreement that the Tokyo Cabinet may make with the United States or other foreign powers. Even the army in the field is not a unit controlled by one head, and the picture is further complicated by the corruption which seems to have spread through all ranks of the invading army. ROGER S. GREENE

Washington, March 5

Nazi "Law"

Dear Sirs: Why the Nazi government regards the Altmark incident as a British breach of international law is hard for me to understand. According to Dr. Franz von Liszt, formerly professor at the University of Berlin and a leading German authority on international law, the liberation of the British seamen even in neutral waters was justified. Von Liszt has pointed out that the recognized conceptions of self-defense and self-help exclude the illegality of such an act.

Aside from that, the present German regime is not usually very particular to respect foreign territorial sovereignty. In 1935 Himmler, the chief of the German police, ordered his men to arrest illegally the journalist Berthold Jacob on Swiss soil and take him to Germany. At about the same time two German police officials penetrated illegally into Czechoslovakia to destroy a secret broadcasting station. On this occasion the broadcaster, Rudolf Formis, was shot down by the two German police officers. Himmler has even boasted of the latter act in an official publication. In September, 1939, Himmler ordered that the British secret agents Best and Stevens be arrested on Dutch soil near Venlo by Gestapo officers and brought to Germany, where they are imprisoned. These are only a few cases among many.

R. M. W. KEMPNER,
Formerly First Legal Adviser in the Ministry of the Interior, Police Department, Berlin

Philadelphia, March 8

Questions for Mr. Corey

Dear Sirs: In his series of articles in recent issues of The Nation Mr. Corey criticizes the orthodox Marxist view of the rigidly defined class struggle and sees the origin of failures of the socialist movement—particularly in the Third International—in the exclusively proletarian base necessitated by this orthodox view. Emphasis on bitter class struggle—"all who are not with us are against us"—has thrown the middle classes in with the fascists, he says, and checked socialism in those countries most prepared for it. Nor does Mr. Corey hesitate to maintain, with some gymnastic logic, that this basing of the revolution on the working class alone, with the consequent alienation of the middle class, has led to a dictatorship of a middle-class bureaucracy.

I wonder if history doesn't permit a somewhat less confusing explanation. Recall Lenin's debate with the economists who wanted to have a democratic party of working-class people. Lenin's solution in "What Is to Be Done?" was an autocratic party of revolutionists of no particular class origin—middle class, clergy, or even members of the court, it didn't much matter so long as they were discontented and determined. I would suggest that Arthur Rosenberg's view of Bolshevism as a device whereby the educated middle class uses the workers to fight their revolutionary battle may be correct. Certainly the Communist Party, with its allies, presents no solid proletarian front even today. I think it significant that certain middle class groups are present in its ranks far beyond their proportions in the total population.

Mr. Corey's picture of his gradualistic Utopia is very pretty indeed, but it too raises some questions. He visualizes a central core of government-owned credit and big industries with a periphery of smaller private concerns. I wonder how long this equilibrium could last or how desirable it might be that it should. Small business seems to subsist in our monopoly economy mainly because of its cruder exploitation of cheap labor. A socialistic government would probably raise wage standards beyond what these small industries could pay and still be profitable.

Without a doubt private business will do its best—constitutional or otherwise—to hamper the transition to Utopia. Mr. Corey doesn't say what we are to do when reaction ("counter-revolution") comes out in the open using all the forces at its disposal. Yet that is probably the most crucial problem of the transition. Whatever tyrannies have arisen from the application of the "dictatorship of the proletariat," the Marxists have at least tried to solve this problem. I wish Mr. Corey would.

JOHN B. MARKS

Chicago, March 4

Italy Waives the Rules

Dear Sirs: The conduct of the Italian steamship lines since the war began deserves critical attention. In normal times the Italian lines were predominantly used by Italians, but all that changed after September. Now the flag of Savoy seems to rule the Atlantic, at least in respect to passenger business. The Italians are exploiting the opportunity to the limit, and their victims are helpless refugees.

Up to last December some 20,000 refugees came to the United States on Italian boats; the same ships are looking forward to transporting 50,000 more in the future. Italy's anti-Jewish laws have not inhibited the Italian lines from providing passage for the Jews—at exorbitant rates. After September 1 all lines of the Atlantic pool raised their rates from 30 to 50 per cent, because of the increased insurance costs and higher wages of sailors in war time. When I last investigated, the Italian line alone had not raised crew wages. Yet their rates have been steadily rising. Before November they charged passengers $170 for a third-class ticket when the United States Lines were charging only $130. Since November the Italians have introduced the deceptive fiction of "all third class"; in return for giving passengers the "run of the boat" they charge $200 to $220 for third-class berths. To financially hard-pressed refugees this is small compensation for the increased price. It is true that the United States Lines have now also raised their rates to a comparable figure, but a host of other profiteering devices remain unique with Italian ships.

A young refugee girl from Berlin took a boat from Trieste. She had made a reservation in advance, but when she came on board she was told the room was taken. The head steward then demanded—and got—fifty lire for obtaining an identical room for her. Her case, I am reliably informed, is not unusual. Refugees naturally carry a great deal of baggage. Two hundred pounds of clothes and linen are transported free, but other material is classified as "merchandise" and must be paid for at $2 a pound—lire are not accepted. And if a single piece of "merchandise" exceeds a certain limit in weight, it is measured in cubic volume, and the charge is $10 for each cubic meter. All these petty forms of legal extortion are cruel enough. But worst of all is the contemptuous and abusive language of the ship officials toward the refugees. I have heard numberless examples of the small ways in which life for the Jewish passengers is made unbearable by scornful officials.

No Italian booking office in Central Europe is supposed to reveal the detailed financial burden of the journey in advance, and especially not to refugees. I am told that a few officials are so ashamed of the extortion practiced on the ships that they have on occasion paid the fees themselves. Almost the whole refugee traffic is financed by American relatives of refugees or by refugee agencies. To that extent Americans have a very concrete reason for striving to halt this cruel—if legal—piracy.

A. P.

New York, March 7

"We Who Are About to Die"

Dear Sirs: In 1914 it was "Huns" and "Boches" and "Hang the Kaiser." Today it's "Hitler, Beast of Berlin." The truth is, the same ones who ran the last war and cleaned up on it are doing business at the old stand. They hand out the same pap about "a struggle between two totally incompatible ideas of man's destiny." Imperialist rivalries? God forbid! says The Nation—only the shadow, not the substance.

We who are about to die say, "Rot!" And we have the colonial slaves of the British, French, Italian, and American empires to prove it. We have the domestic slaves in Germany and Japan to prove it.

You don't want American participation in a physical sense? Of course you don't. But reread the files of a journal called The Nation and learn how you are helping with your present editorials to prepare the ground for it. Reread those columns that say "Never again." I've been brought up on them; you can't sell me any Chamberlain-Daladier-Blum-Roosevelt-Hoover-Nation axis.

S. L. J.

Mt. Vernon, N. Y., March 6

Never a Socialist

Dear Sirs: In your issue of December 9, 1939, in a review signed by James Rorty, he lists me along with others as a Socialist. Never at any time in my life was I a member of the Socialist Party, and I cannot imagine where Rorty obtained any authority for the statement.

GEORGE CREEL

San Francisco, February 27

A Long Association

Dear Sirs: May I congratulate The Nation upon its seventy-fifth anniversary and upon the very significant issue which marks the event.

In my childhood I knew of the weekly arrival of The Nation, and heard my father's often-expressed admiration of E. L. Godkin. Earlier still, before my arrival upon the scene, The Nation published letters written by my father, Richard Dewey, M. D., from Germany, where from September, 1870, to April, 1871, he served as volunteer surgeon in the Franco-Prussian War.

I feel therefore a reflected pride of association with The Nation; I have also an appreciation of it entirely my own. In the years since 1914 this truly liberal journal has provided fearless comment and democratic outlook on the chaotic events of our time. Like another of your congratulators, I am "uncomfortable until I find time to give The Nation a careful reading."

ETHEL L. DEWEY

Chicago, February 20

Llewelyn Powys's Letters

Dear Sirs: Alyse Gregory, widow of Llewelyn Powys, is collecting his letters for publication. She would appreciate it if anyone having letters from him would send them to me for forwarding to her in England. All originals will be promptly copied and returned. They may be addressed to me at 519 West 121st Street.

AGNES A. DE LIMA

New York, February 23

Bibliography of a War

Dear Sirs: I am preparing a comprehensive bibliography on the Spanish civil war which will list all books, pamphlets, and magazine articles dealing with the war. Prose, poetry, and fiction will be included. I shall be happy to acknowledge any assistance your readers may offer. Address me at 5989 St. Urbain Street.

SAMUEL H. BROWN

Montreal, March 8

CONTRIBUTORS

JOHN RICHMOND is a free-lance journalist, formerly on the staff of the Literary Digest. He has contributed to the Off the Record section of Fortune.

FREDERICK KUH is the London correspondent of the United Press.

RUSTEM VAMBERY, formerly professor of criminal law and criminology at the University of Budapest, is now giving a course at the New School for Social Research in New York.

HUGH H. DARBY is an associate in the Department of Biological Chemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, dramatic editor of Time, is the editor of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 23, 1940 NUMBER 12

The Shape of Things

IN VOTING TO SUSTAIN THE APPOINTMENT of Bertrand Russell to the faculty of the College of the City of New York, the Board of Higher Education withstood a formidable united front of small minds and large prejudices. The closeness of the vote—eleven to seven—is a measure of the ferocity of the campaign against Russell, and there is no sign that the opposition will yield gracefully. Legal action has already been instituted by the diehards, who will seek to have the appointment annulled by the courts. There will be further fireworks when the college budget comes up for consideration. In view of the storm of opposition the board's decision is an important victory for academic freedom. We cannot help regretting, however, that some of Dr. Russell's defenders sought to vindicate the appointment by proving that his thoughts are as safe and sane as George F. Babbitt's. If Dr. Russell were as innocuous as some of his supporters insisted, he would not be the center of such a storm.

* * *

MAYOR LAGUARDIA CONTINUES TO PLAY A strange role, for a friend of labor, in his controversy with the Transport Workers' Union in New York. On the eve of a conference with John L. Lewis, the Mayor named George Keegan, general manager of the Interborough subway system, to the Board of Transportation which will run all the high-speed lines after they come under municipal ownership and operation. Keegan has an anti-labor past, although the I. R. T. was recently forced to grant the Transport Workers a closed shop. The board post has been vacant for two years, and some wonder why it was so suddenly filled. It is suspected that the Mayor feared Lewis would ask to have C. I. O. subway workers represented. The other two members of the board are Francis X. Sullivan, counsel for the State Federation of Labor, and John Delaney, an old-line Tammany politician who once carried a card in Big Six. Sullivan is no friend of the C. I. O., and Delaney is no friend of collective bargaining. After the conference with Lewis the Mayor seemed somewhat less adamant, and there will be another conference on March 27. The Transport Workers' Union, as representative of the majority, is asking for the right to be the exclusive bargaining agency for all the subway workers. This the Mayor has yet to concede, although majority rule is a basic principle of the Wagner Act.

* * *

THE ALL-INDIA NATIONAL CONGRESS MUST decide this week between an immediate campaign of civil disobedience as urged by its more vigorous elements and Gandhi's moderate program looking toward "moral independence" from England. The Patna resolution calling for immediate independence and the dissociation of India from the European war has been accepted by the Congress Committee against the wishes of Gandhi. Whether the full Congress will ratify this action is difficult to predict. Despite the apparent tactical weakness of his position, Gandhi retains his immense personal prestige with the Congress. In requesting a postponement of the campaign for civil disobedience, his hand has been strengthened by the recent affair in London in which an Indian gunman killed Sir Michael O'Dwyer, former Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, and wounded the Marquis of Zetland, the present Secretary of State for India. Most Indians will sympathize with Gandhi in his insistence that a civil-disobedience campaign can succeed only if it is not marred by violence. Subhas Chandra Bose, former Congress President and leader of the anti-compromise bloc, has drafted a program which breaks with Gandhi not only on the question of immediate tactics but on long-range economic policy. Adoption of this program in its entirety is unlikely. Neither the moderate elements within the Congress nor the left-wing group associated with Jawaharlal Nehru seem ready for such a break. It is more probable that some compromise will be reached on a program that will carry Gandhi along. An independence movement without Gandhi would be unthinkable.

* * *

PLANS FOR INSTALLING WANG CHING-WEI as the Japanese puppet ruler of the occupied areas of China appear to be nearing fruition after months of delay. Wang has issued a formal statement setting forth his program for the new "state," and Premier Yonai has replied with an official pledge of Japanese support. General Nobuyuki Abe, who recently stepped aside as Premier, has been selected to represent Japan at the inauguration, the date of which has not yet been set. That the establishment of a centralized puppet regime will be an important victory for Japan cannot be denied. It is probable that Wang will command a certain amount of support from conservative elements in the occupied areas. The establishment of his rule is not likely to prove as serious, however, as it would have been six months ago, when it was first announced. Wang's prestige has suffered considerably in the interval as a result of the defection of his chief subordinates and the premature publication of the terms of his agreement with Japan. It looks as if the Japanese no longer had very much hope of winning substantial Chinese support for his government. Their immediate objective seems to be rather to obtain recognition of the new regime from at least some of the European powers. Italy has already indicated a willingness to extend recognition. But the Japanese are doubtless playing for higher stakes. There seems to be hope in Tokyo that England, anxious to regain Japanese friendship as a defense against Soviet influence in the Far East, may be persuaded to recognize Wang's "government." But it is fair to assume that Britain will take no such action without the assent of the United States. And we cannot believe that Washington, despite its recent appeasement tendencies, has fallen so low as to give its approval.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

BREAKING A SILENCE THAT HAD LASTED nearly five days, Martin Dies talked again last week. Promising to uncover the operations of the Soviet secret police in America, he hinted darkly that "people in government circles" were involved in the GPU network; and as the Dies committee's next attraction he advertised the "head of the GPU in this country." Whether Mr. Dies will fulfil his boasts remains to be seen. He has failed to do so on many similar occasions. For months he talked glibly and loud of "Communists in the New Deal"; when asked to produce a single exhibit neither Mr. Dies nor his committee could find one. The important thing is the method: the damage is done in advance; suspicions are aroused that somehow the New Deal is linked with the GPU; and the impression lingers even if the details never appear. When the Dies committee's appropriation was renewed, his supporters assured everyone that Mr. Dies was taking the vows of silence and henceforth would speak only when his committee had something to say. The "new" Martin Dies, as represented in his articles in Liberty and in his current blasts, bears a striking resemblance to the Martin Dies who once called himself head of the demagogues' club.

THE AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH Company has agreed to reduce its rates on calls of more than 420 miles to an amount equivalent to $5,500,000 annually, assuming that there is no increase in business as a result of the reduction. In announcing this development the Federal Communications Commission points out that the reductions were negotiated without the necessity of any long-drawn-out rate proceedings and praises the company for "pursuing a forward-looking policy." We do not begrudge this praise, but we think that both the commission and the public it represents should follow their thank-yous with immediate requests for more. The sum involved in this concession is something under 3 per cent of the net earnings on A. T. and T. stock last year and compares with an increase in 1939 over 1938 earnings of nearly $45,000,000. Moreover, rate concessions nearly always increase traffic and speedily diminish the apparent loss of revenue involved. We should like to suggest, therefore, that the Telephone Company take advantage of its fine financial position to cheapen the service further. Particularly expensive at present are its charges for comparatively short distances. An evening call from New York to Stamford, Connecticut—a distance of some forty miles—costs more than an evening call of four hundred miles from either London or Stockholm. Surely the A. T. and T. should blush to be outdone by British and Swedish state enterprises, both of which incidentally manage to return very satisfactory profits.

*

SAMUEL UNTERMYER KNEW WALL STREET'S tricks so well that he couldn't resist the temptation to take a profitable flier in them himself on occasion. But unlike the pompous Bumbles who are among the Street's legal luminaries, he regarded the complex chicanery of high finance with amused contempt rather than hypocritical reverence. He enjoyed tilting at some of our biggest corporate windmills in behalf of the small man. His address "Is There a Money Trust?" led to the famous Pujo money-trust investigation which he served so ably as counsel. His work in the Waters-Pierce Oil Company case showed what a sham was the Supreme Court order "dissolving" the Standard Oil trust. He had a hand in framing the Clayton Anti-Trust Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act. He was one of the earliest advocates of tax legislation to prevent undue concentration of wealth and of the kind of Stock Exchange and security legislation which the New Deal has enacted. He was for government ownership of utilities and of iron, coal, and copper mines. He was a Wall Street "maverick" whom the magnates hated but never dared despise. And he was a "maverick," too, among wealthy upper-class Jews who preferred to hush-hush Hitler rather than fight him with the boycott as Untermyer did.

Peace Is a Weapon

THE defeat of Finland was a German even more than a Russian victory, and the intangible gains which accrue to Germany are even more important than the territorial spoils which pass to the Soviets. The latter, as Robert Dell points out in his article on page 385, are substantial enough, and they leave Finland with small possibilities of resisting further Russian aggression should Stalin decide to continue his imitation of Hitlerian tactics. But Russia has not won a cheap victory. It has had to pay heavily in casualties, and it has suffered a loss in prestige both because of the preliminary defeats experienced by its army and because of its abandonment of Mr. Kuusinen and its enforced rediscovery of a Finnish government it had pronounced "non-existent."

Germany's victory was gained without the loss of a single man, and the Reich is left with heightened prestige. Its threats to Sweden and Norway prevented those countries from sending military aid to Finland or permitting the Allies to send an expeditionary force. Moreover, it appears to have influenced the Finns against asking formal assistance from the West by hinting that it was prepared to join in the Russian attack. As Premier Ryti told the Finnish Parliament: "By accepting this [Allied] help we would have been drawn into the World War. . . . In all probability the opponents of the Western powers would have resorted to war against these troops, and our country thus would have become a battlefield also in the great war."

Whether, in these circumstances, the Allies should have brushed aside neutral protests and dispatched the largest force available to Finland without awaiting a formal invitation was and is a subject of heated debate both here and in Europe. In Britain especially there was acute division about the wisdom of forcing Russia into the enemy camp, and while the military advantage of opening a "northern flank" was not to be scorned, the risks involved were very considerable. Nor was it easy for countries fighting under the banner of democracy to decide to violate the neutrality of democratic countries. It is hardly becoming for Americans, who have criticized much milder breaches of international law by the Allies, to complain of their hesitation about such a major trespass.

But whether the Allies were right or wrong, the fact remains that Germany has scored heavily. It has cut off the northern countries as a possible avenue of attack, demonstrated once again its power to excite among small neutrals the same kind of fascinated terror which the snake inspires in rabbits, and helped Russia to end a campaign which was curtailing supplies needed to offset the Allied blockade. In addition, an attack on the other alternative front—the Near East—now becomes more difficult and dangerous for the Allies. Balkan countries which had been encouraged by Allied diplomatic and economic action to resist Nazi demands are already showing signs of renewed servility to Berlin. In Rumania King Carol is said to be contemplating further means to increase trade with Germany, and he has taken the significant step of releasing nearly all the pro-Nazi Iron Guards.

Considering, then, that Germany's diplomatic and strategic position has been appreciably strengthened, it may seem strange that this moment should be chosen in Berlin for a peace drive. For that, indeed, is what appears to be going on under a heavy smoke screen of bluster. But it must never be forgotten that peace on any terms which enabled Germany to hold on to its loot—and no other terms seem possible while it is strong and undefeated—would be the equivalent of victory. Such a peace would mean the abdication by the Allies of all authority east of the Rhine and would provide Hitler with the opportunity to organize Central and Southeastern Europe as a confederation of dependent states. That accomplished, he could obtain all he wanted from the West step by step without risk of armed resistance.

The present propaganda and diplomatic efforts of the Nazi government appear to be directed toward impressing on the Allies, and incidentally on Sumner Welles, the hopelessness of their situation. At best, it is insinuated, Britain and France can expect only a stalemate; at worst, a smashing defeat. The hastily arranged meeting on the Brenner between Hitler and Mussolini, obviously timed to buttress the reactions to the Finnish débâcle as well as to influence Mr. Welles, is being played up in Berlin as a sign of a reinforced axis policy. Hints are broadcast of pending agreement between Rome, Berlin, and Moscow; suggestions are thrown out of military assistance from Italy when the time is ripe. Meanwhile, it is declared, no opportunity will be lost to demonstrate to the Allies that Italy is Germany's ally "economically, politically, and ideologically."

It may be, of course, that Mussolini, noting the apparent improvement in Germany's situation, is preparing to join the band-wagon. We suspect, however, that this chat on the Brenner—which, incidentally, Italy has been busily fortifying against its axis partner—is intended mainly for its propaganda value. For whether or not Mussolini is willing to underwrite Germany's war, he is certainly willing to back a German peace from which he hopes to obtain pickings. It cannot be said, however, that there are any signs in London or Paris that these scare tactics are undermining the determination to continue the war. Nevertheless, there are evidently hopes in axis quarters that Mr. Welles will bring back such an unfavorable report of the Allied position that the President will be persuaded to attempt mediation and put the onus of refusal on Britain and France.

Card for Mr. Hoover

SIX years ago Congress passed an act forbidding wire-tapping. Last week the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce favorably reported a resolution for an investigation of alleged wire-tapping by the FBI and other agencies, official and private. Now Attorney General Jackson has issued an order barring wire-tapping by the FBI in the future. The Attorney General's statement, admits that the FBI, despite the law, has been indulging in what Justice Holmes called the "dirty business" of wire-tapping. Yet Mr. Jackson's explanation seems to be couched in such terms as to deflect criticism from the official responsible for the wire-tapping: the press is told that the order was promulgated "on the recommendation of J. Edgar Hoover." It not only admits wire-tapping in the past but pleads for the right to tap wires in the future in kidnapping, extortion, and racketeering cases. The last is a category that vitally affects labor, for the federal racketeering law has been used not merely against racketeering by labor unions but against what the Department of Justice considered "uneconomic practices" by labor unions. The Attorney General's statement raises some disturbing questions. Would the FBI have gone on with its wire-tapping if no Senate investigation had been pending? Is it engaging in other illegal activities? Is this the opening gun of a campaign to legalize the "dirty business"?

We hope that the Attorney General will reconsider what seems to us his far too tender handling of Hoover in the matter of wire-tapping. He has set himself an excellent precedent in the Detroit cases, for he has now ordered a real investigation into charges made by Senator Norris. These charges indicate a revival of all the old FBI abuses. Mr. Jackson, after a preliminary inquiry into the Detroit raids, wrote Senator Norris that he had found "nothing to justify any charge of misconduct against the Federal Bureau of Investigation." But Senator Norris, in another letter, has provided specific details and asked whether the Attorney General did not make the previous statement after hearing "only one side of the controversy," that is, after "a review of the matter with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the District Attorney's office" in Detroit. The Attorney General's answer was to direct Henry Schweinhaut, chief of the civil-liberties unit of the department, to make a thorough investigation. "No prosecutions for opinions of any kind will be instituted while I am Attorney General," he declared. We honor him for his forthright action.

The Detroit arrests, according to Senator Norris's second letter, involved nothing "other than a technical violation of law." Yet if the facts alleged in his letter are correct, those arrested were treated like criminals of the most dangerous kind. "The woman taken into custody," Senator Norris wrote, "was arrested while she was in bed, compelled to dress practically in the presence of four or five Federal Bureau of Investigation men, and questioned almost constantly from the time of her arrest until she was taken into court at three o'clock in the afternoon. She was given only the vaguest idea as to the crime with which she was charged. She had no idea where she was being taken. She was frightened; she was dazed. She feared the men who were taking her away were a gang of kidnappers or hoodlums." In one case the FBI men obtained entrance to a physician's home in the middle of the night by telephoning that a seriously injured patient was being brought to see him. All those arrested were taken into custody under terrifying circumstances, awakened from sleep, handcuffed, and "subjected to third-degree methods from the time they were arrested until three o'clock in the afternoon." In one arrest the FBI agents broke down the door of a bedroom in order to obtain entrance. These are the methods of the terror, as practiced by dictators. Those who use them have no place in American government. We should rid ourselves of un-American men and methods now, before they have grown too strong to be eliminated. It would be well if a Senate committee looked into the FBI's card file. If it really is a list of persons dangerous to our form of government, it ought to include a card for "Hoover, J. Edgar."

Dorothy Thompson's Arithmetic

COLUMNIST DOROTHY THOMPSON has performed many minor miracles in her distinguished journalistic career, but none of them quite measure up to her achievements in the article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune on March 11. Within the confines of her usual space Miss Thompson discovers: (1) that the United States has only 2,000,000 unemployed; (2) that the proportion of the population having jobs is within 1 per cent of that in the boom year of 1929; (3) that the working population has a larger part of the national income than it enjoyed in 1929; (4) that this income is actually greater, in terms of purchasing power, than the record $80,000,000,000 income of the boom year; and (5) that the problems of the share-croppers and the Okies are merely a reflection of our growing social awareness. Not content to be thus wholly scooped by his feminine rival, Arthur Krock devoted three of his columns in the succeeding week to demonstrating that the number of unemployed, if not actually as low as two million, could not be more than three or four million.

Miss Thompson arrives at her original and optimistic

Burlingame, Cal.

estimate of the number of unemployed by rather plausible juggling of statistics. By adding the 2,300,000 employees of the WPA, CCC, and other emergency agencies to the 46,300,000 persons privately employed in December, 1939, she finds that there were 1,800,000 more persons employed this past December than in December, 1929. Granting that there has been an increase of 3,800,000 in the number of persons who would normally be seeking work, owing to increased population, she concludes that the number of jobless is only about 2,000,000.

It is difficult in brief space to list all the points at which Miss Thompson (and Arthur Krock) has gone astray. First, it must be remembered that the depression had started in December, 1929, and that the number of unemployed in that month was conservatively estimated at 2,000,000. Second, her estimate of the number of young people who have come on the labor market in the last ten years over and above the number of persons who withdrew by reason of death or retirement is low by at least 2,000,000. The figure is usually estimated at 6,000,000. Third, it is impossible to justify the inclusion of 2,300,000 emergency workers averaging approximately $50 a month as "employed." To do so is to take a cynical view of our present labor standards such as even Miss Thompson can hardly subscribe to. Fourth, in taking December, 1939, Miss Thompson chose the most favorable month for her comparison: the A. F. of L. estimates show a rise in unemployment between December, 1939, and January, 1940, of 1,300,000. Fifth, no estimate is given for the number of additional persons who have been brought on the labor market as a result of the depression and the prolonged unemployment of the principal breadwinner. A booklet just published by the Committee on Social Security of the Social Science Research Council estimates that for every 1,000,000 thrown out of work there is an increase of from 1,100,000 to 1,250,000 in the number of persons seeking jobs. If we assume that 1,000,000 additional job-seekers have been created in this manner during the depression, we find that these five corrections have added a minimum of 8,600,000 to Miss Thompson's 2,000,000 job-seekers. This makes a total slightly greater than the rather conservative A. F. of L. estimate of 10,381,000.

Lack of space prevents a similar analysis of Miss Thompson's remaining great discoveries. But we cannot let pass her impudent dismissal of such catastrophic developments as the uprooting of tens of thousands of Dust Bowl families and the displacement of other tens of thousands by the reorganization of the cotton industry in the South as merely evidence that we are becoming "share-cropper and Okie conscious." The advent of power machinery in the cotton belt has created social and economic problems such as this country has rarely faced. Miss Thompson's best friends should keep her informed.

Notes on Puerto Rico, II

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

San Juan, March 3

THIS letter is not a "report"; it is a commentary on things heard and seen in two weeks in Puerto Rico. Anything more would be an impertinence. Only a visiting Congressional committee could base a report on such casual evidence. I begin with this warning because I noticed in a recent issue an over-optimistic announcement of "reports" to be made at intervals by this editor. Call them notes and I'll feel happier.

It is unnecessary to talk about the two chief scourges of Puerto Rico, but no visitor can avoid it. Poverty and political corruption meet you on your arrival and trail you until you leave. They are flagrant and pervasive. They all but obscure the beauty of a fine countryside and the good work of honest public officials. They dominate education—the university as well as the lower schools; they pervert justice; they make the democratic institutions of the country a sour joke. They collaborate in ruining an island created by nature for pleasure and abundance.

Corruption is as open as the sunshine. On the day we arrived my husband and I met a single small but revealing example of how things are supposed to work. The Assistant Commissioner of Education, Oscar Irizarry, a Puerto Rican who was educated in the United States and worked there before his appointment, met us at the dock and helped us through the elaborate formalities connected with landing a car that belonged to a college on the island and so could come in without paying the customary 10 per cent excise tax. We waited in an office of the Interior Department while the necessary documents were prepared. While we stood there Mr. Irizarry was approached by a Republican member of the Puerto Rico Senate who loudly demanded, in the presence of several employees and ourselves, that the Assistant Commissioner dismiss a number of employees in his department who happened to be members of the Liberal Party. It was well known, he said from the eminence of his own political detachment, that they were playing politics. With good humor and firmness Mr. Irizarry declined. He patted the Senator on the shoulder and said, "You know I can't dismiss these people for no reason except that they are Liberals. Show me proof of improper conduct and I shall act at once, but not on flimsy, general charges." The Senator was angry and insistent. He said that he would find a way to get at the Assistant Commissioner. "We can't oust you because you are appointed by the Commissioner and he is appointed by the President. But we can slash your appropriations and that is what we will do." The Republican-Socialist coalition, of course, controls the island legislature.

The incident is insignificant compared with dozens of others which I heard about rather than witnessed. Political scandals involving millions of dollars that found their way into the pockets of Senators and Representatives and their friends have been uncovered, proved, discussed in the press, and then forgotten. If they have come into the courts they have been thrown out by judges who know where their political and financial fortunes lie. More often they have been suppressed by influence and money before legal action got under way.

Politics dominates appointments to the university, the appropriation of funds for buildings and salaries, the choice of lecturers. A university instructor said to me: "Teaching is freer under Trujillo than under our board of trustees. In Santo Domingo several eminent Spanish Republican scholars have been given posts in the university. We couldn't get those men in here." The rector of the university, with whom I talked at some length, is not a reactionary or a politician. But he yields to pressure and acts or refuses to act out of fear; his fate and that of the university are in the hands of the politicians and he knows it. A more defiant character might stand up to his overlords, but to fight would take courage and might well mean defeat.

The result is a curious one. Many liberals teach in the university, and much imaginative work is done there. Intellectual ferment is in the air. The students are excited about politics, particularly the exasperating question of Puerto Rico's political status. Many of them are radicals. On the other hand, academic standards are low and academic discipline slack. During my stay I visited the Polytechnic Institute at San German, a Presbyterian college headed by an able American director, Dr. Jarvis S. Morris. The contrast was startling. Hard work and discipline were evident; a friendly atmosphere pervaded the place and the students seemed interested and alert, but the stimulation of political turmoil was wholly absent, as remote as in a denominational school in the States. Perhaps this is healthy. At any rate it is a fact that students dropped from the Polytechnic for low marks can go into the university. The Polytechnic is a small school, but it may serve as a yardstick with which to measure the academic level of the university.

Politics affects the university in tangible as well as intellectual ways. The buildings recently put up with federal funds are imposing and beautiful. But a desire for display seems to have outweighed good sense and planning. The new college theater is larger, more elaborately equipped, more elegant in detail than most of those on Broadway. The building is air-conditioned. The dressing-rooms would satisfy the most exacting movie star. The acoustics are perfect. Certainly no university in the United States that I know of can boast such a theater.

But the University of Puerto Rico has no funds for scenery. It cannot afford to turn on the air-conditioning or even to operate the lighting system. It has no drama department or money to spend on one; in fact, there is not even a dramatic club in the university. The theater stands there, empty and unused, as fantastic a demonstration of conspicuous waste as I have ever seen. It cost, by the way, about three-quarters of a million dollars. Meanwhile university salaries are low. The English department is housed in a one-story wooden structure that looks like temporary army barracks. The science department is inadequate.

Perhaps these and other equally apparent defects may be remedied later on. The rector and many of the teachers and students earnestly hope that their institution will become the long-discussed Pan-American University. If that is to happen, the men who directly or indirectly control appointments and the expenditure of funds will have to show a new interest in education and a new disinterest in politics. Nothing I saw or heard inclines me to expect any such revolutionary change.

Next week I shall add a few notes on the social and political situation in the island, especially on the remarkable campaign of Luis Muñoz Marin.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 377

EDITORIALS:

- PEACE IS A WEAPON 379
- CARD FOR MR. HOOVER 380
- DOROTHY THOMPSON'S ARITHMETIC 380
- NOTES ON PUERTO RICO, II by Freda Kirchwey 381

THE LAURA LAW MURDER by Herbert Lundy 383

WHY FINLAND LOST by Robert Dell 385

A "WAGNER ACT" FOR EMPLOYERS by Arthur A. Michael 387

CANADA'S STRATEGIC ELECTION by T. E. Wood 391

IN THE WIND 393

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 394

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

- HELLO TO REFORM by I. F. Stone 395
- IMPROVISATIONS OF REALITY by Philip Rahv 396
- MR. GITLOW REGRETS by Robert Bendiner 396
- LOOK BEYOND THE LAW by Max Lerner 397
- STRANGER IN THE LAND by Louis B. Salomon 398
- DECADENCE AND DYLAN THOMAS by Paul Rosenfeld 399
- IN BRIEF 401
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 402

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

The Laura Law Murder

BY HERBERT LUNDY

Portland, Oregon, March 11

LAURA LUOMA LAW was born in Finland in 1914, in a world at war. She died in January, 1940, at Aberdeen, Washington, while Soviet bombs dropped on her native Helsinki. Her death and the events surrounding it are rapidly becoming a cause célèbre in the Northwest.

Wife of an aggressive union organizer and herself active in C. I. O. affairs, Laura Law was the victim of an unknown assailant who entered her home on the night of January 5 and beat and stabbed her to death. The murder occurred just a month after a mob had wrecked the so-called Red Finn Hall at Aberdeen without interference from police. Authorities of Grays Harbor County and the city of Aberdeen failed to convict any of the raiders of the hall. And so far they have made no arrest in the Laura Law murder case.

The Congressional delegation of the state of Washington has asked for a federal investigation of the situation in Aberdeen. The Grays Harbor Civil Rights Committee, formed by Communists and labor leaders after Laura Law was killed, and Howard Costigan, secretary of the Washington Commonwealth Federation, have demanded federal intervention under the civil-rights statutes. They have presented affidavits and documents purporting to prove that there has been a "breakdown of law and order in Grays Harbor County" and that "inaction by the United States Department of Justice will lead to a fulfilment of the general call to vigilante action against organized labor in the entire West Coast lumber region and thus re-create the general abrogation of civil rights which followed the failure to guarantee civil rights in Centralia in 1919."

The Grays Harbor Civil Rights Committee does not have majority support from Oregon and Washington C. I. O. unions, although several have voted funds to aid its cause. Yet the Law case threatens to endanger labor contract renewals in the lumber industry this spring and is certain to be a factor in the Washington elections. For the labor and political excesses of Aberdeen and its sister city, Hoquiam, which go back many years, have produced a fresh crop of hatred and bitterness. Pretty twenty-six-year-old Laura Law may have been bludgeoned and stabbed to death by a mad tramp, by someone well known to her, or by a crackpot "patriot." No evidence that she was killed by vigilantes has yet been adduced. But whatever the truth of the matter, every day that passes without a solution of the crime makes worse the festering labor relations on the Pacific Coast. The Law murder case is no ordinary "who-done-it?"

Grays Harbor County is a plywood, lumber, and fishing center of southwestern Washington. From the beginning lumber has been king. Timber barons have made and lost fortunes there in virgin Douglas fir. And for years union organizers have used it as a proving ground; strikes and violence have been its heritage.

Thousands of Greeks, Finns, Austrians, and Swedes flocked to the mills and camps around the turn of the century, welcomed by the timber men who ruled the region's economic and social life. In 1912 the Industrial Workers of the World were strong enough to strike the Aberdeen and Hoquiam mills, where most of the workers were Greeks. The police smashed their picket lines, arrested scores, refused them trials by jury, fined them, and released them when the jails were filled. The mills reopened with "American" crews. Rioting spread, and the authorities called for militiamen. In Raymond, a neighboring town, a vigilante body of two hundred armed citizens tossed fifty Finns into an outbound steamer and loaded a hundred Greeks into box cars. Newspapers chuckled over the "bloodless victory."

In the years before the World War, I. W. W. agitators filtered into every logging camp and mill in the Northwest, fomenting job actions, slow-bell, and sabotage. But in 1917 patriotism and the army broke the back of the organization in the fir forests. Soldiers were marched into the woods to fill the government's demand for airplane stock. The army organized the Loyal Legion of Loggers and Lumbermen, the largest company union ever seen in the West, and the I. W. W. could not stand against it. The final blow was struck in Centralia in the bloody fight between legionnaires and wobblies. Through a change of venue the trial of the Centralia slayers was held in Montesano, county seat of Grays Harbor. Militiamen patrolled the streets.

With the coming of the NRA and later the NLRB, the American Federation of Labor moved into the Northwestern forests. Bill Hutcheson's Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners organized the sawmill and timber workers' union, which reached the peak of its power in Grays Harbor in the pre-C. I. O. years of 1934, 1935, and 1936. Strikes were called in lumber operations throughout the Northwest in 1935, and in the tenth week of the shut-down Governor Clarence D. Martin of Washington sent the National Guard into Aberdeen, Hoquiam, Everett, and Tacoma. The mayors of Aberdeen and Hoquiam and the Grays Harbor County sheriff had requested troops, and six mills opened behind the guardsmen's bayonets. Strike-breakers were stoned. Five hundred strikers met cold steel with rocks when soldiers broke through a cordon to rescue ten besieged comrades. A dynamite blast wrecked a store patronized by strike-breakers and soldiers. After bitter months of violence the union won wage and hour concessions from a staggering industry.

"Communist," "fascist," "red," and "red-baiter" became epithets frequently and loosely applied in Aberdeen. Three hundred pickets prevented William Dudley Pelley, Silver Shirt chief, from holding a rally. The Hoquiam residence of State Senator Frank L. Morgan, attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, was bombed. Labor leaders and suspected Communists received threatening notes and telephone calls. The Communist movement gained converts in the unions and in the Finnish Workers' Federation. In 1937 Harold Pritchett of Vancouver, British Columbia, who rose to power with the aid of the Communists, carried more than 50,000 woodworkers into the C. I. O., and employers were caught in the nutcracker of a jurisdictional war without quarter. Strikes and boycotts were used for organizing purposes, and the "boss" was left holding the bag.

Pritchett has been fought doggedly in his own union, the International Woodworkers of America, by opponents who charge that he follows too closely the Communist Party line. For more than three years he has beaten all efforts to unseat him. His energetic aides in this fight, and in that against the employers, have been two Grays Harbor men, O. M. Orton, first vice-president of the I. W. A., and Dick Law, member of the executive board and organizer.

Law ran Pritchett's floor show at the Klamath Falls convention last year when the Canadian was accused of communism by delegates from the Columbia River district. He led a band of C. I. O. men into Aberdeen's leading hotel and ran two A. F. of L. organizers out of town. With other C. I. O. men he served warning on Abe Muir of San Francisco, vice-president of the Carpenters and Joiners, who had originally organized Northwestern lumber workers in the A. F. of L., and Muir left Aberdeen with a police escort. At every I. W. A. negotiation with employers in southwestern Washington Dick Law was in the forefront of the workers, and he was on hand to call nearly every strike. He made many enemies.

While Law was organizing lumberjacks, mill hands, and plywood and veneer workers, his Finnish-born wife, Laura, was organizing auxiliaries. She stirred many a convention by her lively speeches. With her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Nestor Luoma, she participated in the social and political life of the Finnish Workers' Federation, which has about two hundred members in Grays Harbor—many of them Communists, some of them members of C. I. O. unions.

There are two Finn halls in Aberdeen. One is the meeting place of the Kaleva Brotherhood, a fifty-year-old fraternal society of Western Finns with its grand lodge in Astoria, Oregon. It was built about 1900 and painted blue. The other is the hall of the Finnish Workers' Federation, which in recent years has been a political affiliate of the Washington Commonwealth Federation. This hall was built in 1906 and painted red, because red paint was cheap. It has always been called the Red Finn Hall to distinguish it from the Blue Finn Hall, and only recently has the name been identified with communism.

Finnish Communists in Grays Harbor were in a difficult position when the Soviet Union invaded Finland. But oddly enough, it was not the white Finns who vilified them most; it was their old 100-per-cent-American opponents on the other side of the labor fence. The raid on the Red Finn Hall on the night of December 2, three days after the Soviet troops crossed the Finnish border, would perhaps have passed as a spontaneous outburst of hatred for communism had local authorities dealt efficiently with the offenders. But the police did not stop the raid, and the only two suspects arrested were found not guilty by a jury that deliberated twenty minutes.

A regular weekly dance at the Red Finn Hall had been planned for the night of December 2 by the women of the federation, but it was canceled when white Finns and others called a mass-meeting in the Blue Finn Hall for the same evening to raise funds for Finnish relief. The Aberdeen World for that day reported: "A. F. of L. union members and World War veterans this afternoon were said to be planning to picket the Grays Harbor Communist 'Victory' dance tonight at the Workers' Hall . . . in protest against 'communism and the ruthless aggression of Soviet Russia on Finland.' . . . Those planning to picket the Workers' Hall will gather in front of the Oregon-Washington district A. F. of L. sawmill-union hall at 7:45, it was said. A leader will be chosen and the march will begin with the American flag at the head."

There was no march of "pickets" because there was no dance, but a crowd of men and high-school boys gathered in front of the hall about eight o'clock. Muttered threats grew louder. A rock smashed through a window. The mob rushed the darkened three-story structure, battered down the doors, and streamed inside. Anton Alho, the janitor, alone in the hall, fled through a rear door. He said afterward that he stumbled into the arms of a police officer who appeared reluctant to let him go without a thorough search. As soon as he was released he ran to the police station and reported the raid.

Aberdeen patrol cars are equipped with two-way radio communication and the hall is only a few blocks from the station, but by the time the police arrived, the raiders had gone and only a crowd of onlookers stood about. The mob had left the interior of the hall a mass of wreckage. Large framed pictures of President Roosevelt, Joseph Stalin, and Earl Browder had been burned or carried away. The usually reliable Associated Press sent the following report from Aberdeen: "A mob of 400 to 500 persons Saturday night rushed a group of some thirty dancing Communists at a 'Workers' Hall' here, wrecked the interior of the structure, ripped floors and walls, and burned pictures of Joseph Stalin and Earl Browder in the street." A few hours after the raid missiles were thrown through windows of the A. F. of L. sawmill-union headquarters and the residence of Harry Tucker, the anti-Pritchett conservative president of the I. W. A. local.

Though flashlight pictures were taken during the attack and many onlookers were still there when the police finally arrived, none of the raiders were identified. Dick Law and his faction in the C. I. O. stridently demanded police action and started gathering evidence. Law declared later that Mrs. Law helped him and received threats against her life.

Mrs. Luoma came home from a theater the night of January 5 and found the body of her daughter, Laura Law, sprawled on a davenport. Her skull had been fractured in five places by powerful blows of a blunt instrument. Two post-mortem examinations showed that the slayer, after smashing her head, had thrust a stiletto-like weapon, probably an ice-pick, seven times into her left breast around the heart. The house had been ransacked. Papers had been strewn about, drawers emptied on to beds, and boxes opened. But the search had not been thorough, and nothing has been proved to be missing.

Dick Law charges that since his wife's murder the police have been interested only in "making [him] the principal suspect." Yet from a detective's point of view some questioning of Law has been justified, especially in view of the fact that he once served a term in Oregon State Prison for robbery. Fellow union members have accounted for his time on the night his wife was slain, but have refused to make further statements. Special Prosecutor Paul O. Manley, who is ambitious to go to Congress, held a coroner's inquest that resembled a trial. Testimony bearing on alleged extra-marital relations of Law's promptly resulted in a slander suit. Long discussions of "class warfare" and vague references to threats against union men brought a solution of the killing of Laura Law no nearer. The inquest was recessed after four days. It has not been reconvened.

Why Finland Lost

BY ROBERT DELL

THE sudden end of the Russian-Finnish war reveals more sharply than ever the extent to which the Soviet Union has been guilty of aggression. The U. S. S. R. stands convicted under the terms of the Convention for the Definition of Aggression which it concluded in London on July 3, 1933, with various other powers immediately adjacent to it, and even more strikingly under its treaty of non-aggression with Finland, signed on January 21, 1932. This treaty provided, among other things, that the contracting parties must submit any disputes between them to a procedure of conciliation before a joint Conciliation Committee, which was set up on April 22, 1932, "and particularly the question whether the mutual undertaking of non-aggression has or has not been violated." On November 28, 1939, the Soviet government denounced this treaty, which it had no right to denounce before December 31, 1945, on the ground that it had been "systematically violated by the Finnish government" and refused to submit the question to conciliation or arbitration. Incidentally the Russian aggression invalidates all the bilateral pacts concluded by the U. S. S. R. with other countries, except that with Germany, for they all contain the famous "escape" clause.

To pick a quarrel with Finland the Soviet government imitated the tactics of the Japanese in the Manchurian affair. It first faked an "incident" and then set up a puppet government. In his telegram of December 5, 1939, to the Secretary General of the League of Nations, in which he refused on behalf of his government to be represented at the sessions of the Council and Assembly of the League convened to deal with the Finnish appeal, Molotov said:

> The U. S. S. R. is not at war with Finland and does not threaten the Finnish nation with war. Consequently, reference to Article 2, paragraph 1 is unjustified. The Soviet Union maintains peaceful relations with the Democratic Republic of Finland, whose government signed with the U. S. S. R. on December 2 a Pact of Assistance and Friendship. This pact settled the questions which the Soviet government had fruitlessly discussed with delegates of the former Finnish government > now divested of its power. By its declaration of December 1 the government of the Democratic Repubic of Finland requested the Soviet government to lend assistance to that republic by armed forces with a view to the joint liquidation at the earliest possible moment of the very dangerous seat of war created in Finland by its former rulers.

The bad faith of this statement is equaled by its impudence. Stalin has now put on the scrap heap both the "Democratic Republic of Finland" and the pact that the Soviet government signed with it on December 2.

In its memorandum of October 14 the Soviet government alleged that its aims were to secure the safety of Leningrad and become satisfied that "Finland will have firm, friendly relations with the Soviet Union." The peace terms that Stalin has now imposed on the unhappy Finnish nation show that this was as false as all the other declarations of the Soviet government throughout the affair. The terms of peace deprive Finland of its independence and make it a vassal state of Russia. They go far beyond what the Soviet government demanded in October. In the memorandum of October 14 the Soviet government demanded that Finland should cede to the Soviet Union, in exchange for other areas, the following territories: the islands of Suursaari, Lavansaari, Tytarsaari, and Koivisto, part of the Isthmus of Karelia from the village of Lippola to the southern border of the town of Koivisto, and the western parts of the Kalastajasaarento. By the peace treaty Russia annexes the whole of the Karelian Isthmus, with the city of Viipuri, the whole of Viipuri Bay with its islands, the territory west and north of Lake Ladoga, including the cities of Kaekisalmi and Sortavala, the territory east of Maerkaejaervi and Kuolajaervi, and a number of islands in the Gulf of Finland. Finland gets nothing in exchange.

In the memorandum of October 14 the Soviet government made no demand at all concerning the Pestamo area. Article 5 of the peace treaty, as broadcast from Moscow on March 13, imposes severe maritime restrictions at Petsamo. Article 6 of the treaty gives Soviet Russia and its citizens the right of free transit through the Petsamo region into Norway and back and provides that goods from Soviet Russia to Norway or from Norway to Russia are to be sent through Petsamo free from control and transit duties.

The worst articles in the peace treaty are the third and seventh. By Article 3 both countries undertake not to "conclude any alliance or participate in coalitions" directed against the other signatory. Article 7 reads:

> Finland agrees to grant access across the territory between Russia and Sweden, via the shortest route, for a new railway to be built jointly by both countries, possibly in 1940, between Kandalaksha and Kemijaervi.

Some people have suggested that Article 7 indicates an intention on Stalin's part to attack Sweden, but in my opinion this is a mistake. A Soviet attack on Sweden would bring Russia into conflict with Germany, and there can be little doubt that in the agreement made between Germany and Russia last August Scandinavia was recognized as a German sphere of influence. The aim of this article is to give Russia control of Finland.

Article 3 makes Finland defenseless and puts it at the mercy of Russia. Stalin will be able, if he pleases, to declare that any defensive alliance or pact of mutual assistance concluded by Finland with other countries is directed against Russia and make it an excuse for another attack on Finland, just as Hitler made the Franco-Soviet pact an excuse for sending his troops into the demilitarized zone. Provisions similar to that of Article 3 are contained in the Russian agreements with the Baltic states, but, with those exceptions, they are probably unprecedented in any treaty. They are quite incompatible, as indeed is the treaty as a whole, with Molotov's declarations in his speech broadcast on November 29, 1939, that the Soviet government had no intention of taking and annexing Finnish territory, or of infringing the independence of Finland, or of interfering in its domestic and foreign affairs. "We regard Finland," he said, "whatever may be the regime in existence there, as an independent state. . . . We are anxious that the Finnish people should itself decide its internal and external affairs as it thinks best."

The subjection of Finland to Russian domination is a great victory for Hitler and a severe blow to the Allies, and one for which the British government has a heavy responsibility. Not, however, the French government. It is now known that the French government and the French General Staff wished to send military aid to Finland in December, but the British government refused to agree until February 5. The reason of the refusal was undoubtedly a desire to avoid at all costs being involved in a war with Russia. The attitude of the British government toward Russia has become more friendly since Stalin sacrificed communism to power politics, for the excellent reason that there is no longer a "Communist danger" in Europe; Stalin has ruined communism in every European country outside Russia. Winston Churchill apologized in a broadcast speech on October 1, 1939, for Russia's participation in the partition of Poland, and Neville Chamberlain told the House of Commons that Russia had gone into Poland in self-defense. He was mistaken, but it is significant that he made the statement.

In his statement to the House of Commons on March 13 Chamberlain did not utter a word of condemnation of Russia. The British government has undoubtedly been cherishing the hope that it could detach Russia from Germany, which in my opinion is an illusion. Stalin cannot quarrel with Hitler while the present war lasts. The British government did not wish the Finns to fight and hoped they would come to terms with Stalin.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Anybody reading between the lines of Daladier's speech in the French Chamber on March 12 will conclude that he bitterly resented the opposition of the British government to military intervention in Finland. It was equally clear that he resented the attitude of the Swedish and Norwegian governments, which have the greatest responsibility for the Russian victory over Finland. They may live to regret it. According to information that I have received from a Swedish friend who has recently been in Sweden, the majority of the Swedish people, in particular the parties of the left, wished to give military aid to Finland and to allow Allied troops to cross Swedish territory for that purpose. They believed that Germany would probably attack Sweden in any case before the present war ends. On the other side were the conservative upper classes, who have always been pro-German—big business and finance, the same sort of people as the supporters of the "policy of appeasement" in England and France. The Swedish capitalists wanted to go on selling iron ore and munitions to Germany. The leading munitions maker in Sweden went to Berlin to ask for Hitler's aid in making peace between Russia and Finland.

It is difficult to understand why the Allied governments insisted that the Finns should publicly ask for military aid. The resolution unanimously adopted by the League Assembly at Geneva on December 14 enabled them to demand a passage for their troops through Sweden and Norway under Article 16 of the League Covenant. The Finns dared not ask for it because they were intimidated by the Swedish and German governments. Besides, the offer of military aid came very late. If the Allied governments had offered it, as the French government desired, at an earlier date, Swedish resistance to the move might have been overcome and Finland might have been saved. As it is, Scandinavia passes under German control and Finland under the control of the Soviet Union.

A "Wagner Act" for Employers

BY ARTHUR A. MICHAEL

Washington, March 12

IF THE present assault on the National Labor Relations Act succeeds, as seems more than likely, labor will not be long in coming to the realization that it has lost more than the act gave it. What purports to be a movement for the suppression of imperfections in the law actually cloaks a powerful drive for the suppression of rights which labor had painfully won many years before the act was passed. The Wagner Act may yet be subjected to so effective and ironical a transformation that, as in the case of the Sherman Act, those who were thought to be its beneficiaries will come to regret that it ever saw the light of legislative day.

No longer do the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Industrial Council, and their associates call for the repeal of the act; that campaign has been dropped. Lammot du Pont, Tom Girdler, Ernest T. Weir, and the other powerful magnates who govern modern industry's labor relations through the revitalized N. A. M. have concluded not only that the "repeal" campaign was crude salesmanship but that its objectives were too narrow. Repeal would merely withdraw from labor such benefits as the act bestowed, whereas judicious amendment of the act not only can nullify these benefits but forge in addition powerful restraints with which to bind labor. In Wisconsin and Pennsylvania this strategy was tested last year on "little Wagner acts," and the results were highly gratifying. Accordingly, the password in Washington now is, "By all means keep the act—but perfect it."

When Representative Howard W. Smith tossed into the House hopper H. R. 8813, embodying the recommendations of a majority of his committee for amendments to the act, the first step was taken to effectuate this twofold program for clipping the wings and removing the claws of an advancing labor movement. It must be understood that the Smith proposals, sweeping as they are, were designed to achieve merely the objectives of the first stage of the amendment program, the sterilization of the Wagner Act.

FIRST STAGE: STERILIZE THE ACT

Since it is contended that the Smith amendments are necessitated by the present board's "shockingly inadequate" procedure, it may be well first to recall that in the Jones and Laughlin decision the Supreme Court, even before it was "reconstituted a New Deal Court," carefully reviewed the act's procedural requirements and found nothing lacking. Chief Justice Hughes stated:

> The act establishes standards to which the board must conform. There must be complaint, notice, and hearing. The board must receive evidence and make findings. The findings as to the facts are to be conclusive, but only if supported by evidence. The order of the board is subject to review by the designated court, and only when sustained by the court may the order be enforced.

> Upon that review all questions of the jurisdiction of the board and the regularity of its proceedings, all questions of constitutional right or statutory authority, are open to examination by the court. We construe the procedural provisions as affording adequate opportunity to secure judicial protection against arbitrary action. . . .

Despite the fact that they are generally referred to as procedural, many of the proposed amendments are not procedural at all, but pierce to the very core of the act. Changing the definition of "employee" so as to bar from the protection of the act any worker who is shown to have engaged in "violence" is a substantive, not a procedural, change, the effect of which would be to reward employers who succeed in provoking union-minded employees into fist fights or scuffles. Similarly, the redefining of "agricultural labor" so as to eliminate from the act's coverage thousands of workers engaged in processing agricultural products could be considered "procedural" only by Mr. Smith and the Associated Farmers.

Other proposals of the Smith committee are even more fundamental. The stipulation that employers need not submit counter-proposals in the process of collective bargaining tears out the very heart of the bargaining provisions and reduces the expression "bargaining in good faith" to a hollow phrase, a fact which even the courts have recognized and affirmed. Permission to employers to express to employees "opinions" respecting union matters, "provided that such expressions of opinion are not accompanied by acts of coercion, intimidation, discrimination, or threats thereof," opens wide the door to the very employer interference with the self-organization of employees which the act was designed to eliminate. The board's decided cases are replete with instances of employer expressions of "opinion" which were unaccompanied by acts of coercion or threats thereof but were themselves highly coercive and intimidating in the circumstances under which they were uttered. Constitutional guaranties of free speech do not have to be written into statutes; they are protected by organic law. Under the act as it now stands, should the board attempt to prohibit employer expressions of opinion without substantial evidence in the record that the expressions were coercive, the courts would gladly refuse to enforce the board's order, which would be ineffectual.

Among the other proposals of the Smith bill, some of which are actually procedural, there is not one which would not endanger, to a greater or lesser degree, the effective operation of the act. Splitting the present board into a divided agency composed of an administrator and a "labor court," subject to no unified control, would at the least invite a return of the very confusion and impotence which characterized the administration of Section 7-a of the NIRA. The House Labor Committee in 1935 urged creation of the present board precisely "to dispel the confusion resulting from dispersion of authority and to establish a single paramount administrative or quasi-judicial authority in connection with the development of the federal American law regarding collective bargaining." Making it mandatory for the board to hold an election whenever an employer files a petition alleging that two unions claim to represent his employees would place it in the power of employers to force a vote at a time when a union had just commenced organizing and was sure to suffer a defeat.

The so-called Garrison proposal, which would deprive the board of jurisdiction in cases where conflicting unions were unable to agree on the appropriate unit, would free the board of troublesome A. F. of L. and C. I. O. controversies, but on the whole it would seem calculated to promote industrial strife rather than lessen it. Since it would free employers from bargaining with any union when there is a dispute, A. F. of L. or C. I. O. unions would doubtless seek to intervene and thus thwart collective bargaining whenever their rivals were about to achieve organization of a plant. The provision to limit the appropriate bargaining unit in all cases to the largest requested by the employees might well serve to destroy the industry-wide or association-wide collective agreement which has brought relative industrial peace to such great segments of labor as the men and women's garment industry and the Appalachian coal industry.

Most crippling of all would be the effect of the proposed rules for the admission and weighing of evidence in board proceedings, and for the judicial review of board orders. The former would gravely hamper the board in the ascertainment of the truth by sacrificing substance to legalistic form; the latter, through the provision that courts may set aside board orders that are "clearly erroneous," would constitute a plain invitation to federal courts to substitute their judgments for those of the board; they do this now without invitation, despite the admonitions of the Supreme Court.

There are lesser but nevertheless substantial changes which cannot be considered here for lack of space; but two other aspects of the Smith bill deserve mention because they have been generally overlooked: the proposed new subpoena rules, which would enable employers to intimidate workers and union officials by scattering about sweepingly worded subpoenas; and the strange way in which Section 13 of the present act has quite disappeared from sight. Section 13 reads, "Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike." No two lines in the present law could be omitted with more devastating effect. However, since the Smith report did not even mention this vital omission, perhaps it ought charitably to be attributed to careless draftsmanship, which the committee will eventually rectify.

Representative Smith himself has taken pains to point out that his bill by no means represents the final step in the amending program. H. R. 8813, he announces, is "designed to meet only the most pressing needs disclosed by the inquiry, which is to be continued." The amendments which are still to come are intended to achieve the objectives of the second stage—the transformation of the act into an effective instrument for shackling organized labor. The outlines of this assault upon the act are already adumbrated in a host of proposed amendments which are being vigorously pushed to the fore.

SECOND STAGE: BALANCE THE ACT

The most frequently urged and most significant of these second-stage amendments are those which seek to "equalize" or "balance" the act. These proposals are invariably prefaced by a disarming and moving plea for equality and fair play. The act is at present palpably unfair, it is asserted, because it is "one-sided"; it limits the privileges and increases the obligations of employers, while it imposes neither restraints nor obligations upon employees and trade unions. This is a telling argument, for inbred in every American is the conviction that fair play requires identity of rules for both sides in any contest—what's fair for Harvard is fair for Yale. But in drawing an analogy between social legislation and football one may overlook the fact that the objective of social legislation is precisely the correction of existing unfairness, the restoration of social balance where unbalance exists. It is not usually argued that the workmen's-compensation law is "unfair" because it confers benefits on the workers but obligations on the employers, that the Securities and Exchange Act is unfair because it confers benefits on investors but obligations on securities vendors, that the Interstate Commerce Commission Act is unfair because it regulates the railroads without regulating the public. Yet the National Labor Relations Act is charged with gross unfairness because it prohibits an employer from interfering with organization on the part of his employees while it does not impose restrictions or obligations on employees or unions.

What is overlooked is the fact that the Wagner Act is not a code designed to govern the entire field of employer-employee relations. It has only one function—to protect employees in their right to organize and bargain collectively.

Though it prohibits interference with employee organization, the National Labor Relations Act leaves untouched the employers' complete dominion over his employees. In the process of collective bargaining the employer is not obliged by the act to concede or refuse a thing, or to reach any agreement whatever. If a deadlock occurs, the act leaves untouched the ensuing test of economic strength. All that is affirmatively required is that there be bona fide collective bargaining and no attempt by employers to interfere with the employees' right to organize; so that employees, may, if they wish, seek to achieve by bargaining as a group what Holmes once described as "the equality of position between the parties in which liberty of contract begins."

What is most noteworthy about these second-stage proposals, which claim to be schemes newly evolved to offset the "one-sidedness" of the act, is that they cloak anti-labor proposals conceived long ago and unsuccessfully urged for years by groups fully recognized as partisan. Most of them are storehouses of dynamite screened by a gentle and "what-could-be-fairer" façade. Consider the most frequently urged of the "balancing" amendments, the proposal that employees shall have the right to organize without interference or coercion "from any source." Vigorous attempts to protect employees against coercion from "any source," as well as from the employer, were made by anti-labor forces, including the National Association of Manufacturers, back in 1932, 1933, and 1934, before the Wagner Act was ever proposed, and again in 1935 when the act was pending before Congress. The suggestion was flatly rejected by both houses, the Senate committee stating:

> This erroneously conceived mutuality agreement is that since employers are to be prohibited from interfering with the organization of workers, employees and labor organizations should also be prohibited from engaging in such activities. To say that employees and labor organizations should be no more active than employers in the organization of employees is untenable; this would defeat the very object of the bill.

The House committee added forcefully:

> What is really sought is a legal strait-jacket upon labor organizations, on the specious theory that such organizations have no more legitimate concern in the organization of employees than have employers themselves.

Despite this definitive Congressional repudiation before the act was passed, the proposal is now being vigorously pushed under the pretense of "balancing" the act, and may receive far different treatment in a House which authorized the Smith investigation by an overwhelming vote. Smith himself, protesting coyly that he must not be thought to have "prejudged" the issues, recently stated that Congress must "so amend the law . . . that the laboring man himself, whom it is the object of the act to protect, can be free to act without fear of coercion . . . from any source."

No one has yet defined with precision the scope of the "coercion" from which employees would be protected by such amendments. If actual or threatened violence is contemplated, then hundreds of jail sentences meted out each year testify that existing penal statutes amply punish employees and union representatives for actual or imagined "coercion" of a physical character. Employers, on the other hand, for their "coercion" under the act face merely a "cease and desist" order from the board, which must be obeyed only after approved by a federal court. The term "coercion," moreover, as used in the law, is possessed of elastic qualities which for hundreds of years have made it a highly effective tool for crippling legitimate labor activities. To some judges in labor disputes a single picket, even absolute silence, may constitute "coercion." Hearken to New Jersey's notorious chancery judge, Maja Leon Berry, issuing an injunction against a union:

> A single sentinel constantly parading in front of a place of employment may be just as effective in striking terror to the souls of employees bound there by their duty as was the swinging pendulum in Poe's famous story "The Pit and the Pendulum" to the victim chained in its ultimate path. In fact, silence is sometimes more striking than the loud mouthings of the mob.

Just as the "coercion from any source" type of amendment would "balance" the act by crippling the organizational activities of unions, other proposals advanced to "balance" the act would impose, under one euphemistic slogan or another, serious restraints on the right of labor to strike. One such proposal has recently come into great favor because of the way it is working out in Wisconsin, where it was adopted last year as an amendment to Wisconsin's state "Wagner Act." This amendment makes it an unfair labor practice for employees to participate in a strike unless a majority of the employees in a collective-bargaining unit have voted by secret ballot to call a strike. The seeming reasonableness of the proposal, which will win it the commendation of many fair-minded people, conceals nothing less than the virtual outlawing of the organizational strike. A union which has 490 members out of 1,000 employees in a plant cannot strike despite the refusal of the employer to bargain with it or to adjust legitimate grievances, even if every member of the union favors such a strike. And if the union is successful in inducing a majority of all the employees in a unit to support a strike, its every move and plan will become an open book to the employer as the result of the procedure prescribed.

In addition to the various proposals designed to prohibit or restrict strikes, numerous suggestions have been advanced, always on the same pretext of "balancing" the act, to regulate the time when, and the procedure by which, strikes may be called. Such proposals run a wide gamut, but many of them incorporate "cooling" and mediation features. Amendments of this type obviously have for their purpose to impede successful organizational strikes by the imposition of procedural hardships and delay. The difficulty of maintaining employee morale at an effective pitch over an extended period of time and the inability to utilize strategic timing in the calling of strikes have long been recognized by employers and labor leaders as fatal to success. The abuse of preliminary injunctions by intransigent employers seeking to strangle strikes through delay was one of the principal factors necessitating enactment of anti-injunction laws in labor disputes.

Representative Smith is known to favor a proposal for compulsory mediation and a "cooling" period as conditions precedent to the right to strike, provisions "similar to those of the Railway Labor Act." The menace inherent in this proposal is scarcely veiled by the reference to the Railway Act. In the railway industry, as Senator Wagner has pointed out,, organizational strikes are practically unknown, union organization and authentic collective bargaining have been firmly established for so many years that the situation is not at all comparable to that in industries in which employees must strike to procure recognition of such rights. Moreover, it is noteworthy that these various proposals to apply the "cooling" feature of the Railway Labor Act to labor in general have not been accompanied by offers to invoke the drastic criminal penalties and other severe restrictions which that act imposes upon employers.

Euphemistically labeled as "guaranties of union responsibility," another group of proposals seek to impose regulations on the internal operations of trade unions. These would require publication of union finances, constitutions, and lists of members and officers, regulate eligibility to union office, and forbid political contributions by unions. The weighty objections to all these bright ideas, which have been often and clearly established when they were urged frankly as anti-union measures, lose none of their force when such proposals are advanced as amendments to "balance" the act. Although thousands of "cease and desist" orders demonstrate that some employers are sufficiently irresponsible to violate the law of the land, and though there is conclusive proof that associations of employers have instigated open defiance of it, no one has ventured to suggest an amendment to regulate the machinery utilized by employers' associations or corporations in their labor relations.

The often-repeated argument that unions should in fairness be prohibited from making political contributions because corporations are prohibited from making them is ironic in the light of the La Follette committee report demonstrating how effectively corporate employers have circumvented this restriction through contributions to the war chests of their powerful employers' associations. And more important, the attempted analogy between corporations, which are chartered by the state for commercial purposes, and unions, which are voluntary, non-profit associations formed specifically to promote the welfare of their members, is entirely misleading. Farmers' organizations and other voluntary associations are not forbidden to make political contributions. If any sound reasons exist why labor unions should be thus singled out, they have not yet been advanced.

Limitations of space prevent analysis of other subtle and disingenuous suggestions now being urged in the name of "balancing" the act, suggestions which, like those already discussed, would achieve results sought by anti-labor groups for decades. Prominent among these are proposals to prohibit or restrict all-union shop contracts, to impose on the Labor Board the duty of enforcing collective-bargaining contracts, and to establish a varied list of unfair labor practices for employees and labor unions, violation of which the board would be empowered to punish in some instances by a "death sentence" prohibiting a union from collecting any further dues or assessments. Even this last proposal is advanced in the name of "fair play," although a fair balance would conceivably involve a grant of power to the board to order a corporation guilty of an unfair labor practice to surrender its charter or cease business; at present it merely issues to the employer an order, ineffectual without court approval, to "cease and desist" from the prohibited activity.

PUBLIC LIB... Burlingame, Cal.

Underlying the contentions for the necessity of amendments affecting the procedure and powers of the board is the unceasing cry that the board is biased. Employer assertions that the board suffers from an "overweening" partiality for labor are scarcely surprising, but the statement that an employer "knows before he goes before the board that there is no record of a single decision where he has had a ghost of a show" is reduced to absurdity by the figures. Of a total of 21,789 cases closed by the board since it began to function, 10,907 cases were closed by agreement of the parties, 3,262 cases were dismissed by the board, and 5,844 were withdrawn to avoid dismissal.

Strategy may impel the forces behind the drive for amendment to accept modest gains at the present session of Congress. But once the act has been opened up, there will be no stopping short of a complete transformation of the act and its purposes. For the working people of the country that can spell only disaster.

Canada's Strategic Election

BY T. E. WOOD

Toronto, March 13

ON JANUARY 25 last the Canadian Parliament convened for its first session since the outbreak of the war. The session opened with proper decorum. The Governor General read the speech from the throne. "My advisers," he concluded, "having regard to the existing conditions and the stage of life of the present Parliament, have decided upon an immediate appeal to the country."

But not until Premier Mackenzie King himself informed the House that the session was to be prorogued that very afternoon and that the election would be held some time in March did the incredulous members comprehend what was afoot. In vain the opposition leaders rose to protest. R. J. Manion, leader of the Conservatives, and J. S. Woodsworth, leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation fraction—generally polar opposites in their politics—were at one in condemning the government: The government was running away from parliament; its action was a negation of the fundamental principles of democracy; dissolution was "a piece of unscrupulous trickery designed to win a decision for the government on a snap verdict." But it was all in vain. That evening the lights were turned out in the House of Commons, and there was nought for the malcontents to do but return to their constituencies, nursing their wrath to keep it warm. The election was set for March 26.

If Premier King and his ministers suffered any qualms over their actions, they did not show it. They insisted, on the contrary, that their decision to dissolve Parliament had been prompted by the best of democratic intentions. Just one week prior to the short-lived session Premier Hepburn of Ontario had jammed a motion through the provincial legislature censuring the federal administration for ineptness in the conduct of the war. In the face of such a motion, jointly indorsed by the Liberal and Conservative parties of Canada's largest province, an immediate general election was obligatory for any honest government. This, at least, was the Liberal explanation.

The opponents of the Liberals charge that Hepburn's motion of censure is at the best a paltry excuse. There are a number of excellent reasons why the Liberals should have avoided a parliamentary session before appealing to the country, and these reasons must have occurred to the astute politicians of the Cabinet as well as to the leaders of the opposition. First of all there was the ubiquitous bogy of political patronage in the War Department. It was known that the opposition was preparing some highly embarrassing questions on the subject. The contract for the manufacture of Bren machine-guns which the government let three years ago was still on the books for discussion. So flagrantly unethical was the Bren contract that the staunchly liberal Winnipeg Free Press felt constrained to demand a review of every contract which had been signed by the incumbent Ministry. Members of the government hotly defended the contract, but they were clearly made uncomfortable. The two principals in charge of the Defense Department were shifted elsewhere as soon as the war broke out—an admission of maladministration. The fact that both were appointed to other positions is merely additional evidence of Premier King's often irrational loyalty to his colleagues.

The Bren gun contract has since been supplemented by other charges of political patronage. The Financial Post of Toronto, acting entirely on its own and without access to the most essential government files, has succeeded in unearthing a number of deals which—to put it mildly—smack of impropriety. Perhaps the most glaring example is the case of a Belleville firm which with a capital of $10,300 succeeded in obtaining defense contracts to the amount of $1,200,000. The firm, it might be added, is controlled by a Liberal M. P. So aroused was the government over the Post's disclosures that Acting Minister of Defense Rogers decided to deprive it of all access to departmental information.

Then, again, had the Liberal Party continued with the session, it would have been compelled to reduce its budget, the swollen figures of which would have been sufficient to make even the staunchest patriot swallow hard. According to Finance Minister Ralston, at least $500,000,000 will be required to finance the war for the coming fiscal year (beginning March 31), the equivalent of the entire annual peace-time expenditure. (In contrast with this figure the cost of the last war was only $60,800,000 in the first year, and even in 1918 it stood at the relatively modest figure of $343,800,000. If the war continues for two or three years, Canada, in company with every other belligerent, faces the certain prospect of utter financial collapse.) Taxation of the consumer has already reached an inordinately high level. A $1,000,000,000 budget—with all that it involves in increased taxation—could scarcely be considered a politically advantageous accomplishment.

The Liberal ministers, moreover, were unquestionably concerned about French Canada. Quebec is the traditional stronghold of the Liberal Party; the federal Liberals today occupy no fewer than sixty of the sixty-five provincial seats. But Quebec is coincidentally a hotbed of isolationist and anti-imperialist sentiment. The defeat of Duplessis in the provincial election of last October has been widely misconstrued as a demonstration of pro-war sentiment. In reality, the French Canadians voted for the Liberals because they believed that this was the most effective way of protecting themselves against conscription.

Premier King has given his word that his government will not introduce conscription. But as the influential Toronto weekly Saturday Night dryly points out, neither King nor Manion would hesitate to introduce compulsory service if the military situation became sufficiently urgent. French Canada will be antagonized by the war budget and increased taxation. Its affection for the Liberal Party will scarcely be enhanced by the outbreak of large-scale hostilities. And conscription would be the final straw. It was this that Premier King had in mind when he said in his initial radio speech: "I believed that it [the election] ought, if possible, to be over before the spring offensive."

Such were the motives which impelled the Liberals to avoid a parliamentary session before they presented themselves for reelection. The unprecedented speed with which they dissolved Parliament has been a trump card in the hands of the opposition. Apart from this trump, however, the opposition holds little that will be of any use. It was probably this desperate lack which induced Manion to try the trick of "National Government."

Political cryptographers are still trying to decipher just what Dr. Manion means by National Government. Premier King has informed the country that neither he nor any of his ministers would be party to such a government; Manion has returned the compliment by informing his opponents that they would not in any case be invited. The field left open to Dr. Manion includes the C. C. F., the Hepburn Liberals, the Social Credit Party, and the New Democracy movement. Sober opinion holds that by National Government Manion means nothing more than government by the Conservative Party. Be that as it may, nothing has done so much to bedevil the following of the Conservative Party as this ignis fatuus of Dr. Manion's.

For the average citizen the issues of preparedness and war effort must remain a welter of accusations and counter-accusations. Manion insists that the First Division departed for Europe without complete equipment. Defense Minister Rogers lists the number of cannon and machine-guns that it took along. Manion retorts that the field guns were all of 1918 vintage and the machine-guns were due to be replaced. Manion accuses the Liberals of sabotaging Canada's military preparations during their years in office. The Liberals accuse ex-Premier Bennett of neglecting Canada's defenses during his period of power (1930-35). The Conservatives say that Canada provoked the war by refusing to announce solidarity with Britain during the Munich crisis. Premier King blandly replies that his position has always been that the question of war or peace was for Parliament to decide.

The support of Mitchell Hepburn, Premier of Ontario, is scarcely welcomed by the Conservatives. Hepburn, who can be as tempestuous and irascible as a spoiled child—his worst exhibitions have been characterized by downright boorishness—has a rare faculty for compromising himself and his friends. At the beginning of the campaign Hepburn announced that he intended to remain neutral. Today most Conservatives fervently wish that he had kept his word. His motion of censure in the Ontario Parliament, his decision to ban the showing of the March of Time film "Canada at War," his ill-considered criticisms of the War Department have militated against the Conservatives despite his current pretense of neutrality.

The Conservative Party might have made a much better case for itself had it taken a consistent stand for democracy. Its vehement protests about the "scuttling" of Parliament were prompted by little more than a partisan desire to get at the government files so that it could prove its charges of patronage. It has been left for Mr. Woodsworth of the C. C. F. to point out that for the first seven months of the war there have been two brief sessions of Parliament which altogether covered less than a week's time; that Parliament did not pass on the Defense of Canada Regulations, did not decide to send an expeditionary force, did not decide to make Canada the arsenal of the empire, did not decide on the empire air-training scheme. The one thing that Parliament did pass on was the declaration of war—and even here the decision was anticipated by the speech from the throne, which spoke of "the state of war which now exists. . . ." And Premier King was the man who said, "Parliament will decide"!

The Conservatives have protested, justly, against the censoring of their radio speeches. But here again their democratic protestations indicate precious little altruism. The radio censorship is but a minor phase of the war dictatorship under which Canada has been living these last months. The Defense of Canada Regulations have already achieved an international notoriety; so stringent are they that in comparison the British War Regulations would pass as a Bill of Rights. The Conservatives might have taken advantage of the widespread discontent with the War Regulations; instead they seem to consider them a part of the inevitable order of things. The task of the opposition has again fallen on the shoulders of the tiny C. C. F. group.

At the time of writing the consensus of expert opinion points to another victory for the Liberals. They have the advantage of incumbency in office, they have a far abler group of political propagandists, they have apparently won the backing of the money barons, and to cap it all they have the leadership of William Lyon Mackenzie King, whose masterly opportunism has made him Prime Minister of Canada for fourteen out of the last twenty years. In the present House the Liberals have a majority of 176 out of 245; the Conservatives have 39 seats, Social Credit 15, and the C. C. F. 7. Whether the Liberals will be able to retain their tremendous majority not even the experts can say.

Whichever of the two major parties wins, it will make little actual difference to the people of Canada. The disagreements between them are confined to monstrously exaggerated bickerings over political patronage, military expenditures in the years 1930-38, the quality of Canada's war effort, and the like. The basic issues of democracy, parliamentary rights, and war aims and the still important question of unemployment play a small part in their propaganda. As for the C. C. F., which has at least concerned itself with these issues, its little group is still a voice crying in the wilderness.

In the Wind

HOLLYWOOD ACTORS and writers, organizing to defend themselves against the coming Dies "exposé," have been coldly rebuffed by William Green. To their plea for support Green replied with a vigorous rebuke. He assured them that Dies was no menace to anyone "except Communists," and that the Dies committee deserved "co-operation" not "hindrance."

WHEN THE French film "The Baker's Wife" opened here, the proceeds of the first performance were turned over to Le Paquet au Front, an organization raising funds for packages for French soldiers. The film is based on a novel by Jean Giono—who is in a French jail for opposing the war.

IN THE NATION several weeks ago Henry Kranz, short-wave monitor for CBS, wrote that the German short-wave radio propagandists suffered from a fatal lack of humor. Shortly afterward, as Kranz was at his listening post, he heard the "week-end poet," one of the Nazi broadcasters, angrily attacking Kranz and The Nation for his article and asserting that Americans have no sense of humor.

A BITTER ATTACK on "Russian bombardments" of "defenseless objectives" appeared on January 25 in the Madrid newspaper ABC. . . . Facts in Review, the Nazi propaganda bulletin, apparently forgets that Jewish books have been burned and that Jewish authors are taboo; a recent issue contains a citation from Oppenheim's "International Law." . . . Three days before the Russo-Finnish war came to an end the Daily Worker ran a front-page editorial insisting that all "peace talk" was propaganda designed to "bolster" the "White Guard" regime and prevent Kuusinen from taking over.

A REPORTER, London sources relate, asked a friend who worked for the Ministry of Information how he could get a job there. "Just walk in, sit down at a desk, and collect your check on Friday," he was told. A week later they met again. "How are things going?" the reporter was asked. "Fine," he replied, "I have a desk and I was paid today. The only thing that bothers me is that a man has been following me all week." "That's all right," he was assured, "he's on your staff."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE Committee on Militarism in Education has just called attention to a remarkable seventy-one-page report on military training at the University of California recently prepared and published by the peace committee of the Associated Students at that institution. It is by all odds the clearest and most convincing argument against compulsory military drill yet produced. If the university Board of Regents can be influenced by sound reasoning backed by evidence that cannot be gainsaid, we shall in a short time see California joining the University of Wisconsin, the University of Minnesota, and North Dakota Agricultural College in shifting military training from a compulsory to a voluntary basis. That is the first recommendation of the student committee. Its second is the establishment of a peace court for dealing with the problems of war and peace, to be advertised to the students as a course on education for peace. To meet the argument that there is no money for establishing a new course, the committee recommends that an existing course on international relations be made over. Its third recommendation is that the intramural athletic program now partially financed by the Associated Students should be expanded and completely taken over by the university. This, it says, would be by far the best solution of the problem of providing all students with physical education and general health-building activities.

Since the War Department has been empowered by Congress to extend military training to the high schools and colleges of the country, I propose to give the rest of my space to part of the summary of this report made by the Committee on Militarism in Education. It begins by pointing out that, contrary to widespread belief, there is no federal legislation requiring compulsory enrolment and that the university would not suffer financially or otherwise by making drill voluntary. Moreover, the Board of Regents has the power under the California constitution to make the drill voluntary. The following are some of the other important points made:

Compulsory R. O. T. C. has little or no physical-educational benefits:

a. The exercise it provides for the cadets is of the wrong sort.
b. The uniforms are the wrong kind to wear for exercise and physical exertion.
c. The physical training that is presented is not compatible with that required by the type of society in which we live.
d. Military instructors are in no way qualified to teach physical education.

Compulsory R. O. T. C. is of little value for national defense:

a. The War Department does not urge or even suggest that enrolment in the R. O. T. C. be made compulsory.
b. Men taking merely the basic two-year course are not potential reserve officers, would not be commissioned in time of war, and are not part of our system of national defense.
c. The training given in the two-year basic course could be given in one week of intensive training.
d. Voluntary R. O. T. C. is a much less expensive method of turning out reserve officers than is compulsory R. O. T. C.
e. The R. O. T. C. course today is not teaching the students the necessary things that fighting a war connotes: it trains students to outmoded methods of warfare, with outmoded weapons of war, with outmoded tactics: there is no bayonet drill, no gas-mask drill.

Compulsory military training does not provide good citizenship training or create good citizens:

a. The type of citizenship taught is not compatible with the needs of contemporary society.
b. Military "citizenship training" is not compatible with the needs of other departments in the university, or with those of education in general.
c. The military instructors are in no way qualified to teach citizenship.
d. In the R. O. T. C. courses no time is devoted to even that minimum of citizenship training that the military department claims it gives.

Compulsory military drill does not develop character:

a. Compulsory R. O. T. C. makes for parrot-like repetition and unthinking, unquestioning obedience.
b. Character can only be developed where the curriculum is full of opportunities for individual decisions.

The R. O. T. C. develops a mind which accepts war as "inevitable":

a. The students are presented with a parade-ground version of warfare that ends on the parade ground and at the military ball.
b. Necessary truths are being withheld from the students in the R. O. T. C. as to what warfare will really mean in their lives.

If the university continues the compulsory R. O. T. C. course it is denying elementary civil liberties to many students.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Hello to Reform

THE AMERICAN STAKES. By John Chamberlain. Carrick and Evans. $2.75.

THE tides are running toward the right, the chambers of commerce are in cheerful mood, and the intellectuals are revising Karl Marx. John Chamberlain's "Farewell to Reform" (1932) and his new "American Stakes" mark off an era in the thinking of the politically literate. The farewell turns out to have been an auf wiedersehen. For this attempt to plot a not so new approach to American problems, domestic and foreign, is as persuasive a plea for gradualism as "Farewell to Reform" was an attack upon it. It is easy to set the Chamberlain of 1932 tilting with the Chamberlain of 1940. A "planned capitalism," he felt then, was "a contradiction in terms." Now he believes that "Western planners—see the files of Plan Age—have developed a technique . . . of limited, or partial, planning. This technique does not require dictatorial control . . . for it begins by research and ends in the consulting chamber." The final phrase is not intended to be ironic. Chamberlain 1940 dwells on the "need for a modern substitute for the Homestead Act or the new county and state roads of the early twentieth century." Chamberlain 1932 sneered at the "economic parrot" who looks for "new markets to be uncovered, new wants to be exploited." "The situation," Chamberlain wrote in 1932, ". . . can lead to but one of two personal conclusions: it can make one either a cynic or a revolutionist." He has ended instead in a standard variety of social democracy, though he prefers to call it political pluralism.

The situation that has made Chamberlain, and so many of his generation, new-style social democrats is not the same situation that left him the alternative of cynicism or revolution. By 1932 the achievements of the muckrakers, the trustbusters, and the Wilsonians, which "Farewell to Reform" discusses, were either dead letters on statute books or weapons in the hands of the interests they were intended to curb. Business indexes were at new lows; Mr. Roosevelt's speeches were not too different from Mr. Hoover's; there was no unemployment in the Soviet Union. Technocrats were at a premium on Park Avenue, and Wall Street was hoping to appease the coming revolution with ergs. In this context gradualism looked far too gradual. But the unexpected happened. Neither grass nor barricades appeared in the streets. Mr. Roosevelt provided the "confidence" Mr. Hoover had prescribed. The rather plausible politician from Albany rose to greatness in the White House, and the stock of reformism began to rise. Hitler's seizure of power and his refusal to reach a modus vivendi with the Soviet Union led to the Popular Front, and the Popular Front also turned amateur revolutionists into amateur gradualists. The Moscow trials, less glamorous than Five-Year Plan statistics, added to the trend. It was at this point that Chamberlain—as our pious friends say—fell off the locomotive of history. The trials, he writes in "The American Stakes," were "dramatic evidence of a socialist horn to the age-old dilemma of blending freedom and economic security," evidence that the Russion state was substituting "the courtier vices of deference and loyalty, and the courtier vices of fawning and intrigue" for the vices of capitalism. Here is the ideological divide between the Chamberlain of 1932 and the Chamberlain of 1940.

Chamberlain wants to steer a course between "a capitalism that makes for monopoly and a socialism that makes for monolithic party government." All he now admires in communism is the NEP. "If the Communists had been scientific planners, instead of 'scientific socialists,' " he writes, "they would have learned fast in 1921-28. They would have said to themselves: 'This NEP isn't pure socialism. But it works quite well in the handicraft-vegetable area of the economy, where no bottlenecks can be seized by bold entrepreneurs. Now let's go on to steel mills without disturbing NEP to the peasants.' " What he wants to do is to get away from the " 'either-or' boys" and "to hymn the virtue of a mixed economy, an eternally pluralistic economy, not in terms of presenting an argument for chaos or the status quo, but in terms of indicating the proper components of a permanently workable dynamic balance . . . the glamour of the all-or-nothing approach to our social problems must be exposed for the shoddy tinsel that it is." Chamberlain does not take these propositions apart and examine them as closely as he should. The abandonment of the NEP seems to have been a political rather than an economic move, dictated by fear of the development of a new class living on profit and hostile to socialism. The question of reform versus revolution is not a question determined by abstractions but by historical circumstances. There is revolution where reform fails, but the failure of reform is not "inevitable." Chamberlain does not grapple with the crucial problem of determining just what the "proper components of a permanently workable dynamic balance" for this country would be.

War, Chamberlain believes, will upset the whole equation. But, given peace, if the gradualist approach is to be effective, its advocates must do a better job of revising "Marxism" and of analyzing the products of New Deal reformism. Chamberlain's criticism of "Marxism," like so much of current revisionism, starts with definitions so loose as to beg the question. "Marxists fail generally to understand the democratic state," he writes, "because they assume that the force of an owning class knows no limits and is always agreed on its aim. . . . The Marxist, looking at the naked power base of politics, forgets that original characteristics can be diluted and even transmuted by democratic custom." I do not pretend to be an authority on Marxism, but the idea of the "naked power base of politics" derives from Oppenheimer not Marx. Marxists themselves differ on the question of the state as widely as the "pluralistic" Kautsky, who stated Chamberlain's basic thesis long before Chamberlain,* differs from the "either-or" Lenin (who was not always so "either-or"). Marx's favorite joke seems to have been to deny that he was a Marxist, but he is not an unfair test of Chamberlain's statement. If, as Chamberlain implies, the "Marxist" regards democratic processes as illusory, why did Marx hail the English ten-hour law as a great victory for the workers and hold up the American eight-hour movement as an example for the European proletariat? Why did Marx praise Rochdale cooperatives, even as Chamberlain does? The problem is subtler and more difficult than Chamberlain's statement of it.

Intellectually, it is far simpler to be a revolutionary purist than a "pluralistic" reformer, and it is not fair to blame Chamberlain for failing to provide a blueprint of the social order for which he is groping. But gradualism for its success demands the same kind of tough-mindedness that "Farewell to Reform" brought to bear on past attempts at reformism. If the advances of the Roosevelt period are to be maintained and pushed forward, the New Deal's cast of characters and regulatory agencies must be subjected to as keen a scrutiny as the best of the pre-war progressives gave the Interstate Commerce Commission and the state railroad and utility commissions. Otherwise the victories of today may prove as negligible as yesterday's, and the whole attempt at gradualism bog down. "The American Stakes" approaches the SEC, Thurman Arnold, Mayor LaGuardia, Phil La Follette, in too mellow a mood. Chamberlain is somewhat premature when he calls Arnold "the first vigorous trust-buster in our history"; like Teddy Roosevelt, Arnold talks big and carries a little consent decree. To term Knickerbocker Village a triumph of "practical idealism" is to be the victim of a runaway cliché. To include the notorious California Fruit Growers' Exchange and the Dairymen's League among the triumphs of the cooperative movement is again to take appearance for reality. Chamberlain sees that we must go beyond the New Deal, that "the fight, in the future, will be over the question of increasing our total production instead of spreading what production we have," but he is alarmingly tender with Phil La Follette, who sets these same words to demagogic tunes.

I. F. STONE

Improvisations of Reality

THE CRAZY HUNTER. By Kay Boyle. Harcourt, Brace, and Company. $2.50.

IN THE three long stories that make up this volume Kay Boyle in no way deviates from the norms set in her previous work. Again one notes the fragility of her themes and their detachment from substantial experience and convincing locations. In the main she still depends for her effects on an implacably pursued rarity of phrase.

The three stories are unified by a common concern with integrity of feeling and its violation by the compulsive accidents of life and the callous conventions of society. In the title-piece a blind horse becomes the issue disrupting the tranquillity of a genteel English family; the mother has resolved to have the horse shot, while the daughter, in the purity and absolutism of her youthful spirit, tries to avert the deed of violence, which in her mind swells into an all-comprehensive image of cruelty, fear, and death. "The Bridegroom's Body," probing the frustration of women in a world of males, is saved from vagueness and remoteness by its effective symbolism of mating and battling swans. "Big Fiddle," sturdier than the other stories yet least impressive, tells about an American jazz player in Europe who is accused of a murder which he did not commit.

Weighed down by a burden of excessive detail, these narratives move at a snail's pace; for detail often serves Miss Boyle merely as an occasion for a gratuitous display of her literary powers rather than as a means of creating verisimilitude, of naturalizing and deepening the projected scenes and characters. The difficulty, however, is that the seeming richness of texture cannot mitigate her failure to produce fiction more accomplished than the sensitive, and at times moving, improvisations of reality which she now has to her credit. Nor does her gift of arranging words in a unique manner carry her very far beyond the suspect pleasures of verbal virtuosity—and virtuosity should not be confused with excellence of style. Language, as Eliot once remarked, is healthy only when it directly presents the object, when it is so close to it that the two are identified. Otherwise it becomes morbid and unreal.

To my mind, the chief defect in Miss Boyle's equipment as an artist is to be traced to her lack of a subject which is organically her own; and by an organic subject I mean something more tangible than a fixed interest in certain abstract patterns of emotion and behavior. Being in possession of an elaborate technique and having developed disciplined habits of observation, Miss Boyle seems to be able to turn her hand to almost anything. As a result one feels all too often that she is not really involved with her themes, that she has not conceived but merely used them. And what, after all, is the difference between use and conception if not a measure of the gap separating competence from creation.

PHILIP RAHV

Mr. Gitlow Regrets

I CONFESS: THE TRUTH ABOUT AMERICAN COMMUNISM. By Benjamin Gitlow. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

CONFESSION may be good for the soul, but six hundred pages of it is plain overindulgence. Mr. Gitlow's fulsome penance inevitably recalls more famous instances of the Bolshevik bent for confessing, but in fact there is a profound difference. The Moscow comrades confessed the sins they had committed—or said they had committed—against the Communist Party; for the most part Mr. Gitlow confesses the sins which the party committed against him. However, there is enough of the flagellant in him to warrant some comparison and more than enough to make much of his book uncomfortable reading. He freely includes himself in the ranks of the damned and describes with relish the depravities of his party days. "We were pretty mean and heartless," he writes, speaking of the "lynching bee" staged by the Central Executive Committee when it drove Ludwig Lore out of the party as a heretic. "But at the time we did not even question the ethics of hounding an innocent scapegoat at the behest of the Comintern leaders." When he points out how Jay Lovestone and he opposed the scheme of shooting an American flag full of holes in order to display it at a party rally as a flag captured by Sandino in Nicaragua, he feels compelled to add: "Note that even our opposition to this bit of knavery was purely on the grounds of expediency. It occurred to none of us to consider the matter in the light of ordinary human decency."

---

* "In a Socialist society," Kautsky wrote, "there can exist side by side the most varied forms of economic enterprises—bureaucratic, trade union, cooperative, private."

These little close-ups—they are scattered through the book—are not of a sort to reassure the reader concerning the reliability of Mr. Gitlow's testimony. Neither is the extreme bitterness of his delineations of everybody in the party, from Stalin, "like a panther about to pounce upon his prey," down to the most wretched factional tool ordered by Gitlow and his caucus mates to steal a briefcase from a rival factionalist. Unlike the Hatfields and the McCoys, the comrades of the "third period" days rarely stayed put in any one clan but switched around like old-time Chinese generals, shopping in this faction and that for the best buy in prestige, power, and opportunity for advancement. The result was that in an active career like Gitlow's a man would at one time or another have experienced the hearty enmity of practically everyone else in the party. All that in-fighting left Gitlow a mass of scars, and it is hard to determine in his book where fact ends and Gitlow grudge begins.

But the reader loses little if he quickly abandons any effort to examine judiciously every strand in the web of intrigue, gossip, and conscienceless power politics which Gitlow weaves about the party from its birth. His versions of the thousand and one plots and counter-plots that marked his days as a Communist are not important; what is important, and grimly convincing, is the web itself, the pattern of the party's history, which his book reveals. Anyone with the most fleeting experience in leftist politics knows the corrosive power of factionalism. If Mr. Gitlow's book were a mere compilation of the countless rows, rifts, cabals, and conspiracies within the party it would have significance only for those modern Schoolmen who care how many proletarians can dance on the junction point of a hammer and sickle. But the volume goes beyond that and raises some major questions.

Mr. Gitlow argues, and I believe he makes a good case, that factionalism originates in quasi-dictatorship and ends in full-fledged dictatorship. In its earlier days the Communist Party of the United States, and of any other country for that matter, took its cues, its directives, and much of its money from Moscow. From the first, Gitlow maintains—and there is much documentation to back him up—the Russian party was the only one that had the privilege of instructing its delegates to the Comintern; moreover, it enjoyed the exclusive power to review and alter Comintern policy. The Comintern itself fixed the course for the parties of all countries, issued ultimatums, shifted comrades around not only from position to position but even from country to country, summoned leaders to Moscow for discipline, and voted funds for party activities to supplement those raised at home. The American comrades could argue up to a point

The book that tells what happened to our Liberals in the last war.

A LIBERAL IN WARTIME

THE EDUCATION OF ALBERT DESILVER

By Walter Nelles. Edited by Lewis Gannett, with Introduction by Roger N. Baldwin

"Albert DeSilver, associate director of the American Civil Liberties Union during and after the first World War, was a liberal who was born a conservative, and who was willing to give his full vigor to the defense of radicals, without ever becoming a radical himself. He stood for the most free and most deep-rooted Americanism at a time when the word was being perverted to connotations of reaction, intolerance and actual despotism; and he did it because he respected individual rights and human dignities, loved freedom and had a passion for justice. Roger Baldwin says this book is especially pertinent now; but he limits it too greatly. This portrait of an American is of permanent value . . . its transcendent importance is in its expression and embodiment of the essential spirit of American democracy." —N. Y. Times Book Review. $2.50

W. W. NORTON & Co., 70 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

NATIVE SON

BY RICHARD WRIGHT

"The most powerful novel to appear since 'The Grapes of Wrath'," says Clifton Fadiman of this novel by a Negro about a Negro that has overwhelmed the country.

$2.50 A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection for March with the delegates sent over to keep an eye on them, but the court of last resort was in Moscow. The natural result of this kind of rule from above was the formation of illicit cliques and cabals. Each held its own secret meetings and surreptitiously got out its own caucus paper; each schemed feverishly against its rivals, flooded the high court with coded cables, and sent secret emissaries abroad to convince the authorities that it was the only loyal group, the only one worthy of provincial leadership. Paralysis set in.

HARPERS

Then came the lightning. The man who eliminated factionalism in the U. S. R. R. eliminated it in the C. P. U. S. A. The party of Gitlow's day never experienced the unanimity that marks its course today. There are no factions; there are no differences of opinion. With the factionalism went the last vestige of democracy. But as Gitlow acutely points out, the two had nothing in common: the factionalism of the Communist Party, far from being a guaranty of democracy, was the catalyst that hurried the change from autocratic influence to totalitarian control. Genuine political democracy throughout the Communist movement might have made the fatal aspects of factionalism unnecessary, but that, unfortunately, was ruled out from the start. As a result Lenin begot Stalin and Stalin begot the miasma which rises from every page of Mr. Gitlow's unhappy saga. ROBERT BENDINER

Look Beyond the Law

LOOK AT THE LAW. By Percival E. Jackson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.75.

WHEN a doctor gets disillusioned with his profession he tries to write a novel like "The Citadel"; a journalist or a radical writes an autobiography; but a lawyer fires a broadside volume at the whole structure of bench and bar. Here is another testament by a lawyer, in some respects similar to Rodell's turbulent "Woe Unto You, Lawyers" (previously reviewed in The Nation), bearing witness that the cynical layman's view of the law is on the whole justified. One begins to wonder whether we may not be at the beginning of a sizable flurry of legal muckraking.

Unlike Rodell, Jackson does not consign to the flames the whole of the law. He wants particular reforms in the legal system. As a result his way of organizing his material is simple, although it tends to looseness. He starts with ten charges that the layman makes against the law, devoting a chapter to each: that there is too much law, that it is uncertain, rigid, technical, hypocritical, slow, expensive, that lawyers are dishonest, judges corrupt, and witnesses liars. While this has the merit of being rooted in the lay consciousness, it tempts the author to empty his notebooks into each chapter. In a way, however, I am happy that he has succumbed to the temptation. For each chapter is studded with richly illustrative stories taken from law reports, newspapers, lawyers' lore. They make the core of the book and are worth its price. In fact, I confess that the examples remain in my mind even when the commentary has slipped away.

Mr. Jackson is, I have said, a legal reformer rather than a legal revolutionist. He wants to change, not abolish, law and lawyers. He feels that both are inevitable parts of the social fabric; in fact, in a rather stuffy chapter toward the end he argues that unless Americans reform their law we shall get either communism or fascism. This is decidedly to mistake symptom for cause in our present social demoralization.

Yet there are insights in the book that go deeper. The author sees at times that law and lawyers are neither better nor worse than other men; that they are what they are because they reflect our economic and political set-up. And he sees that "reform of the law and of the lawyers cannot come from within; that it can and will come, as it has in England, only through popular appeal and understanding." But when he comes to his final chapters of "Remedy" he shifts from realism to the hortatory. "Let lawyers subscribe to their code at whatever cost. . . . We must restore to lawyers a sense of their importance and obligation to government." Fine, but how? Here we approach the fault line in Mr. Jackson's analysis: in one part of the book he sees the law as social product; in another he sees it as autonomous—self-remedying and presumably self-causing. To be sure, he uses as subtitle the phrase "The law is what the layman makes it," yet this is so only in the sense that it is so of all social institutions. And here again Mr. Jackson contents himself with the hortatory, calling on the layman to do something about it.

I suspect there will be no substantial change in either law or lawyers without a substantial shift in the base of economic power. Mr. Jackson's reference to England might have furnished a clue. Bentham and the philosophic radicals got a measure of law reform through Romilly and Brougham because they had behind them a capitalist class that was already on its way to power; it was principally the landed aristocracy that resisted the reforms. But since then (see the comments on England in Laski's essay on Law and Justice in the Soviet Union in his recent "The Danger of Being a Gentleman") English legal conservatism has been as tenacious as the American. What Veblen wrote in 1904 in his "Theory of Business Enterprise" about law and politics in both countries being adjuncts to business enterprise is even truer today. It is ironic that a quarter-century ago Louis Brandeis should have published a volume of essays asking business men to emulate lawyers and become a profession, while today we are increasingly aware that the legal profession itself has become a business. If "the law is what the layman makes it" it is only in the sense that every social system and every ethos fashion their own legal system, and that the path to radical reform in the law lies in reshaping society as a whole and, crucially, its structure of economic power. I no more agree with Mr. Jackson that there can be a basic reform by laymen in the law alone than I do with Mr. Rodell that there can be a revolution by laymen against the law alone. MAX LERNER

Stranger in the Land

THE STRANGER. By Rose Albert Porter. The Dial Press. $2.75.

CAN a Jew, by running away from his home, family, and everything that stands for the religion of his ancestors, really escape the subtle, tentacle-like encumbrances of his race's heritage? Will he find at the end of his flight that he has squandered most of his spiritual forces on the mere fruitless running-away, that his real goal all along was something more easily attainable and at the same time more worth fighting for? These questions are implied, though only partly answered, in "The Stranger," the story of a young Russian immigrant groping passionately for the vital essence of America. Having shaken off the dogma and ritualism of his father's inflexible creed, Philip Magell is dismayed to find in New York and Philadelphia Jews still cramped in noisy, shabby ghettos of their own choosing, hugging their old-country fetishes to their bosoms, while out in the copper hills of Montana most of the people—Jews and Gentiles alike—are blindly absorbed in their sordid game of dog eat dog, oblivious to nature's example of open-handed bounty and freedom.

Although Philip has intelligence and good looks and is unshackled by worship of tradition, he is extremely vulnerable to ridicule and to appeals for pity or sympathy. Envying the gumption of the copper barons and big-time gamblers, he has nevertheless too many ethical scruples to carve out a fortune by their kind of brigandage; realizing that one's own spiritual integrity alone can bring durable satisfaction, he nevertheless lacks courage and self-assurance to make a desperate stand for what he believes is right, until the crucial opportunity has passed. With remarkably little bias Mrs. Porter follows his restless flight, really a flight from himself, which makes him a stranger both among his own people and among the Americans to whom he yearns to be assimilated; and the story of his failure reflects not only the tribulations of a foreigner and a Jew but the tragedy of all men who discover too late that they have mistaken their own maladjustment for a malignant, inexorable fate, that the door which they have for years tried to batter down was never locked.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Decadence and Dylan Thomas

THE WORLD I BREATHE. By Dylan Thomas. New Directions. $2.50.

THAT "most exciting development in English poetry during the last few years," the work of the young Welshman Dylan Thomas, is very decadent art. We take our definition from Havelock Ellis, from the essay on Huysmans in his "Affirmations." "The classic manner," we read there, "subordinates the parts to the whole and strives after the virtues which the whole may best express. The later [decadent] manner depreciates the importance of the whole for the benefit of its parts, and strives after the virtues of individualism." In the representative selections from Thomas's three slender volumes of verse and handful of fantastic, sinister stories in poetic prose which constitute "The World I Breathe," the "whole" of poetry, the integrity of emotive and intuitive meanings, no longer or only very partially exists.

Vaguely the verses represent an interior world. It is "the pantheist totality and the obscure world underneath the skin." (The words are William Empson's: he is one of the important critics who feel Thomas to be a poet and a good one.) As much is to be gathered from Thomas's statement that "poetry must drag further into the clean nakedness of light even more of the hidden causes than Freud could

There are 64 VALUES
in LAFAYETTE'S
Radio Line

Whatever the radio you have in mind—portable, table model, automatic radio-phonograph combination . . . whatever the price you choose to pay, Lafayette has the set for you, and offers more for your money. More wanted features, more realism of reproduction, more cabinet beauty, more fine quality throughout. There are sixty-four distinguished models in the Lafayette line for 1940 — every one a value! Send today for Catalog No. NC4 describing the complete line.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y. | 24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I. | 110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL. | 265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

A SYMPOSIUM
"What Socialism Means to Me"
Beginning in the current issue of The CALL, official weekly publication of the Socialist Party, U. S. A.
CONTRIBUTORS
Norman Thomas, Lillian Symes, Joseph Coldwell, Upton Sinclair, Prof. Oskar Lange, Prof. Maynard Krueger, Tucker P. Smith, Travers Clement, Albert Sprague Coolidge, Alfred Baker Lewis, Frank Trager, Marceau Pivert, Bertram Wolfe, John M. Work, Henry Haskell, Mary Donovan Hapgood, Reginald Singh, Paul Porter, Richard Rovere, V. F. Calverton and many others.
write for free sample copy
SUBSCRIPTION: ONE DOLLAR A YEAR
THE CALL
549 W. Randolph St., Chicago, Illinois

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Readers Service Division
The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue · New York

In This Week's NEW MASSES
MR. COREY RECONSIDERS
A Series of Articles by
A. LANDY
A Marxist answer to Lewis Corey's series of articles in The Nation which he was so rash as to title "Marxism Reconsidered."
ORDER YOUR COPY NOW!
NEW MASSES
ESTABLISHED 1911
"Keep Abreast of the Truth"

NEW MASSES—461 Fourth Ave., New York City
Please send 10 weeks of NEW MASSES to me as per your special introductory offer of $1.00. I enclose this amount.
NAME..
ADDRESS..
CITY AND STATE..na

FRONTIERS OF DEMOCRACY

Edited by William Heard Kilpatrick

in the March 15 issue

"RESOURCES AND EDUCATION"

ARTICLES BY
David Cushman Coyle • Sidney Hook
David Lilienthal • George Soule • Paul
Hanna • Harold Hand • and others

"A liberal mid-monthly on the social scene written by educators for educators to help clarify the relationship between education and the broad framework of American life and culture."

▼

published by the Progressive Education Association
221 West 57th Street
New York City

$2.50 per year 35c single issue

STALIN and HITLER
The Reasons for and the Results of
THE NAZI-BOLSHEVIK PACT

a new 10¢ booklet
by Louis Fischer

To thousands of liberal Americans, August 23, 1939, was the darkest moment of the post-war years. On that day Soviet Russia signed its pact with Nazi Germany. What was the story behind the pact? What had happened inside Russia—and outside—to make the alliance possible? What did the event augur for the future of the Western world?

These are the questions that Louis Fischer weighs in this 64-page booklet. He covered Moscow for twelve years, from 1924 to 1936. His authoritative analysis of the pact is not only exciting journalism but important history!

REDUCED PRICES FOR FIFTY OR MORE COPIES

Single copies..........10c each
50 copies or more.......9c each
100 copies or more.......8c each
250 copies or more....7c each
500 copies or more....6c each
1,000 copies or more....5c each

Send your order for copies with remittance today! We will ship copies direct to your friends if you let us have their names and addresses.

THE NATION • [illegible] FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK CITY
8-23-40

I inclose $.................... for .... copies of Louis Fischer's booklet, "Stalin and Hitler."

☐ Send copies to the names on the list attached
☐ Send copies to me.

Name..

Address...

....

realize." Poems such as those commencing, "Where once the waters of your face" and "The hand that signed the paper felled a city," most certainly appear to be mystic symbols of the present stages of the cosmic life. The dreamlike world of the prose expresses a Welsh feeling of the diabolic core of creation. Still in many instances the intuitive meanings are hopelessly obscure. The prose recklessly mixes poetic with morbid experience and hallucinations. We perceive that despite his surrealism the poet is fairly indifferent to intuitive meanings, more than prepared to subordinate them to emotive ones: again and again drunkenly he has sacrificed his "criticism of life" to the splendors of form, sonority, sensuous effect.

It is almost exclusively for ear and eye that his fastidiously fashioned verse and prose have satisfactions. These none the less are rich. The verses are verbal scores. Oftentimes wry, the sounds lead an amusing life of their own and generate each other. The movement frequently recaptures an eighteenth-century vigor and stateliness: lines like "Awake, my sleeper, to the sun,/ A worker in the morning town," etc., approach, as closely as verse so sublime in pitch and image as that of Thomas can approach poetry of the elegant century, "From hence, ye beauties, undeceived," etc. Entire stanzas of his chant wonderfully:

> Some let me make you of the vowelled beeches,
> Some of the oaken voices, from the roots
> Of many a thorny shire tell you notes,
> Some let me make you of the water's speeches.

The flow of singular, not infrequently powerful, images is steady. The circumstance that well-nigh every line is a unique image, a minute poem, intensifies the taut rhythmicality. Finales such as "By the sea's side hear the dark-vowelled birds" or "to that Day/ When the worm builds with the gold straws of venom/ My nest of mercies in the rude, red tress" penetrate by virtue of intrinsic weight and magic.

That to an extent this work is a protest on the part of a young English poet against his immediate predecessors, the Audens and Spenders and their MacNephews and MacNeices, is a suggestion flowing from a recent study by Herbert Read. The article gave Thomas's negligence of intuitive meanings the look of a condemnation of the social and political comment which provided too much of the content of the verses of the poetic journalists; his accentuation of beauty of texture, the look of a condemnation of their limp and catarrhal form. The chief importance of this suggestion lies, however, in its reference of ourselves to the possible social significance of this decadent literature, with its accentuation of the life of an individual part at the expense of the totality. One of the questions it raises is whether the object against which this poetry may be thought to protest may not be less Auden and company than the collectivism they espoused. Its characteristics certainly give it the appearance of an individualistic protest. Another question is whether that protest may not have its lever in something far transcending the individual, Dylan Thomas. Let no one consider them irrelevant. Thomas is said to be very much "in" with Welsh nationalists. Just before the war broke out he was expected to edit a paper of Welsh cultural nationalism. And art has long been among the shadows cast before them by coming evolution and events.

PAUL ROSENFELD

IN BRIEF

BETHEL MERRIDAY. By Sinclair Lewis. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

In this novel Sinclair Lewis takes the theater under his protection. As wide-eyed as a country boy viewing the bohemians on his first visit to Greenwich Village, he surveys the wonderland of the stage with irrepressible enthusiasm and some apt humor. Mr. Lewis has evidently enjoyed his play-acting of recent years, for no one has ever treated stage folk in fiction with more good-will. Lively and no doubt exact in all details as a piece of reporting, the story is otherwise soft and effeminate. The author never takes a look into the insides of his characters, but is content to record their miseries and triumphs and to engage in copious discussions of their profession. He follows slavishly the itinerary of his assembled cast while it entertains provincial America with a version of "Romeo and Juliet" in modern dress. The one member of the troupe not portrayed in a purely external manner is Zed Wintergeist, a fanciful young man exhibiting all the traits of a Group Theater intellectual. The heroine, Bethel, whose career is traced from middle-class childhood in Connecticut to minor success on Broadway and happy marriage, is such a completely virtuous young lady and so dully and whole-heartedly devoted to her art that she turns out to be the least interesting person in the book.

CONVERSATION. By Conrad Aiken. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

This novel is of the type that reviewers like to describe as "civilized." Mr. Aiken, who has better fiction to his credit, here describes a domestic crisis in the family of an artist living on Cape Cod. The husband is, of course, an unpractical fellow and doesn't mind being poor, while his beautiful wife is insufficiently sympathetic. The situation is further complicated by the appearance of Jim Connor, a New York bohemian who steals furs from department stores in order to supply his indigent friends with some ready cash. In the end, however, the wrangling couple recognize—in words at least—the objective meaning of their difficulties and are reconciled. Nothing is really settled between them; presumably such are the finalities of existence. The story is urbanely written and has a few mildly resonant passages. All in all a pretty trivial performance.

POLITE ESSAYS. By Ezra Pound. New Directions. $2.50.

A new collection of not so new essays. Published in various places over roughly the last ten years, they employ Pound's famous "ideogrammic" method to communicate his now equally famous views on critics and literature. The perpetual clever undergraduate who mistakes rudeness for iconoclasm, this ex-enfant terrible is also a very sound critic when he comes to grips with a real subject.

GOING NATIVE. By Oliver St. John Gogarty. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

Novel? Satire? Travel diary? This entertaining, scandalous, and not very important book by the celebrated original of Buck Mulligan in "Ulysses" lightly recounts the adventures of (we trust) an imaginary Irishman who visits England on the advice of Yeats and tries to "go native." Without going very deep—and sometimes going quite wrong—it manages to convey a good deal of what everybody knows but rarely sees in print about the more emancipated circles of the English upper class. As a famous Irishman, the author works wit, poetry, and Dublin for all they are worth; but he is undeniably amusing.

SHANGHAI: CITY FOR SALE. By Ernest O. Hauser. Harcourt, Brace, and Company. $3.

A picture of the world's fifth-largest city, founded by British and Americans in 1843 as center of a ruthless commercial imperialism. Entertaining as well as informative, it covers a century of history in full detail drawn from research and from first-hand acquaintance, a century which ends with the eclipse of the white man's supremacy under the stress of recent events.

LIFE ON THE CIRCUIT WITH LINCOLN. By Henry Clay Whitney. Edited by Paul M. Angle. Caxton Printers. $5.

A new edition of the now rare volume of recollections of a friend and contemporary, provided with an introduction, notes, and illustrations—some from unusual contemporary photographs—by the secretary of the Illinois Historical Society. It is flowery and verbose but gives a lifelike impression.

CHIP OFF MY SHOULDER. By Thomas L. Stokes. Princeton University Press. $3.

A still young Washington correspondent, winner of a 1939 Pulitzer prize, gives a graphic report of his Atlanta childhood, and of life in the capital and other parts of the country in the period from Harding to Roosevelt. He has a gift for re-creating personalities and bringing facts to life. Like a good reporter, he changes his social philosophy with the times. Like many good reporters, he sometimes overwrites.

THE DUTCH: A PORTRAIT OF THE PEOPLE OF HOLLAND. By Adriaan J. Barnouw. Columbia University Press. $3.

Not a history, a travelogue, or a survey, this book is an interpretation of Dutch life and character by a native of Holland (at one time The Nation's correspondent at The Hague) who has been Queen Wilhelmina professor of the history, language, and literature of the Netherlands in Columbia University for twenty years. Distinctly non-academic and written especially for American readers, it is both lively and enlightening, but it is conspicuously silent on economic questions as such.

A HISTORY OF SCIENCE, TECHNOLOGY, AND PHILOSOPHY IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By A. Wolf. The Macmillan Company. $8.

This is the second volume of Mr. Wolf's exhaustive history of modern science and technology. (Of the section on philosophy the less said the kinder to him.) It does not cover so dazzling a period of scientific progress as did the first volume, for the great scientists of the eighteenth century do not compare in stature with their predecessors of the seventeenth and sixteenth. In the eighteenth science approximated more what we take to be its normal progress—a progress depending on the steady co-operation of a multitude of more or less anonymous researchers, with an occasional figure of very high distinction, rather than on the revolutionary contributions of towering geniuses seemingly rising by their own unaided power to great heights. Nevertheless, the period covered by this volume is not a whit less interesting than the earlier century. Birth may be a more obviously dramatic event, but growth and maturation have their own fascination. Mr. Wolf does his job, as he conceives it, with distinguished competence, but only in the colloquial meaning of the word can he be called a historian. For what he gives us is not a history but a chronicle. Problems such as historians seek to resolve are only incidentally touched on. We get nothing of the organic growth of science, of the role of the scientific method, of the way in which its use spreads from one field to another, of the forces within and without the laboratory which sustain interest in research and channel its direction. For Mr. Wolf the efficient agent of development is the spirit of the times—a convenient ghostly power which explains everything. But since the progress of science conceived as chronicle is the bare recital of superseded errors, it can be of serious concern only in so far as it can be used to illumine something more than the facts of which it consists. In spite of its limitations, Mr. Wolf's volume should find a place in the library of everyone interested in the development of science and of Western culture, for it is an inexhaustible mine of factual data.

RECORDS

THE reports concerning Dimitri Mitropoulos have been that he has to a remarkable degree the personal force and magnetism that a conductor must have in order to exert power over the minds and wills and bodies of a hundred orchestral players; and one does in fact sense these qualities in the performance of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture that he has recorded for Columbia with his Minneapolis Symphony (11175, $2). They make the performance dynamic and give the work power; but its full power depends on its plastic proportions—such things as the fortissimo of the opening chords in proportion to the forte with which the following phrase ends; the sudden piano of the first four measures of the second subject in proportion to the violence which precedes them and the gradual crescendo to fortissimo which follows; the forte of a phrase in the development in proportion to the fortissimo of its repetition a moment later at the climax of the development. And on this record these plastic proportions are not realized: the opening fortissimo is barely as loud as the forte at the end of the following phrase; the second subject is almost forte; the phrase in the development is as loud the first time as the second. To what extent this is Mitropoulos's doing and to what extent the recording engineers' I cannot say. The recording is clear and brilliant; the orchestra seems competent but not distinguished.

One hears a finer personnel, superbly disciplined by a conductor of authority and verve, in the Cleveland Orchestra's performance of "Schéhérazade" under Artur Rodzinski, which is recorded with remarkable clarity and fidelity and a brilliance that is a little hard, and also with a waver at the end (M-398, $10). The Pasquier Trio does some of its beautifully sensitive playing in Beethoven's String Trio Opus 9, No. 3 (M-397, $5), of which I find only the scherzo movement interesting.

I care as little about Schubert's early Quartet No. 9 in G minor, of which a fine performance by the Coolidge Quartet is poorly recorded by Victor (M-641, $4.50). On Victor singles we get Handel's Oboe Concerto No. 1 (12605, $1.50), not one of his best works, but enriched by Leon Goossens's breathtaking tone and style on the oboe and good playing by the London Philharmonic under Eugene Goossens; two bits of Russian liturgical music—Ippolitov-Ivanov's "Behold, Bless Ye the Lord" and the First Psalm of Kiev Monastery, "Blessed Is the Man, Hallelujah" —beautifully sung by the Siberian Singers (4462, $1); the Scherzo-Valse from Chabrier's delightful "Dix pièces pittoresques" for piano, atrociously played by Reginald Stewart (12606, $1.50); and two American folksongs, "John Henry" and "Jack o' Diamonds," sung by John Jacob Niles, and a little harshly recorded (2051, $1.50).

A couple of years ago I pointed out the "ignorance that clothes itself in the terms of erudition" in the Victor leaflets. In the past year or so the show of erudition has become vastly more pretentious: the leaflets signed A. Veinus now contain long, learned-sounding discussions of technical aspects of the music, studded with references to significant details, some of them given in musical notation. There isn't the slightest possibility of the ordinary reader understanding any of this; and he isn't even told exactly where on the records he can as much as hear the details that are referred to. I don't think the intention is that he should understand; I think it is rather that he should be impressed: he is to stand humbly in the doorway and look from a proper distance at the dishes of knowledge on which the élite of the Victor leaflets feast. And it is just as well, for at closer range he would find they are sawdust: the supposedly significant details are the utterly insignificant ones which a man who didn't know what he was talking about would pick in order to show that he knew a great deal. A man who, encountering a simple A-B-A form in which A on its return is ornamented somewhat, calls it an example of theme and variation form is one who, encountering a simple theme and variation movement in a Haydn quartet, will call its normal accompaniment bass a ground bass and will discover in the movement details of the variations on a ground bass form as it existed and developed nowhere but in this man's mind. But what has set me off on this subject is a statement of a different sort: one purpose of the writer of the leaflets is to mention as many other works of the composers that are on Victor records as he can possibly drag in; and in the leaflet of the Schubert Quartet No. 9 the slow movement of the String Quintet Opus 163 (Victor Album M-299) is cited as illustrating—believe it or not—the "rhapsodic exultation which, in the last year of his life, Schubert learned to evoke and control at will." My advice to the reader is what it was—to listen to the music with his own ears and use the leaflets for the various domestic purposes I suggested two years ago.

B. H. HAGGIN

BALLAD FOR AMERICANS
Stirringly Sung by
PAUL ROBESON
Two 10" Records—Four Sides
VICTOR ALBUM P20—$2.00
ERIC BERNAY'S MUSIC ROOM
133 West 44th St. LOngacre 3-4420
OPEN TO 10 P. M. — ORDERS MAILED PROMPTLY

LAFAYETTE
PHONOGRAPHS—RADIOS AT THE MIDTOWN SHOWROOM
OPEN TO 10 P. M.
ERIC BERNAY'S MUSIC ROOM
133 W. 44th St. LOngacre 3-4420

Coming Soon in
THE Nation
"Failure of a Mission, Berlin, 1937-1939"
By SIR NEVILE HENDERSON
REVIEWED BY HANS KOHN

Letters to the Editors

Mathematics vs. "Morals"

Dear Sirs: The protest against the appointment of Bertrand Russell as professor of philosophy at the College of the City of New York is a sad spectacle. There seems to be no question of Dr. Russell's abilities as a philosopher and mathematician, but a decrying of certain of his ethical beliefs. Because we may not agree with those beliefs, are we to deprive our college students of the stimulus and inspiration of a celebrated thinker? Is this not descending to the practice of a fascist system that deprives itself of special knowledge, as in the case of Dr. Ehrlich and his famous "606," because it was contributed by a "non-Aryan"?

If Bishop Manning and the others are to have their way, why stop with Bertrand Russell? Or is Russell in a special category because he has "propagandized" his views? If so, what becomes of the old saying: Actions speak louder than words?

I am quite certain that Dr. Russell has never forced his particular body of beliefs upon anyone. Why should Christian gentlemen force opinion on Dr. Russell by the none too delicate method of limiting his activities as a teacher and his ability to earn a living as such?

MARGARET LA MANNA

Brooklyn, March 12

Corey and His Critics

Dear Sirs: This is not to answer the comments on my "Marxism" articles, but to set the record straight on several matters of fact.

Algernon Lee writes: "Five years ago he [Corey] had seen his Moloch put on a false-face clumsily simulating the features of democracy. . . . Last August he saw the mask cast aside, saw Bolshevism and Nazism clasping hands—and was Mr. Corey stupefied! Or was he really? Anyway, he has now more or less emerged from his stupor. Six months, in such a case, is perhaps no more than a fair equivalent for the ten seconds allowed in pugilistic practice." Mr. Lee has spun all this out of his inner consciousness. The facts are as follows:

1. I never accepted or defended the "popular front" or the hypocritical Stalinist playing with democracy; in fact, I spoke publicly against both.

2. I was not "stupefied" when Stalinism cast aside the mask and the Stalin-Hitler pact was signed, for I had publicly predicted the pact a year earlier.

3. The ideas I expressed in The Nation articles are not a product of the past six months. I first advanced the general ideas in a series of lectures three years ago at the Independent Labor Institute, of which Bertram D. Wolfe was director; again at the institute in another series of lectures two years ago; again in a lecture before a seminar of the League for Industrial Democracy in March, 1939, where Norman Thomas was present; again in a lecture at Unity House in July, 1939, where the chairman was Elias Tartak of the Social Democrat New Leader; again at a symposium in October, 1939, where one of the speakers was Louis Waldman of Mr. Lee's Democratic Federation.

Bertram Wolfe says: "I think he [Corey] underestimates the trade union as the most important single institution for the development of economic democracy." But as a matter of fact I emphasize in my third article the importance of trade unions as a bulwark of democracy under socialism: "Independent unions, with the right of collective bargaining and the right to strike, must exist to protect the workers who still remain workers and to limit the threat of bureaucracy."

Wolfe then asks: "With whom shall Corey's 'new middle class' combine?" The answer is in my articles: with the other useful functional groups, whose largest component is the proletariat.

Finally, Wolfe writes: "The greater danger is not, as Corey seems to think, that of dictatorship by the mass of producers over the technicians and administrators, but—as happened in Russia—the dictatorship of indispensable technician-administrators over the mass of producers." My articles "imply" nothing of the sort. Wolfe misunderstands and reverses my position, which is that totalitarian dictatorship, whether communist or fascist, is a dictatorship over the mass of producers. I nowhere say there is danger of a dictatorship of the producers over the administrators, for there is no such danger. I do say that if a proletarian dictatorship is set up over a new middle class not won to socialism, it will end as a dictatorship of that class over the proletariat and farmers.

LEWIS COREY

New York, March 13

Should We Try Again?

Dear Sirs: I cannot refrain from protest after reading the letter of W. T. Couch in your issue of March 2. Mr. Couch is convinced that we must eventually take sides in the European conflict—that we shall sooner or later support the governments and economies of France and England rather than see them fall. Mr. Couch says that if we supply the Allies with all the armaments, munitions, and supplies they need, they can almost certainly win the war.

Well, we tried that last time, and our men followed the armaments and munitions—followed them, I have read, as soon as the Allies themselves became unable to furnish enough men to use the supplies being sent. And the sending of our boys did not bring about a peace that proved either just or lasting.

Does Mr. Couch believe, does anyone believe, that Germany, fighting two of the strongest nations in the world, could come off victor except at frightful cost to itself? Would such a Germany be one that an America which had kept out of the conflict need fear? It seems to me that if this war takes its course, Europe will make itself a shambles out of which no nation will come as a "victor." What will it profit Europe or ourselves if we sacrifice our youth to enlarge that shambles?

ELLEN A. FREEMAN

Troy, N. Y., March 7

Blackout in Canada

Dear Sirs: I wish to draw the attention of your readers to the fact that a Union Defense Committee has been formed to aid the defense of C. H. Millard, secretary of the Canadian Committee for Industrial Organization, who faces trial shortly under the Defense of Canada Regulations. Millard was arrested last December for statements he is alleged to have made at an organizational meeting of the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union at Timmins, Ontario.

The statements the crown charges

Millard with making are not different from those made by many persons prominent in Canadian public life. None of these persons have been prosecuted, and no one who believes in democracy thinks they should be.

Trade unionists and progressives believe that the charges against Millard constitute an attempt by Attorney General Conant of Ontario, the Dominion's chief labor-baiting official, to use the Defense Regulations to blackout trade-union activity. It may be significant that Conant was crown attorney at Oshawa in 1937 when Millard was president of the United Auto Workers' Union, which obtained improved conditions despite Premier Mitchell Hepburn's boast that he would ride with General Motors and drive the C. I. O. out of Ontario province.

It seems to us that since industrial democracy is a solid basis for political democracy this attack on trade unionism should be defeated with all the resources available. The defeat of such an attack should have considerable effect in bringing about amendments to the regulations.

Expenditures in connection with the hearing are expected to be considerable. Contributions from all trade unionists and liberal-minded persons will help. They should be addressed to the Union Defense Committee, 302 Manning Chambers, Toronto.

HARRY ROWE, Treasurer

Toronto, March 12

"Four Negroes"

Dear Sirs: May I add a footnote to your superb editorial of February 24, Four Negroes, on the unanimous decision of the United States Supreme Court, read by Justice Black, which reversed convictions of four penniless—and, until the N. A. A. C. P. came to their rescue, defenseless—Negro tenant-farmers in Florida who had been cruelly beaten to extort "confessions" of a murder they did not commit.

The victory in this case reminds Americans of two important things: first, how grueling is the struggle and, second, how the fight for one minority directly benefits other minorities and bulwarks democratic rights for all Americans.

Readers of The Nation will be interested in knowing that this is the thirteenth victory won in the United States Supreme Court by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It was made possible by the nickels and dimes of colored people and by the self-sacrifice of the two Negro lawyers in the case—S. D. McGill of Florida and Leon A. Ransom of Washington. Both lawyers not only served without fee but paid out of their own pockets some of the expenses of the four appeals to the Florida Supreme Court and the eventual successful appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The N. A. A. C. P. has no endowments and does its work wholly on memberships and contributions. When we won the famous Elaine, Arkansas, riot cases, in which the United States Supreme Court ruled that trials dominated by race prejudice and mob violence violated the federal Constitution, the late Louis Marshal sent us a "thank offering."

We should like to ask readers of The Nation to send us "thank offerings" now in the form of memberships or contributions, which will enable us to fight a great number of other equally important cases. Checks should be made payable to Mary White Ovington, treasurer, and sent to 69 Fifth Avenue, New York.

WALTER WHITE,
Secretary, N. A. A. C. P.

New York, March 6

Happy Ending?

Dear Sirs: Regarding your editorial Four Negroes, in your issue of February 24, I would like to state that if Dr. Goebbels files this particular story away I see no reason why he should fail to remember where he placed it. Where is the happy ending that all Americans can be proud of?

True, the Supreme Court saved the lives of the four Negroes. But will they receive any compensation for the seven years they spent in the shadow of death? Will any employee of the state of Florida be punished for the way in which these four defenseless Negroes were treated?

Too many justices of the United States Supreme Court have been satisfied with the passive role of proclaiming doctrine, enunciating stirring canons of liberty and justice; but beyond that they have not gone. So it is pertinent to ask: Will the officials in the state of Florida be allowed to interpret and enforce the law in the future as they have interpreted and enforced it in the past?

ARTHUR PENN

San Francisco, March 11

Prose by Hart Crane

Dear Sirs: I am editing a collection of prose passages from the letters, articles, reviews, and notes of Hart Crane, the American poet. This collection is to be published in the fall, 1940, issue of Twice a Year, published semi-annually in New York City.

I should greatly appreciate the privilege of examining any prose of Hart Crane's which has not yet been printed in full in his "Collected Poems" or in the biography by Philip Horton. Full credit will be given. Material may be sent to me at 19 West Thirty-fourth Street.

BROM WEBER

New York, February 23

CONTRIBUTORS

HERBERT LUNDY, staff writer of the Portland Oregonian, spent several months in Aberdeen investigating the Law case.

ROBERT DELL was for many years the correspondent of The Nation and the Manchester Guardian at Geneva. He is now lecturing in this country.

ARTHUR A. MICHAEL is the pseudonym of a lawyer who has made a close study of labor legislation.

T. E. WOOD is a Canadian journalist who has frequently contributed articles to The Nation.

PHILIP RAHV is an editor of the Partisan Review, a radical literary journal.

MAX LERNER, professor of political science at Williams College, has written extensively on legal problems. His most recent book is "Ideas Are Weapons."

LOUIS B. SALOMON, a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College, is a regular reviewer of fiction for The Nation.

PAUL ROSENFELD has written on contemporary movements in art and poetry for The Nation, the New Republic, and other periodicals.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 30, 1940 NUMBER 13

The Shape of Things

NOT SINCE THOSE REMOTE PRE-WAR DAYS when the big-business press was sure that the ICC would prove the ruination of the railroads has a regulatory body been subjected to such vicious and misleading attacks as those now being directed against the National Labor Relations Board. An ex-trial examiner from Orange, New Jersey, is given all the space he wants to slander the board for fostering "Communists and kindred radicals" until embarrassing disclosures about his own unjudicial conduct as a trial examiner lose him the limelight. A report by regional directors disclosing nothing worse than that the board is understaffed and unable efficiently to coordinate its work is ballyhooed as a "suppressed" indictment of the board's "methods, policies, and machinery." The same interests that made a great to-do over this report, which indicates that the NLRB needs more funds, are the chief support of the movement in Congress to slash the board's appropriations. An attempt is being made to cut out the appropriation for the board's economics division, headed by David J. Saposs, a labor economist of established reputation who is far from being the "Communist" the blatherskites have been calling him. Finally Representative Norton's pro-labor and pro-New Deal House Labor Committee, in an attempt at appeasement, has voted to approve an amendment of the Wagner Act providing for a five- instead of a three-man board. The committee is still resisting pressure to report the Smith amendments, which would ruin the act altogether, but its new move will have the effect of throwing the act open to amendment from the floor unless a "closed rule" is obtained barring any amendments but the committee's.

*

THE UNFORTUNATE RESULTS OF ATTEMPTS at appeasement are illustrated by the fruits of Mrs. Norton's effort last year to give reaction half a loaf on the wage-hour law. Mrs. Norton bottled up in her committee the Barden amendments, which were sponsored by the notorious Associated Farmers of California and would have exempted 1,000,000 workers in agricultural processing industries from the wage provisions of the wage-hour law and another 1,500,000 from the hour provisions. Workers in canneries, packing houses, and the stockyards would have suffered from these exemptions, which were sold to Congress as relief for farmers but were actually relief for some of our greatest fruit, vegetable, and meat processing companies. When pressure on the House Labor Committee became severe, Mrs. Norton reported out a bill of her own as a compromise measure. She asked a closed rule to prevent the Barden amendments from being offered from the floor but failed to obtain it. In the parliamentary scuffle that ensued the Barden amendments were reported out by the Rules Committee, and though they failed to pass last session they are on the calendar now. They may come to a vote next week. If they pass, the success of the packers' and canners' lobby will encourage other industries to seek similar exemptions. Labor's chief gains from the New Deal are at stake in the amendments that threaten the Wagner Act and the wage-hour law.

*

THERE IS NO DIVINITY THAT DOTH HEDGE a judge, and the attempt of jurists in Chicago and St. Louis to send editors to jail for daring to criticize them calls for a manifestation of good old Boston Tea Party Americanism. Two editors and the famous cartoonist, Fitzpatrick, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch have been cited for snorting editorially at a judge who dismissed extortion indictments against a politician and a labor leader. Granted that the great Fitzpatrick can be very disrespectful—his offending cartoon was entitled "Burlesque House in Rat Alley"—it's still a free country. The case of the Post-Dispatch has called forth thunderbolts from Editor and Publisher, but the press has shut up like a clam on the Chicago case, for the Hearst strike is involved and publishers hang together. Some time ago Judge John J. Lupe issued an injunction seriously hampering the Newspaper Guild in giving publicity to the strike. The Guild was fined $5,000 plus $4,000 in costs for telling people a strike was on. Now Louis F. Budenz and W. L. Patterson, editor and associate editor, respectively, of the Chicago Record, and Robert Wirtz, state secretary of the International Labor Defense, have been cited for criminal contempt. They may go to jail for criticizing the injunction. Unfortunately most publishers, including those of the "liberal" Chicago Times, which is also silent, would rather help break a Guild strike than defend the freedom of the press.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE HITLER-MUSSOLINI CONFERENCE AT the Brenner was followed by some very animated kite-flying in Berlin, but in neither Moscow nor Rome has there been much open response. "Well-informed sources" in the German capital fed the foreign correspondents reams of matter about the forthcoming agreement among the Reich, the Soviets, and Italy to insure the neutralization of the Balkans and checkmate Allied intrigues in that region. There followed rumors that Molotov was about to pay a visit to Berlin, but this was officially denied in Moscow. Meanwhile, Italian newspapers continued to stress Italy's "non-belligerent" role and to make nasty remarks about the Allies—a cheap and safe method of adhering to the axis. Despite this apparent lack of enthusiasm, Germany is likely to maintain its efforts to promote a triple guaranty for the neutrality of the Balkans. This would leave it free to exploit the region economically and at the same time lock up its one remaining vulnerable flank. Such an agreement, however, would be difficult to negotiate without a long-range understanding about the respective spheres of influence of the three dictator powers in the Balkans. And how are their very divergent interests to be reconciled? Stalin, pursuing his czarist forerunners' dreams of perfect security, must aim at possession of the Straits, without which the Black Sea can never be a Russian lake. But attainment of this objective would mean Russian domination of the eastern Mediterranean, where Mussolini also has ambitions. Nor is it compatible with German plans for a Lebensraum stretching to the Aegean.

*

MEANWHILE, THE NAZIS CONTINUE TO PUT pressure on Rumania in the hope of obtaining full control of its economic resources. Once again Dr. Karl Clodius of the German Economics Ministry has descended on Bucharest with an impressive train of experts. Stories were sent abroad that he brought with him an ultimatum to the Rumanian government, which was so annoyed by these reports that it arrested several prominent persons for spreading false news and expelled the British correspondent of Reuters. The truth appears to be that Clodius merely presented some very urgent "suggestions," after which he invited the Rumanian ministers to see a film showing in gory detail the effectiveness of the German campaign in Poland. Despite these hardly subtle tactics Rumania has since sent a trade commission to London. The German demands include a more favorable exchange rate for the mark, increased oil and agricultural production and exports, and increased transport facilities —presumably to aid the shipment of Russian goods via Black Sea ports. Greater farm production requires demobilization, but Rumania is disinclined to turn from swords to plowshares while its future remains so precarious. Hence the German effort to induce Italy and Russia to join in guaranteeing Rumanian integrity. This means ignoring Hungarian claims and probably explains Premier Teleki's hurried visit to Rome.

*

THE PROJECT OF A DEFENSIVE ALLIANCE of the Northern neutrals seemed from the first a rather forlorn effort to lock the door after the Finnish horse had been stolen. It is not likely to mature now that the Soviet government has plainly indicated its desire that the door be left open. That, in itself, suggests that Russia may some day find it convenient to occupy the stable. If it does, the Finns are hardly in a better position to resist than they are to withstand Moscow's "advice" regarding foreign policy. For despite brave declarations of Finland's determination to rebuild its defenses, the fact is that the terms of the peace treaty have so undermined its strategic position that its ability to hold out against renewed aggression is very doubtful. Moreover, its resources, crippled by the war and the peace, are quite inadequate to provide for both military and economic reconstruction. Half a million refugees from the ceded areas must be resettled and the damage to 370 bombed towns and villages repaired. And funds for carrying on this work must be found at a time when Finnish economy is severely handicapped by the effects of the Western war on its export markets. With Finland removed as an effective barrier between them and Russia, the anxiety of Norway and Sweden is understandable. It seems likely that, while they will have to abandon the plan for a defensive pact with Finland, they will attempt to reach a military understanding between themselves. Yet even such a limited agreement will present difficulties, since geography forces Sweden to cultivate the good-will of Germany, while Norway, with its long Atlantic coastline, tends to pay more heed to Britain.

*

AS WAS ANTICIPATED, GANDHI EMERGED from last week's All-India National Congress at Ramgarh with power to make another attempt at peaceful settlement before the civil-obedience campaign is formally initiated. If the attempt fails—and there are few who predict otherwise—Gandhi himself is to direct the campaign to free India from British rule. The decision of the Congress has not been accepted by the left-wing group under Subhas Chandra Bose, which has launched its own campaign for immediate independence. Bose charges that Gandhi, although avowedly standing for independence, is actually preparing the ground for a compromise with British imperialism. Gandhi's supporters insist that he is fully prepared to lead the independence drive, but that time is required not only to attempt to gain this end, if possible, by peaceful rather than coercive methods but to prepare the Indian people for a successful civil-disobedience campaign. While Gandhi has apparently not divulged his plans to anyone, it is believed that the campaign has been postponed for at least three months.

*

SPECIAL AID FOR REFUGEE CHILDREN IN ALL parts of the world will be made possible through the "Children's Crusade for Children Without a Country," to be held during the week of April 22. Under the leadership of Dorothy Canfield Fisher a plan has been worked out by which each American school child, from grade to high school, will be asked to contribute as many pennies as he is years old to a fund for child refugees. The funds are to be distributed among Chinese, Polish, German, Spanish, Austrian, Czech, and Finnish refugees according to need on a basis worked out by a distinguished jury. Aside from its practical purpose of raising money for the tens of millions of children who have been rendered homeless throughout the world by the folly of adults, the campaign should also serve a useful educational purpose in acquainting American children with the predicament of children abroad.

The Reynaud Cabinet

VICTIM of a temporary combination of left and right, the Daladier Cabinet fell between two stools, meeting the usual fate of French Cabinets of the center trying to govern with a shifting majority. There would appear to have been two main issues in the latent conflict between Daladier and Reynaud which led to the crisis, namely, the inclusion of Socialists in the Cabinet and the restoration of parliamentary government. Like the French General Staff, Reynaud believes that the successful conduct of a war requires the support and cooperation of organized labor. And he has not concealed his opinion that only a government including the Socialists could make it possible to restore parliamentary government in France during the war.

A Government of National Union such as was formed at the beginning of the last war, which Reynaud desired and Daladier might have been willing to accept, was impossible because Louis Marin and his Republican Federation, the largest and most compact group of the right in the Chamber, refused to enter a Cabinet including Socialists. Daladier preferred the right to the Socialists, and about three weeks ago he planned to reconstruct his Cabinet by taking in the right and getting rid of Reynaud. The maneuver failed and led to his fall.

In the March 19 vote of the Chamber which forced Daladier to resign, the abstainers, who outnumbered the supporters of the government, included all the Socialists (155) and about a score of other deputies of the left who wanted Reynaud as Prime Minister; Marin and the whole of his group, who wished to get rid of Reynaud; and Pierre-Etienne Flandin, with half the members of his small Democratic Alliance group.

Immediately after the formation of the Reynaud Cabinet there was a Radical attempt at sabotage which must have had Daladier's support, although Daladier himself and six other Radical ministers had accepted portfolios. When the Chamber voted confidence in the new Cabinet on March 22 by a majority of 112—268 to 156—only 33 Radicals voted for the government, 7 voted against it with the right, and 70 were among the 111 abstainers. It was no doubt planned that the Radical ministers should resign and force Reynaud's resignation, but again the maneuver failed. All the members of the government pledged themselves to loyal support of the Prime Minister—it must have been a bitter pill for Daladier to swallow—and the government decided to remain in office.

The Reynaud Cabinet is a great improvement on its predecessor. The elimination of Georges Bonnet, Munichois par excellence, would alone justify satisfaction, but it is far from being the only gain. The new Prime Minister is immensely superior to the sham strong man and intriguing small-town politician whom he succeeds; indeed, he is probably the best Prime Minister that could be found in France at this moment. A man of great intelligence, with a ready wit and an independent mind, he is a realist in the best sense of that term. He is also a man of decision who knows what he wants and usually knows how to get it. Reynaud was formerly a member of the Democratic Alliance but left it a few years ago on account of Flandin's pro-Nazi tendencies, and he is now an Independent. He was opposed to Munich and was one of the four members of the Daladier Cabinet who resigned in September, 1938, after Chamberlain's visit to Berchtesgaden but unfortunately withdrew their resignations under pressure from Daladier. The other three—César Campinchi, Georges Mandel, and Henri Queuille—are all members of the new Cabinet. Reynaud was a strong supporter of close relations with the U. S. S. R. until Stalin turned his coat.

The new government includes five Socialists—three ministers and two under secretaries. Georges Monnet, the the new Minister for the Blockade, is one of the best men in the Socialist Party. Albert Sérol, Bonnet's Socialist successor as Minister of Justice, should give France less repression and fewer prosecutions for political offenses. The appointment of Louis-Oscar Frossard as Minister of Information should turn out to be a good one. He has had a checkered political career, for he has been successively a Socialist and a Communist and now belongs to the Socialist Republican Party, a halfway house between the Radicals and the Socialists. But he is very intelligent and may be expected to give more freedom to the press and to make the censorship a little less stupid than it has hitherto been.

Reynaud himself takes the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. He will have a strong team of collaborators at the Quai d'Orsay. The new Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Auguste Champetier de Ribes, is one of the deputies of the right who definitely opposed Munich. Coulondre, who was French ambassador to Berlin until the war, and is now, for all practical purposes, though not officially, permanent head of the Quai d'Orsay, is one of the ablest men in the French diplomatic service and may be trusted to recommend a sound policy.

The French ministerial crisis is not a sign of the weakness of French democracy, as the German, Italian, and Russian press pretend, but on the contrary a sign of its strength. During the last war France had about half a dozen different Cabinets, and the frequent changes did no harm. Reynaud's position is not yet secure, and he will have a tough job to keep in office, but there are already signs that French public opinion is on his side. The maneuvers of the Radicals have been severely condemned by newspapers of all shades of opinion. One of the few exceptions is the Journal des Débats, which belongs to François de Wendel, president of the Comité des Forges and a member of the international gang of financiers and big business men who were the real progenitors of appeasement. Its opposition is a compliment to the Cabinet.

The Fifth Avenue "Riot"

LAST week's "riot" in front of the French consulate in New York reflected little credit on either the city administration or the pickets who were attempting to protest against alleged French persecution of the Spanish refugees. The police action in suppressing the picketing was reminiscent of Mussolini's great victory over Albania. A cordon of five hundred men, mounted and afoot, was thrown around Rockefeller Center more than five hours before the picketing was scheduled to begin. When the pickets appeared, twenty-three in all, including several women, they were pounced upon with such violence that several bystanders were injured.

The general resentment against the brutality of the police has undoubtedly been tempered, however, by doubts regarding the purpose and desirability of the protest. The pretext for the demonstration was an order supposed to have been issued by General Menard at Daladier's behest calling for the immediate expulsion from France of all Spanish refugees who refuse to enlist in the French army or accept military labor service. The French government declares that the report of the order was deliberately "faked" by Communists for political purposes. It insists that there has been no change in French policy toward the refugees and that there is no intention to close the camps in which some 150,000 are still provided for. The facts of the situation are difficult to obtain. Julio Alvarez del Vayo, whose article on conditions in Franco's Spain appears elsewhere in this issue, has made a public statement defending the French treatment of the refugees, and his position is fully backed by Negrín. Nevertheless, it is known that the French have interfered on numerous occasions with refugee services. Several months ago Bonnet ordered a raid on S. E. R. E., the official Spanish relief organization, and its activities in getting refugees to Latin America have been hampered. Although the refugees have not been "forced" back into Spain, tens of thousands have returned under pressure. The Menard order may have been a "fake," but some doubt regarding the full accuracy of the French denial is justified.

But even if we were to assume the authenticity of the Menard order, we should still question the wisdom and sincerity of such a demonstration as that staged before the consulate. Criticism which does not recognize that the French, for all their mistakes, have done more than any other people for the refugees is politically suspect. The French government's denial concerning the order was in itself a statement of policy, and the demonstration which followed could only have been motivated, therefore, by considerations that had little to do with the plight of the refugees. The change in the French government which brings the pro-Loyalist Paul Reynaud to power and eliminates Bonnet promises a sounder handling of the problem; and if any further pressure is needed to assure fair treatment of the refugees, it will not come with any effectiveness from the Communist-inspired group which staged the demonstration.

Such tactics do the refugees considerable harm. They obviously make it more difficult to raise money for their cause. Anti-Loyalist groups delight in charging that sums given for the refugees have been diverted for political ends. The fact that the accusation is untrue does not stop it from being circulated. Fortunately, there was no connection between the demonstration and the Spanish Refugee Relief Campaign, which is the primary agency collecting funds to aid the refugees. We are glad to note that this organization, despite partisan statements issued in the name of some of its local committees, has kept its head through the recent charges and countercharges and is devoting its energies to obtaining funds for relief of the refugees and for transporting them to the countries that are willing to receive them.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Wire-Tapping and FBI

THE NATION is glad that the Senate has given unanimous approval to the resolution calling for an investigation into wire-tapping by governmental and private agencies, including the FBI. We have been urging an inquiry to prevent a revival of the abuses that marked the Palmer era. The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, in reporting the resolution favorably, stressed this aspect of the investigation when it said, "Wire-tapping, dictographing, and similar devices are especially dangerous at the present time because of the recent resurgence of a spy system conducted by government police. Persons who have committed no crime but whose economic and political views and activities may be obnoxious to the present incumbents of law-enforcement offices are being investigated and catalogued." The reference is to the card index of "radicals" being compiled in the Dilling manner by J. Edgar Hoover.

As Senator Wheeler declared in announcing the appointment of five members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce as a subcommittee for his investigation, "We have a law upon the statute books which prohibits wire-tapping. The Department of Justice should rigidly enforce it, and prosecutions should be had of all those violating the statute regardless of who they might be." Now, many are suspected, but only one agency is known to have violated the law. That agency is the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Attorney General's statement, issued shortly after the Senate committee voted favorably on the resolution for an inquiry, admitted that the FBI had been tapping telephone wires and ordered the practice ended. That order comes just six years after Congress passed a law forbidding wire-tapping under any circumstances by any agency.

Obviously the place for the new inquiry to begin is within the shadow of the Capitol, in the offices of the Department of Justice. Yet Senator Stewart, chairman of the subcommittee which will handle the investigation, now declares that lack of funds will prevent an inquiry into the FBI. It is true that the subcommittee has only $15,000 to begin its work, but the very fact that its funds are limited would seem to dictate that it begin with the FBI, for that is nearest, easiest, and most important. We realize that there are special situations in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts which require attention. In those states wire-tapping is suspected; at the Department of Justice wire-tapping is admitted.

We think that the first witness summoned before the committee ought to be J. Edgar Hoover. And the first question asked should be: "By what authority did you tap telephone wires after Congress had made wire-tapping a felony?"

Notes on Puerto Rico, III

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

IF POLITICAL corruption is a chronic disease in Puerto Rico, poverty provides the constitutional debility in which the germ flourishes. The slums on the outskirts of Puerto Rican towns create an effect of physical collapse and depression so overwhelming that no contrast of mountains and rich canefields can wipe it out. The country slums seem better only because the flimsy shacks are open to sun and air. Comfortable small farmsteads exist, but they are few in comparison with the huts of field and town workers, so few that one exclaims with pleasure over houses that would seem at least shabby even in the depressed areas of the South. A large part of Puerto Rico's workers live in permanent "jungles"—shanty towns that have been accepted as the accustomed housing arrangements of one of the most thickly populated areas in the world.

The United States attempted no important improvements in the wages and living standards of Puerto Rico's workers for thirty-seven years. In 1935 the New Deal, personified on the island by the Puerto Rican Reconstruction Administration, made a start. First under the direction of Ernest Gruening, who was also the head of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the Interior Department, and later under the direct control of Miles H. Fairbank as Assistant Administrator, the PRRA has carried out large-scale projects in a dozen different fields. It has initiated agricultural experiment stations, built several housing developments, improved public-health work, begun to distribute small plots of land to farm laborers. It has acquired and is operating cooperatively a sizable sugar central and has launched several other cooperative enterprises. It built and now operates a major hydroelectric plant and is developing a broad rural-electrification program. More recently the wage-hour law has put pressure on Puerto Rican employers to pay a more nearly living wage to their workers. Opinion as to the success of the industrial ventures and the practicability of the wage-hour provisions in a depressed colonial economy varies all the way from extreme hostility and contempt to partisan enthusiasm, depending on the politics and economic status of the observer. Both are probably of more value as education than as yardsticks of achievement.

A drive around the island provides a good chart of its problems. Follow the road that leads from San Juan to the south coast over the central mountain range, and you see it laid before your eyes: canefields that stretch off over hilltops long since denuded of trees; roads jammed with cane trucks and walking human beings and livestock so that every steep curve hides a possible casualty; huts built of unpainted wood open at every seam, roofed with tin or thatch and plastered with advertising signs. Towns, fringed with wide areas of one- or two-room shacks, with small shabby dwellings along the side streets, and at the center a pleasant plaza flanked by church and shops and public buildings. On the higher hills you find coffee—a hopelessly depressed crop—fruits, vanilla. Bananas grow at almost all levels. You move through the island and store up variegated impressions leading, no doubt, to many unsound conclusions. But of one thing you are sure at every twist in the road—there are too many people and they are desperately poor.

We visited the Lafayette Central—controversial focus of the PRRA's attempts to alter the island economy. It is impressive to the eye—a large mill and eighteen thousand acres of cane land, part of which is leased to individual farmers and part operated by the central. The whole is a cooperative enterprise of rather intricate structure. As an important feature of the venture—though separately administered—the PRRA has built for the workers a large number of small concrete dwellings, each with an acre of land, clustering about community centers which comprise schools and shops and clinics and rooms for meetings and entertainment. The head of the housing development and the manager of the mill, both Puerto Ricans, led us through this impressive social-economic experiment station. Their interest and devotion to the idea behind the venture were contagious, but they were quick to acknowledge weaknesses. Although the central is making a small profit, it has not reached a level of efficiency comparable with competing commercial mills. This they attribute largely to the need of educating the workers to an understanding of the nature of the enterprise. "When they learned that they owned the plant, their first idea was, Why work? Owners don't have to work." These men questioned, somewhat, the wisdom of trying to apply strict cooperative methods to a large-scale industrial-agricultural venture run largely by unskilled, uneducated labor. But they maintained against all criticism the present educational value of Lafayette and its future importance as an economic example.

An independent fruit planter in the hills told us the undertaking was a failure from every point of view. "The jibaro," he said, "won't take instruction. He doesn't want land for growing ground crops. He hates and fears concrete houses—thinks they're cold and damp and far inferior to a wood or thatch shack. I've tried all those things. I offered my workers land and the seed to put in it. They didn't want the land and they ate the seed. I've tried to improve their health too—used to treat them for hookworm. But if they won't wear shoes, what's the use of curing their hookworm? They come around once a week now and down a dose of epsom salts and go off satisfied."

But the experience at Lafayette is different. At first, workers looked at the new houses with suspicion and resented instruction in planting and terracing and improving the land. Gradually they learned to take pride in both land and house, and social workers and agricultural inspectors are now welcomed. The results are manifest. Bougainvilleas and other vines grow over the porches, and the gardens are almost all well tended. And a long waiting list of applicants for houses is evidence of the changed feeling. But it must be admitted that education and some degree of paternal supervision are a necessary part of any successful social reform in Puerto Rico. It is too much to ask a family that has had no experience of either sanitation or order, that has lived in a shack on beans and rice, that has owned no land and planted only for another man's profit, to adapt itself suddenly to cooperative methods, a vegetable garden, and a two-room concrete house with a privy.

What can be done about Puerto Rico's desperate poverty? PRRA methods should be continued, however marginal their effect. And the people should be educated to levels that will make them capable of absorbing and using new social ideas. But, in addition, the country must be freed from the political diseases that are racking it.

Theoretically Puerto Rico is a democracy in spite of its ambiguous status as a possession of the United States. The citizens vote for their legislators—they cannot, of course, vote for federal officials—and some other insular office-holders. The jibaro, by age-old and accepted custom, sells his vote. He may get fifty cents for it, but he may get as much as two dollars, more than half a week's wages. He probably doesn't stop to ask where the party leaders get the money with which they buy his cross-mark; but even if he figures that they get it from the sugar companies and other business interests, it doesn't make much difference to him. Whoever wins the election, he goes on getting his forty or sixty cents a day for as many days as he has work. If he is a cane worker, his degree of hunger depends largely on a quota set in Washington; and he never even heard of Mr. Wallace. So he sells his vote, and the politicians play their ancient game with favors and jobs and contracts and money, and pay little or no attention—in office or out—to the hunger of the jibaro.

Control of the island legislature is now held by a coalition of the Union and Socialist parties. The Socialists are well to the right of the A. F. of L. and have no trouble coalescing with the most reactionary political group on the island. The Liberals are the opposition. Recently the Liberal Party split, and Luis Muñoz Marín, a prominent leader who had played a large part in building up the PRRA, has formed a new group, the Partido Popular Democrático. He took with him a good part of the following and the local machinery of the Liberals, and he has gone to the country on a platform of economic and social reform, paralleling in some degree the ideas that underlie the program of the PRRA. But his actual appeal is simpler than that. He is asking the jibaro not to sell his vote, and explaining why he should not do so. For a little more than a year he has been carrying into every corner of the country a gospel of honest elections to give the control of the country back to the people. He does not confine his campaign to speechmaking. When a worker tells him that the boss in the central refused to pay him the legal rate under the wage-hour law and that the last man who kicked had lost his job, Muñoz provides legal services to try to collect the worker's back pay. When he succeeds, when the man actually collects $100 or $200 owed him, the story runs like lightning through the countryside. And in his next speech Muñoz tells about it himself and draws a simplified moral: The mill-owner may have provided the $2 that Juan was paid for his vote last fall, but why did he do it? So that no one would interfere when he robbed Juan of the $200 he should have paid him. The further moral is even more easily learned: next November Juan will vote the ticket of the Partido Popular Democrático.

Luis Muñoz Marín believes his party, although only a couple of years old, is already the biggest single party in Puerto Rico. The registration of new voters a few months ago provided a partial test, giving Muñoz 40 per cent of the total. He admits that the elections may tell a different story, especially now that the old parties are warned and may coalesce against him. But that his strength is growing everyone admits; and many Liberal leaders are trying to climb aboard the new machine.

Critics of Muñoz—and there are many—charge him with demagoguery. They say he is a rabble-rouser like Huey Long, making the same sort of appeal to an ignorant electorate. They charge him with personal instability. Even some of his good friends admit that he is easily discouraged—a magnificent campaigner and leader as long as things go well but likely to give up in the face of serious setbacks. It is agreed by friends and foes alike that his party is a one-man show and entirely dependent on his leadership. I am not in a position to judge how far these opinions are justified, but I can testify to the magnetism of the man and the effect of his appeal.

One night we drove across the island to a small village on the southern coast. There under torches and a moon, with the Caribbean as background and a dark mass of Puerto Rican workers as audience, the Partido Popular Democrático held a performance. First one of Muñoz's henchmen spoke briefly and with conventional passion about the party and its intention to draw workers and farmers from every other party and form one great organization standing for the rights of the common people. He told the crowd how to vote, and made no bones about it. Muñoz played an entirely different role. He demanded no votes. He only explained to his absorbed listeners the need of choosing men for office who would take care of their interests instead of selling their votes to men who would naturally take care of the interests of the fellows who put up the money. He explained who they were, what they got out of it. He used homely examples, small words. It was the simplest sort of lesson in elementary democracy. The audience responded with quick laughter, tremendous applause. There could be no doubt that they understood and believed him.

Whether Muñoz Marín is successful or not, such instruction cannot be entirely wasted. Basic social reforms in Puerto Rico cannot be made until the people learn the rudiments of self-government. To elect officials who are not owned by the old parties and the interests that finance them is only a beginning. After that comes the task of formulating and driving through a workable program. But an electorate that does not sell its vote is the prerequisite for all that must follow.

Next week I shall comment on the independence problem and on the attitude of Puerto Ricans toward the new Governor, Admiral Leahy.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 405
EDITORIALS:
THE REYNAUD CABINET 407
THE FIFTH AVENUE "RIOT" 408
WIRE-TAPPING AND THE FBI 409
NOTES ON PUERTO RICO, III by Freda Kirchwey 409
WHAT I BELIEVE by Bertrand Russell 412
MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT.
III. PRETTY BOY McNUTT by Milton S. Mayer 415
ONE YEAR OF FRANCO by Julio Alvarez Del Vayo 418
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 421
IN THE WIND 422
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 423
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
ART IN OUR TOWN by Constance Rourke 424
WHAT GERMANS NEVER LEARNED by Rustem Vambery 425
THE CAREER OF ALBERT DE SILVER
by Oswald Garrison Villard 426
ILL FARES THE LAND by Louis B. Salomon 426
THE "LONG ANIMAL" by F. W. Dupee 427
WPA—PRESENT AND FUTURE by Alfred B. Kuttner 428
IN BRIEF 430
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 431

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

What I Believe

BY BERTRAND RUSSELL

[In the fight against his appointment to teach advanced logic and the philosophy of mathematics at the College of the City of New York, Bertrand Russell's opponents have accused him of promulgating a moral code ranging from bolshevism to the advocacy of "eternal triangles." To refresh the public mind on Mr. Russell's real beliefs we are glad to reprint his own views as written for The Nation of April 29, 1931.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Bertrand Russell

THE answer to such a question as What do you believe? is generally expected to consist of two parts: the first explaining one's views as to the nature of the world, the second one's opinions as to how human life should be conducted. The man who invents some fallacious and fantastic argument to show that since the world is such and such, conduct ought to be so and so is considered to show greater profundity than the man who perceives that the two questions have nothing to do with each other. Academic philosophers, ever since the time of Parmenides, have believed that the world is a unity. This view has been taken over from them by clergymen and journalists, and its acceptance has been considered the touchstone of wisdom. The most fundamental of my beliefs is that this is rubbish. I think the universe is all spots and jumps, without unity, without continuity, without coherence or orderliness or any of the other properties that governesses love.

Indeed, there is little but prejudice and habit to be said for the view that there is a world at all. Physicists have recently advanced opinions which should have led them to agree with the foregoing remarks; but they have been so pained by the conclusions to which logic would have led them that they have been abandoning logic for theology in shoals. Every day some new physicist publishes a new pious volume to conceal from himself and others the fact that in his scientific capacity he has plunged the world into unreason and unreality. To take an illustration: What are we to think of the sun? He used to be the glorious lamp of heaven, a golden-haired god, a being to be worshiped by Zoroastrians and Aztecs and Incas. There is some reason to think that the doctrines of Zoroaster inspired Kepler's heliocentric cosmogony. But now the sun is nothing but waves of probability. If you ask what it is that is probable, or in what ocean the waves travel, the physicist, like the Mad Hatter, replies, "I have had enough of this; suppose we change the subject." If, however, you press him, he will say that the waves are in his formulae, and his formulae are in his head, from which, however, you must not infer that the waves are in his head.

To speak seriously: such orderliness as we appear to find in the external world seems to be due to our own passion for pigeonholes, and it is quite doubtful whether there are such things as laws of nature. It is a curious sign of the times that religious apologists welcome this view. In the eighteenth century they welcomed the reign of law, since they thought that laws implied a Lawgiver, but religious apologists in the present day seem to be of opinion that a world created by a Deity must be irrational, on the ground, apparently, that they themselves have been made in God's image. The reconciliation of religion and science which professors proclaim and bishops acclaim rests, in fact, on grounds of quite another sort, and might be set forth in the following practical syllogism: Science depends upon endowments, and endowments are threatened by bolshevism, therefore science is threatened by bolshevism; but religion also is threatened by bolshevism; therefore religion and science are allies. It follows, of course, that science, if pursued with sufficient profundity, reveals the existence of a God. Nothing so logical as this penetrates, however, to the consciousness of the pious professors.

The odd thing is that, at the very moment when physics, which is the fundamental science, is undermining the whole structure of applied reason and presenting us with a world of unreal and fantastic dreams in place of the Newtonian order and solidity, applied science is becoming peculiarly useful and more able than ever to give results of value to human life. There is here a paradox of which possibly the intellectual solution may be found hereafter, or, equally possibly, no solution may exist. The fact is that science plays two quite distinct roles: on the one hand as a metaphysic, and on the other hand as educated common sense. As a metaphysic it has been undermined by its own success. Mathematical technique is now so powerful that it can find a formula for even the most erratic world. Plato and Sir James Jeans think that because geometry applies to the world, God must have made the world on a geometrical pattern, but the mathematical logician suspects that God could not have made a world containing many things without exposing it to the skill of the geometer. In fact, the applicability of geometry to the physical world has ceased to be a fact about that world, and has become only a tribute to the geometer's cleverness. The only thing that the geometer needs is multiplicity, whereas the only thing the theologian needs is unity. Of unity, however vague, however tenuous, I see no evidence in modern science considered as a metaphysic. But modern science considered as common sense remains triumphant, indeed more triumphant than ever before.

In view of this state of affairs, it is necessary to make a sharp distinction between metaphysical beliefs and practical beliefs in regard to the conduct of life. In metaphysics my creed is short and simple. I think that the external world may be an illusion, but if it exists, it consists of events short, small, and haphazard. Order, unity, and continuity are human inventions just as truly as are catalogues and encyclopedias. But human inventions can, within limits, be made to prevail in our human world, and in the conduct of our daily life we may with advantage forget the realm of chaos and old night by which we are perhaps surrounded.

In human beings three things seem to me to be particularly desirable. They are scientific method, friendly feelings, and interest in life or the world. Let us begin with scientific method.

The ultimate metaphysical doubts which we have been considering have no bearing whatever upon the practical uses of science. If a Mendelian develops a variety of wheat which is immune from diseases that are destructive to the older varieties, if a physiologist makes a discovery about vitamins, if a chemist makes a discovery about the scientific production of nitrates, the importance and usefulness of their work is quite independent of the question whether an atom consists of a miniature solar system, or a wave of probability, or an infinite rectangle of integers. When I speak of the importance of scientific method in regard to the conduct of human life, I am thinking of scientific method in its mundane forms. Not that I would undervalue science as a metaphysic, but the value of science as metaphysic belongs in another sphere. It belongs with religion and art and love, with the pursuit of the beatific vision, with the Promethean madness that leads the greatest men to strive to become gods. Perhaps the only ultimate value of human life is to be found in this Promethean madness. But it is a value that is religious, not political or even moral, and at the present moment it is of morals and politics that I wish to speak.

Scientific method as an ingredient in everyday life consists of the habit of basing opinions upon evidence rather than upon emotion or tradition. The agriculturist who employs the methods that he learned from his father and his grandfather is likely to be indignant with the urban whippersnapper who sets to work to instruct him. Frequently the latter is ignorant of something essential and is apparently overwhelmed by the shrewd man of practical experience. Nevertheless, he is likely to possess some new piece of knowledge which, if it can be incorporated with experience, will lead to an important improvement on traditional methods. Uneducated mothers imagine that nature has taught them how to bring up their infants, and are indignant when male experts offer them advice. No doubt the male experts would be a failure if they tried to bring up infants themselves. Nevertheless, on many points, such as fixed hours of feeding, their advice has now been accepted by all intelligent women. The main principle of the scientific method is that emotion, like what the soldier said, is not evidence. If this could be more widely recognized, it would not only improve the technique of the arts and of education, but would go far to solve international problems, which are rendered intractable by the substitution of patriotic emotion for a sober survey of facts. Emotion has its sphere, since it decides the ends to which our activities are to be devoted, but it should not be allowed to obscure our vision as to the means for realizing those ends.

Scientific method is closely connected with the social virtue of impartiality. Piaget, in his book on "Judgment and Reasoning in the Child," contends that the reasoning faculty is a product of the social sense. Every child, he says, begins with a dream of omnipotence, in which all facts are bent to his wishes. Gradually, through contact with others, he is forced to the realization that their wishes may be opposed to his, and that his wishes are not invariably arbiters of truth. Reasoning, according to Piaget, develops as a method of arriving at a social truth upon which all can agree. This condition is, I think, largely valid, and emphasizes one great merit of the scientific method—namely, that it tends to avoid those intractable disputes which arise when private emotion is regarded as the test of truth. Piaget ignores another aspect of scientific method—namely, that it gives power over the environment and also power of adaptation to the environment. It may be, for example, an advantage to be able to predict the weather, and if one man is right on this point while all his companions are wrong, the advantage nevertheless remains with him, though a purely social definition of truth would compel us to regard him as in the wrong. It is success in this practical test of power over the environment, or adaptation to it, which has given science its prestige. The Chinese emperors repeatedly refrained from persecuting the Jesuits because the latter were in the right as to the dates of eclipses when the Chinese astronomers were in the wrong. All modern life is built upon this practical success of science, at any rate where the inanimate world is concerned. It has had hitherto less success in direct applications to man, and it therefore still meets with opposition from traditional beliefs where man is concerned, but it cannot well be doubted that if our civilization survives, man also will soon come to be viewed scientifically. This will have a great effect upon education and the criminal law, perhaps also on family life. Such developments, however, belong to the future.

The power over the environment which science gives is not necessarily a good thing; the stock instance to the contrary is war. If science gives a nation the power to wipe out an enemy capital within a few hours of the outbreak of war, the gain to mankind is problematical. Whether scientific power is to be a boon or a curse depends upon the dominant emotions of those who wield it. Hitherto hatred and cruelty have always played a very large part in human life. Education and the criminal law have at most times been so ferocious as to defeat their supposed ends; that is to say, boys have been stupider, and criminals more criminal, than they would have been if they had been more kindly treated. Similarly, when nations go to war nominally for economic ends, both sides are impoverished, and it is clear that hatred has blinded them to their true interests. The more scientific power men acquire, the more important it becomes that they should wield this power for good rather than for evil. How they will wield power depends upon their dominant emotions: if these emotions are friendly, they will wield it well; if hostile, badly.

The problem is therefore presented to the men of science to devise a method of generating friendly feeling in the mass of mankind and more especially in the holders of power. The method of direct exhortation, which has been favored by the founders of religions, has not proved very effective, and it is clear that quite other methods are required. A considerable period of experimentation will be necessary before anything can be said positively on this subject, but it is clear that among the factors concerned are diet, instinctive satisfaction, and skill in constructive work. Probably a radical transformation of the economic system is also necessary. I have no doubt whatever that methods could be devised for creating a world in which most men had friendly feelings toward other men, but I think rivers of blood will have to flow before the holders of power will allow such a world to be created, and I am doubtful whether rivers of blood are the right kind of rivers to water the tender plant of human kindness.

When I speak of the necessity of friendly feelings, I emphatically do not mean unselfishness. Unselfishness is, of course, a vague word which is incapable of any precise meaning, but at any rate it always involves control of the feelings by the will. Traditional ethics emphasize the will far too much; emotions and sentiments are far more important than will. The type of person that should be produced is a type that spontaneously, without self-control, wishes to do what in fact is in the general interest, not the type that is filled with destructive wishes kept in check by an iron self-control. Destructive wishes, where they exist strongly, will find an outlet somehow, usually by generating beliefs which justify cruel actions. Useful emotions are produced not by preaching, but by physiological means and by wise conditioning.

This technique applies not only to friendly feelings but also to interest in life. There are many moderns in whom zest is lacking: they live more or less virtuously, but with a minimum of enjoyment. This is usually due to the fact that they force themselves by an effort of will to live in a way which is contrary to powerful emotions, of which they may or may not be conscious. An indispensable psychological condition for interest in life is a certain emotional harmony which makes it unnecessary to suppress certain emotions in order to gratify certain others. The most frequent conflict is between sexual emotions and desire for the respect of neighbors. Wherever such conflicts are strong, they are likely to produce either listlessness or rage: a man will either lose all interest in life or will find his chief pleasure in punishing those who have enjoyed the pleasures which he has denied himself. To keep alive the spontaneous play of interest and the flow of friendly feeling, it is necessary that as far as possible such fundamental emotional conflicts should be avoided. This requires partly an adaptation of the individual to the community, but partly also an adaptation of the community to the individual. To avoid emotional conflicts in the individual, it is sometimes best to adopt such methods of education as will prevent certain desires from growing up, but at other times it is best to alter public morality in such a way that desires previously incompatible shall cease to be so. The latter is the best method wherever public morality condemns acts which would be harmless if they were not condemned.

I believe that the substitution of a scientific for a religious technique in the production of virtue may prove to be of enormous importance. Moralists hitherto have been extraordinarily unsuccessful in producing the type of character that they said they desired. The growth of psychology and biochemistry is likely to give us in the not too distant future a far greater power of molding character than mankind has ever hitherto possessed. Like the power over inanimate nature, this new power over human nature may be used either for good or for evil. I do not profess to know in which way it will be used, but if it is used for evil, our scientific civilization will not long survive.

Men Who Would Be President

III. PRETTY BOY McNUTT

BY MILTON S. MAYER

WE LIBERALS danced in the streets back in January, 1933, when Governor Paul V. McNutt mounted his legislature and rode it over the corpse of constitutional procedure in the sovereign commonwealth of Indiana. "This," Governor McNutt told his fellow-citizens in his inaugural address, "is a testing time for representative government"; the following day he assembled his Reichstag and instructed the members in the representative art of voting Ja. And we liberals cheered.

For McNutt was a New Dealer, and what did it matter if he drew up decrees at five in the morning and pronounced them law at noon? "Bills of Rights" for labor, for the poor, for the schools, for the aged were rammed through the legislature with rules suspended, debate curtailed, and amendments forbidden. Indiana, under benevolent tyranny, caught up with and passed nearly every state in the country in social legislation. By March 3, the day of Franklin Roosevelt's inauguration, the New Deal was a fact in Indiana and the legislators had been dismissed. By midsummer we liberals were talking, and writing, of McNutt as Roosevelt's successor in 1940.

McNutt had the same idea. At the age of eight, according to the legend around Martinsville, Indiana, he decided he would rather be President than right. Maybe he will never be either, but we liberals who thought he was right in 1933 have to concede him the privilege of thinking he will be President in 1940.

The word for McNutt is "effective," and there is, more often than not, a connection between effectiveness and tyranny, despotic or benevolent. He was effective as governor. He anticipated the New Deal by anywhere from two months to two years. "Relief is our first problem. We must make every resource available. We cannot wait and we dare not fail." That was January 10, 1933, and relief in Indiana was at once made adequate and, to a surprising extent, non-political. The schools, all of them down to eight-month terms and most of them facing three-month terms or closing altogether, were put on their feet with state support. "Roads and buildings may wait, but not the children."

And so on down the line. Everything that labor had fought for and had won in only the most progressive states it got in Indiana under McNutt—everything from ratification of the child-labor amendment to a little Norris-LaGuardia Act. Workmen's compensation was liberalized and old-age pensions were established, not under Roosevelt in 1935 but under McNutt in 1933. The loan-shark racket was scotched. Utilities rates were reduced, and McNutt's rural-electrification program increased the percentage of electrified farms from 11.7 in 1934 to 36.7 in 1939. "Unalterably opposed to the principle of a sales tax," McNutt gaveled through a 1 per cent gross-income tax with a $1,000 exemption. The property tax was cut as a sop to conservative owners of homes and farms. Liquor revenue and the acceleration of economic activity pulled Indiana out of the hole.

There is proof that he balanced the budget and proof that he didn't, and proof that it's a good thing to do and proof that it isn't. In the past few months he has soft-pedaled the budget balancing in his campaign publicity, and for obvious reasons. In an early blurb last year he described his inauguration as follows: "Indiana was facing bankruptcy, its budget unbalanced." Now that's no way for a New Deal candidate to talk, and last month McNutt told the Boston Chamber of Commerce: "To incur further debts and carry an unbalanced national budget year after year, in the face of economic folkways and mores acquired over the centuries, demands both courage and vision."

McNutt's reorganization of the state government, which was drawn up in an all-night session of spoilsmen at the Indianapolis Club and enacted into law before a single legislator could have read it, should have warned us liberals that our platinum-headed boy was a dangerous man. All elective offices were abolished except those of eight departmental administrators elective under the constitution, and these eight were deprived of their power through the reduction of a hundred-and-some departments to eight administrative agencies under boards appointed by the governor. The act gave McNutt blanket authority to transfer any function or fund from one department to another, abolished the State Board of Finance, and transferred its duties to the Treasury, which McNutt controlled through an appointive board.

What McNutt wanted was power, and he didn't stop at the reorganization of the state to get it. There is no point in exposing Paul McNutt here; he has been exposed and reexposed, and everybody in the country knows all about it. But there is something new to be said on each of the three counts on which he has been found guilty—the use of troops to break strikes, the degradation of the state personnel by the use and abuse of the spoils system, and the extortion of campaign funds from employees, contractors, and beneficiaries of special legislation.

Paul McNutt

McNutt's use of troops in the 1933 general strike in Terre Haute aroused liberals throughout the country. If McNutt is never elected President, he will owe his failure to such relatively small voices as those of Norman Thomas and The Nation. Thomas hung the nickname of "Hoosier Hitler" on a man whose own name was bad enough, and the whole country, even mild conservatives, picked up the euphony. McNutt's New Dealism was quickly forgotten as the "Hoosier Hitler" tag caught on, and millions of Americans suppose to day that the man has an unbroken record of black reaction. "I don't know much about him," one of the most influential New Dealers said to me a week ago, 'but I have the impression that the man's a fascist." The same official's assistant said: "He sure went down the line for us in '33."

Terre Haute put McNutt on the spot. Labor leaders who are not hysterical agree with sympathizing experts in government that somebody has got to get tough when a city can't get food and milk. The law compelled McNutt to send troops on the written appeal of the local authorities. R. Clyde White, the federal conciliator in the situation, says that McNutt wished to withdraw the proclamation almost from the day order was restored, but that the civil authorities refused to take responsibility.

McNutt's hands are so clean in the Terre Haute affair that when John Lewis attacks him as a strikebreaker McNutt blandly pretends that Lewis is referring, unjustly, to the Terre Haute strike. But Lewis is referring to Sullivan County, which McNutt never mentions. McNutt's predecessor had sent a company of troops into the high-cost mining area around Jasonville in July, 1932. McNutt refused to remove them. The companies were selling miners, as they say in Indiana, instead of coal. On October 8, 1933, there was the usual "riot"—a union picket killed—and on the following day McNutt proclaimed the entire area a military district. For twenty-eight months no assembly was permitted, no unauthorized ingress or egress, no picketing, no exercise of civil authority.

McNutt fired 2,500 state employees during his first week in office, and it is not hard to believe the charge that he hired 3,500 during his second. There was nothing new or uniquely corrupt about this in American government, but McNutt went to new extremes. McNutt was effective. Even the state library, previously immune, was swept out, and only the ferocious protest of medical men saved the nationally respected superintendent of a state mental institution. Thirty legislators were given state jobs in open violation of the constitution. The beer law, for the like of which one must go back to the tax-farming of the Bourbon kings, set up exclusive "importers" in each of the state's twelve districts and licensed liquor salesmen; every job went to a McNutt man, and the deal wasn't unilateral.

Money matters McNutt assigned to the management of Frank McHale (lawyer for liquor interests, receiverships, banks) and Bowman Elder (furniture, real estate, receiverships). McHale was Democratic state committeeman; Elder, treasurer of the American Legion. They have been McNutt's back-room men for fifteen years, and neither of them suffers from hyper-idealism. In Indiana everybody is sure—though nobody except McNutt, McHale, Elder, and, possibly, the United States Treasury is in a position to know—that there have been deals in everything, from cement to soap bubbles. The McNutt war chest, which is not to be confused with the funds of the Two Per Cent Club, brings in $200,000 or so a year.

The Two Per Cent Club nets another $200,000 or $225,000 a year, but this shouldn't shock anyone over ten. Every state, every county, every city hall in the country has a Two Per Cent Club. If the Democrats have more of them than the Republicans, it merely means that the Democrats have fewer fat cats and are really more democratic. "It costs money to run a political organization," McNutt's friends explain. "You get it from the steel companies in Gary or the coal people downstate or the railroads in Indianapolis—or you get it the way McNutt gets it, openly and honestly, and with no favors to repay to the big interests."

True, but there are a couple of blemishes on the portrait of St. Paul McNutt. In the first place, he "gets it," as he does everything, more effectively than anybody else. Jobholders in some places, including departments in Washington, may refuse to kick in; others may be so poor that the machine is ashamed to put the bite on them. In Indiana everybody kicks in, and a janitor supporting five kids on $800 a year comes through with his 2 per cent or, after forty years of peonage, out he goes. In the second place, McNutt also gets it from the "interests." And it is not the Two Per Cent Club that the Bureau of Internal Revenue is investigating; it is the war chest. It is doubtful whether Mr. Roosevelt will let the Attorney General blow the lid off Indiana before the election—the Kelly-Nash fireworks in Chicago, ignited some months ago by Mr. Murphy, seem to be a bit damp—but James A. Farley, who hates McNutt, has had his own investigators in Indiana and will enter the Democratic convention with some very interesting reading matter in his pocket.

McNutt is consumed by ambition. He would trade his grandmother for the South Dakota delegation. And, as I have said, he is effective. They may have laughed when he went out to win the presidency of the Epworth League at the age of twelve—but he won it. They may have laughed when he proposed himself for president of his high-school class and hero of the class play, when he nominated himself for editor of the student paper and president of the student council at Indiana University, when he suggested that he be made dean of the Indiana Law School, commander of his Legion post, of the American Legion—but he won every time. They're laughing now, and he's nominating himself for President.

You have to understand Indiana to understand McNutt. Indiana can show more piety and fraud than Kansas. Its politics stink worse than those of Ohio or Pennsylvania, and its worst men almost always rise to the top. Of the four Republican governors preceding McNutt, one went to the penitentiary and another was saved by the statute of limitations.

In addition to being an Indiana politician, ambitious and effective, McNutt is intelligent. After making Phi Beta Kappa at Indiana and Coif at Harvard, he maneuvered his way up from instructor—with time out for a World War training camp—to dean of the Indiana Law School at the age of thirty-four. Indiana is a political university, but McNutt raised admission standards, strengthened the faculty, and did some legal research of his own. He did all this with his left hand, because his right was busy grabbing the mitt or coat-tail of every legionnaire in the land. During his year as state commander he traveled 40,000 miles and attended Legion conventions in nineteen states. During his year as national commander he delivered 1,300 speeches—all of them hooey and all of them loaded with militarism and "Americanism." Though he is bitterly hated by the Legion minority, which is sure that he used the organization for political purposes, the Legion constitutes an auxiliary machine in his campaign.

When he left the governorship, he left McHale and Elder in charge of the state, set up a figurehead named Townsend to take his place in Indianapolis, and sent Sherman Minton, a dependable subordinate, to the United States Senate. McNutt ran the whole show from Manila, effectively.

He was effective as High Commissioner in the Philippines. It was a tough assignment, and Roosevelt knew that McNutt was tough. Never the fresh-water type, he took with him considerable understanding of international affairs. He won over Quezon, or at least Quezon acts as if he did; he was firm in the enunciation of the fact that the Islands were still American property; and he worked out an intelligent program for the ultimate colonization of 10,000 refugees from Japan's friend Hitler. His tenure in the Philippines convinced him, he says, that "if the United States abandons the Islands they will become a bloody battleground." A tour of the Orient before his return to the States convinced him that "he was right in opposing independence for the Philippines." He thinks the American people haven't given the matter enough thought, but that after we've thought it over we ought, if our decision stands, to get out of the Far East "lock, stock, and barrel." In estimating McNutt's campaign fund, you may add a kitty of no less than a million dollars from Philippine sugar interests that want to keep the Islands inside the American tariff wall.

McNutt seems to be exactly as militaristic as Franklin Roosevelt and no more imperialistic than Cordell Hull. He tried, without success against the anti-New Deal clique in command, to swing the last convention of the Legion behind revision of the Neutrality Act, and he has defended the reciprocal trade treaties eloquently and impressively. He hasn't, in recent years, beaten the tom-tom as hard as Roosevelt has, but like a good legionnaire he wants "a military establishment second to none."

He has been effective as Federal Security Administrator, though he hasn't had a chance yet to make much of a record; the agencies he is coordinating were all well established—Social Security, NYA, CCC, Office of Education, Public Health Service, and Employment Service. The National Health Program, abandoned by the Administration, would have given McNutt a sounding-board. It would have provided, at the same time, a test of his social morals. As Governor of Indiana he handed over the responsibility and state funds for preventive medicine to the county medical societies and curtailed or abolished state services in a program urged if not written by the Indiana State Medical Association.

McNutt hasn't hit the front page since he has been in his present office. It is just possible that Roosevelt, when he gave McNutt the Security job, knew that the health program was out and that foreign affairs would occupy the limelight for some time to come. There are several explanations of why Roosevelt placed the lame, the halt, and the blind in the tender care of a Presidential candidate with a political record like McNutt's, but the likeliest is this. Roosevelt offered the job to President Dykstra of Wisconsin. Roosevelt was informed, incorrectly, that Dykstra wouldn't take it. The job had to be filled quickly, and by a good administrator. McNutt walked in, all tanned and administrative, and reminded Roosevelt that he'd been promised a good job when he returned from the Islands. "Here it is," said Roosevelt. One of F. D. R.'s closest friends says: "The President likes some strange people, and McNutt is one of them. But he doesn't trust the man and he doesn't want him to be President."

McNutt's campaign, which is being carried on from the Federal Security offices just as plainly as Roosevelt's is from the White House or Garner's from the Hill, got off to a bad start last spring with a lavish brawl at the Mayflower. The New Dealers didn't like it, partly because McNutt was beating the gun, partly because they hate him for his combination of New Deal brains and Old Deal morals. Even if McNutt is only half as bad as the New Dealers say he is, he's bad enough. To look at him is to mistrust him. Every writer who has interviewed him has reacted negatively. He is too smooth; and unlike Roosevelt he isn't smooth enough to look as if he weren't smooth. Roosevelt's smile seems hearty, even if it isn't; McNutt's seems phony, even if it isn't.

Is McNutt as bad as he is usually painted? Let us assume, over Thurman Arnold's dead body, that men are capable of seeing the ends of society and deciding which means or intermediate ends are good or bad in the light of the ultimate goal. In the governorship McNutt's activities as a spoilsman, a corruptionist, and a strike-breaker stand in interesting contrast with his social legislation. He seems to have kept his distance from the Klan, which owned Indiana in the early twenties, and though they have carefully avoided direct attacks on vested interests, his speeches, outside the Legion, have been consistently liberal, some of them ringing with almost Rooseveltian force. The epithets "fascist" and "Hoosier Hitler" are patently ridiculous, not only because of the man's mixed record but also because he consistently attacks Nazism and fascism rather than totalitarian Stalinism—and he, mind you, a former national commander of the American Legion. Everything in his small-town Indiana political background, however, would tend to make him conservative or reactionary, and there is only his intellectualism, which, while it is limited, does exist, to make him liberal. He is a risk, and a bad risk. But he is not a known quantity. He would probably make a terrible President; he would possibly make a wonderful one. But this, as Governor McNutt said as he ground his heel into the representative government of Indiana, is a testing time for representative government, and 1940 is not the year for risks.

Nobody takes McNutt's campaign very seriously, though his second-choice convention votes might give him second place on the ticket or even the Presidential nomination if Roosevelt should be out and the convention deadlocked. It isn't likely though—not with the lid about to come off in Indiana. McNutt's future is obscure, but his present is plain: the New Dealers don't trust him, Farley hates him, the conservatives and reactionaries have no respect for him, and nobody knows him for sure.

One Year of Franco

BY JULIO ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Mexico City, March 15

ON MARCH 28, 1939, at eleven o'clock in the morning, Radio Madrid announced in the name of the Casado Junta the imminent entry of the Franco forces into that ultimate bastion of Republican resistance.

I have no desire to review here that last lamentable episode of the epic of the Spanish people. Anyone who has read Colonel Casado's book, "The Last Days of Madrid" (London: Peter Davies), will have formed his own idea of the role which irresponsibility, resentment, personal ambition, and muddled political thinking played in that rebellion against the Negrín government which entailed so many consequences, the most fatal being the abandonment of tens of thousands of self-sacrificing and heroic Republicans, soldiers and civilians alike, to the ferocity of the Franco repression. The most ardent admirer of Dr. Negrín could hardly have produced a document that would justify his policy of resistance better than does Colonel Casado's book. Events in Europe since the fall of Madrid have proved that we in the Negrín Cabinet were no mere dreamers or sectarians. Those of us who were convinced that only through resistance could we force Franco to agree to humane peace terms were also hoping to maintain on Spanish soil one last Republican trench where we could hold on until the international situation should change in our favor, that is, until appeasement, of which we had been the victims since 1936, should cease.

If in September, 1939, the Spanish Republican Army had been in possession of a corner of southeastern Spain behind a line however shortened—and except for the Casado rising this would have been possible even with Madrid lost—the situation today would be different, and this anniversary commentary would be superfluous.

We knew quite well what would happen to our country once Franco had won. Had Franco been a statesman or even a man of vision he would have been able to profit by the fatigue, the bitterness, and the disillusionment that inevitably followed the sorry end of the brief

PUBLIC
Burlingame, Cal.

Casado episode, and through a policy of clemency he could have softened the antipathy which his brutality and his reliance on foreign bayonets had won for him among the majority of Spaniards. Instead it was vae victis. This could have been foreseen by anyone who had followed his record and his utterances especially in the days when mediation was being attempted by Paris and London and his almost daily refrain was "unconditional surrender." There was also his particularly revelatory refusal to accept, as the Republic had done with alacrity, the proposal of Field Marshal Sir Philip Chetwode, head of the British Commission for Exchange of Prisoners, that death sentences imposed on each side be canceled reciprocally. This was an omen of the monstrous repression to come.

In Paris last November we estimated the number of political prisoners in Franco's jails at around 300,000. On January 26, 1940, the New York Times published a dispatch from Vatican City in which papal circles gave the figure as half a million. But when I talked in London in late December with the correspondent of the News-Chronicle, A. V. Phillips, who had just come from four months in a Madrid jail, I learned that the number exceeded the million mark. Other trustworthy reports brought by people escaping from Spain confirm Mr. Phillips's story. A million persons still held as political prisoners a year after the end of a war is pure insanity. On the basis of the size of the average Spanish family this means that there are in Spain from five to six million people who have relatives in prison. And that this has had grave repercussions on the economic life of the nation is evidenced in the recent speeches of the Caudillo and his chief Minister, Serrano Suñer, in which one detects a justifiable anxiety.

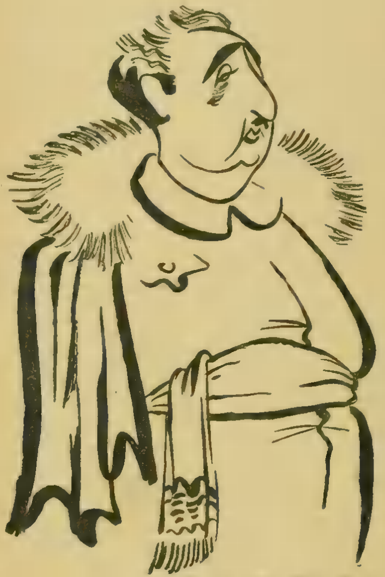
The rhythm of arrests continues unabated with the passing months. House-to-house searches for Republicans go on. The press publishes almost daily admonishments to citizens to denounce one another. If a crime of sufficient seriousness can be established, on the basis of inconsistent and superficial accusations, the man is shot. Lesser criminals are liable to sentences averaging thirty years. Having been an active Republican is in itself a crime. Schools, convents, and public buildings have been converted into jails, but there are still too few buildings to accommodate the "penal" population, and so a vast system of concentration camps on the Nazi model has been established to complete the repressive apparatus of a regime dedicated to the elimination of all opposition.

In the prisons a process of regeneration takes place conforming to the methods which fifty years and more ago dishonored the Spanish penal system. Through the use of enforced fasting and the club, Franco's jailers, who are old in the Spanish tradition, undertake to exorcise from the Republican prisoner the baleful effects of "red" sorcery. In the place of the old prison guards, themselves never distinguished for their tenderness, are now the Civil Guards, experts at the art of transforming a robust peasant into a heap of flesh with only enough vitality left to sustain pain, humiliation, and madness until the next beating. The history of Andalusia and Estremadura, save for the short period of authentic Republican government, is replete with the excesses and arbitrary brutalities of the Civil Guard. Those cruelties pale beside the present methods of the Franco government. But such methods are unavailing before the indomitable spirit of the Spaniard. It was with profound emotion that I heard Mr. Phillips tell how the thousands of prisoners who leave their cells each month to be shot go to their death crying "Viva la República!"

In the concentration camps reserved for lesser "criminals" or for those against whom the officials have not yet been able to present a damaging dossier, the government is relatively benevolent. Here the principle of economic exploitation takes precedence over the primary desire for vengeance. The Franco slogan "Redemption Through Work" has opened to private enterprise an unlimited supply of cheap labor. The men and women in the concentration camps—when the state does not use their labor in some of the fantastic schemes for national reconstruction with which it tries to cover up the disastrous economic and financial conditions in the Franco paradise—are farmed out to a private entrepreneur who is happy at not having to pay more than a peseta a day to a worker who cannot think of striking and whose complete submission is guaranteed by armed guards.

The fact that those Spaniards who, preferring the risk of violent death to slow extinction, attempt to escape from the vast prison that is Spain today obtain aid and comfort from people of all classes is an arresting index of feeling in the country. Before the war finally broke upon Europe an average of fifty Spaniards a day escaped over the Pyrenees to France. Last December, despite the severity of an unusually hard Pyreneean winter, a Spanish mother with three children, the eldest aged nine, appeared at the first French frontier post and asked to be taken to a French refugee camp. There she declared that thousands of Spaniards in Spain, even granting the truth of the complaints of their compatriots in the French concentration camps, would gladly exchange places with them. Among the fugitives in France today are people who once left the French camps, returned to Franco Spain, and then escaped back to France. Others of those who returned to Spain believing in Franco's promises of clemency were taken and shot immediately and were never able to escape a second time. Last spring the grave-digger at the Irún cemetery, horrified at the mass executions of the returning Spaniards, himself fled to France.

The stories of some of these escapes from Franco are more exciting than any adventure fiction. There recently arrived in New York City, en route to Latin America, one of the oldest and bravest militants in the Spanish Socialist Party, Santamaría, mayor of El Ferrol when the revolt broke out. He spent three years hidden in rebel territory. Six months after the end of the war he and fourteen others fled to France in a motor boat from a beach near El Ferrol. Despite the great hazards involved in preparing for this wholesale escape, Santamaría and his friends managed to disguise themselves as Civil Guards with three-cornered hats and belting of cardboard and wooden rifles. On a night when the darkness favored them Santamaría, who is a man over fifty, and his fourteen comrades approached a motor boat, pointed their wooden rifles at the occupants, and challenged them as smugglers. The men in the boat fled, and soon the fifteen Republicans were in the open sea headed for France. In a short while their gasoline was exhausted. The improvised apparel was then burned, piece by piece, until finally a French ship saw the flames, drew near, and picked them up.



Drawing by Schreiber

General Franco

Almost four years after the beginning of the war there are still armed bands in the hills of Galicia and Asturias. The police search everyone going into the hills to keep food from being carried to these men, who have decided never to give themselves up alive to the "justice" of Franco. There have been veritable battles in the hills. Many have been killed.

Among the recently escaped fugitives now in Mexico are two who found refuge in the house of the village priest. A large part of the lower clergy is against Franco. Their attitude is due in part to the fact that they consider the brutal and seemingly endless repression irreconcilable with their Christian principles. The humble priests in the towns are also aware that the silence of the hierarchy in the face of the continued slaughter and the presence of the hierarchy at all functions of the Phalanx are strong factors turning the people against the church.

Hunger is the dominant feature of the present situation in Spain. From time to time, as for example after the new commercial treaty with France, the empty bins are filled with wheat imported from foreign countries. But the poor distribution system coupled with the excessively low wages prevents most of the people from satisfying their appetite. While prices of the most essential foods have doubled, wages have been cut. From five to eight pesetas is a maximum daily wage. On the other hand, potatoes, which before the war, even when they were most expensive, cost only five pesetas the arroba (twenty-five pounds), are sold today for fifteen pesetas. Olive oil, an essential ingredient of Spanish cooking, has become a luxury; half a liter of olive oil, on the rare occasions when it can be bought, costs from five to six pesetas, that is, the daily wage of a laborer.

Business is in a state of permanent crisis. Taxes and fines have practically wiped out the small dealer. Nor does the well-to-do middle class escape the severity of an economic system based on capricious expropriation and corrupted by the politics of prestige. Industry as well as agriculture suffers from the system of repression which keeps approximately one million experienced laborers and peasants in prisons and concentration camps. For every experienced worker in Spain today there are eight novices.

The recent decree giving back to the grandees the lands distributed by the Republic both before and during the war according to the constitutional terms of the agrarian-reform law was a hard blow to the popularity of the Franco regime and gained for it finally and forever the passive resistance and hatred of the small landholders. If we can trust the estimates of serious observers who reported that at the end of 1939 the percentage of people really with Franco did not exceed 15 per cent, how small must be the percentage with him now!

Criteria of caste inspire the decisions of the government. In the course of the first year of Franco's regime three measures were taken which need no comment from me: first, the return to the Jesuits of all their property; second, the return to the former King, Alfonso, of all his personal property; third, the transfer to Franco of the total patrimony of the crown of Spain, with an annual income of millions of pesetas.

The differences between Falangists and Requetés have been aggravated on the eve of the first anniversary of Franco's victory. And the old struggle between the Phalanx and the army, which was the source of constant worry to the Caudillo, has also broken out again. This is proved by the dismissal, without public explanation, of General Muñoz Grande from the post of secretary general of the Falangist Party, a post which carried with it the position of minister in the Cabinet, where he was supposed to represent the "definitive" reconciliation between the Phalanx and the generals.

A foreign visitor in Spain today, judging the situation by its external signs, will come out affirming that the name of the Caudillo is acclaimed everywhere, that everyone praises the wisdom and intelligence of the liberator of Spain. But here is what happens when the people of a small Spanish village gather in the early evening around the small, glowing fire in the local tavern—a person recently escaped described the scene for me. When somebody enters who is not known by all, the tone of the conversation changes. From the bitterest criticism of the regime they pass immediately to the most conventional and exaggerated praise. Then, suddenly, someone present says, "This fellow's all right," and everyone begins again with his denunciation of Franco. "This fellow's all right" is the common denominator which relegates to minor importance the specific party affiliation. Contrary to what is unfortunately happening in certain groups of Spanish emigrants, the millions of anti-fascists who suffer in Spain do not make any distinction between Socialists, Republicans, Basque Catholics, or Communists. They are all one thing—Franco's enemies.

The incapacity of Franco's government even to build a totalitarian state of the Fascist or Nazi type has caused people here and there to talk about the monarchy as the only possible way out. It is a solution that naturally finds many sympathizers in British circles, but a few weeks ago in London I could see that people were beginning to realize its great difficulties. The foremost Spanish opposition to this development is the Phalanx, which knows that the reestablishment of the monarchy would mean its own destruction and is ready to oppose restoration with arms. The refugees whom I have questioned give always the same answer: Between Franco and a king, a king, but in a free election neither Franco nor a king. For a republic there would be more votes today than there were in 1931, when the municipal elections forced Alfonso to leave. The spirit of rebellion grows every day. One common thought checks the impatience: "If only Italy weren't here!" People are afraid that in case of a successful uprising against Franco Italian soldiers would again scatter death on Spanish soil.

The fate of the Franco regime is linked to Italy's position in the European war. I think that those in London and Paris who tried to find consolation for their past mistakes in the thought that they could yet remedy their fatal non-intervention policy by playing up to Franco have already given up that senseless dream. Franco will follow Mussolini to the limit in the present war. However, the war has a long way to go yet. Difficulties with Italy may arise. Although such complications would not necessarily mean that Franco would participate in the conflict against the Allies—direct participation of Spain in the war seems quite impossible—there are forms of neutrality more dangerous than direct participation.

The war has for the time being strengthened Franco's position. But it would be a mistake to conclude that the length of his rule will be strictly determined by the duration of the war. The history of the Spanish people shows their audacity and courage and is full of surprises.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Arm's-Length Bargaining

ONE of the favorite Wall Street accusations against the Administration is that it constantly adopts a belligerent and non-cooperative attitude toward business. Considering that ferocious libels on the President are conversational small change in Wall Street, and that the financial press maintains a constant drumfire of abuse against government agencies, it seems to me that this complaint is comparable in impudence to Moscow's denunciations of Finnish "aggression." It is always difficult to cooperate with someone who, when you offer your hand, replies by kicking you in the belly. This has been the painful experience of the SEC, which has leaned over backward recently in its efforts to work amicably with the financial bigwigs.

On February 29 the SEC, aware that its rules governing the relationship between utility companies and investment bankers were causing dissatisfaction, made a request to interested parties to suggest revisions which might "be less burdensome from the standpoint of the issuer and more effective from the standpoint of the commission" in preserving "competition and arm's-length bargaining in the distribution of utility security offerings." It is difficult to view this letter as anything other than a friendly gesture and one to which its recipients, had they been truly anxious to cooperate, might have made a friendly response.

But what has been the upshot? From the Investment Bankers' Association has come a lengthy and abusive report charging the SEC with exceeding its statutory powers, with indulging in "Star Chamber proceedings," and with intimidation, and suggesting that it should go before Congress in a white sheet and ask to have its sins investigated. The report goes on to make recommendations for the regulation of utility security issues which amount to a demand that the Public Utility Act be nullified and the investment bankers be allowed to run their business in their own sweet way. Not unfairly the SEC, in a statement commenting on this I. B. A. memorandum, declares it makes clear that its author's primary interest is "in regaining, by any subterfuge, its outlawed privilege of operating the financial markets without responsibility to anybody but its own little group."

In its efforts to maintain competitive conditions in connection with the issuance of utility securities, the SEC at present depends on Rule U-12f-2. This provides that no firm may be paid a fee for underwriting more than 5 per cent of a utility security offering if the underwriter (1) is an affiliate of the utility or (2) is found by the SEC to stand in such a relation to the utility that "there is liable to be or have been an absence of arm's-length bargaining with respect to the transaction." According to the I. B. A. the Public Utility Act of 1935 does not contain any provision "charging the commission generally, apart from intrasystem transactions, with 'maintenance of competitive conditions' in the distribution of securities." Further, it is claimed, Sections 6 and 7 of the act, the sections regulating the sale of securities, make no reference to such matters but only require that prices, fees, and expenses be reasonable. Section 7(d, 6), however, requires the commission to withhold approval of a security issue if it finds that "the terms and conditions of the issue or sale of the security are detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers." And in Section 1 of the act it is specifically stated that such interests are injured "when subsidiary public-utility companies . . . enter into transactions in which evils result from an absence of arm's-length bargaining or from restraint of free and independent competition."

That the SEC has a difficult task to perform in carrying out the purpose of the act can best be illustrated by reference to the Consumers' Power case which came before it last December. This company had made an underwriting contract with Morgan, Stanley and Company in respect to a refunding issue. Admittedly it had neither asked bids from investment bankers at large nor "shopped around" to see which house would offer the best possible terms. Hence the question arose whether there was an "affiliation" between Consumers' Power and Morgan, Stanley; and as this could not be determined immediately, the SEC ordered that the latter's fee should be impounded pending hearings. A similar course has since been taken in regard to other underwriting transactions. This process, however, involves the unraveling of very complicated relationships and is a tedious and expensive business for both the commission and the business men concerned. Most of the utility holding-company systems were banker-organized, and in most of them banker-control remains. It may, however, be very remote control, the existence of which can be denied when diplomacy requires—a control comparable in fact to that which Japan maintains over the Manchoukuoan government.

All the common stock and a clear majority of the voting power of the Consumers' Power Company is owned by Commonwealth and Southern, in which one of the largest stockholders is, or was until recently, the United Corporation. The last-named was formed by J. P. Morgan and Company and has always been known as a Morgan company although the nominal interest of these bankers in it is probably far short of voting control. Nevertheless, there are more ways of controlling a company in Wall Street than by owning a majority of its stock. The really vital question involved is: Who controls the management? Could Mr. Wendell Willkie and the other directors of Consumers' Power Company defy the wishes of the House of Morgan on some vital issue and retain their places? If the answer is no, then obviously negotiations between investment bankers, filially related to Morgan and Company, and the directors of Consumers' Power can hardly be of an "arm's-length" character.

These facts illustrate the kind of financial thickets in which the SEC must grope in its efforts to apply Rule U-12f-2. The I. B. A. alternative is to forget about "affiliation" and allow the "reasonableness of the price, terms, and spread of a proposed issue to be established by comparing them with those prevailing for comparable issues selling, or recently issued, on the open market." As the SEC points out, this would leave the bankers in control of the yardstick. A more satisfactory solution would be insistence on competitive bidding for all utility issues or at least a rule requiring "shopping around," and the possibility of SEC action on these lines is the real cause of the bitterness of the I. B. A. report. For were genuine competition enforced in the underwriting business, monopoly of the cream by a handful of investment bankers would no longer be possible.

In the Wind

MANY MONTHS AGO Sinclair Lewis and the late Sidney Howard were approached by a German theatrical producer who wanted to stage "Dodsworth" in Berlin. His letter asked them to sign formal statements certifying that they were "Aryans." They facetiously replied that they weren't, that in fact Lewis's real name was Levy, Howard's was Horowitz. In the 1938 Dramatic Index published by the F. W. Faxon Company of Boston this entry appeared: "Lewis (Levy), Sinclair, author, playwright, actor."

FRANK GANNETT spoke recently at a luncheon of the Lions Club of Bangor, Maine. His speech was broadcast over Station WABI. When he had finished, the station began to broadcast musical recordings. The first song was "I can get along without you very well."

ADVERTISEMENT IN a British newspaper: "Patriotic Down to the Pantees. These slick little pantees embroidered with the slogan 'England Expects' . . . are certain of a rapturous welcome as a gift for any lingerie drawer."

MEMO TO the Smith committee: A case is now pending before the NLRB involving a printing house in Binghamton, New York. The transcript of the testimony reveals that one of the NLRB's major witnesses is named Karl Marx.

THE PRINCIPAL speaker before the Miami Chamber of Commerce recently was Dr. Thornwell Jacobs, president of Oglethorpe University in Atlanta. Dr. Jacobs warned: "The republic which was established by the founding fathers has slowly degenerated into a democracy. I call for a return to the republic, which is a government by the best, the upper half. First we must eliminate from the franchise all those who are the beneficiaries of city, state, and federal appropriations. . . ."

"THE CREDIBILITY of Eugene L. Belisle as a witness before the state milk-control board was challenged yesterday by David Greer, counsel for milk producers, on the ground that he could not be genuinely interested in increasing sales of milk while retaining a position as executive director of a birth-control league."—News item in the Boston Herald.

THERE WAS ONE neat irony in NBC'S exciting dramatization of Dalton Trumbo's "Johnny Got His Gun." The story is powerful anti-war propaganda; James Cagney played the leading role in the broadcast. As the program ended, the announcer informed the listening audience that "Mr. Cagney may be seen in Warner Brothers' film 'The Fighting Sixty-Ninth.' "

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

BEING still beset by thoughtless people who believe that I favor an immediate peace with Hitler on Hitler's terms and—incredible as it may seem in any person capable of raising fifteen cents to buy The Nation—think it necessary to tell me that a murderous anarchist's word is not to be trusted, I rejoice to have received an admirable Englishman's admirable statement on this whole question of immediate peace negotiations. Charles Roden Buxton comes of a long line of Englishmen distinguished for their public service, their humanitarian point of view, and their intense interest in foreign affairs. Few Englishmen have known as much about Southeastern Europe as he and his brother, Lord Noel Buxton, both of whom during the Versailles days were conspicuous for their desire for a reasonable and decent peace and for just treatment of the Germans. In "The Case for an Early Peace" Charles Buxton has put together all the arguments for and against exploratory negotiations for peace in so calm and reasoned a manner that his seven-page pamphlet has compelling value for all who wish to think this vital question through.

Mr. Buxton begins by expressing his respect for those who think that if the Allies should make peace now "it would give us no security against future aggression by Germany." To those who feel that the war must be prosecuted to the bitter end and until the elimination of Hitler, he says that we who think otherwise have the right to call upon them to prove two things: first, that a secure peace is not possible at an early date; and, second, that "a secure peace, or at least a better peace than is now attainable, could be attained at the end of three years, say, of war." He himself believes that "the probability of attaining a reasonably secure peace at an early date is so great that an attempt should be made to attain it; that the settlement after three years of war, whichever side were the victor, would be a worse settlement than could be obtained now." With this second point I especially agree. If the war goes on for three years and the Allied peoples are reduced almost to beggary and are infuriated by the destruction of their cities, the chances of a humane, intelligent, and far-sighted peace that will really bring about the establishment of that completely new order in Europe which Chamberlain says he wishes will be slim indeed.

But beliefs are one thing, and the arguments on which they are based another. What are Mr. Buxton's arguments for his position? He contends that Hitler's speech of October 6 last outlining certain terms was not his last word but obviously merely the beginning of negotiations. Very soon, if approaches were made, Mr. Buxton thinks, the Allies would reach the stage of negotiation not with Hitler alone but also with powerful neutral states, whose signatures would guarantee the settlement finally reached; they would necessarily be interested in maintaining that settlement because it would in part be their own creation. He assumes of course a genuine conference in which there would be give and take, and in which the interests of Italy and Russia, and also of the smaller neutrals, would be taken into consideration.

Why does Mr. Buxton think that Hitler would be willing to consider peace at a time when the Germans are confident, as they seem to be now, that they are winning the war? He believes that if complete war with the Allies comes soon, it will make Hitler much more subservient to Russia than he is now and far more so than he wishes to be. "Russia would be able to do almost what she pleased." Mr. Buxton feels sure that if Hitler were faced with the possibility of a just and universal settlement, such as the Dutch Premier called for on January 3, he would not dare to compel his people to go on fighting if the only points at issue were the establishment, for example, of a Polish and a Czech state. As to that opinions will differ—naturally; I came out of Germany thinking that it was by no means impossible. It depends for one thing upon the morale of the German people and the strength of their opposition to the war. Finally, Mr. Buxton makes the unanswerable point that a new European order is the only possible guaranty against aggression and the brigand morals of which Stalin and Hitler are the distinguished exemplars.

Those people who think that all would be well if only Hitler could be eliminated, if Göring could make the peace, are utterly deluded. Who could take the place of Hitler save a military despot? And what guaranty would there be that such a man's word was any better than Hitler's? No, the only guaranties worth anything on either side—for I have not forgotten all the broken promises, American and Allied, since the Armistice—will inhere in the peace itself. And after even a year of bloody total war a reasonable peace will be out of the question, whether the Allies win or lose. Such a war will end in the destruction of the German Empire or of the British Empire, and neither will mean lasting peace or a new order. No, let us make one more effort for a negotiated peace before going on to a vindictive dictated peace and complete economic disaster.

BOOKS and the ARTS

ART IN OUR TOWN

BY CONSTANCE ROURKE

IN 1854 a young artist from Delft came to a small village in Michigan that had been established as a trading post less than twenty years before. His pictures were small and exquisitely precise: he had been trained in the school of the "little" masters. Setting up a studio in an upstairs room on the main street, Marinus Harting applied his gifts to the copying of daguerreotypes, to the painting of pictures reminiscent of Delft or The Hague, and to teaching a class of young ladies who, studying art as a polite accomplishment, produced little sketches entitled Summer, Autumn, Winter, Spring that sometimes had a local flavor. Harting himself painted scenes in the new village, one of which is still fresh in spite of a film of darkened varnish, a portrait of a house in a severe, simplified phase of the classic revival peculiar to Michigan. Red damask curtains float from the long porch windows; at one side is a small rose arbor. The passers-by and the few others are sharply, delicately portrayed. In front of the white paling fence runs a plank walk, along the edge of which are thin young elms inclosed in splints to keep the horses from nibbling the bark.

According to a well-established formula, art had little or no place on our frontiers, and the Dutch Calvinists among us have usually been supposed to consider the arts as irrelevant. Yet Harting came to Michigan through the urgency of a Calvinist minister who led a large Dutch colony to the shores of Lake Michigan, establishing a settlement that still spreads inland from the lake shore in a large half circle with strong ancestral traces. The larger proportion of other early settlers in our town came of stock which, according to the formula, either ignored or suppressed the arts—that of Puritan New England. The village had been founded by a French trader and others of the same race whose ancestors had lived for long in the Michigan wilderness.

Marinus Harting suffered disappointments, he made only a slender living; yet his accomplishment disturbs the theory, and he was by no means an isolated figure in our village. Itinerant painters managed to make their way through a fairly dense wilderness and painted here a considerable number of highly individualized portraits, some of them interestingly abstract and even modern. Settlers brought pictures with them. No great distance away and filtering into the village were Pennsylvania Germans whose genius for design often overflowed into formal, brilliant water colors and occasionally into portraiture. Since the formula is often extended to include all the arts, it may be noted that music was to be heard everywhere in an abundance of old songs, to the accompaniment of the German zither and the southern dulcimer, with a scattering of spinets and harpsichords and an early importation of pianos. From the first the cluster of villages roundabout had a strong literary flavor. Byron Center was named at the height of the fever over the Greek Revolution; Adah for Byron's daughter. Emerson came here to lecture in 1860, and some of our citizens became subscribers to The Nation when it was founded.

We had our Grab Corners—the name endured for years—with other evidences of a rude struggle in the midst of primitive forces, yet the village did not conform to the accepted type. It is in fact a question whether the type, which undoubtedly existed, was not pretty well matched by the variables. I can think of at least two dozen villages in Michigan and elsewhere in the early Middle West that did not conform to it, and the arts had some sort of place in all of them.

Well, what of it? Luster may be brushed over our history by the accumulated evidence, but what survived when industrialism began to pound through the country in subsequent decades? By way of reply we have the formula, which is pretty inclusive: not only in the frontier period but in succeeding decades life in our smaller towns and cities has been too meager to give the artist nourishment. Aesthetic roots sent down there were bound to shrivel.

Yet certain marked preoccupations with the arts continued to appear in our town, sometimes riotously. The Gothicism that so strangely invaded American taste came into gloomy flower in furniture from our factories in the eighteen seventies and eighties, particularly in bedroom "suites" of massive medieval grandeur, of the blackest of black walnut. But in architecture the same forms took a different direction: "steamboat Gothic" often had an effect of gaiety, with the houses painted light colors and perched on wooded knolls. Many houses were built in a severe phase of the classic tradition, without ornament, with fine surfaces, cornices, moldings. Square, well-proportioned dwellings of limestone from the river bed were common. Shoddy houses appeared, it is true, and were rebuilt or torn down or fell down, and the town was always strongly industrial, but it never experienced a boom, and thus lacked the sprawling scars left by sudden growth. Some towns—Baton Rouge is one of them—may suddenly drop the outer semblance of their early history, but here the spacious pattern of the early village was retained.

Clashes and inconsistencies of taste continued rather vigorously. During the period when our famous golden oak was rolling out from our factories the town began to spread over neighboring farms, inclosing fruit trees and country gardens that gave it a pastoral touch. Then, as earlier, the paintings which business men brought home with them from trips to Chicago were delicate pictures of farmhouses, sheep in ethereal green meadows, suggesting in another fashion that nostalgia for the farm which crops up so frequently in American urban life. But to bring a painting from Chicago was superfluous evidence of an interest in art; there was never a time when it was impossible to purchase here original work, some of it interesting. We were backward in accepting the great brown wash of photographic copies of masterpieces that helped to create an aesthetic lost generation. We have always had a good many Sunday painters.

By the end of the nineties an artist was intrenched in our town, painting landscapes, portraits, and a large number of rather angry self-portraits, not a great artist but a thoroughly honest one, who sold enough of his work to make possible its continuance. Though towns like ours are supposed to have been well aloof from current aesthetic movements, we had an early exhibition of the revolutionary "Eight" at a time when they were still finding it difficult to show their work. These are not complacencies; the stream was not a rich one and its direction was uncertain, but it existed.

Now, after the lean decade just past, a positive concern with art is again on the rise, any phase of which might be placed first, not least that evolving in the public schools, where a whole generation is growing up with the use of art as a free and familiar medium. The small studio belonging to our art gallery is regularly taxed to overflowing by enthusiastic young Saturday painters. Pressure is also being exerted upon its slight resources by older people, by men as well as women, who want the resources of a workshop and crowd in during their odd hours. And all at once we have a colony of young professional artists who seem to be arranging their lives without regard for the formula.

They have found some of the good places to live in the country near by on islands in the river or on wooded slopes above it, far enough from town to gain the isolation they want for work yet not so far as to cut themselves off from its life. Most of them have steered away from the metropolitan schools and have worked with older artists here and there. If they have entered a school at all it has been a small one in some distant part of the country to which they have jogged in their cars for a winter or a summer, taking flight back home again to attack their problems afresh in their own way. Some of them have, among other things, an astonishing technical power, something the larger schools are supposed to cultivate, even to monopolize, and their work has an individual character not always retained in the massed grind of big classes or in the midst of the many comparisons that go on when numbers of artists are closely congregated.

When the plight of artists seemed particularly desperate early in the last decade a new argument took shape: how excellent it would be if most of them—and writers too—living in New York or elsewhere along the eastern seaboard, would make the homeward journey. What a solution this would be because of the cheaper living, and how they would enrich the cultural life of the community! The counterpart of the proposal seems to have been little discussed—that if workers in the arts scattered homeward and stayed there, enrichment might take place the other way around. Surely something may be gained by the artist—by the worker in any of the arts—from knowing a society at close range, from perceiving cycles of its effort, touches of its history, its distinctive flavor, its darker and more checkered aspects.

Twenty-five years ago "the revolt from the village" was pronounced. Now by an impalpable change the village is apparently being considered with a more genial eye. We must hope that our town will not become "an art center"—heaven forbid!—and we trust that the efforts of our young artists to improve the cultural life of the community will not be specific. We should like to think that they will only do their work with reasonable contentment.

In any event, whatever the reasons, an increasing number of artists now seem to be working without too much dissatisfaction not only in our town but in many other places at a distance from the Atlantic seaboard. In a recent national exhibition here a noticeably large number of works was entered from small towns, and many of those signed by unknown names were fresh and interesting. This is not to say that paradise is provided for the artist who stays at home. Plenty of problems await him besides those he confronts when he looks across himself at his own work. He may not find in his own medium a tradition upon which to draw. In our town, for example, he may not wish to turn to Marinus Harting as a master. Yet he may find a more substantial American past in the arts than he has been led to expect, and he may discover more than he has counted on in the way of those social continuities which surely are basic for the artist. He may learn that our towns and villages are not always stereotypes but often are variables, now as in the period of the frontier—and creative forces are set in motion by the sharp and stinging sense of variations.

What Germans Never Learned

WHAT GERMANY FORGOT. By James T. Shotwell. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

THREE days after the battle of Jena, Count Schulenburg-Kehnert, a minister in the Prussian Cabinet, had posters stuck on the walls of Berlin: "The King has lost a battle; now the first duty of the burghers is to keep calm." Kings invested with power by divine authority could afford to avow their defeat. When the people itself is supposed to incarnate sovereignty, a scapegoat has to be found, for no nation as a whole can be expected to confess to folly or blunder. Such a scapegoat was the Treaty of Versailles, which was held responsible for all the misery the German people had to suffer as an aftermath of the World War. There were, of course, secondary scapegoats, such as Jews, Socialists, pacifists, who could be accused of the "stab in the back."

It is not easy to overrate the great value of Professor Shotwell's book. He proves with the dispassionate argumentation of the historian and the scholarly comprehension of a sociologist that the war itself, Germany's war-time economy, its continuation in the Hindenburg program of heavy expenditure, the devastating inflation, the "false recovery" based on the "miracle" of the Rentenmark, the tariffs of the post-war period, and other economic fallacies, rather than the treaty, produced that morass of despair from which eventually rose the miasma of Nazism. This is not only "what Germany forgot," but what insistent propaganda in this country kept Americans from perceiving. Professor Shotwell produces convincing evidence that the Weimar Republic freed Germany from all the "servitudes" of the treaty, and he shows in addition that "the Hitler method of territorial revision by the threat or use of force robs the economy of Europe of any permanent prosperity, and without the prosperity of Europe, Germany itself cannot prosper."

An equally great merit of Professor Shotwell's lucid, well-documented work is its unmasking of other conventional lies concerning the treaty, especially of the deliberate misinterpretation of Article 231, which has been supposed to declare the sole guilt of Germany for the war. In point of fact this so-called war-guilt clause contains merely a statement "holding Germany responsible for all the loss and damage" it had caused. Only mistranslation of the word "causing" has put Germany in the wrong "als Urheber," or prime cause.

All who possess unbiased information about the World War are by now aware of the share of all belligerents in the responsibility. However, I am afraid that Professor Shotwell, in exonerating Germany from this self-imposed war guilt, goes a step too far. At one point he admits that those who believed "the Prussian militarists of Berlin had joined with the Hapsburg reactionaries of Vienna to force the war" "were nearer to the truth," yet later on we learn that Berchtold "dragged Germany further than it had any liking to go." By giving Austria-Hungary carte blanche, although Berchtold's warlike design was probably no secret in Berlin, Germany, no doubt, became responsible for the crime as an accessory before the fact. German diplomats may have been dull, but they were certainly no babes in the wood.

Not only has Germany forgotten to what extent the war accounted for its distress, but the majority of the population has never learned that military efficiency and nationalistic megalomania are not enough on which to base a claim to world domination. Professor Shotwell's view that lack of experience accounts for their undeveloped political capacity and that "Bismarck taught the German people to lose confidence in themselves" is unassailable. Three centuries under the heel of the Prussian royal jackboots were not exactly a training course in political common sense. The majority of the German people have never realized the disproportion between their inflated nationalism and the ability of their political leaders to put it into imperialistic practice. Nor have they ever learned that their supposed lovableness and skill in handling foreign races were only self-delusion.

By revealing the antecedent economic fallacies of the Nazi revolution Professor Shotwell has rendered an extremely valuable service to historical truth. Reading of this book should be made compulsory for all who still believe that the harsh and unjust treaty justified the Germans morally in creating a "dying space" for the Czechs, the Poles, and the other small fry on whom Nazi imperialism feeds.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

The Career of Albert De Silver

A LIBERAL IN WAR TIME: THE EDUCATION OF ALBERT DE SILVER. By Walter Nelles. Edited by Lewis Gannett. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

THIS is the adequate tribute of a friend, also prematurely deceased, to Albert De Silver, a relatively young man of most unusual promise who came to an accidental death in November, 1924. Few men of his generation, which flowered immediately after the World War, rendered as great service to the cause of sanity and to the preservation of civil liberty in the United States in the years of hysteria from 1917 to 1923 as did Albert De Silver. He was neither a radical nor a born reformer, but he became a pillar of the American Civil Liberties Union because his conscience, his reason, and his insatiable intellectual curiosity and love of truth drove him to the position that he took. Then, after serving the union devotedly from its foundation until 1924, he resigned because he, the able lawyer, had become at thirty-six absolutely immersed in the study of chemistry at Columbia.

A rich man's son who early inherited his father's fortune and had the luck to marry a wife extraordinarily fitted to be his partner, Albert De Silver's evolution was a constant amazement and joy to his sympathetic friends. He was a regular conservative in college, as was to be expected of one of his birth, surroundings, and prospects in life. But his mind was clear, fertile, logical, searching. It did not allow him to remain static for a moment, yet one felt, and his record shows it, that whichever way he went, it was a controlled drift. He was never in danger of a lee shore, was never a reckless navigator, and never did he embark on an insufficiently appraised or ill-studied course. But when he had decided he had neither fear of consequences nor of hostile public opinion. He took his stand, and that was all there was to it.

He was a wise, thoughtful, able legal adviser and a devoted friend. He always stood by others. One knew where to find him, and one had unbounded confidence that nothing improper could sway him. Yet he thought himself "temperamentally not very well suited to that type of activity [the reformer's], and it is not the sort of work in which I can be thoroughly absorbed." Yet his loss was a real one to chemistry and to reform. Finally he came to say: "I can't make much out of this curious world in which we live. What we all do seems to me so stupid and yet so natural. And that combination of stupidity and naturalness seems to me to rob the problem of a complex civilization both of certainty in the sense of predictability and of standards."

Mr. Nelles avoided the usual emotional pitfalls which lie before one who writes a tribute to a friend and produced a narrative which must impress those who did not know Albert De Silver as thoroughly justifying the writing of one more "Life." It is a book especially to be set before young men in college; indeed, it should be made required reading in certain civics courses.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Ill Fares the Land

THE HAPPY LAND, By Eric Knight, Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

EXCEPT that it is not deserted, the Yorkshire village of Apley Moorside is Mr. Knight's "sweet Auburn," chosen to illustrate the thesis that abundant ills prey on a land where wealth accumulates and men decay, that a bold peasantry when once destroyed can never be supplied. Here, it is true, the peasantry consists of colliers; when the mines shut down we watch their initiative and self-respect dribble away under the cumulative pressure of idleness, reduced living standard, unemployment insurance, and finally government assistance. The younger ones at least make a stand: they look for other jobs, and, failing to find them, scrabble for bits of coal on the slag heaps until driven away by the police; then they form "clubs" to dissemble their own inactivity from themselves, while the spineless sit more and more at home and figure out ways to perpetuate and if possible increase their dole, such as not getting married because a wedded couple draws only twenty-four shillings weekly while the two separately can total thirty-one.

All the degrees from rebellion to resignation meet in the Clough family. Thora, young, strong, alternately comforting and commanding, is spiritually undefeated to the very end. Of her two brothers: Fred, the younger, ambitious and hopeful, tramps over most of England looking for a job and ends up in the British equivalent of a CCC camp; big Matt, bearlike in brawn, has no fear of work but deteriorates through lack of brains and adaptability. Their father, old Tom Clough, and his whining crony, Napper, have stepped right out of "Juno and the Paycock" to convert their few spare pennies into beer and complain that the world is in "a tarrible state of chassis." There is not much that could be called plot, but of forceful character-drawing there is plenty, and a thorough grasp of what happens to common, ordinary, everyday people when the economic dyspepsia of the present time forces them to accept pauper status in the place of relative independence. The author, a Briton now living in the United States, is already known for his pleasant novella, "The Flying Yorkshireman."

LOUIS B. SALOMON

The "Long Animal"

SELECTED LETTERS OF EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

ROBINSON appears to have passed on to his literary executors some of his own singular humility. Hermann Hagedorn's recent "Life" was a most unassuming book, and Ridgely Torrence has compiled this brief choice of letters in the same modest spirit.

The earliest letters date from 1890. Still a youth in Gardiner, Maine, Robinson is tending his crippled father, translating Vergil, and confessing to vague emotions of loneliness and unworthiness. The last letter was written in New York Hospital in 1935; and the poet, unaware that this is his final illness, is telling an old friend, "You must be very careful of your eyes," and warning her against Auden and Spender because "they are for the youngsters." The letters between these two dates chronicle a life which was certainly not without excitements and satisfactions. The young Robinson experienced some trouble getting published; yet he had faithful and determined friends from the start. In addition he was to have the unique experience of being read and taken up by a President of the United States. And finally, his "Tristram" was to be an immense best-seller. Nevertheless, the outward successes of his life appear to have left pretty much intact his feelings of solitude and inferiority. He is always charging himself with not "amounting to anything," with being "lazy" and "incomplete," with lacking "brains," ideas, tact. The loyalty of his friends is a continual amazement to him, and in thanking them he is never sure that he has done justice to his feelings: ". . . my chief mission in life appears to be that of a very long animal who barks and snarls when 6th printing

Price $2.50

A book for all of us who realize how little we learned at school

How To Read A Book is a practical guide to the art of acquiring a liberal education. Although it is not a "how-to" book in the Dale Carnegie sense, it does lay down specific rules, teaching how to use reading time intelligently, profitably and with pleasure.

It is a book for all of us who feel that something has gone wrong with our education but do not know quite what the trouble is. Within three weeks after publication it has leaped to the top of the best-seller lists. The reviews tell why:

THE REVIEWS:

"I wish to recommend it to all literates who would like to learn to read. From How To Read A Book I have actually learned how to read a book."
—Clifton Fadiman, The New Yorker

"How To Read A Book should establish Adler as one of the most persuasive thinkers in the U.S. No mere manual of 'mind-training,' Adler's book provides not only the rules, but a pleasurable discussion and application of them."
—Time Magazine

"It is not one of those how-to books which beckon a royal road that doesn't exist: it is a serious and valuable invitation to an enrichment of personal life." —The New York Times Book Review

SIMON AND SCHUSTER • PUBLISHERS

STALIN and HITLER

The Reasons for and the Results of THE NAZI-BOLSHEVIK PACT

a new 10¢ booklet by Louis Fischer

To thousands of liberal Americans, August 23, 1939, was the darkest moment of the post-war years. On that day Soviet Russia signed its pact with Nazi Germany. What was the story behind the pact? What had happened inside Russia—and outside—to make the alliance possible? What did the event augur for the future of the Western world?

These are the questions that Louis Fischer weighs in this 64-page booklet. He covered Moscow for twelve years, from 1924 to 1936. His authoritative analysis of the pact is not only exciting journalism but important history!

REDUCED PRICES FOR FIFTY OR MORE COPIES

Single copies..........10¢ each
50 copies or more.......9c each
100 copies or more.......8c each
250 copies or more....7c each
500 copies or more....6c each
1,000 copies or more....5c each

Send your order for copies with remittance today! We will ship copies direct to your friends if you let us have their names and addresses.

THE NATION ■ 55 FIFTH AVENUE ● NEW YORK CITY
3-30-40

I inclose $.................... for .... copies of Louis Fischer's booklet, "Stalin and Hitler."

☐ Send copies to the names on the list attached
☐ Send copies to me.

Name..

Address...

....

Don't Miss An Issue!
To keep THE NATION coming regularly just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION ■ 55 FIFTH AVE. ■ NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $..................

☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

Special Introductory Offer
☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name . . . .
Street . . . .
City . . . .
State 3-30-40

Extra postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c.

he means to make all sorts of good-natured and affectionate noises."

There can be little doubt that shyness and loneliness were the great specters of Robinson's personal life. And, as we know from Mr. Hagedorn's biography, these emotions were probably connected with his early belief that he was a belated and somewhat unwelcome addition to his father's household. Feeling excluded from the family as a child, he was to feel isolated from society later on; and he was to endeavor to make himself as small and unobtrusive as possible. Yet the letters show a curious interest in communal living: references to Brook Farm are surprisingly numerous; and with his discovery in middle life of the MacDowell colony in Peterborough, New Hampshire, the tone of his correspondence was to become increasingly serene.

"The whole Western world is going to be blown to pieces, asphyxiated, and starved," Robinson wrote to Mrs. Ledoux in 1921; and he seems to have found the post-war havoc particularly congenial to his own melancholia. But he will never admit he is a pessimist, and he expresses himself at all times with a grim cheerfulness and humorous self-disparagement. Indeed, his accent in these letters is the very accent of rural New England, and it is largely responsible for his charm as a correspondent. But Robinson's provincial stoicism, if we may call it that, appears to have had the disadvantage of making for a certain prudence and uniformity in his response to experience; and certainly it excluded him more and more from adventures in literature, ideas, and opinions. The letters record few such adventures at any rate; and to offset his chronic diffidence toward most things, he seems to have had only his lifelong enthusiasm for Dickens and Wagner, and, inversely, his rather ill-defined hostility toward "mechanism" and "materialism."

F. W. DUPEE

WPA—Present and Future

WORKERS ON RELIEF. By Grace Adams. Yale University Press. $3.

AUTOPSIES on the WPA seem to be in order even though parts of the body are still very much alive. Undoubtedly the next few years will bring many revelations and scandals, with a considerable acrimonious exchange of contrary opinions. But it is to be hoped that there will also be some just appraisals. The WPA is too important to be made the football of political partisanship. It is the greatest collective effort ever made in the United States.

Grace Adams, taking no sides, surveys the WPA with sound psychological insight. The author of "Psychology: Science or Superstition," she uses the case method, letting a number of sufficiently diversified workers tell their experiences and weaving the necessary facts and figures into a running narrative form. In this way she avoids a dreary recital of confusing statistics which would interest only professional social workers. It does not always sound like plausible conversation, but it serves the purpose of holding the layman's attention. Miss Adams apparently has the future of the WPA at heart and realizes that its fate depends upon intelligent popular support of it.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal

Her case histories illustrate both how the WPA works and how it has failed to work. They show the utter bewilderment of workers, as well as of local administrators and supervisors, at the mass of red tape, arbitrary and frequently changed rulings, fantastic classifications, and meaningless qualification requirements. We see workers assigned to work they have never done before and becoming what they have never thought of being.

The ludicrous or pathetic situations described may read like caricatures to the outsider, but anyone who has been on the inside could easily duplicate them. Undoubtedly lack of coordination between Washington and the field has had much to do with it, and initiative at the lower end of the administrating body has not been encouraged. Many of the supervisors have been defeated men who had lost their initiative, while others have been political hacks and trimmers. "Do as you are told and don't stick your neck out" became their protective slogan. They nursed their jobs just as some of the younger workers made a career out of the WPA for the simple reason that they had never had a career of their own. Without any pick-up in outside employment workers faced nothing but a return to home relief if they stepped out of the ranks.

That is the debit side of the picture. On the credit side some seven million people have been given employment, and the amount of work they have accomplished sounds prodigious; Miss Adams quotes two solid pages of statistics from the WPA publicity department. Any analysis of these figures would have exceeded the limits of her book, but they will have to be broken down and analyzed to determine their value. Against what standard of efficiency was the work checked if, as is claimed, it was only 50 to 60 per cent efficient? Were the handicaps under which the work was done always the fault of the WPA or did lack of technical supervision and the proviso against competition with private industry also play a part?

Sooner or later, Miss Adams insists, the WPA will have to decide whether its aim is to give relief or work. If relief, it should be coordinated with the other relief organizations all over the country to give just that until recovery comes. If the primary object is to give work, then the highest standards of efficiency should prevail. Her analysis of the lag which has been the bane of the WPA ever since its inception is provocative. It was conceived in the atmosphere of New Deal optimism which followed the Hoover illusion that recovery was just around the corner. The word "temporary" was its watchword and its hope. It planned for only three million unemployed when the National Reemployment Service Bureau had already registered over eight million. It never faced the permanency of unemployment as Congress will have to do if the WPA is to function properly as either a relief or a work agency.

ALFRED B. KUTTNER

GET AT THE BOTTOM OF THINGS
REGISTER AT THE WORKERS SCHOOL
Elementary and advanced courses in Marxism — Leninism — Imperialism and National and Colonial Question—Negro Question — Political Economy — American and Labor History — Trade Unionism—Science.
SPRING TERM CLASSES BEGIN WEEK OF APRIL 8
WORKERS SCHOOL, 35 East 12 St., N. Y. C. AL 4-1199

64 TO 1
You're right with LAFAYETTE'S Radio Line

Is it a portable? . . table model for office, den or "upstairs" . . . car radio . . . magnificent phono-combination? Lafayette has it. 64 distinct—and distinctive—models to choose from. All different in style and purpose, yet alike in this: dollar for dollar, Lafayette is finer in tone, superior in performance, greater in value than any other radio of your acquaintance. We invite you to visit our showroom nearest you for convincing proof of this statement. Or write for free catalog NC5 You can spend more, but you cannot buy a better value than Lafayette.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
[illegible] Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

SHERWOOD EDDY'S
MEXICAN SEMINAR
Sails July 4 Back August 13

A COMPREHENSIVE study of Mexican life with special emphasis on the later phases of the Revolution. Interviews with government officials and authorities on the economic, political and social problems of the country.

Ten days in Mexico City plus nearly three weeks of travel in the provinces, including Oaxaca, Orizaba, Cuernavaca, Taxco, Puebla, Patzcuaro, Morelia, Vera Cruz.

•

For information concerning membership, cost of participation, travel arrangements, etc., address:

SHERWOOD EDDY, 52 Vanderbilt Ave., New York City

"THE MOST DISTINGUISHED NOVEL THAT 1940 HAS YET VOUCHSAFED US."
—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

• "Definitely reminiscent of Robert Nathan's One More Spring and Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men. Watch Corle. Read Solitaire." —N. Y. Tribune.

• "Mr. Corle is a gifted writer. The story is told with great delicacy and dramatic suspense." —The New Yorker.

• "Mr. Corle's picture of suburban life is accurate, lively and ironic."
—Saturday Review of Literature.

• "As charmingly perceptive a story of childhood as has been written in a long time." —Joseph Henry Jackson. San Francisco Chronicle.

SOLITAIRE
by Edwin Corle
E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY, INC. $2.50
NOW IN ITS 3rd PRINTING

IN BRIEF

PEACE IN OUR TIME. By James P. Warburg. Harper and Brothers. 75 cents.

Purporting to ask thought-stimulating questions without answering them, the gist of this banker-author's approach is in the title of the Introduction: "It Is Our Problem." His formulation of desirable peace aims coincides with that which he quotes from the British Foreign Minister. We must take part in the peace; so the conclusion is inescapable that we must help as far as necessary to secure an acceptable outcome of the war. "For lack of competence," he does not touch upon the Far East. Nor does he ask the most fundamental question of all: "Is this war anything more than a symptom of what ails the world?"

ACCULTURATION IN SEVEN AMERICAN INDIAN TRIBES. Edited by Ralph Linton. D. Appleton-Century Company. $4.

This book comprises accounts of the aboriginal modes of life and present-day condition of seven Indian tribes of North America, studied with an eye to the contrast between their past and present modes of behavior. The tribes are the Puyallup of Washington, the White Knife Shoshoni of Nevada, the Southern Ute of Colorado, the Northern Arapaho of Wyoming, the Fox of Iowa, the Alkatcho Carrier of British Columbia, and the San Ildefonso of New Mexico; the studies were made in the field by students in the Department of Anthropology of Columbia University. The editor contributes an introduction outlining the plan for the studies and three essays on the processes and distinctive aspects of what is technically called acculturation—that is, the borrowing of tradition by the members of social groups through continuous first-hand contact. Though this book is primarily for the professional anthropologist, it has value for all who are interested in Indians, for it gives one of the most objective pictures yet drawn of the present condition of the tribes discussed. Most of those who write of the Indian of today stress the breakdown of aboriginal custom and the resulting demoralization; in this book it can be seen to what an extent the Indian has adapted himself to the situation thrust upon him by white aggression.

In The Modern Library:

Bertrand Russell's

most significant writings, including the two essays, A Free Man's Worship and Mysticism and Logic printed in full, important chapters from Education and the Good Life, Proposed Roads to Freedom, Why Men Fight, The A B C of Relativity, and much other material.

This volume contains a special introduction written for it by the author, who personally selected its contents. One of its advantages is that it enables the reader to follow, in one volume, the changes in Mr. Russell's style from his earliest writings on. 410 pages.

SELECTED PAPERS OF BERTRAND RUSSELL

95¢ Send to THE MODERN LIBRARY, 20 E. 57th Street, N. Y. City, for free list of 270 titles, including the works of other grand contemporary Thinkers.

THE PRIVATE AND PUBLIC LIFE OF SOCRATES. By René Kraus. Translated by Barrows Mussey. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

A biography fictionalized to the point where it is really a novel in treatment, though with Xenophon and Plato to draw upon the author has not needed to invent details or even conversations. Intent on interpreting the past to the present, he interposes the atmosphere of the present between the reader and the subject. Doubtless his "facts" are correct, but a "straight" biography would seem preferable.

CLARA SCHUMANN: A ROMANTIC BIOGRAPHY. By John N. Burk. Random House. $3.

Historical knowledge, musical scholarship, human sympathy, and a quiet, simple style of writing go to make this a first-rate biography of the wife of Robert Schumann and the inspirer of Brahms, who was also—indeed, first of all—one of the greatest pianists of her day. A natural, charming book about a natural, charming woman.

THESE RULE FRANCE. The Story of Edouard Daladier and the Men Around Daladier. By Stanton B. Leeds. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

Starting from the premise that those who defend personal and national liberty always come to power in the end in France, and apparently assuming his readers' complete ignorance of French political and social conditions in both the past and the present, the author instructs us sketchily and superficially about key figures in finance, journalism, and the arts, as well as in politics and the army.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT IN THE OLD SOUTH. By Clement Eaton. Duke University Press. $3.

"The suppression of the Southern anti-slavery men furnishes one of the most impressive monuments in history of the ultimate folly of intolerance," concludes the author of this well-documented but readable study. But the growth of intolerance shows up more strongly against earlier Southern than contemporary Northern liberalism. This book, which won the Duke centennial prize, is an especially worthy example of recent impartial studies of bypaths of Southern history by Southerners.

CONTRIBUTORS

BERTRAND RUSSELL, one of the world's most distinguished philosophers and mathematicians, has recently been appointed to the faculty of the College of the City of New York.

MILTON S. MAYER has been connected with the Associated Press, the Chicago Evening Post, and the Chicago American.

JULIO ALVAREZ DEL VAYO, before he became Spain's war-time Foreign Minister, was one of Europe's outstanding newspapermen, having been president of the Foreign Press Club in Berlin and Spanish correspondent of the Manchester Guardian and the Buenos Aires Nación.

CONSTANCE ROURKE is the author of "Charles Sheeler: Artist in the American Tradition" and of many other books dealing with American social and cultural history.

RUSTEM VAMBERY, noted criminologist and sociologist, was at one time a member of several Hungarian government ministries and committees. He is now on the teaching staff of the New School for Social Research in New York.

F. W. DUPEE is on the editorial staff of the Partisan Review.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

MUSIC

IN THE succession of dull works and undistinguished performances which the New Friends of Music presented in its chamber-music series this year the outstanding occasions were the performances of Mozart's String Quintets by the Budapest and Primrose Quartets. It was with these that the New Friends fulfilled its purpose and promise of offering the masterpieces which inertia in program-making leaves unperformed and unheard. When a string quartet decides to play a Mozart quintet it almost invariably chooses the G minor, never the E-flat or D major, which are superb works, and almost never the C major, which rivals the G minor in power. It was with the Budapest Quartet's performance of this work that the New Friends brought its rather inglorious series to a brilliant conclusion. And then it opened its orchestral series with a concert which must have been for others what it was for me—an experience to be cherished as long as memory could retain it.

Mozart's piano concertos occupy a special place in his works. He wrote them for the occasions when he presented himself to the public as composer-pianist; in each his object was to show all that he was capable of as a musician, and to show this in constantly new ways. In a single work, then, one gets his powers operating at incandescence, producing a breath-taking flow of miracles of loveliness, expressiveness, and wit; and in one work after another the unending variety of these miracles becomes overwhelming: consider, for example, the constantly and triumphantly new ways in which the all-important first entrance of the piano is contrived. Of the two dozen or so concertos which Mozart wrote in his entire lifetime at least ten are among his greatest works, with individual movements—the slow movement of K. 467, for example—that are among the supreme musical utterances of all time. To say this is to say that they should be constantly in the orchestral repertory; but since conductors regard concertos not as part of the orchestral repertory but as vehicles for soloists—since, in other words, a conductor does not decide to give Mozart's Concerto K. 453 or 503 and engage a pianist to play it, but engages a pianist and chooses from whatever concertos the pianist offers—the result is that K. 453 and 503 have not been played in New York in the twenty-five years that I have been attending concerts. It was only because Webster Aitken happened to offer K. 450 that the Boston Symphony played it for the first time in its sixty years' history; and there are others which may remain unplayed by the Boston Symphony for the sixty years it will take another pianist to offer them.

A year ago Leon Barzin hinted at a survey series of concerts by the National Orchestral Association devoted to these works; and the original announcement of the New Friends last year promised something more extensive than the four concertos of the present series. Originally, moreover, there was a possibility of Schnabel playing the ones that have been neglected; but in the end he chose K. 466, which is the best known, K. 467, which has had two performances in New York, and K. 482 and 488, which have been played more frequently. The series, then, is not making the public acquainted with unfamiliar masterpieces; but it is revealing familiar ones in the light cast upon them by performances the like of which will not soon be heard again. For rumor has Schnabel retiring at the end of this season; and how enormous and irreparable the loss will be he demonstrated with his playing in K. 466 and 467 at the first concert. I cannot think of a pianist capable of phrasing the long cantilena of that slow movement of K. 467 as Schnabel did—a pianist, that is, who could give it the form, the significance with which Schnabel's fingers caused it to emerge from the piano; a pianist, in still other words, who brings to music the resources of matured emotion and understanding and pianistic skill that Schnabel brings. And I would say that an artist with these resources is not free to stop; they impose on him the obligation to go on as long as there is still power in his mind and hand.

One is bound to give first consideration to Schnabel's playing because of the primary importance of the solo instrument in these works and his masterly handling of it. But the Mozart concerto, as Tovey has pointed out, employs the concerto principle of opposition of unequal instrumental forces that is basic in the earlier concerto of Vivaldi, Handel, and Bach; with the difference that in Mozart the use becomes more complex: the solo instrument not only is set off against the orchestra but is constantly involved in subtle interplay with strings and woodwinds which Mozart makes the unceasing wonder and delight here that they are in his operas. And in the New Friends performances this subtle interplay, this integration of orchestra with piano, was beautifully achieved with fine precision in execution and homogeneity of style. In this music, as in the Haydn symphonies a year ago, Fritz Stiedry revealed himself as a musician of feeling and taste; and this year the playing of the orchestra gave more impressive evidence of his competence and authority as a conductor.

B. H. HAGGIN

RECORDS

Now in Stock

BALLAD FOR AMERICANS
Stirringly Sung by
PAUL ROBESON
Two 10" Records—Four Sides
VICTOR ALBUM P20—$2.00
ERIC BERNAY'S MUSIC ROOM
133 West 44th St. LOngacre 3-4420
OPEN TO 10 P. M. — ORDERS MAILED PROMPTLY

LAFAYETTE
PHONOGRAPHS—RADIOS AT THE MIDTOWN SHOWROOM
OPEN TO 10 P. M.
ERIC BERNAY'S MUSIC ROOM
133 W. 44th St. LOngacre 3-4420

LATEST RECORDS

IMPORTED
RUSSIAN RECORDS!
BY
Modern Russian Composers

Song of the Plains
Red Moscow
Kalinka
From Border to Border
Cossack's Song

and many more
SEND FOR COMPLETE LIST N

Phone CH 2-6744 OPEN EVENINGS
O. PAGANI & BRO.
[illegible] Bleecker Street, corner 7th Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

Defense of the Copyright Bill

Dear Sirs: Thorvald Solberg, in The Nation of February 24, criticizes certain features of the new copyright bill (Senate No. 3043). While I agree that the so-called manufacturing clause has been a "major blot" on our copyright legislation since 1891, it has successfully resisted all efforts, including those of Mr. Solberg, to eliminate it. The new bill, drafted by the Committee for the Study of Copyright, has endeavored to liberalize the provisions of the manufacturing clause to such an extent as to enable the United States to adhere to the Berne Convention, and I am encouraged by legal opinion to believe that we have succeeded.

Although the draft provides that all copies of any copyrighted work which shall be distributed in the United States shall be manufactured wholly within the United States or its dependencies, important exceptions to this provision are allowed, as follows: foreign newspapers, periodicals, or magazines; works in foreign languages by authors not resident or domiciled within the United States; authorized translations in a foreign language of works previously published in the United States; motion pictures, works in raised characters for the blind, etc. Furthermore, the importation, not for sale or hire, of foreign printed works in English is allowed as follows: one copy of any work in personal baggage; one copy of any work on any one invoice for personal use of consignee; copies for libraries; two copies for author's own use; copies of works in private collections purchased en bloc in a foreign country. To these permitted importations, which may in the aggregate be considerable but which Mr. Solberg does not mention, is to be added commercial importation of five hundred copies for distribution through trade channels. The committee believes that the allowed importations are sufficient to meet the demands of libraries and scholars and to test the likelihood of a profitable American edition.

With regard to the provision requiring deposit of copies of works, it should be noted that this is applicable only to publishers and to works manufactured within the United States. The works of foreign authors become subject to this requirement only if they cause an American reprint of such works to be issued.

It should also be noted that the works affected by the manufacturing clause of the bill receive copyright automatically in the United States, without formalities. It is only when commercial importation of works exceeds five hundred copies—in addition to permitted individual and library importations—that such copyright is affected. If the commercial importation of more than five hundred copies takes place with the consent of the author, it implies a voluntary dedication to the public. If it takes place without such consent, copies so imported are seized and forfeited or, in the absence of gross negligence or fraud, returned to the country of export, but the copyright is not impaired.

Furthermore, loss of copyright protection resulting from authorized importation of more than five hundred copies applies only to printing, distribution, and sale. Rights in radio, cinema, drama, translation, etc., are not impaired.

WALDO G. LELAND, Chairman,
Committee for the Study of Copyright
Washington, March 20

Mr. Browder's Logic

Dear Sirs: Earl Browder's reply to Lewis Corey's articles on Marxism (The Nation for March 9) clearly establishes the essential intellectual dishonesty of the American Communist Führer. Mr. Corey discusses questions of social, economic, and political thought, action, and strategy in the light of present-day world conditions. All this Mr. Browder passes up and argues, first, that Corey is not qualified to discuss these problems from the Marxist standpoint; second (by implication), that Corey is a literary bandit, like Eastman, who can derive profit from his present anti-Marxist position because it will bring his articles "to the attention of the right people"; and, finally, that Corey has joined the Rooseveltian army in a "holy crusade to save Europe from socialism, from proletarian revolution." No doubt if Mr. Corey had supported Hitler in his struggle to destroy British capitalism, thus liberating the British workers, and Stalin in his crusade to free the exploited Finns, he, Corey, would be the most penetrating exponent of Marxism now writing.

IRVING B. ALTMAN
New York, March 16

Packing the Labor Board

Dear Sirs: Two years ago there was an awful hullabaloo all over the country about "packing the Supreme Court." It still remains the President's outstanding boner. Now among all the various suggestions to prune, whittle, and spirit away the National Labor Relations Act there seems to be one on which almost all agree, including Senator Wagner—enlarge the board. The admitted purpose of this is to give Dr. William M. Leiserson, a minority member, a majority in agreement with him in order to effect changes in administration, procedure, and personnel.

What's the difference in principle between "packing the Labor Board" and the Supreme Court affair? But where are the righteous howls?

WILLIAM GASTON
New York, March 20

Fighting Hearst and Hunger

Dear Sirs: The 231 men and women who have been on strike for some fifteen months against W. R. Hearst's Chicago newspapers are facing a crisis. These people, who with their dependents number more than 700, have made incredible sacrifices to achieve a better life for newspaper workers. Despite every form of repressive terror employed by their gigantic adversary, William Randolph Hearst, their will to win still burns as strongly as ever.

After denying these people their right to use the press and radio, Hearst is now pushing injunction and contempt proceedings to still their voices. These proceedings would deny them their right of free speech by forbidding the issuance of their own pamphlets, the operation of their own sound trucks, and the presentation of their own movie. If these rights are to be upheld, money for appeals to the higher courts is necessary.

At this moment the strike itself has hit a financial dead center. Hunger is one foe we cannot defeat. If there is anything you can do at this time to aid, it will be a boon. The aggregate of many small sums will enable us to go on.

HARRY D. WOHL,
International Vice-President,
American Newspaper Guild
Chicago, March 19

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 6, 1940 NUMBER 14

The Shape of Things

THE DISPUTE BETWEEN MAYOR LAGUARDIA and the Transport Workers' Union seemed to be headed toward serious conflict and a possible strike as we went to press. After a conference last week with John L. Lewis the Mayor promised "to recommend" that the Board of Transportation, subject to judicial construction, take over union contracts along with the two private lines soon to come under city operation. But the promise proved worthless. Two of the board's members are strongly anti-union, and the third is an A. F. of L. official—all were appointed by LaGuardia. As was expected, it declined to bargain collectively with the C. I. O. Transport Workers' Union as exclusive bargaining agent, and Lewis was back in town for last-minute conferences as the union prepared to strike. A letter from the Mayor to the union virtually threatens loss of jobs and contract privileges if a strike is called, but the Mayor seems to have left the union no alternative but strike or extinction. On the line already operated by the city the Board of Transportation has always refused to recognize the union as representative of the majority, though it won a majority in State Labor Board elections. The board's chairman, John H. Delaney, would like nothing better than the job of breaking the union on the other two lines when he takes them over. All the Mayor's clever maneuvers and legalistic exegesis have failed to justify his inconsistency in refusing subway workers the basic rights he has advocated for labor elsewhere, or to explain why workers which bargained collectively when the lines were under private ownership should not do so when they are under public control.

*

PREMIER MOLOTOV'S SPEECH BEFORE THE Supreme Soviet cannot have given much comfort to his Berlin friends for all its heated criticism of the Allies. For he clearly indicated that Russia proposed to remain neutral in the war, and while he denounced various British and French actions as provocative he indicated that the Soviet government would not be easily provoked. Nor did anything he said suggest that Moscow was preparing to enter into closer relations with Germany and Italy in order to regulate the future of the Balkans. He mentioned that the U. S. S. R. had never recognized Rumanian sovereignty over Bessarabia but stated that the question of recovering that province by military means had never been raised. He indicated, however, that Allied military activity in the New East was being watched and that any hostile move would be promptly met. In actual fact it would appear that the Allies have as yet come to no decision about drawing Russia into the war. The French government seems readier to take this step than the British, which wants to be convinced that the forced alignment of Russia with Germany will help and not hinder the campaign against the latter. Thus in his recent radio speech Winston Churchill declared that there was no need for Russia to be drawn into the struggle unless it insisted on throwing its weight to Germany. Unfortunately, there are many possibilities of conflict between the Soviets and the West, especially if the Allies seek to tighten their blockade by persuading Turkey to allow them entry to the Black Sea. There are also likely to be further attempts to prevent Russia from acting as an intermediary for German imports. The enormous increase in Soviet purchases of strategic raw materials in recent months certainly suggests that Russia is making a hole in the Allied blockade.

*

THE HOUSE HAS INCREASED BY $67,000,000 the amount asked by the Administration for the Labor-Security appropriation bill. But a joker makes it unlikely that the $50,000,000 of this increase which goes to the CCC will ever be spent. And while the House showed exemplary generosity in adding $17,000,000 for the National Youth Administration, it was significantly parsimonious in dealing with both the wage-hour administration and the NLRB. It refused an additional $1,000,000 badly needed to enforce the wage-hour law, and it lopped off the $248,000 required for the maintenance of the NLRB's Division of Economic Research. We hope the Senate will restore the $248,000 and grant the extra funds asked for wage-hour enforcement. The press, which gives William M. Leiserson its biggest headlines when he criticizes his colleagues of the Labor Board, buried deep his letter to Congressman Murdock declaring that elimination of the research division would seriously handicap the board's work. The Wagner Act, Leiserson pointed out, "is a remedial and not a penal statute; it empowers the board only to find facts and to order appropriate remedies." How find facts without a fact-finding division? The decisions of the courts provide ample testimony to the usefulness of the Division of Economic Research and its able head, David J. Saposs. The question of his work came squarely before the courts two years ago in the Third Circuit, where particular objection was made to Saposs's testimony as an economic expert. The court upheld the propriety and relevance of his testimony, and the Supreme Court denied a review. The fight to abolish the research division is only the beginning of a broader fight to make "economy" an excuse to reduce the board itself to impotence.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

NO CONGRESSIONAL INQUIRY IS NEEDED TO discover why Communist leaders are reluctant to divulge their membership lists. In industry, in many schools, and in many offices membership in the Communist Party constitutes ground for dismissal. Mr. Dies knows this, and so does every member of Congress encouraging or condoning his inquisition. The question of whether Communists can legally refuse to disclose the rolls of their party without reprisal is a complex and unsettled one. It is less important than the question of why Mr. Dies has precipitated the issue. The Communist Party is legal, and membership in it is not a criminal offense. Even Martin Dies has verbally conceded its right to existence. But there are more ways to destroy a particular party and civil liberty in general than by official decree. One is to make membership in a minority group equivalent to economic suicide. The other is to eliminate its leaders by a legal Blitzkrieg. Mr. Dies seems confident that he has discovered an infallible formula. If the party's leaders bring forth the membership lists, an "index" for reactionary industrialists will be on file, and future recruiting for the party will be shadowed by that fear. If, on the other hand, the Communists defy the demand, as they have thus far done, Mr. Dies vows to "jail every Communist leader in the United States." We don't know who Mr. Dies will select as his next victims if this purge is accomplished. But he has given every warning that the Communists are merely his first prey. We hope that every effort will be made to challenge the legality of the committee's procedure; if it is upheld, radical and liberal groups in America will be confronted with a serious threat to their existence. Will the courts and Congress let Martin Dies continue his one-man crusade against democracy?

THE SACRED RIGHT TO LYNCH NEGROES IS again in danger, and some of the Southern statesmen in the Senate are threatening a filibuster to block a vote on the anti-lynching bill, already passed by the House. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted twelve to four in favor of reporting the bill. Senators Connally, Pittman, Miller, and Chandler made up the minority which stood firm against it. Senator Wagner, who has led the fight in favor of the bill, declared that seventy-three lynchings have occurred during the six years it has been before Congress. The bill would penalize police officers for failing to protect prisoners. Senator Connally, who led the successful filibuster against it in 1937 and again in 1938, calls it "a deliberate affront to the people of the Southern states." The real affront is that a lawless, ignorant, and brutal minority should be identified by Connally and his like with "the people of the Southern states."

*

THERE IS ANOTHER SOUTH THAN THAT represented by the Connallys and the Bilbos, and it is reflected in the popular support and subscriptions that have made it possible for George Fort Milton to begin publication of the new Evening Tribune in Chattanooga, Tennessee. The Tribune made its appearance on March 25, just 100 days after the Chattanooga News ceased publication. Under Mr. Milton's editorship the News had been one of the outstanding papers of the South. It fought for public power. It campaigned against lynching. It exposed political corruptionists. It befriended labor. But a technical default on its bonds gave its anti-New Deal and power-trust enemies the chance they had long sought to put it out of business. The advertising columns of the new paper indicate the existence in Chattanooga of enlightened business interests prepared to support an independent and liberal paper. Best of luck to the new enterprise!

*

THE CANADIAN GENERAL ELECTION GAVE a new lease of power to the Liberal Party and its leader, Mr. Mackenzie King, whose political astuteness and sense of timing none can deny. His triumph was greatly assisted by the incompetence of the Conservatives. They proved unable to develop any definite program beyond a vague proposal for a "national government," and while they sought hard to "expose" the wrongdoings of the Liberal administration, they neglected genuine grievances such as wholesale abrogation of civil liberties, for which the war has served as excuse. In the circumstances it is not surprising that the voters should have preferred not to swap horses while at war. Mr. King's victory places him in a position of almost uncontrolled power. This is unlikely, however, to lead to any permanent undermining of Canadian democracy, for by temperament he is a political manipulator rather than a dictator. Moreover, the Liberal Party is not an entirely cohesive body and might split under pressure. For the moment, however, Mr. Hepburn, the leading potential rebel, has retired to the sidelines with his own prestige rather damaged by the wholly negative reactions of the country to his onslaughts on Mr. King.

*

LITTLE BY LITTLE CATHOLIC PRESSURE IS undermining secular education in New York State. The first step was passage of a bill providing state funds for buses to parochial schools. The second is the McLaughlin bill just passed by the legislature to permit children to be excused from regular classes for religious observance and instruction. The objection, as stated by Norman Thomas in a public protest, is not to religious instruction but to the use of school time for non-school purposes, the accentuation of religious differences, and the encroachment on basic American principles. There can be no secure freedom of religion without separation of church and state. Separation of church and state requires secular education. Those who do not like secular education are free to establish schools of their own. But the Catholic church in New York is not content with its parochial schools. It wants to invade the public schools too.

Bullitt, Kennedy, and Goebbels

THE first question prompted by the publication of the German "White Book" is whether the documents which it contains are genuine; the second and more important one is what ends its sponsors hope it will serve. Clearly the action of the German Foreign Office was not motivated by a disinterested desire to contribute to diplomatic history. True or false, the purpose of the publication was propaganda, and it was intended to produce definite effects in this country and perhaps in others as well.

Before discussing this aspect of the case, however, it may be useful to examine the evidence for and against the authenticity of the documents which are said to have been found in the abandoned archives of the Polish Foreign Office. Those which concern us chiefly are reports supposed to have been written by the Polish ambassadors in Washington, Rome, and Paris containing accounts of interviews with William C. Bullitt and Joseph P. Kennedy. There is also a very curious review of American opinion stated to have been sent by Ambassador Potocki in Washington to the Polish Foreign Minister on January 12, 1939. This reads like a stock report of a Nazi agent and, if genuine, reveals its author not only as a crude anti-Semite but as a purveyor to his own government of such misinformation as the statement that "almost 100 per cent of radio, films, press, and periodicals" in this country is owned by Jews. This particular document looks as if it had at least been very freely edited. On the other hand, the alleged conversations with Bill Bullitt certainly reflect the known sentiments of our ebullient Ambassador to France, and since he notoriously is the soul of indiscretion, it is not unthinkable that he would have used some of the expressions quoted. It is a little hard to believe, however, that he would give Mr. Kennedy orders to put the heat on Premier Chamberlain about giving assistance to Poland or that the latter would have meekly complied with such commands. Further, these documents picture Mr. Kennedy, who hitherto has been considered a proponent of appeasement, in early 1939 aiding and abetting Mr. Bullitt in pushing Britain into taking a strong line against Germany.

Against anomalies such as these, which raise doubts about the "White Book," must be set the fact that wholesale forgery of documents is a delicate and dangerous business which even a propagandist as ingenious and resourceful as Goebbels might hesitate to undertake. And, it must be admitted, the denials of their truth which have come from all concerned are conventional rather than convincing. Until further information is available the only safe verdict appears to be that the authenticity or otherwise of the documents is "not proven."

In releasing this material at just this moment the Nazi government is probably attempting to fortify its propaganda front in several different directions. The disparaging remarks about Russia and Italy attributed to Bullitt, together with the suggestion that he was encouraging conflict between Russia and Germany, are perhaps intended to strengthen bonds with Rome and Moscow. Again, the revelations that Bullitt and Kennedy had been urging the Chamberlain government to make no further concessions to Germany are perhaps intended to increase reported British irritation at the lukewarmness of American "moral support," and hence to feed "anti-war" sentiment.

The major propaganda objective, however, is undoubtedly the bolstering of American isolationist feeling. Possibly publication was held back in the hope that Mr. Roosevelt could be persuaded to act as godparent to a German "peace" plan. But the conclusion of Mr. Welles's mission has dispelled any such hopes. Meanwhile the primary campaigns are warming up, and assorted movements to "keep America out of war" are increasingly vociferous. To the experts in the German Ministry of Propaganda the time must have seemed ripe for delivering fresh ammunition to those elements, right and left, in this country, engaged in ceaseless efforts to smear the President as a "war-monger." But while Hamilton Fish has eagerly seized on the Nazi hand-out and suggested that it may form a basis for impeachment of the President, more responsible isolationists in Congress have adopted an attitude of reserve. They know that support from Berlin is likely to embarrass rather than forward their endeavors to keep America out of war, for there is nothing the American people are more likely to resent than Nazi attempts to interfere with domestic politics.

Behind the Russell Case

> The habit of considering a man's religious, moral, and political opinions before appointing him to a post or giving him a job is the modern form of persecution, and it is likely to become quite as efficient as the Inquisition ever was.—Bertrand Russell: "Free Thought and Official Propaganda" (1922).

WHAT Bertrand Russell said in 1922 has proved prophetic in his own case. The decision of Justice McGeehan of the New York Supreme Court forbidding him to teach at City College is a reflection of the same bigotry and in part of the same religious forces that created the Inquisition. Russell's views on marriage are held to make him unfit to give instruction in the logic of mathematics. Justice McGeehan's decision, on the Tammany Hall level of profundity and culture, expresses "disgust" with carefully culled selections from Russell's writings; history affords many examples of the paradox that it is often the most moral of men who are accused of immorality. Leading the pack against Russell are such institutions as the Hearst press, which is so delicate in exploiting the sex irregularities and nudity Russell is supposed to advocate.

The Russell case would be fit material for the gusto of a Rabelais or the contempt of a Swift, and one might greet it with laughter if it were not an attempt to poison free education in New York State. Behind the rallying of the prurient, the self-righteous, the ecclesiastical demagogues, and the high moralists of Tammany Hall are more dangerous and more farsighted forces. Only recently Hague's protege and Coughlin's North Jersey mouthpiece, John A. Matthews, warned the annual communion breakfast of the Wall Street branch of the Anchor Club of America against "the camouflage cloak of academic freedom" in the Russell case. And last August the New York State Chamber of Commerce in a notorious report called for more religion and less education in the schools. "A review of history," the Chamber of Commerce declared, in its best Nürnberg accents, "indicates that as culture rises, morals and physical well-being go down and that often the destruction or disintegration of the state has followed." The Chamber of Commerce questioned the wisdom of free general instruction beyond the literacy point. The church wants religion taught in the schools. The Russell case is a blessing to both. It links their campaign with sanctity and sex, and the New York State Legislature as a result of the uproar has already authorized an investigation into the doctrines taught in New York's schools. There is good reason for calling Friday night's Carnegie Hall mass-meeting on the Russell case a "Citizens' Rally in Answer to the Attack on Public Education."

The nation's largest city is now the scene of a struggle which differs only in its proportions from the Tennessee monkey trial. An undistinguished jurist has catapulted himself into the limelight with a decision that illustrates the power of the legal mind to distort and misrepresent. A specious argument is presented for the right of the courts to interfere with the Board of Higher Education. It is admitted that Russell was to teach mathematics, not ethics or sex. Nevertheless, McGeehan finds that the English "alien's" very presence, his very ability and charm, would make him a dangerous moral influence. The judge disavows any intention to interfere with the board "in so far as a pure question of 'valid' academic freedom is concerned"—whatever that means—but will not tolerate use of academic freedom "to promote the popularization in the minds of adolescents of acts forbidden by the penal law." City College, in effect, would be establishing "a chair of indecency" if it invited one of the world's outstanding mathematicians to teach within its walls. So says Justice McGeehan and so says Mrs. Grundy. It is up to the higher courts to reverse Justice McGeehan and to enlightened elements to rebuke Mrs. Grundy. The Russell case is the first battle in a well-planned attack on public education.

British Morale

THE long-prophesied spring offensive on the western front shows no sign of materializing; Göring's threat of massed bombers over Britain has yet to be translated into action. In London and Paris there is much talk of a more active war policy, but Allied efforts are likely to be confined to the spheres of economics and diplomacy, for a feasible battleground is not in sight. Thus it is very possible that fine weather will bring fewer changes in the pattern of warfare than had been expected, and that blockade and propaganda will continue to play a more important part than military tactics.

The Nazis lately have been telling the world that they are prepared for an indefinite siege, that the blockade is ineffective, and that the longer the war goes on the better they will be able to organize their supply bases in Russia and the Balkans. These claims seem to have impressed a good many of the "experts" in this country, but to our mind they suggest more than a taste of sour grapes. For they involve acquiescence in, and adjustment to, a strategy imposed by the Allies instead of the development of one conditioned by German military superiority. The Allies' margin of power at sea is as undeniable as their greater command over economic resources, however generously Russian aid to Germany is estimated.

Burlingame, Cal.

It may be argued, however, that in siege warfare the question of morale is paramount, and the recent manifestations of hostility to the war in Britain can be cited as evidence both of growing defeatism in the Allied camp and of the effective use by the Nazis of their most potent weapon—propaganda. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that any corresponding feelings which may exist in Germany have no open means of expression. Opposition to the war or the regime cannot be voiced in meetings or the press. But it can be made manifest by apathy, and that, according to qualified observers, is widespread. Anne O'Hare McCormick recently reported in the New York Times a lack of enthusiasm among the workers of the Ruhr resulting in absenteeism on a scale which nullified all efforts to prevent it by the provision of severe penalties.

In Britain, by contrast, the war has brought practically no restrictions on the liberty of speech or press. The safety valves for popular discontent are wide open, and the noise of the escaping steam may receive more attention than it strictly deserves. In our own press recently a good deal of prominence has been given to anti-war resolutions passed by the Independent Labor Party and other working-class bodies. The I. L. P. played an important part in organizing opposition to the last war, but since that time it has splintered so often that it is but a shadow of its former self, with a membership of only about 7,000. Moreover, the resolution of which its annual conference approved, while demanding the end of the war, also called for cooperation among neutrals in peace negotiations with Germany whenever the latter was prepared to restore the independence of Poland, Austria, and Czechoslovakia. These apparently contradictory desires hardly suggest a keen sense of international realities.

At first sight, the support given at a Cooperative Party conference to an anti-war resolution by delegates representing 1,323,000 members appears more impressive, even though it was defeated by two to one. But this party is one of those mass organizations in which only a tiny fraction of the nominal membership takes an active part, and it is often possible for its locals to be captured by a handful of energetic politicians. By way of contrast, the fate of a similar resolution at a delegate conference of the South Wales Miners' Federation may be mentioned. For this union has a militant and very active membership, and in addition its able and greatly respected president is a Communist. Nevertheless, it rejected the "party line" on the war issue by three to one. Further evidence of the fact that the noise made by anti-war propaganda in Britain is out of proportion to its actual popular strength is provided by the insignificant polls of pacifists at most recent by-elections.

This does not mean that the British workers are content with the Chamberlain government. On the contrary, they have many and legitimate grievances which are constantly aired in Parliament by the Labor opposition. But it would be as unsafe for Berlin to assume that this grumbling portends a collapse in British morale as it would be for Moscow to suppose that the British revolution is just around the corner.

Japan's Puppet

WANG CHING-WEI was formally installed as head of Japan's new puppet government at Nanking on March 30, after months of delay. The ceremony was an elaborate one, for the Japanese yield to no one in the art of puppetry. But it is difficult to see just what purpose the Japanese had in mind in staging the elaborate event. Some months ago they doubtless hoped that the establishment of a central government under as prominent a Chinese as Wang would attract a degree of Chinese support, at least in the occupied areas. This hope was dissipated with the defection of Wang's closest supporters and the premature revelation of the terms of his agreement with Japan. As it was, the inauguration of the new regime was greeted by a slow-down strike at Shanghai and general derision throughout the whole of China.

Since the Japanese can hardly have expected any other Chinese reaction, it is necessary to look elsewhere for an explanation of the establishment of what would seem to be a superfluous piece of governmental apparatus. One explanation frequently heard is that the Japanese are playing for foreign support. There is no indication, however, that any country save Italy, and possibly Germany, will extend recognition to the Wang "government." Certainly no one in Tokyo could have thought for a moment that the United States would be bamboozled by the hocus-pocus at Nanking. And there seems little chance that Great Britain, France, the Soviet Union, or any other important country will in any way alter its policies in the Far East because a streamlined 1940 puppet has been set up to replace the somewhat shopworn regional puppets.

The new regime would seem to be Japan's answer to the abrogation of the American trade treaty. Nothing that Japan could have done would have more clearly reflected its contemptuous disregard of the United States. This country abrogated the trade treaty because Japan repeatedly infringed the treaty rights of Americans in China. Although we have perhaps been less explicit about it than we should have been, the basis of America's policy has been the maintenance of China's territorial and administrative integrity as guaranteed by the Nine-Power Pact. The Japanese invasion was in direct opposition to our policy, but it was always possible for the Japanese to maintain that any interference with American rights resulting from the invasion was a temporary mishap due to the exigencies of warfare. Japan never formally repudiated the Nine-Power Pact, taking the position that its occupation was merely a transitory stage in the establishment of the New Order in Asia. The setting up of the Wang Ching-wei regime represents a direct rebuff to America's policy and an effort to give legal sanction to the Japanese military occupation of China's coastal regions. Japan will not, of course, repudiate the Nine-Power Pact or close the Open Door. The dirty work will be done at Nanking, and Tokyo will merely give its assent to independent "Chinese" action.

During the ten weeks that have passed since the expiration of the trade treaty Congress has cautiously waited to see what Japan would do next. Japan has now given its answer. It is going ahead with its program of reducing China to a colonial status, freezing out Western interests regardless of our protests. This puts the issue squarely up to Congress.

Notes on Puerto Rico, IV

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

I HAVEN'T any idea whether or not Puerto Rico wants independence. No representative body has ever voted on the issue; no referendum has been held. About a year ago an economic congress in San Juan, made up largely of conservative business men and delegates from professional organizations, unanimously adopted a resolution favoring self-determination. I think the meeting was rather steam-rollered into unanimity by its more progressive leaders, but the vote probably reflected majority opinion at least. And it showed that while representative Puerto Ricans may not know what they want, they at least know that they don't want what they have. Puerto Rico is neither colony nor incorporated territory, neither state nor free government; it is a part of the United States but a dependent, inferior part. This it resents.

I am convinced that the present difficult, touchy relationship between Puerto Rico and the United States will never be ended until the island is given an opportunity to formulate and express its opinion on its own future status.

One thing is sure. Only the Nationalists—a handful of followers of Pedro Albizu Campos, now in Atlanta Penitentiary serving a ten-year sentence for sedition—want unconditional independence. Most of the supporters of Puerto Rican freedom with whom I talked believe that the island's present free-trade relations with the United States should be continued by treaty. They know it could not survive an abrupt ending of its present trade advantages, and they argue that the relationship must be profitable to the United States or it would not exist. At the same time freedom would make possible trade treaties with other nations. Advocates of statehood want Puerto Rico to come into the Union on terms which will continue its present exclusive control over its own revenues, but will not limit its rights as a state. This, they admit, would involve amendment of the Constitution. Conservatives generally believe that the present status, however ambiguous, best meets the needs of a dependent economic entity, and they emphasize the privileges and financial benefits that would be wiped out by either statehood or separation. A few people suggest the possibility of working out some sort of dominion status to give the island the economic protection it needs along with more complete self-government. But the whole question bristles with complexities that can only be resolved by the most earnest, disinterested efforts of intelligent Puerto Ricans and Americans. The animosities aroused by the terrorist tactics of the Nationalists and the repressive measures of the authorities, ending in the tragic blunder at Ponce, prevented any helpful collaboration during Governor Winship's regime. Now, under happier auspices, a solution might be possible.

Puerto Ricans like Governor Leahy. I talked to all sorts—to Luis Muñoz Marín, leader of the new Partido Popular Democrático; to Don Manuel Dominech, a respected and honest conservative and the Governor's financial adviser; to radical students in the university; to Americans in government jobs. Without a single exception, they spoke well of the new governor. The only criticism I heard was from one or two persons who feared that, in an honest desire to respect the island's democratic processes, Governor Leahy might allow the politicians to get away with practices that ought to be stopped. Radicals said, "He actually seems to believe in the Bill of Rights." When Admiral Leahy's appointment was announced, The Nation objected to the selection of a naval man for the post. A professor at the University of Puerto Rico told me that liberals on the island had taken the same attitude. "We'd had enough military rule on the island," he said. But Governor Leahy has conducted a strictly civilian administration. "He seems to look upon his office as a job and not as a title," said this observer. "He works at it. He has set about mastering the island's situation—economic, political, even cultural. Everyone is surprised and pleased. If he keeps on as he has begun he may do great things for Puerto Rico."

I talked to the Governor and Mrs. Leahy on the porch of their small temporary quarters beside the magnificent Fortaleza, now under repair. He struck me as a straightforward, pleasant, but business-like and hard-headed person. He talked realistically about the economic ills of Puerto Rico and sympathetically about the efforts being made to cure them. I think he is conservative, but he is open-minded as well. I don't believe the local politicians will fool him; I doubt if reactionary business interests will control him. Above all, he is not afraid. I shall be astonished and disappointed if he ever acts out of panic, no matter what the provocation. He would be firm, perhaps hard, in case of disorder or terrorist acts. But he would not go in for hysterics. This in itself promises a welcome change. Governor Winship was a frightened man from the tragic day when Colonel E. Francis Riggs, Insular Chief of Police, was assassinated by two Nationalist fanatics. I asked the Governor how he proposed to handle Nationalist agitation. "We let them meet and talk, and we keep an eye on them," he said. He himself is carefully protected. When he went out of his garden and drove up to the gate of the Fortaleza to show us the reconstruction now under way he said that it was the first time he had escaped without his bodyguard. "He'll find out where I am and trail me. You'll see," he remarked. We climbed all over the ancient palace, and when we came out the Governor saw us to our car. As he closed the door he pointed to a man in plain clothes standing across the street. "There he is," he said.

No one, least of all himself, expects the Governor to redeem and revolutionize an island suffering from the assorted ills that afflict Puerto Rico. But he can do more than would appear on the surface. In the first place he can see to it that Puerto Rico continues to get a fair share of federal funds for relief and reconstruction. He can use his appointive power to put and keep in office department heads who are honest and above factional struggles and back them when they come into collision with intrenched political interests. He can use the whole weight of his office to protect the civil rights of the people. In this connection it is to be hoped that he will soon get rid of the present Chief of Police, who was appointed after the death of Colonel Riggs and has become a symbol of corruption and brutality throughout the island.

The Governor can also use his great influence to bring about some progress toward a solution of Puerto Rico's basic political problem—its relationship to the United States. It may as well be admitted that complete independence for Puerto Rico is not a practical possibility at a time when the island is being rapidly developed as a major military outpost. Time and again I said this to Puerto Rican supporters of independence and was met by the logical but wholly unrealistic answer that Cuba was a separate nation despite the naval base at Guantanamo.

Independence would not be granted now even if it were demanded; and in my opinion it is not generally desired. But neither can relations be safely left as they are. Even the interests of national defense will be served if the poison is drawn out of the relations between Puerto Rico and the power that rules it. Governor Leahy would perform a lasting service if he would call a conference to consider and report on a new status for Puerto Rico. It should be composed of both Americans and Puerto Ricans chosen with no regard for their political connections but entirely on the basis of disinterested knowledge and understanding. There should be experts in constitutional government, economics, and international law, as well as representatives of business and labor and persons interested primarily in Latin American cultural relations. I would gladly supply a list of American delegates! Charles Beard, Edward Mead Earle, Archibald MacLeish, and Arthur Garfield Hays are samples of the sort I would appoint. The findings of such a body would have only the weight of honesty and expert knowledge to back them, but I am certain they would be welcomed in Puerto Rico as a basis for discussion and in Congress as a basis for future legislative action. No disingenuous Tydings bill would emerge from such a conference.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 433
EDITORIALS:
- BULLITT, KENNEDY, AND GOEBBELS 435
- BEHIND THE RUSSELL CASE 436
- BRITISH MORALE 436
- JAPAN'S PUPPET 437
- NOTES ON PUERTO RICO, IV by Freda Kirchwey 438

CONGRESS EDITS THE BUDGET by Kenneth G. Crawford 440
TALE OF TWO WARS by Robert Dell 441
THE KLAN RIDES AGAIN by Richard H. Rovere 445
HOW ABOUT TELEVISION? by Edgar M. Jones 447
IN THE WIND 449
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 450
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 451
- INSIDE GERMANY by Franz Hoellering 452
- THE UNCONSTRAINING VOICE by John Peale Bishop 452
- THE WEARING OF THE GREEN IN THE GREEN ROOM by Robert Vambery 454
- SCIENCE IN SOCIETY by Benjamin Harrow 454
- CHINA OLD AND NEW by Maxwell S. Stewart 456
- DEATH CHAMBER by George Joel 456
- DRAMA: AFTER TWENTY YEARS by Joseph Wood Krutch 457
- MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 458

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Congress Edits the Budget

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, April 1

NO ONE in Washington was surprised—least of all, it can be assumed, the President himself—when the Congressional farm bloc fed his 1940-41 budget to the hogs. And no one except the economy fanatics of the House Appropriations Committee seemed to care very much. Indeed, an almost audible sigh of relief escaped the rank-and-file membership of both branches when the Senate added $300,000,000 to the Department of Agriculture's appropriation bill, thus wiping out at one stroke all the economies so laboriously effected in the seven supply bills previously passed. The President's ingenious budget message was at last a dead letter. Republicans and Democrats were equally responsible for its long overdue demise, and everyone was relieved. The lid was off and Congressmen could be themselves, behaving again as they have always behaved in election years.

The House immediately took advantage of its new freedom to add $17,450,000 to the National Youth Administration's appropriation and $50,000,000 to that of the Civilian Conservation Corps. These popular agencies no longer had to be starved once the farm lobby had shown how unimportant economy could be when an effective pressure group got to work. Yet economy was still important enough to serve as an excuse for cutting down the appropriations of the National Labor Relations Board and the Wage-Hour Division of the Department of Labor. A total of about $1,250,000 was taken away from these two agencies—not a large saving but enough to weaken at vital points the enforcement structure protecting labor's minimum standards and its collective-bargaining privilege. This would please industrial campaign contributors almost as much as the farm hand-out would please rural voters. Since labor divided was not considered dangerous, it could be safely ignored by Congress in the process of budget revision.

The President's January budget, it will be remembered, called for expenditures of $8,464,000,000 in fiscal 1941, a substantially smaller total than the current year's. Mr. Roosevelt proposed to hold the next deficit down to $1,716,000,000 by discontinuing farm parity payments and thus saving some $200,000,000, by firing 600,000 WPA employees to save another $500,000,000, by snatching back $700,000,000 of unexpended balances from New Deal agencies, and by stiffening the revenue laws to increase income $460,000,000 a year. If all these things were done, the government could finance the President's big armament program without breaking through the $45,000,000,000 statutory debt limit.

From the point of view of the New Deal itself, this budget was a monstrosity. The President admitted in his message that his estimates for unemployment and farm relief might prove inadequate. New Deal economists were sure they would. The whole thing seemed to be a political stratagem not to be taken seriously as an economic document. What the President was trying to do, apparently, was force Congress to accept responsibility for raising the debt limit and for another inevitably large deficit at a time when polls of public opinion were showing overwhelming public sentiment for frugality in government. Knowing Congress as he does the President could have had no illusions about the possibility of getting a tax bill passed on the eve of a national election. And knowing in a general way about what the Allies would buy in this country in the first few months of the war, he could scarcely have expected a business boom of proportions sufficient to justify a one-third cut in relief appropriations. Events have shown both that Congress will not swallow new taxes and that war exports, large as they are, cannot sustain a rapid recovery movement without the supplementary stimulus of government spending.

For almost three months the House played with the President at his own game. Appropriations for the regular departments were systematically cut even below his close estimates. Anti-New Dealers in both parties, under the foxy leadership of Representative Clifton Woodrum of Virginia, held a majority by assuring members that "he can't do that to us." It was the Senate that finally capitulated. It voted sixty-three to nineteen to add $212,000,000 for farm parity payments and seventy-nine to nothing to throw in $85,000,000 for surplus-crop removal. Even the Glasses and Tafts went along on the latter item. Put to the farm test, the toughest of the economizers caved in. The President's tactics had been successful.

The all-important question now is what the breaking of the ice will mean to the unemployed. WPA officials estimate that a minimum of $1,500,000,000 is needed. There is a possibility of compromise in the suggestion that the figure be held at $1,000,000,000, with the so-called Woodrum amendment, the section of the present law forbidding deficiency relief appropriations, removed. Such an arrangement would permit the WPA to spend the entire fund, if necessary, in the first seven months of the new fiscal year and then ask the incoming Congress for a supplemental appropriation. But as yet there is no assurance that Congress will do for the unemployed what it has done for the farmers. Reports of a log-rolling deal between urban and rural representatives should not be taken too seriously. City members have thought they were trading farm-relief votes for WPA support before, only to find that the country brothers, once they had theirs, forgot all about the bargain. Most city liberals vote for farm relief on principle, whereas many rural representatives find it politically profitable to be pump-primers on the farm and economizers in town.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Moreover, the Woodrum crowd still has a terrible weapon in the threat of legislation raising the debt limit or imposing new taxes at this session. Actually there will be no need for such legislation unless Congress goes hog wild on spending. Income-tax collections for March were more than $600,000,000 better than last year, exceeding estimates. The stabilization fund and various other nest eggs are still available if worst comes to worst, although Secretary Morgenthau insists that there will be no tricks. Since European orders for airplanes and ordnance are keeping American producers in practice, the President's army appropriations can be cut substantially without jeopardizing defense. There will be no excuse for an inadequate relief appropriation unless Congress accepts Dorothy Thompson's unemployment figures instead of the experts'.

Whatever budget Congress finally evolves, it cannot be worse than the President's and in most respects it will probably be better. Nobody will ever know for sure whether the President got more by forcing Congress to take the initiative than he might have by submitting higher estimates in the first place and then defending them openly.

Tale of Two Wars

BY ROBERT DELL

DOROTHY THOMPSON recently remarked in an admirable article on the propaganda obsession with which America is at present afflicted that it made people incapable of distinguishing between what is true and what is false, and that its victims would probably end in being taken in, as over-suspicious people usually do. A great deal of what is being written to prove that the present war is merely a continuation of the first World War seems to me to support Miss Thompson.

I agree that the present war is no more "ideological" than the last one, but I would remind those who are addicted to hunting for parallels that it was Woodrow Wilson who started the slogan about a war "to make the world safe for democracy." Naturally the English and French adopted a slogan so likely to appeal to American sentiment, but I cannot remember that anybody in Europe talked about a war for democracy before Mr. Wilson did. The English said in 1914 that they went to war to save "gallant little Belgium"—which, so far as the mass of the English people was concerned, was true—and the French said that they went to war because Germany declared war on them, which was true. I cannot, however, agree that "this new war began as the last one did—in a clash between German and Anglo-French imperialism." No two wars could be more different in their origins and antecedents.

So far as its immediate origin was concerned, the first World War was primarily a war between Austria and Russia and secondarily a war between England and Germany, into which France was dragged by the Franco-Russian alliance and the Entente Cordiale. The Austrian government had long been seeking an occasion to pick a quarrel with Russia. In 1912 I was in close touch with the Polish Nationalists in Paris, and they told me all about their arrangements with the Austrian government with respect to the future war. The Austrian government promised the Poles that, in the event of an Austrian victory over Russia, it would restore Polish independence and set up a Polish national state composed of Austrian and Russian Poland. In return Pilsudski undertook to raise a Polish legion which would fight with the Austrian army, as in fact it did when war broke out in 1914.

Until 1904 England and France were on very bad terms. More than once they had been on the verge of war, notably over the Fashoda affair, which would have led to war had not the French government climbed down. In 1889 Bismarck offered an alliance to Salisbury, who was then British Prime Minister, and the offer was refused. A few years later, after Bismarck's dismissal by the Emperor William II, Salisbury and Joseph Chamberlain, father of the present British Prime Minister, whose pro-German sympathies are inherited, offered an alliance to Germany. The German Emperor refused the offer on the advice of Holstein, then permanent head of the German Foreign Office, who said that England would never be able to come to terms with France or Russia and therefore an alliance was unnecessary. A subsidiary reason for the refusal was that the Emperor was anti-English and pro-French and would have much preferred an alliance with France. He actually offered one to the Waldeck-Rousseau Cabinet soon after the beginning of the Transvaal war. The offer was favorably received, especially by Théophile Delcassé, the French Foreign Minister, who afterward became an ardent partisan of the Entente Cordiale, but who was at that time smarting under the humiliation that he had been obliged to accept in the Fashoda affair. The negotiations fell through because the German government insisted that France should renounce Alsace-Lorraine forever, and that was something no French government could do.

In 1901 Lord Lansdowne made overtures to Eckardstein for a "defensive arrangement," because he understood that Holstein disliked the word "alliance." Holstein made a counter-proposal that England should join the Triple Alliance together with Japan, in return for which Germany would guarantee the British Empire. Naturally, this was a proposal that no British government could accept. It would have involved England in almost every possible war and put the whole European continent under German domination.

Finally, Lansdowne and the British Cabinet in which he was Foreign Secretary decided to come to terms with France. The result was the Entente Cordiale, sealed in April, 1904, by the Anglo-French treaty concerning Egypt, Morocco, and other questions in dispute between the two countries. The treaty professed to guarantee the independence of Egypt and Morocco but contained secret clauses by which England was given a free hand in Egypt and France in Morocco whenever they agreed to avail themselves of it. The Entente Cordiale was welcomed by the parties of the left in France, in particular by Jaurès and the Socialists, who of course knew nothing about the secret clauses of the treaty, because they hoped that it would detach France from Russia. In fact it was converted by Edward Grey, who became British Foreign Secretary in 1905, into the Triple Entente, which bound France to Russia more closely than ever.

The secret clauses in the Treaty of April, 1904, became known to the German government. They had been communicated to Russia as the ally of France, and the German Emperor was probably informed about them by the Czar. Hence the Franco-German incidents over Morocco which thrice brought France and Germany to the verge of war.

From 1904 to 1914 French foreign policy was dominated by England almost as much as it has been during the last seven years. The exceptions to this rule were short periods during which first Rouvier, later Joseph Caillaux, was Prime Minister of France. In 1905, when the first Franco-German crisis over Morocco occurred, Lansdowne offered an alliance to Delcassé, who was still French Foreign Minister. Rouvier, supported by the whole Cabinet with the exception of Delcassé, refused the offer on the ground that it would drag France into war with Germany, and Delcassé was forced to resign. In 1911 Caillaux settled the still more serious Agadir crisis by a treaty with Germany which gave France complete control of Morocco in return for a small piece of the French Congo. He was driven from office by Poincaré and Clemenceau and incurred the hatred of the British Foreign Office because the result of the Franco-German treaty was that the secret clauses of the Anglo-French treaty of April, 1904, fell to the ground. The text of the clauses was published by Caillaux, before he left office, with the consent of the British government.

Through all these years the overwhelming majority of the French people were intensely pacific and strongly opposed to a war with Germany even for the sake of recovering Alsace-Lorraine. The party of revenge, led by Poincaré and Clemenceau, was a small minority, but it was an influential one and was consistently backed by British diplomacy. After Poincaré became French Prime Minister in 1912—a year before he was elected President of the Republic—he was less subservient to England than most of his predecessors had been. At the time of the late Lord Haldane's visit to Berlin, the German government asked the British government to undertake to remain neutral in any war in which Germany might be engaged. Such an undertaking was naturally impossible. The German government modified it and asked merely that England should remain neutral if Germany were attacked by another country. Poincaré informed Grey that if such an undertaking were given he would break the Entente Cordiale, and the German proposal was rejected.

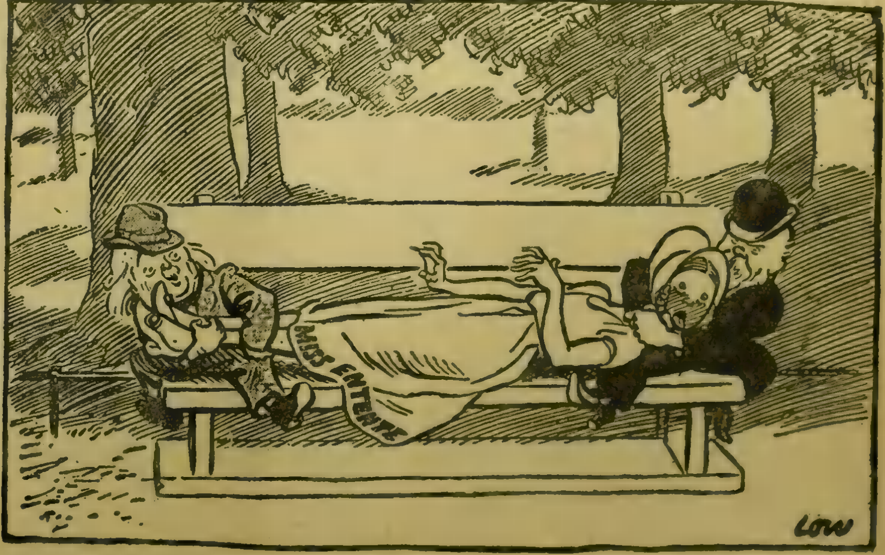
It is necessary to distinguish between the attitude of the government and of the mass of the English people. Grey and his advisers in the Foreign Office wanted a preventive war with Germany, and there can be no doubt that German policy, especially naval policy, was a menace to the British Empire. It also forced England to spend enormous sums on the navy. It was a foolish policy on the part of the German government, for Germany, a much poorer country than England, could not possibly maintain a navy equal to the British navy in addition to the largest army in the world.

Public opinion in England in 1914 was as much opposed to war as in France. On July 30, 1914, a member of the British Cabinet said to a friend of mine that if the government went to war with Germany, it would be turned out by the House of Commons. Lloyd George was the leader of the opposition to war. At a Cabinet council held on August 2, 1914, his view prevailed, and the Cabinet decided to remain neutral, whereupon Grey tendered his resignation as Foreign Secretary. After the German invasion of Belgium the decision was reversed, and Lloyd George supported the war. John Burns and two or three other members of the government resigned.

Nothing but the violation of Belgian neutrality would ever have rallied the English people to the war. Grey knew it, and it was for that reason that when he was asked by the German ambassador to London whether England would remain neutral if Germany did not go through Belgium, he refused to reply, that is, in effect, replied in the negative. Grey wished the Germans to go through Belgium in the event of war. The war aims of the British government were to destroy the German fleet and to prevent French and Belgian ports from falling into the hands of Germany. The war aim of the English people, as has been said, was to go to the aid of Belgium.

In July, 1914, French opinion was overwhelmingly opposed to war for the sake of Russia. On Sunday, July 19, 1914, there was a huge demonstration against war on the Grands Boulevards in Paris, and the members of the Action Française who organized a counter-demonstration were driven off the boulevards. Poincaré had undoubtedly a great responsibility for the war. During his visit to Russia in July, 1914, he encouraged the Russian government in a bellicose attitude, and it was with the consent of the French government that the Russian government ordered a general mobilization before any other country and thus provoked the German government to declare war on Russia. Poincaré then wished to declare war on Germany, but he was overruled by the Prime Minister, René Viviani, and the Cabinet.

The French general mobilization was ordered on August 1, 1914, but on August 3 Viviani gave an undertaking to the Socialist Party that France would not declare war on Germany in any circumstances. Naturally he knew it to be probable that Germany would declare war on France, but in my opinion he would have kept his word if the German government had not made that blunder. It was as great a blunder from the political point of view as the violation of Belgian neutrality. One reason why I think that Viviani would have kept his word is that, if France had declared war on Germany, there would have been such strong opposition to the war that the government might have been defeated in the Chamber of Deputies. In any case France would have entered the war as a divided country. The German declaration of war on France naturally rallied the overwhelming majority of the French people to the war.



(Published October 28, 1922)

With the militant Poincaré at one end and the demobilized Lloyd George at the other, the Entente became at times somewhat strained

The German Emperor did not want war with France. He first offered to withdraw his troops from the French frontier and abstain from attacking France if the French government would remain neutral, but only on condition that Germany should be allowed to occupy a piece of French territory for the duration of the war. Naturally the French government could not agree to such a condition, but when it was refused, the German Emperor telegraphed to the King of England (George V) undertaking to withdraw his troops from the French frontier and refrain from attacking France if France would remain neutral and England would guarantee its neutrality. Grey told the House of Commons, after England had declared war on Germany, that he had not transmitted this offer to the French government because he thought that the Franco-Russian alliance made it impossible for France to remain neutral!

Can anybody seriously maintain that there is any resemblance between this story and that of the events that led up to the present war? In 1914 Europe had for several years been divided into two hostile camps—on one side the Triple Alliance and on the other side the Triple Entente. In the seven years preceding the present war the British government refused to join in any collective-security agreement on the ground that Europe must not be divided into hostile camps, with the result that, as Winston Churchill said on a famous occasion, there was a bloc on one side—that of the totalitarian states—and a rabble on the other.

There was certainly no conflict between German and Anglo-French imperialism from the end of the last war to March, 1939. There was, in fact, no Anglo-French imperialism. The French are nationalist but, with the exception of a small minority, not imperialist. The few imperialists in France are always complaining that the French people take no interest in their empire and that their interest stops at the frontiers of France. Barrès and Déroulède were nationalists, not imperialists, and their one and only aim was the recovery of Alsace-Lorraine. Their ideas bore no resemblance to those of Treitschke, Bernhardi, or Kipling. Besides, England and France were at loggerheads for years after the last war.

Soon after its end British diplomacy awoke to the fact that the peace treaties had destroyed the balance of power and given France a sort of hegemony on the continent of Europe. They set themselves to redress the balance by resuscitating Germany and appealed to the sentiment of the English people by exciting their sympathy for the poor dear Germans, who had had a raw deal. The English people ended by pretending that the French were solely responsible for the peace terms, and popular feeling in England became bitterly anti-French. In Germany popular feeling became extremely pro-English. When I went to live in Germany in November, 1922, Lloyd George was a national hero, and some Germans were seriously proposing that Germany should become a British dominion.

British diplomacy was no doubt aided by the stupid and vindictive policy of Poincaré in the occupied German territory, a policy which excited great hostility to France in England. That policy, however, was the result, not of imperialism or even nationalism, but of fear. And the fear was the result of the failure of England and the United States to implement the guaranties given to France by the treaties signed on June 28, 1919, by Lloyd George and Arthur Balfour in the one case and by Woodrow Wilson and Robert Lansing in the other, Clemenceau and Pichon signing for France. For a long time after the end of the last war the French had the mentality of a defeated nation.

Since 1930 France has been the vassal of England, except when Barthou was Foreign Minister in 1934. Under British pressure the French agreed to the complete evacuation of the Rhineland and the suppression of reparations, events which in my opinion were the chief causes of Hitler's accession to power. I gave the reasons for my opinion in The Nation of December 23, 1939. Since Hitler became dictator of Germany the British government and the French government under its influence have made concession after concession to him to avoid war, culminating in the shameful capitulation of Munich. The British and French "imperialists" and a great part of the ruling classes and big business in both countries were for peace with Germany at any price.

Hitler said in "Mein Kampf" that the only possible allies for Germany in any near future were England and Italy. The events showed that he was right. Chamberlain's policy was an alliance with Germany which would give Hitler a free hand in Central and Eastern Europe in the hope that he could be induced to come to terms and keep off the British Empire. Meanwhile, British diplomacy separated France from all its allies to avoid being drawn into a conflict with Germany by the French alliances.

The British "imperialists" and the international gang of financiers and big business men who pulled the strings to which they danced allowed British ships to be sunk with impunity and guns to be trained on Gibraltar, capitulated to Japan and to Mussolini as well as to Hitler, connived at the German and Italian invasion of Spain, which was opposed to British interests and the success of which was one of the chief causes of the present war, and reduced the prestige of England all over the world to the lowest level that it had reached since the time of Charles II. The injury that they have done to the British Empire is, in my opinion, irreparable.

The British and French governments knew in advance that Hitler was going into Prague and made no attempt to stop him. After he had done it, Chamberlain declared in the House of Commons that he would not change his policy. He was obliged to change it by the pressure of public opinion and the threat of a revolt in his own party. Even after Germany had invaded Poland, Chamberlain and Daladier did not at once declare war because they wished to agree to the negotiations proposed by Mussolini on September 1. The fact that the French government had given a "positive" reply to the Italian proposal was announced in a communication of the Havas Agency, published in the French press on September 2, 1939 (the text of the communication is Document No. 347 in the recently published French Yellow Book). On September 2 Winston Churchill, Eden, and Duff-Cooper saw Chamberlain and told him that if he accepted negotiations they would raise an open revolt against him in the Conservative Party. Chamberlain then climbed down and the British government declared war on Germany. The French government followed its example some hours later.

In the face of these facts how can it be said that this war is nothing but a clash between rival imperialisms? It is not a war for democracy or for any "ideology," but a war forced by the English and French democracies on their respective governments, which yielded most unwillingly. So far as England and France are concerned it is a people's war, as the war of 1914 emphatically was not; it has the sole aim of putting an end to German aggression and rescuing its victims. So far as Germany and Russia are concerned it is an imperialist war with the vulgar aim of territorial aggrandizement. Those who say that there is nothing to choose between the two sides can do so only by falsifying the facts. Consciously or unconsciously they are playing the game of Hitler and Stalin.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Klan Rides Again

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

AT LEAST three persons have been killed by nightriders in Fulton County, Georgia, in the last month. On March 2 two Atlanta young people, Sarah Rawls and Benton Ford, were found beaten to death in a local lovers' lane where they had been sitting in Ford's parked car. On the night of March 7 Ike Gaston, proprietor of a barber shop in an Atlanta suburb, was visited by hooded vigilantes; the next morning his body was found in a field nearby, cut to shreds by blows with a long, cleated belt. The killing of these three people is striking evidence of the resurgence of the Ku Klux Klan and of its new concentration on moral problems. Gaston offended the Kleagles by drinking too much; Ford and his girl were supposed to be violating the Klan's code of sexual decency.

The crudeness of this form of moral admonition has aroused Atlanta and the whole South to a shocked awareness of the Klan's growing strength and activity. Fulton County has been taken aback not only by the killings themselves but by a seemingly endless succession of disclosures which have cut deep into the political and industrial life of the state. O. John Rogge, the federal prosecutor credited with smashing the Long regime in Louisiana, is now working on the Atlanta situation, and he thinks his investigation may result in as thoroughgoing a clean-up as the job he did in New Orleans and Baton Rouge. Rogge is investigating not only the Atlanta murders and other floggings but the alleged mulcting of the state by the Klan described last summer before the House Economy Committee by former Imperial Wizard Hiram Wesley Evans. Evans told the committee at that time that he and other Klansmen had represented several asphalt and truck-body companies in their dealings with the State Highway Department and had influenced and fixed bidding. Also suspect in such matters is Representative B. Frank Whelchel, who was indicted on March 22 for selling postal-service appointments.

The Fulton County grand jury has already heard tales of more than fifty floggings. At the March 22 session fourteen nightriders were identified. It has been proved that the belt with which Gaston, the murdered barber, was lashed was made by a Klansman implicated in two other floggings. Three Atlanta policemen have been indicted for extorting confessions from suspected criminals by flogging, and charges of fatal beatings by the police have been pouring into Southern newspaper offices. Three Fulton County deputy sheriffs have admitted membership in the Klan, a head deputy, W. W. Scarborough, being the local Exalted Cyclops. When questioned in Atlanta, Scarborough coolly admitted that he and his fellows took action outside the law "whenever someone wasn't doin' like he ought to." Asked at another point why he had not arrested a particular lawbreaker instead of threatening him with violence, Scarborough said, "How could I? I was enrobed." The three deputies turned in their badges shortly after these revelations; the next day it was discovered that the books of their Klan headquarters had been destroyed. Sheriff Mott Aldredge has said that he knew about numerous other flogging cases but did not consider investigation of them part of his duty.

Atlanta papers, which have been staging a genuine anti-Klan crusade, suggest the likelihood that hundreds of persons have been flogged during the past year. Since the publicity given to the Gaston and Rawls-Ford cases dozens of local people, Negro and white, have been coming to law and newspaper offices, as well as before the grand jury, to exhibit bodily injuries as material evidence of the terror. Among the cases spotlighted by the current investigation are the following:

W. L. Allen, a tenant farmer near Atlanta, was abducted and severely beaten by nightriders some months ago after ignoring Klan warnings to "get rid of an old Negro we had living on our place."

Emma Heard, a Negro woman of seventy-six, was abducted and flogged two months ago. She is now a patient in the Grady Hospital, suffering from blood poisoning resulting from her wounds.

S. W. Jones and T. E. Young, suburban Atlantans, were seized last July 25, taken to a garbage dump, and beaten for "immorality."

T. C. Ellis, of East Point, was assaulted by men who said they were law officers. While a revolver was held to his head, Ellis was flogged and told to stop "talking about his neighbors."

The Reverend Gray Kent, a local parson, was beaten because his congregation at Ben Hill was "making too much noise." Kent has identified county-owned cars as those in which his abductors called for him.

J. L. Matthews, white proprietor of a theater for Negroes, was flogged in Decatur last October. The Klan did not like Mr. Matthews's business and paraded before his movie house several times. The attack on him came after he refused to discharge a Negro employee.

Atlanta, of course, is the Klan's national headquarters and its traditional stronghold. Recently the organization was so bold as to send out sixty-two Kluxers in full regalia to distribute to A. F. of L. delegates convening in the city leaflets ordering them to destroy the C. I. O. and purge the country of "all other Communists."

Although most of the recent nightriding has been in the Atlanta area, reports of outrages have come in from several other parts of the South. Last November two boys were badly beaten in a National Youth Administration camp for Negroes near Anderson, South Carolina. Lanier Pruitt, a white garage mechanic of Anderson, was beaten for failing to give Christmas presents to his wife and children. Fiery crosses have been burned outside two Negro churches in Orlando, Florida, and their pastors ordered to leave town. From another city comes a story of the Klan's persecution of drugstore cowboys who were thought to be spending too much time "skirt-chasing." One lad, his comrades testified, was beaten for this but was promised immunity if he joined the Klan.

All this is part of a revival of Klan spirit that has been going on for five or six years. After having been practically liquidated in 1926 owing at least in part to the New York World's exposé, the Klan started its comeback in 1934, when Imperial Wizard Hiram W. Evans called for a new crusade in behalf of "constitutional rights." Evans appointed M. O. Dunning, a former federal tax collector, his chief of staff and initiated a campaign against the New Deal and trade unions. This appealing program drew thousands into the organization, and its membership reached a fifteen-year peak in 1937, at the height of the C. I. O. drive among Southern textile workers. The only reported case of a Klan killing in those years was that of Joseph Shoemaker, Tampa Socialist and labor leader, who died after having been tarred with two others on November 30, 1935.

On January 17, 1939, Evans surprised the country and his followers by accepting the invitation of Catholic Bishop Gerald O'Hara to take part in ceremonies attending the dedication of an Atlanta church. His acceptance was taken as a sign of a new liberalism on the part of the Klan. But if Wizard Evans had altered his views on Catholics, which is dubious, most Kluxers had not. Evans was gently removed from office—perhaps as much because of his connection with the Georgia asphalt scandals as because of the Catholic incident—and replaced, on June 11, 1939, by James Arnold Colescott, a flushed and porky ex-veterinarian from Terre Haute, Indiana. Colescott announced on taking office that he was dedicating himself to promoting the interests of the "native-born, white, Protestant, Gentile population."

Although Klan figures are unreliable, it is not difficult to believe Colescott's boast that membership has jumped 50 per cent during his Wizardry and that his recent national tour netted thousands of new members. Present Klan membership is estimated at about 300,000, 70 per cent of which is in the South. Recently Klan activity has been reported in Philadelphia, Providence, Schenectady, Jersey City, New York City, and the Pacific Northwest. Jersey City, with a large Catholic population, is a Klan center; rag-wrapped crosses have been burned near Catholic churches there on five separate occasions. In nearby Roselle, the Klan, under its New Jersey leader, the Reverend A. M. Young, a retired Baptist preacher, burned a thirty-foot cross outside the town synagogue.

The Klan's concern with moral and domestic problems has not entirely superseded its political interests. The Voice, organ of liberal Catholics, reports that it has been advised by a high Kleagle that the Klan hopes the Democrats will nominate a Catholic like Farley or Murphy, for then "we'll wash our nightshirts and go to town." Klan leaflets boast of a membership campaign among unionists and report that it is recruiting many workers, "particularly foremen." It claims to have captured a C. I. O. automobile local in Detroit, though this is unsubstantiated and most unlikely. However, trade unionists, even sincere ones, have been known to join the Klan. Its propaganda in the unions, particularly in Detroit, features the FBI drive against "alien saboteurs" in factories filling war orders; in this it is said by C. I. O. men to be cooperating with the remnants of the employers' National Workers' League and the Black Legion. Joseph E. McWilliams, head of the Christian Mobilizers, a splinter of Coughlin's Christian Front, is reported to have been named to the national council of the Klan. McWilliams denies this vehemently but says, "We might copy the Klan, take some of the nightshirts and go out looking for Jews."

While the Klan appears to have made considerable progress of late, the nightriders are not in an enviable position. The Southern press, with few important exceptions, is playing up the Atlanta revelations and calling for the disbanding of hooded orders. Dozens of hoodlums and amateur Nazis are filling Fulton Tower, the jail that once housed Angelo Herndon and other victims of Klan rule. Organizations ranging from the left-wing Workers' Defense League, which has started a national anti-Klan publicity campaign, to the American Legion, which has spoken out with commendable clarity and courage, are urging ceaseless prosecution.

As always, however, there is the danger that local investigations will drop the threads that lead directly to the Klan. If the Atlanta cases end only in the imprisonment of a few scapegoats, the Klan may be chastened for a time locally but nationally will remain every bit as menacing. A good deal now depends on the findings of Mr. Rogge, which will determine the extent of federal jurisdiction in these cases. But in the end quite as much will depend on the extent to which public opinion uses the Atlanta findings to force the Invisible Empire into the open.

How About Television?

BY EDGAR M. JONES

THE Federal Communications Commission has declared its faith in television to the extent of permitting "limited commercialization," probably after September 1. This extraordinary status is defined as authority to charge advertising sponsors for the costs of producing programs but not for the costs of transmission over the air, which will have to be borne by the broadcasting company. Theoretically the radio companies are to continue television as an experiment. However, the FCC holds its breath and hopes that the public will not go too far in buying television receivers. If a comparison might be drawn, the situation is something like legislation for pari-mutuel betting which contains amendments in the form of prayer against gambling.

The Communications commissioners evidently fear that a few companies are about to recoup their television-research costs from an unsuspecting public by exploitation of the half-ready art of visual broadcasting. Some of the radio manufacturers and broadcasters wanted full commercialization, and the "limited" status was devised by a commission committee to bridge the gap between them and the members of the commission who did not believe television was perfected enough for high-pressure selling. In this the committee was successful, and the FCC unanimously voted for the compromise. When the Radio Corporation of America immediately launched an advertising campaign with great fanfare, however, the commission became alarmed and ordered further hearings on April 8 to determine whether or not it should withdraw its recently voted concession.

A change is coming in radio. Two developments are now well on the way. One is television, which we shall hear about all this summer, and the other, known as frequency modulation (F-M), almost eliminates static. Both need plenty of space in the ether to achieve their ultimate public use, and the FCC is not certain where to find room. Although F-M at present applies to aural broadcasting only, and television adds sight to sound, there is definite competition between the two. F-M wants a radio channel now given to television, and both realize that the public and the broadcaster can, under normal conditions, support only one new development at a time.

Television today produces a picture similar to some of the early movies. There is flicker; there is lack of detail; there is haziness, a general lack of brilliance. At close range the line-by-line composition of the image upon the screen is discernible, but it must be admitted that the eye practically disregards the imperfections to concentrate on the motion. It should be conceded, moreover, that television has surmounted unbelievable difficulties since experimenters went to work approximately ten years ago. But during this period few receivers have been in operation—it was a simple matter to change abruptly to some new method requiring a new type of receiver. Allowances should be made for television; wider use of the instrument will help to iron out its kinks. Nevertheless, television engineers realize they are on uncertain ground. General use of television may provide additional funds for research, but it will limit the field of research to methods fixed by public investment.

So far, research in television has been an out-of-pocket expense borne by the various manufacturers. Not the first but certainly the most active is the Radio Corporation of America, reputed to have poured $10,000,000 into television, largely at the insistence of its president, David Sarnoff. Other companies have spent lesser sums trying to perfect the art. Different conclusions on whether television is or is not here are the result. There is no clear understanding between rival television manufacturers, and there is disagreement over seemingly minor details which nevertheless mean much to the public. RCA, having the greater investment, has more reason to hope that television is ready. The only way the manufacturers can recover their reasearch costs is to sell their product. But if they are to sell their devices, there must be public use; and that is where the FCC fits in. If the FCC would only open up the field for the broadcasters, stations would buy transmitters from the manufacturers, and the operation of these would encourage the purchase of receivers.

The economic base for television is yet to be found. Some believe that its niche will be in the theater, where admission can be charged for entertainment akin to movies. Diehard radio men refuse to believe that the American people will sit in darkened living-rooms to accommodate sponsors of television programs. They have observed that the radio listener enjoys a freedom incompatible with any other form of entertainment. The housewife can hear the daily heart-throb drama while she works in the kitchen. The family reads, plays cards, or talks while the loud-speaker blares. Even the motorist drives and looks at the scenery while his set is tuned in. In effect, America listens with one ear; absorbs its advertising while doing something else.

Television, aural-radio men believe, will require a concentration which will be grudgingly given. Even staunch advocates of television admit this tacitly by their opinions on practical program schedules, pointing out that the listener may turn off the image but keep the sound. However, a program technique suited to this dual purpose is still to be found.

The trend is toward the home set. Manufacturers see a bigger market in selling receivers directly to the public than in selling to the limited number of commercial exhibitors which might develop if television went the other way. Programs for television, except public events, are certain to be very expensive. Unless production is slap-happy, the costs promise to compare with those of Broadway shows—all for a one-night shot. Costumes, scenery, lighting, and exhaustive rehearsals, not now in radio production figures, will present a phenomenal budget to prospective advertisers. Today three technicians are considered necessary for the production details of one good radio show. A similar passion for detail in television will call for twenty-two technicians. Broadcasters estimate that if and when they enter television they will have to bill their clients three times their present charges, and it is common belief that broadcasters who cannot cover themselves with a manufacturing operation—similar to the arrangement between RCA and NBC—will lose considerable sums of money during the first few years of television.

There must be perfect synchronization between the transmitter and the home receiver. A station using one group of operating specifications cannot be received on a set equipped for another. The public will want sets capable of receiving all stations within reception limits, and no telecaster will want to operate on a system incapable of reaching the full potential audience. This will impose upon the FCC the task of ordering standards of operation, thus achieving uniformity for the country as a whole. But this the FCC has refused to do. That body has just said that television is not sufficiently advanced for crystallized standards despite the efforts of manufacturers to settle on one system.

Television loomed up as a regulatory problem about a year ago when an FCC committee prepared a report warning the public of the risk in buying receivers. Despite this, RCA attempted to increase the sale of receivers and build up public interest generally by capitalizing on the New York World's Fair. The failure to make substantial gains in this direction was attributed to the attitude of the FCC. The corporation felt that a more optimistic view should prevail at the commission, that some step should be taken by the government to encourage the public to accept television as it is. Accordingly, several visits were made to Washington in order to bring pressure on the commission to revise its stand. A second report issued by the television committee originated the "limited commercialization" idea and suggested standards of transmitting operations. Despite its qualifying declarations the report was a rescue act for manufacturers.

The other members of the commission were not convinced, however, and ordered hearings, which were held in Washington during January of this year. It was here that the FCC heard about the discord among the manufacturers. There were charges that RCA dominated the Radio Manufacturers' Association, coercing the group into advancing one set of standards for the FCC to study. Various technical differences were explained at length, but one point was clear. The expert witnesses were afraid that wide public use of television would prevent real progress or else the public would lose its entire investment in television receivers. Any significant change in synchronization, frames, or lines at the transmitter would put a black-out on existing receivers. For this reason one company was flatly against any kind of commercialization, arguing that there is no distinction between the "limited" and the "full" variety. RCA men made every effort to offset these views with declarations that the others were stalling for time until they should be in a position to compete with the corporation.

Most interesting perhaps was the view of the Columbia Broadcasting System. This organization is the business rival of NBC, and its investment is in today's radio. It believes that television will compete with rather than replace aural broadcasting. Obviously its competitive position indicates opposition to television, for it would have to buy its equipment from RCA, but it analyzed television very shrewdly. Columbia protested that television must not attempt a public trial at public expense and warned that public trial should not induce large-scale investment. Scheduled program service, it stated, must not be allowed to delude the public into buying sets that suddenly may become useless or betray the broadcaster into wasting his resources. Three courses were open to the FCC, Columbia said: (1) fix standards for ten years and inform the public it could count on receivers for that period; (2) fix no standards but loudly warn the public that it could not count on any receiver; (3) fix flexible standards involving no great broadcaster or public investment. The commission apparently has attempted the second. When "limited commercialization" goes into effect, the television broadcaster must announce that the programs are "experimental." Such an announcement, though, will have little meaning to the general public.

As if television were not enough, the FCC has to meet the collateral problem of F-M. Developed by Major Edwin H. Armstrong, who is responsible for many of the refinements in present broadcasting, the new system is eyeing one television channel. Armstrong put in an appearance during the television hearings and begged the commission to defer decision until it had heard about his new system. Though this was not done, the question of channel allocations was left open, and the FCC has since held hearings on F-M.

PUBL
Burlingame, Cal.

This new system represents a major advance in radio. Its proponents promise near-deliverance from static, and reception so true that listeners to symphonic programs will hear twenty additional instruments not picked up by the microphone today. Broadcasters flirt with F-M because it seems to offer better radio signals from cheaper equipment, and in addition opens the way for nationwide network hook-ups without the cost of land lines. F-M people tell the commission that their system offers more economical use of the air waves, for despite the wider channel per individual station required, more stations can be licensed on the same channel without interference.

Whatever suspicions the FCC may have felt during the television hearings, it opened the way for commercialization. Although no standards have been set and thus presumably any kind of system may be developed, the position of RCA indicates that its methods will eventually emerge successful. Members of the commission privately admit that any other decision would have laid them open to the charge of obstruction—of stubbornly keeping television from the American public. Officially they say that the commission is not unsympathetic with the desire of radio companies to recoup their investment, but that "nothing should be done which will encourage a large public investment in receivers which, by reason of technical advances, when ultimately introduced, may become obsolete in a relatively short time."

The Communications Commission could delay television until manufacturers produced a set capable of adjustment to change. However, the commission relinquished this opportunity with "hopes that attention may be directed toward designing, building, and distributing receivers capable, in so far as is consistent with reasonable cost, of receiving or of being adjusted to receive any reasonable change in methods of synchronization or changes in number of frames or lines which may be found to be practical and licensed in the future. . . . Such a practice will keep to a minimum the economic loss to those acquiring receivers at this stage of the art and for that reason alone would seem to be required by the public interest."

Weighty words, but what do they mean? The general public only hears that television is ready to blossom; that stations will soon be on the air. Well does the FCC know the public capacity for buying radios. Current estimates indicate that 40,000,000 receivers are in the homes of America, representing a public investment of something like $3,000,000,000. When television sets are in display rooms, the purchasing public will have forgotten all about the warnings of the FCC, if, indeed, it ever heard them.

In the Wind

PHILADELPHIA COUGHLINITES, most of whom are Irish Americans, faced a stern ideological struggle a fortnight ago. The Kerrymen's Patriotic Society was holding its annual ball. The "Four Provinces," an Irish musical group, had been hired to entertain. But the "Four Provinces" broadcasts over Station WDAS, which banned Coughlin's talks a year ago. After long debate, the Coughlinites decided to picket the Kerrymen's ball in reprisal against the "Four Provinces." They picketed.

IN BRITISH Home Defense tests Boy Scouts usually act the role of "casualties." During a recent blackout numerous Boy Scouts were scattered in prostrate position in the darkened streets awaiting the arrival of nurses and ambulances. When one party of rescuers reached the spot where the last "casualty" was supposed to be lying, it found only a piece of paper reading, "Have bled to death and gone home."

THE LATEST illustration of Martin Dies's close collaboration with reactionary groups, and with Merwin K. Hart in particular, is the announcement of his committee's intention to expose "textbook propaganda." The efforts of Hart and the Advertising Federation of America to suppress Harold Rugg's textbooks were described in this column several weeks ago. George Sokolsky is closely linked with the campaign. These interests have been urging Dies to "probe" textbooks for months. Now he has made it official.

CANDOR DEPARTMENT: "I am for the farmer year in and year out. I do not have to be for him especially this year because I am not a candidate."—Senator Reynolds of North Carolina, quoted in the Congressional Record. . . . Cheerio: "Difficulties abound in business even in peace time —that's what gives business its zest. In war time these are multiplied. We of B. K. and T. are meeting our share of them, chiefly in connection with the price and shortage of diamonds."—Advertisement in the British Jeweller.

DURING THE recent hearings of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee in San Francisco, Senator Elbert Thomas read aloud a long, detailed plan of the Associated Farmers for mobilizing 600 farmers to repel a "Communist" invasion in Stanislaus County. The Associated Farmers, he said, was equipping the "army" with olive-drab uniforms, shirts, hard hats, and side-arms. As he recited the list a spectator whispered audibly: "What, no skis?"

LONDON'S New Statesman and Nation recently reported this epigram of a prominent man of letters. He was asked why he was not at the front "trying to save civilization." "I am part of the civilization they are trying to save," he replied.

[The $5 prize for the best item submitted in March goes to E. D. of Washington, D. C., for the item about "Karl Marx" published last week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

TO MY mind the most sensational aspect of the German publication of the Polish documents relating to the utterances of American diplomats is the calculated attack upon the United States. When I was in Berlin last fall, Foreign Office officials assured me again and again that they had not the slightest intention of drawing the United States into the war. "There will be no Lusitania case in this war and no Belgium," they said; and they insisted that they had not sunk the Athenia. I attributed their courtesies to me, when they knew of my hostility to the Nazi regime, as another evidence of their desire to cultivate American public opinion. Now they have plainly had a change of heart and are ready to attack the United States, to link us with the Allies, and to antagonize our public and our press.

The explanation can only be that they believe we are now hopelessly tied up with the Allies and that they feel so strong and certain of victory that they are ready to take us on also. They are obviously riding high. They believe that they have the mastery of the air and are winning on the sea; they are making better headway against the British blockade than they had hoped and are inflicting extremely heavy losses on Allied and neutral shipping. Hence their aggressiveness and confidence, which are unlike anything seen in Berlin during the last war. These Nazis believe in forcing the fighting all along the line, and one must record the fact that as yet they are showing none of that fatal misunderstanding of the psychology of other peoples that is usually characteristic of Germans. The English press admits that the German broadcasts to England are making headway even among the British troops.

From an entirely reliable source I have recently heard of a conversation which took place on New Year's Day between an American business man, the head of a great company, and Hermann Göring. They have known each other since Göring's residence in Sweden after the last war. "You Americans are coming into this war," said Göring to his visitor. "No," was the reply, "our people are 80 per cent against our going in." "You are wrong," said Göring; "the latest polls show as high as 95 per cent against going in, but you will be in next fall just the same." This bears out the theory that the Nazis feel there is no longer any use in trying to keep us out and are therefore willing, as the Polish revelations show, to abuse us. On the other hand, their American advisers may have told them to go ahead on the theory that the disclosure of the way our diplomats have been siding with the Allies may discredit Roosevelt with the peace-loving American public and increase the determination of the masses to keep this country out of the struggle. It is too early yet—I am writing this in Los Angeles before the publication of the second promised batch of documents—to tell what effect these publications will have in Washington, but coming as they do on top of the calculated indiscretion of the American minister to Canada, they furnish dynamite for Congress, or would if there were an effective opposition. How Senator Borah would have welcomed this opportunity to cut loose!

That the Germans chose the moment they did for the publication of the Polish documents—almost the very day that Sumner Welles was reporting to the President on what he had learned abroad—shows clearly that they were determined to offset the effect of his recommendations or to blanket his return by overshadowing it. Undoubtedly they have had these papers in their possession ever since the surrender of Warsaw and could have published them months ago; this again would seem to argue that they have recently changed their policy in regard to the United States. That they are substantially correct reports I do not doubt, for Mr. Bullitt has made no concealment of his passionate advocacy of the French and English cause. His speeches in France have at times, it seems to me, gone beyond the bounds of diplomacy. I have no doubt that he has been doing his best to influence Allied policy behind the scenes. There is nothing inherently improbable in the extracts from the Polish documents which have appeared here except the orders to Joseph Kennedy in London which are attributed to Mr. Bullitt.

The outstanding facts are that Germany is now on the war path against us and that Washington, according to the headlines, is seething with indignation. Let those who wish to keep this country out of war take notice. Mr. Kennedy, as everyone knows, is opposed to our getting into the war, but with Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bullitt it will be a very different story if things go badly with the Allies. One thing I can record about my trip across this continent by motor. Nowhere did I see the slightest indication in press or public of any desire that we should enter the war. The tremendous applause given to Taft and Dewey whenever they attack Mr. Roosevelt's attitude toward the war shows clearly what the American people want.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

"STALIN'S KAMPF" (Howell, Soskin and Company, $2.50) reminds me of the Book of Mormon; for both in style and subject matter Stalin's "book" is to the Marxian scriptures as the Book of Mormon is to the Bible—a dull caricature. The sharp polemic and brilliant phrase of those sophisticated Europeans, Marx, Lenin, and Trotsky, appear here as bludgeoning attacks and crude sentences. There are sections in which the only readable paragraphs are those in which Stalin quotes from Marx or Lenin, and in general the book is so thoroughly devoid of any integrating logic, let alone style, that one searches in vain for the "blueprint of Communist ambitions" and "statement of world aims" which the jacket promises. This is partly of course because the book is really a frame-up: it is a collection of speeches and articles some of which go back to 1905, and Stalin had nothing to do with putting it together—though M. R. Werner, the editor, has done a conscientious and careful job. And it is partly because the Communist Party line has changed so often.

Yet a random collection, say, of speeches and articles by Lenin, though he too shifted his line, would show a basic consistency which is lacking here. The reason lies in Stalin's attitude toward writing, which sticks out on every page. He obviously has none of the intellectual's sickly regard for the art as an end in itself; he is a non-writer who despises writers, not because he wants to be one—as Hitler probably does—but because he holds the healthy peasant view that scribbling is a futile business except in so far as it serves a practical purpose. Stalin will never be caught telling a British ambassador as Hitler did that his real desire is to be an artist. He does not share Trotsky's passion to go down as a great writer. His attitude toward the written word is perfectly illustrated in the section headed Can Russia Build Socialism? wherein he proves that socialism can be built in one country by quoting Lenin's vigorous and various assertions that it can't. I could fill a page with sentences which are in direct opposition to their author's actions, but I refrain. For the contradictions of Stalin's socialism, like the contradictions of capitalism, are no longer news.

Seriously, however, Stalin's writings do illustrate one point. It is often and rightly said that the main factor in the degeneration of the October revolution lies in the backwardness of Russia. It is not so well realized that this includes an intellectual backwardness which, once the Europeanized leaders of 1917 had been washed into the discard, had its way as well with Marxism and its interpretation. Equipped with a religious zeal in itself as primitive as icons, the crude interpretations and the cruder language of Moscow, at which Marx would have been horrified, forced their way to acceptance not only in Russia but in the centers of Western civilization, in Paris, London, New York. In literature they took the form of the childish fallacy of "proletarian art." Trotsky, to be sure, demolished it in "Literature and Revolution," but in vain. In the political sphere the results may be seen any day in the columns of the assorted Daily Workers. One of the ironies of this generation is that the most primitive writing of the day, merely as writing, is to be found in the house organs of the Communist Party, which for various reasons has been able to enforce its claim to be the inheritor of Karl Marx, who was so far ahead of his time.

SPEAKING OF STALIN, Eugene Lyons has turned out a biography, subtitled "Czar of All the Russias" (Lippincott, $2.50), which collates and telescopes in 292 pages most of the facts and hearsay about Stalin contained in his own earlier book "Assignment in Utopia," "Stalin" by Boris Souvarine, and other sources. He has drawn most heavily on Souvarine. He is frank in his acknowledgment of the fact, and certainly his book, being shorter, is more suited to one's available reading time. It is well written and interesting, but I can't help feeling that in the apportioning of royalties as well as credit the Lyons share should go to Souvarine.

IN THE REBUTTALS to Lewis Corey, both Earl Browder for the Communists and Max Schachtman for the Trotskyites attacked Mr. Corey as a "revisionist" and a "gradualist." For years now in social-revolutionary circles these terms have been sufficient to damn any left critic of Marxism as a counter-revolutionist if not a bandit, the assumption being that revisionism and gradualism are ipso facto bad. But as Franz Hoellering was saying the other day, it would probably be very difficult to find a single scientific theory current in Marx's day which has not been completely revised at least half a dozen times since then. Only Marx is sacred. As for gradualism, it is having its inning today in the Soviet Union. For the Russian experience shows, if it shows anything, that the telescoping of the bourgeois and socialist revolutions is not possible. One of the social processes now going on in Russia is the development of a bureaucracy which is bourgeois in everything but name. On the industrial front workers are gradually becoming skilled; and gradually the problems of productivity and management may be mastered even against the political odds of purges and paper-work. Eventually these processes may be completed and the structure become ripe for a genuine socialist development, though the "dictatorship of the proletariat" may be expected to put it off for the simple reason that it prevents the "bourgeois" democratic conditioning of the population which, it becomes clearer every day, must precede any stable democratic socialism—which is to say socialism.

HAVING SOJOURNED briefly at the University of Montana, I was glad to hear that the five members of the faculty who had been dismissed or asked to resign for "failure to cooperate" have been reinstated by the State Board of Education. The men in question had served from six to twenty-five years in an institution which is known for its beautiful surroundings and the regularity with which its more lively and useful professors have been kicked out or investigated on suspicion of being subversive. MARGARET MARSHALL

Inside Germany

HEIL HUNGER! HEALTH UNDER HITLER. By Martin Gumpert. Alliance Book Corporation. $1.75.

TWO THOUSAND AND TEN DAYS OF HITLER. By Patsy Ziemer. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

WHAT Fritz Sternberg did in the field of war economics with his revealing "Why Hitler Can't Win: From Nazi Sources," Martin Gumpert, former head of a large clinic in Berlin, does in the field of health, or rather sickness, in the Third Reich with his slender but compact volume. For his material he combed the scientific journals which still exist in Germany. They are put out today by Nazi editors under Nazi censorship, but "here, imbedded among the misrepresentations and monstrosities of 'Aryan' science, were the facts I sought, the truth I needed: statistical statements which, by the law of persistence, continued to be published, research results whose dangerous character had obviously slipped past the attention of the Ministry of Propaganda, and even attempts at an open anxious and warning criticism." The material Dr. Gumpert collected from such sources, given in detail in 198 very valuable references, covers a vast amount of ground.

Starting with the population policy of the Nazis, which is based on the assumption that the numerically strongest people in Europe will in the end rule the whole Continent by sheer weight if it is not held down by a coalition of the minority nations, the author proceeds to show what Hitler's total mobilization has done to the German people. He destroys effectively the myth that Hitler, whatever his politics, has at least made the Germans a strong and healthy people again. The opposite is the truth. The Nazis themselves have to admit that drunkenness, suicide, lunacy, and venereal disease are rapidly increasing in the Third Reich. Women and aged people long retired are made to slave for the state, and even people who are seriously ill, such as the 1,500,000 tuberculars in Germany. Welfare work, in which the Weimar Republic excelled, is generally neglected. The funds collected by the Winterhilfe are used for armament. In consequence, general health conditions in Germany are worse today than they were ten and twenty years ago.

Dr. Gumpert concludes "that freedom is the first condition for the biological advancement of the individual and of the social group." This seems to me too absolute a statement to be really useful. Altogether too many powers have been attributed of late to the ambiguous term "freedom." War, whether fought by "free" democracies or totalitarian powers, is unhealthy for the individual and the social group. And Hitler has been waging war in Europe ever since he came to power. He accepts his losses and would rather work the tubercular to death than lose the war. When Europe has been conquered, the Nazis argue, then the Golden Age can begin. But Dr. Gumpert demolishes the Goebbels contention that the people grow healthier every day while being forced to slave for the realization of the Führer's nightmares.

Patsy Ziemer, the author of "Two Thousand and Ten Days of Hitler," is the twelve-year-old daughter of the former headmaster of the American school in Berlin. She kept a diary while in Nazi Germany, to which, as published, her father has added many of his own observations. The result is a tremendously interesting book. The child's naivete and the father's insight combine to give a most significant and lively picture of conditions under Hitler. Anybody who seeks first-hand information will be satisfied by hundreds of funny and tragic incidents which tell a complete story. I would like to quote a score of them but have space for only one:

> One morning, just as school started, a man came in a blue-serge suit. He said he was the Schulrat to inspect the school. "You have Jewish students. You have no permission to have Jewish students," he said.
>
> "But I have permission from the Ministry of Culture to have German students. Are Jews not German students?" asked daddy.
>
> "Certainly not. They are not German," he said.
>
> "But if they are foreigners I have a license that says the American School can have foreign students," said daddy.
>
> "But these are German Jews," he said.
>
> Daddy simply threw up his hands.

Patsy's father's fight for his school and the German children whom he had taken under his protection is a story in itself. It becomes a frightening document in that part which deals with the repercussions in the classroom of the great pogrom that followed the shooting of von Rath. Mr. Ziemer was also doing some newspaper work at the time and as a journalist saw more than many others.

Both these books on Germany are to be highly recommended, for in both the Nazis themselves are the principal contributors.

FRANZ HOELLERING

The Unconstraining Voice

ANOTHER TIME. Poems by W. H. Auden. Random House. $2.

THE aim of W. H. Auden in his poetry is toward a complete speech, in which whatever is pertinent to his purpose at the moment may be said. He will not, like the capital in one of his poems in "Another Time," hide away the appalling in unlighted streets. A poet would do well to consider himself "a dark, disordered city"—the image occurs in a poem on Matthew Arnold—to be explored until all its ways are known and he has become > Familiar with each square and boulevard and slum

> And found in the disorder a whole world to praise.

Auden's powers have been expended on increasing the possibilities of the language; his interest in the form his poems take is slight. He stands as far as he can from such a poet as Paul Valéry, for whom a poem is something to be constructed, word by word, until at last it is there, a complete composition. From that point, it is outside the poet and must make its own way in the world. What it has to say is then no concern of his, though he has weighed the consequence of every word. What Auden has to say is very much his concern. He can be, and often is, remarkably complacent with mere communication. Valéry, the descendant of Baudelaire and the disciple of Mallarmé, tells us there was a time when he had no other aim than to recover from music what belonged to poetry. Auden's intent is to give poetry the range of prose, so that it may again become, though not in the constraining sense that Arnold meant, a criticism of life.

Since Baudelaire it has been assumed that poets, if they are to advance their art, must move now in one, now in another, direction. Whenever they have concluded that they must add to their material resources from the contemporary world, they have had no choice but to encroach on the province of prose. When, on the other hand, they have been most concerned with the feelings and emotions called into being by that world, they have, not always consciously, come closer to the condition of music. It is not an accident that Auden, in this volume, follows a sonnet, The Novelist, after a page with another, The Composer.

Poets, he says, "amaze us like a thunderstorm." But the novelist, "encased in talent like a uniform,"

> Must struggle out of his boyish gift and learn
> How to be plain and awkward, how to be
> One after whom none think it worth to turn.
>
> For, to achieve his lightest wish, he must > Become the whole of boredom, subject to > Vulgar complaints like love, among the Just
>
> Be just, among the Filthy filthy too.
> And in his own weak person, if he can.
> Must suffer dully all the wrongs of man.

It is probably not too much to say that Auden is here presenting the novelist with his own problem. His own boyish gifts were prodigious. But poets who have only their natural grace and power to depend on as poets have a way of dying young. Or else they are forced into solitude. Like Arnold, they become their own jailers. They become like A. E. Housman, who deliberately chose the dry-as-dust and, growing old, "Kept tears like dirty postcards in a drawer." What Auden hopes to learn from the novelist is obviously nothing technical, but a greater humility toward living creatures and a humbler attitude toward his own craft.

To the composer alone belongs a pure art. But it is beyond his power to say that an existence is wrong.

> Rummaging into his being, the poet fetches
> The images out that hurt and connect.

It is clear that Auden has made his choice. It is not at all clear that a choice is necessary between sense and structure.

The pure poet, as Auden has recently had occasion to write in an extraordinarily interesting review, is not one like Valéry but one like Shakespeare. He is one who rejects nothing that life offers him, for there is nothing living that he cannot translate into poetry. Shakespeare could face any problem, for there is none to which he cannot propose a poetic solution. And that is the only solution we have a right to expect from a poet. But there has been none since Shakespeare who has had his unlimited choice. It is not the appalling in the contemporary world that limits the poet; that he can face. What causes him to falter is that our consciousness of it has become increasingly abstract.

Within the limits of possible choice, no living poet of England has acted more brilliantly or more poignantly than Auden. In the midst of much that is trivial, much that is careless, much that is interesting, but whose interest might as well have been conveyed in prose, we are aware again and again, in this book as in every other that he has written, of that miracle which Coleridge thought might be wrought in poetry "simply by one man's feeling a thing more poignantly or more clearly than anyone had felt it before." What Auden

VIENNA, 1808 . . by a brook in a shady wood, a young man sits writing music . . . Of his Pastorale Symphony, Beethoven said —

"WHILE I WROTE, BIRDS SANG ABOVE ME, AND ALL AROUND ME"

Under brilliant direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos, the great Minneapolis Symphony now brings that music to life, with the new Columbia Masterworks record of Beethoven's "Pastorale". Hear it, and understand why this fine orchestra elects to record exclusively for Columbia (just as other famous orchestras do). A tone fidelity that mirrors every note of every instrument — this is their reason for choosing Columbia Masterworks. Your reason, too, for making this music your own!

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 6, in F Major, Opus 68 (Pastorale)
Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Five 12-inch records, complete with Album. Set M-401 . . $10.00

MOZART: Symphony in D Major (Haffner) K-385
Sir Thomas Beecham conducts the London Philharmonic Orchestra. Three 12-inch records, with Album. Set M-399 . . . $4.50

SIBELIUS: Finlandia, Opus 26
Artur Rodzinski conducting The Cleveland Orchestra. 12-inch record. 11178-D . . $2.00

VERDI: Rigoletto (a) Questa o Quella (b) La Donna è Mobile
Nino Martini, tenor, with orchestra, Howard Barlow, conductor. 10-inch record. 17191-D. $1.00

SCHUMANN: Fantasiestücke, Opus 73
Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, with Ivor Newton at the piano, 12-inch record. 69836-D . . $1.50

COLUMBIA RECORDS

TRADE MARK

feels is something that could scarcely have been felt so clearly before: a disorder of the spirit inseparable from the dissolution of the social order to which he belongs.

What Auden brought to poetry was a new sensibility; his poems are a record of what has hurt and sustained that sensibility. Possibly because the modern man's sense of estrangement from nature is in him particularly strong, he has been able to set his personality against civilization in much the same way as the romantic poets of the last century were able to dramatize themselves against a natural world. The consciousness of the contemporary civilized world is constant in whatever Auden writes. It is in him like a sensation of cold—"winter for earth, and us"—the coldness his in the winter that is England.

> But in that child the rhetorician's lie
> Burst like a pipe: the cold had made him a poet.

The poems in "Another Time" derive in part from Europe, and these have a density that none of those composed since he came to America have. An American influence is obvious in a number of the lighter poems, with their rhythms taken from blues and popular ballads. It is probable that the decision to come to America indicates a change in Auden more significant for his poetry than anything that has happened to him since he got here. It is a heartening rather than a hope, not so much an overthrowing of negation and despair as a certainty of the means, not so small, of affirmation he has against them.

> All I have is a voice
> To undo the folded lie,
> The romantic lie in the brain
> Of the sensual man-in-the-street
> And the lie of Authority
> Whose buildings grope the sky:
> There is no such thing as the State
> And no one exists alone;
> Hunger allows no choice
> To the citizen or the police;
> We must love one another or die.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP

The Wearing of the Green in the Green Room

THE IRISH THEATRE. Edited by Lennox Robinson. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THIS book is made up of nine lectures which were delivered during the Abbey Theater Festival in 1938. Five were given by directors of the theater, one by a playwright, another by the founder of the Dublin Gate Theater, and two by the dramatic critic of the Irish Times, the late Andrew E. Malone.

Malone recounts, soundly but flatly, the early days of the Abbey and the rise of the realistic movement. The novelist Frank O'Connor provides what is more a polemic against Professor Corkery's book than an appreciation of Synge. F. R. Higgins, who deals with Yeats and the poetic drama in Ireland, is apparently a better poet than essayist. T. C. Murray gives a sympathetic sketch of his younger colleagues in the realistic movement: George Shiels and Brinsley MacNamara. The essay on Sean O'Casey by Walter Starkie is competent, though the present reviewer is inclined to disagree with him when he puts the last two plays, written in London under the influence of German expressionism, on the same level as the two great Dublin plays. Reading the bits quoted from the "Silver Tassie" controversy one has the feeling that Yeats was right after all.

Ernest Blythe, former Minister for Finance—it was he who granted the state subsidy to the Abbey—analyzes the Gaelic drama or rather the reasons why there is none as yet. The first Gaelic play to be performed on any stage was Dr. Douglas Hyde's "Casadh an tSugáin." It is amusing to note that in plot it resembles "The Man Who Came to Dinner." In the original production in 1901 the author—now President of Eire—played the Irish Woollcott. Lennox Robinson, the editor, does not explain why Denis Johnston's lecture on Modern Tendencies, which appears in the schedule, is omitted in this publication. The best thing in the book is Robinson's own loving and amiable portrait of Lady Gregory. Last and least is Michael MacLiammoir's talk on Problem Plays, which is chatty and inadequate.

Altogether the nine essays furnish a somewhat sedate account of the thirty years' war which was waged to make an Irish National Theater in the teeth of the Irish Nationalists.

ROBERT VAMBERY

Science in Society

MODERN SCIENCE. By Hyman Levy. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THIS huge book is not altogether what its title suggests. True, there is science in it; but Levy, being primarily a mathematician, discusses mathematics and physics but no biology. Nor does the title suggest that around the principle of indeterminacy, as outlined by physicists, Levy has built a philosophy which supplies an answer to such mystics as Eddington and Jeans. What proves to be the chief merit of the book, the impact of science on society—and the reverse—is not indicated either.

Let me say at once that the strictly scientific portions of the book add little to the knowledge of a mathematician or a physicist and are beyond the grasp of many "intelligent" laymen. In that respect Levy has succeeded no better than Hogben. What makes Levy's book the important contribution that it is, is its presentation of science as a chapter in human society.

It has taken the younger scientists of England—Bernal, Haldane, Hogben, Levy—accelerated by Russian catalysts, to proclaim to the public that the roots of scientific activity lie in the social scene in which scientists live; that there is a give and take, an action and reaction, in which the scientist contributes a chapter to social development and is in turn molded by the society of which he is a part. Much follows from such a point of view: the desirability of a planned economy in and out of science; the emphasis on the scientist as a citizen and not as a bundle of feelingless cells apart from the rest of mankind; the right of this citizen-scientist to cast his vote in behalf of a society which will use his science for constructive and not destructive purposes; a revised system of education for scientist and non-scientist, stressing the function of science in society; and so forth.

Levy's book, taken in conjunction with an earlier volume by Bernal ("The Social Function of Science"), is bound to have far-reaching effects. Not following in the footsteps of the traditional "popularizers" of science, who aimed to "explain" science but merely succeeded in confusing and mystifying the public, the author, whose success in simplifying science is probably no greater—he makes no attempt to write down to his audience—has given science its social setting.

It is but fair to Professor Levy, whose book has afforded me much pleasure, to be somewhat more specific with regard to the content of "Modern Science." The emphasis in the opening chapters stresses the relationship between the social and economic background and scientific activity. At each stage in the evolutionary development of society technical needs are tackled by the scientists of the day. Beginning with the seventeenth century, an added factor came into play. Men of wealth, belonging more specifically to the "leisure" class, began to concern themselves not merely with the pressing needs of society but with the theoretical basis of science. To this group belonged men like Boyle, Newton, and Lavoisier.

This "theoretical" or "philosophical" discussion leads to a study of nature and natural change and an attempt to detect certain regularities. From such regularities spring physical laws, which "are statements of what can be regularly expected in certain specified conditions." Levy attempts to apply such knowledge to a study of the behavior of human beings in the mass. "Regularities" in physical science represent the average behavior of many individual particles. "We seek statistical uniformity since we recognize atomic diversity." Is it not possible to detect such "regularities" in human behavior? Beyond a statement of question, little has so far been accomplished, by Levy or by anybody else.

Many chapters of the book are devoted to various divisions of physics and mathematics: types of energy; numbers, including calculus; Newtonian laws; the physics of the airplane (Levy is an authority in this field); astronomy; geology; gravitation and the structure of space; nuclear physics; the principle of indeterminacy (a good description, for it disposes of a great deal of nonsense); light; the photoelectric cell. These scientific topics are very well handled, but a literary acquaintance of mine still finds the discussion "above his head."

In the epilogue, entitled Science in Travail, the history of the scientific method is summarized. The first phase results in the substitution of natural law for mystical dogma. The second phase emphasizes the mechanical approach to nature, in which the universe is viewed as a vast machine. The third and present phase results from the discovery that the laws of nature are essentially statistical; regularities on the large scale exist side by side "with an indiscriminate medley of movement on the small scale" (the "small scale" applying to subatomic phenomena). This has led to much confusion even within the ranks of scientists. Levy proposes a way out: the application of the dialectical method. Maybe.

I consider Levy's book a kind of pituitary hormone which stimulates the organs of the body. It is the work of a scholar touched by imagination. BENJAMIN HARROW

A DREAM? Yes and No

★

LAFAYETTE

Chippendale

RADIO-PHONOGRAPH

$$139^{95}$

Custom Built

WITH GARRARD AUTOMATIC RECORD CHANGER

★ It's a dream if you mean the Chippendale cabinet —so rich in 18th Century charm. And there's something about the tonal beauty of this Lafayette radio-phonograph that's out of this world. The features you'll find in its 11 tube radio, the feather-quiet action of the Garrard automatic Record Changer—these are things engineers dream of. But if you mean the price, $139.95, for all this luxury listening—that's no dream! Someday soon, see and hear Chippendale Combination Model BB-14W come true. It's one of 64.

LAFAYETTE RADIOS

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

BRONX, N. Y. . . . 542 E. Fordham Rd.
JAMAICA, L. I. . . . 90-08 166th Street
CHICAGO, ILL. 901 W. Jackson Blvd.
NEWARK, N. J. . . 24 Central Ave.
BOSTON, MASS. 110 Federal St.
ATLANTA, GA. 265 Peachtree St.

SPRING BOOK ISSUE

In Defense of Belles Lettres by Louise Bogan
The Ultimatum, a Story by Franz Hoellering
Writers in the Wilderness, III. Katherine Anne Porter by Margaret Marshall
William Faulkner's "The Hamlet" Reviewed by Louis Kronenberger
A. E. Housman's "Collected Poems" Reviewed by Morton Dauwen Zabel
Ernest Sutherland Bates's "American Faith" Reviewed by Reinhold Niebuhr
Lancelot Hogben's "Dangerous Thoughts" Reviewed by Jacques Barzun
Other reviews by Rustem Vambery, Douglas Haskell, W. E. Woodward.

In the Same Issue

Where Voting Costs Money: What the Poll Tax Means to the South by Maury Maverick
The Navy America Needs by George T. Davis

Next Week in The Nation

China Old and New

NEWS IS MY JOB. By Edna Lee Booker. The Macmillan Company. $3.

NINETEEN years ago Edna Lee Booker arrived in Shanghai, an eager journalist scarcely out of her teens. A year ago last summer she made a hazardous journey to Hankow just before its occupation by the Japanese in order to see Generalissimo and Madam Chiang Kai-shek. In the interval between she covered most of the chief events in China as a correspondent for the International News Service and managed to interview all the more important Chinese leaders. The story of her experiences, entertainingly written, provides what is undoubtedly the most readable account of the last two decades of Chinese history to be found anywhere. Woven into the story is a graphic description of Chinese ways of life in the interior, as well as of that special world—the Shanghai foreign community—of which she was a part.

Miss Booker's first year in China was marked by incredible good fortune. The first Chinese woman of her acquaintance was Mei-ling Soong, who later became Madam Chiang Kai-shek. Miss Soong was of inestimable aid in guiding her through the maze of Chinese politics. A few months after her arrival it became evident that China was headed for one of the more serious of the civil wars that periodically disturbed the country throughout the twenties. Her home office instructed her to proceed to the interior and seek interviews with each of the outstanding leaders of the day, including President Hsu Shih-chang, Chang Tso-lin, Wu Pei-fu, and Dr. Sun Yat-sen. None of these men, except possibly Sun Yat-sen, had ever been interviewed by a woman journalist. All had secluded themselves to prepare for the coming conflict and seemed wholly inaccessible. Just as the prospect looked hopeless, Miss Booker succeeded in persuading Chang Hsueh-liang to arrange an interview for her with Chang Tso-lin. Once the Manchurian war lord had capitulated, every door opened to her as if by magic. She was invited to stay in Wu Pei-fu's home during the first days of the war, and within a fortnight had interviews with President-to-be Tsao Kun, ex-President Li Yuang-hung, Feng Yu-hsiang, and Yen Hsi-shan. On one occasion an attack on her train by bandits gave her an unwelcome scoop. A few weeks later she went south to Canton, arriving on the evening of the coup which drove Sun Yat-sen into temporary retirement. Since she was the only foreign journalist in Canton at the time her story of that event scooped the other press services by twenty-four hours. Despite the war she managed to see Sun Yat-sen and also Eugene Chen and a young, relatively unknown officer by the name of Chiang Kai-shek.

No assignment in subsequent years quite matched this initial roundup of Chinese leaders. Miss Booker became Mrs. John S. Potter and withdrew from some of the more strenuous forms of journalism. But she continued to be active and has written a striking summary of the chief events of China's growth into a modern nation. Her trip to Hankow in the summer of 1938 provides a fitting climax to the main narrative, and introduces the new China which has risen out of the anguish of the war.

This section is all too brief. Readers who are interested primarily in the war should be advised to look elsewhere. But those who want a broad perspective, or a reliable account of the little-known events of the early twenties, will find a mine of information and keen enjoyment in the memoirs of this brilliant woman journalist.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Death Chamber

AGENT OF DEATH: THE MEMOIRS OF AN EXECUTIONER. By Robert G. Elliott with Albert R. Beatty. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

IT TAKES approximately two thousand volts of electricity applied for about two minutes to snuff out a human life. Unconsciousness is produced in 1/240 of a second. It is a painless death, quicker and more merciful than the lethal chamber. If you are tubercular or have a large heart, you are more difficult to electrocute. Most victims are less than thirty years old and walk into the death chamber numb with fear, although one man dozed off in his cell and had to be awakened so that he could be electrocuted. No alcohol or drugs are ever given to a condemned person. Practically all occupants of the electric chair protest their innocence. A few perform acts of bravado. Women, when faced with the chair, react no differently from men. All those about to die order elaborate last meals, but few eat them.

These are some of the pertinent observations made by the man who "threw the switch which hurled into eternity 387 occupants of the electric chair, the largest number of human beings that any executioner had put to death by electrical current." In his unusual book he tells about himself, his profession, and the people he put to death. When the first legal electrocution took place in this country at Clinton Prison, Dannemora, New York, in 1890, Robert Elliott was sixteen years old. He was very much interested in the event. His parents, farmers and pious Methodists, wanted him to be a minister. He wanted to be an electrical engineer. Although he never reached this goal, he did become an electrician. His work as such in various state prisons led to his association with Davis, New York's first electrocutioner, whom he eventually succeeded.

Robert Elliott was a simple man, happy with his children and grandchildren and well thought of by his neighbors. A religious man, he never uttered a curse and never failed to pray for those he was about to kill. He was happy if a reprieve was granted. He was opposed to capital punishment because he was convinced that it failed to justify its alleged purpose—prevention of crime. He points out that in some instances convicts subsequently committed crimes that sent them to the very chair they had assisted in preparing for others.

In his work as executioner for the states of New York, New Jersey, Vermont, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, Elliott saw Sacco, Vanzetti, Hauptmann, Ruth Snyder, Judd Grey, and scores of others die, and he has set down in a surprisingly succinct and vivid manner how they acted, how they looked, and what they said as they faced death. It makes a dramatic recital.

GEORGE JOEL

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

DRAMA

After Twenty Years

MOST plays of the present century do not stand any too well the ordeal by revival. Many of even the best have a way of seeming surprisingly old-fashioned when they are put back on the stage, and sometimes they embarrass acutely their most ardent champions. Ferenc Molnar's "Liliom" is not, I think, one of the best plays of the century, but at least one thing may be said of it—it is still astonishingly viable. Thirty years after its first night in Budapest and nineteen after the first showing in New York, it seems in the production now current at the Forty-fourth Street Theater hardly like a revival at all. If it creaks a bit here and there, it creaked a bit back in 1921 when Eva Le Gallienne played Julie to Joseph Schildkraut's Liliom; and those critics—newspaper opinion is divided—who complain that a fine play has been somehow cheapened are only, I think, comparing a present reality with a fond memory which comes down from the days when they were rather more easily impressed. "Liliom" remains what it always was—a bit hollow in its profundities and a bit sticky in its sentiment but enormously clever, resourceful, and theatrically effective.

Probably that smooth boulevardier its author took the play rather more seriously than any he had previously written or than any he has written since, but I doubt that even he ever removed his tongue very far from the inside of his cheek while detailing this story of a kind-hearted tough who lovingly beats his wife because his own tenderness always embarrasses him. Take the final scene in which the hero, released from purgatory to do one kind deed, steals a star from heaven to give to his daughter and then slaps her when he bungles the presentation. Try—it has been done—to interpret in all solemnity the symbolism of that incident, and the whole thing becomes absurd. But take it, like all the rest of the play, merely as a bit of theatrical ingenuity, and it becomes instead the unexpected twist plainly required for a final "curtain."

As a matter of fact, the whole play is only a series of such "twists," and it alternates satire with sentiment, melodrama with pathos, farcical caricature with attempts at sober realism. Perhaps the best scene of all is that on the railroad tracks, where the contrast between the imaginative Liliom and his matter-of-fact companion is nearly first-rate; perhaps the second best scene is that of elaborately worked-up pathos in which Julie weeps by the body of her husband. But in one respect the author is completely without conscience. He is careful only to extract at each moment the full theatrical effectiveness of every incident without caring in the least if that means broad burlesque at one moment and something like realism the next. Neither, for that matter, does he even care whether or not he always knows himself to what extent he is sincere. And yet the fact remains that he succeeds fully within the limits which the attempt itself sets. One laughs at the burlesque, one feels oneself tighten during the melodrama, and unless one is very careful indeed one is likely to be affected by the sentimental scenes.

Perhaps I was not the only spectator to be reminded that in theme and in sentimental attitude "Liliom" is really a pre-war version of John Steinbeck's novel and play "Of Mice and Men." The chief difference is that while Mr. Steinbeck took his theme with complete seriousness, Mr. Molnar was plainly quite aware that his business was to pull an audience's collective leg. Ingrid Bergman, the Swedish actress who has appeared here in the movies but is making a first appearance on the English-speaking stage, is pretty and pleasing if perhaps a bit pale in the role of Julie. John Emery does a fine bit as the romantic Wolf, and Burgess Meredith plays Liliom with more boyishness and less swagger than Schildkraut used to assume.

"Ladies in Retirement" (Henry Miller's Theater) is an English horror play with the virtues and defects of a genre recently made familiar by such pieces as "Night Must Fall" and, to cite the best of the lot, the eerie "Kind Lady" in which Grace George made something of a sensation a few seasons back. Admirably acted by a splendid cast including Flora Robson as star and Estelle Winwood, who, incidentally, gives her best performance in years, the present piece manages not only to achieve considerable tension but to remain believable as well. In such plays the English, of course, rely less than we upon mere blood and thunder, while going in a good deal more seriously for characterization and psychology. Here we have an aging spinster in a lonely house who murders her benefactor in order to provide a home for her own eccentric sisters; and if the conclusion were managed as well as most of the action the result would be something almost as memorable as "Kind Lady." Even as it stands, "Ladies in Retirement" is quite the best thing of its kind seen here in some time, and it is only a pity that the end, which is logical enough, comes suddenly and without the final climax which we are plainly led to expect. The intention is certainly to end on a note of grotesque horror. The more or less normal people are to be eliminated one by one until the most clearly and most sinisterly insane of the lot—the two dotty sisters—are left in possession. This is, indeed, what actually happens, but it happens so suddenly and so easily that what should have been a climax is almost an anti-climax instead. A real struggle of some sort just before the end would transform the effect of the whole piece.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

BOOKS

Just published in the
MODERN LIBRARY
The Prince
and
The Discourses of Machiavelli

These are Machiavelli's two greatest works. They have never before been printed in a single volume. The texts are complete; the introduction is by MAX LERNER of Williams College, and until recently editor of The Nation.

95¢ At all bookstores. Other [illegible] Modern Library titles include books by Vincent Sheean, John P. Marquand, Ludwig Lewisohn, James Farrell, Lin Yutang, etc. Send for a FREE complete list of 270 titles. MODERN LIBRARY, Dept. N, 20 E. 57 St., N. Y. C.

SPECIAL $1.00 OFFER
MARRIAGE [illegible] MORALS, by Bertrand Russell 79c
OUR BATTLE, by Hendrik W. van Loon. His famous [illegible] to Hitler. ($1.00 list.) 30c
One dollar brings these [illegible] books mailed anywhere in U.S.A. Otherwise add 5c per book.
DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
206 Broadway, corner Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

THEATRE

Special Preview Performance
MEDICINE SHOW
by Oscar Saul and H. R. Hays
SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 6
New Yorker Theatre, 54 St. W. of B'way.
Tickets on sale at Box Office on night of performance.

MUSIC

WITHIN a few days New Yorkers had opportunities to experience those tonal wonders of the age—the playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky and that of the Philadelphia under Stokowski. The two conductors are extraordinary virtuosos in their medium; but there the similarity ends. The surprising continence of Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's First was a measure of his growth as a musician, the greater refinement of his taste in the presentation of older music; whereas Stokowski's increasingly lurid performances are a measure of his deterioration. And it was Koussevitzky's passionate love of music, his passionate desire to make the points in Strauss's "Don Quixote" as effective as possible, that caused him to kill them with overemphasis; but the hash Stokowski made of the Good Friday music of "Parsifal," among other things, represented his insensitiveness and indifference to anything in music but the opportunities it offers to produce gorgeous sounds and stunning effects with lush movements of his hands.

Stokowski at least offers the excitement of virtuosity, such as one gets from Horowitz on the piano or Heifetz on the violin; but Barbirolli does not offer even that to compensate for the musical defects of his performances and the wretchedness of his programs. If a director of an art gallery were to exhibit its collection defaced by his retouching the public clamor would cause him to be thrown out within a week. But Barbirolli, for four seasons, has been defacing Beethoven, Brahms, and in fact all the music in which he does not feel the restrictions imposed by the style of Haydn and Mozart; the press has been sour; even placid Friday afternoon dowagers have been moved to cancel subscriptions; yet he has been reengaged for two years, and the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra will celebrate its hundredth anniversary by exhibiting to an unadmiring world the mediocrity it has descended to under his direction.

Nor is the reengagement more surprising, more conscienceless than the first engagement. Barbirolli was brought here to share the season of 1936-37 with several other conductors, but was engaged as sole permanent conductor after only a few weeks, before Enesco and Rodzinski had been heard and had demonstrated their overwhelming superiority; and this happened not because of any irresistible brilliance that Barbirolli exhibited in those few weeks, but because it did not take the manager of the orchestra, the directors, and the orchestra itself longer to discover that he was a man who in various ways made life pleasant for them—pleasanter for the orchestra, for example, than Rodzinski, who when he took charge later in the season had occasion not only to speak sharply about the deterioration in its playing but, worse still, to act vigorously about it and to make the orchestra act vigorously. Barbirolli may do terrible things to music; but one can well understand how to Mr. Judson, to Mr. Field and Mrs. Pratt, and to the orchestra it would be more important that life be made pleasant for them than that music be well treated.

In his new 'Cello Concerto—recently given its first American performances by Piatigorsky and the Boston Symphony—Prokofiev uses all the resources of his technique as ways of going through elaborate motions of saying a great deal when he is saying absolutely nothing. And it is not surprising that this grand-mannered pretense should impress the Soviet Russian critic Kuznetzov who is quoted in the program notes as having disapproved of the "salon spirit" of the charming "Peter and the Wolf," as having demanded of a composer of Prokofiev's stature nothing less than "earnestness and fidelity to himself," and as having observed that the concerto "re-creates successively the main stages of Prokofiev's inner evolution. This is not a panorama, but a synthesized, integrated picture. . . . The present Prokofiev is not yet as clearly discernible as the 'early Prokofiev' or the 'middle-of-the-road' Prokofiev. The Violoncello Concerto bears testimony of this. Its strongest points are in retrospection, totalizing the stages passed by the composer, rather than in its forward perspective. Prokofiev's creative crisis has not been solved, and it cannot be solved without protracted and concentrated effort."

Terms like "main stages of . . . evolution," "retrospection, totalizing the stages," "forward perspective," "crisis" refer to nothing in Prokofiev's music and to nothing that can be said in description or judgment of it; they are merely terms which are considered proper for criticism in Russia, because of the proper ideas about the close relation of art to economics (they recall a Daily Worker article some years ago on "A. F. of L.-ism in Music"). As such they are ways of going through required motions; and in this respect they are like the "formalism," "scholasticism," "didacticism" that were applied to Eisenstein, and also like the revolting epithets applied by workers in factories and scientists in laboratories to the Finns, or the revolting hymns of praise to "the peace policy of the Soviet Union, which always respects the rights of small nations." I refer to these political manifestations to make clear what is of concern to me as a critic: the fact that the same enslavement and degradation of the mind (in a country in which no man may own a factory or a bank, so that other men's minds may not be enslaved and degraded) produce writing about the arts for which—if one is sensitive to intellectual rigor and integrity, and to their opposites—one needs the same strong stomach.

B. H. HAGGIN

LATEST
RECORDS

IMPORTED
RUSSIAN RECORDS!
BY
Modern Russian Composers
Song of the Plains
Red Moscow
Kalinka
From Border to Border
Cossack's Song
and many others
SEND FOR COMPLETE LIST H

Phone CH 2-6744 OPEN EVENINGS
O. PAGANI & BRO.
289 Bleecker Street, corner 7th Avenue
New York, N. Y.

In Early Issues of
THE Nation
Mr. Pitt and America's Birthright
BY J. C. LONG
Reviewed by Rustem Vambery
The French Yellow Book
Reviewed by Robert Dell

Letters to the Editors

Law and the Covenant

Dear Sirs: In your excellent editorial Peace Is a Weapon in The Nation of March 23 you say that if the Allies had forced their way through Sweden and Norway to go to the aid of Finland, they would have committed a breach of international law. I think you are mistaken.

In its resolution of December 14, 1939, the League Assembly declared that the U. S. S. R. had been guilty of an aggression against Finland and had violated not only its special political agreements with that country but also Article 12 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and the Pact of Paris. The resolution also appealed to every member of the League "to provide Finland with such material and humanitarian assistance as may be in its power and to refrain from any action which might weaken Finland's power of resistance."

It follows that, by the provisions of Article 16, paragraph 1, of the League Covenant, the U. S. S. R. "committed an act of war against all other members of the League," who were bound individually to resort to economic, financial, and diplomatic sanctions against the U. S. S. R. and had the right to resort to military sanctions. The application of sanctions does not require any decision of the Council or the Assembly, and there was no such decision in the Abyssinian affair in 1935.

It also follows that Sweden and Norway were bound by paragraph 3 of Article 16 to "take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the League which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the League." It is true that in voting for the resolution of December 14 the delegations of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway declared "that they made every reservation in so far as the resolution involved any measure coming within the scope of the system of sanctions," but this reservation did not relieve them of their obligations under Article 16 of the League Covenant. Even if they had given notice of withdrawal from the League, they would have continued to be bound by those obligations for two years. It is too often forgotten that the Covenant of the League of Nations is a treaty which is just as binding on its signatories as any other treaty.

The British and French governments would, therefore, have been legally justified in forcing a passage through Sweden and Norway for their troops going to the aid of Finland, whether the Swedish and Norwegian governments liked it or not. Whether it would have been wise and expedient to take this course is another matter.

In my opinion, the British and French governments ought to have decided to give military aid to Finland as soon as that country was invaded, to have immediately begun preparations for such aid, and to have informed the Council of the League of Nations when it met at Geneva—at least privately—that they proposed to apply military sanctions against Russia and expected Sweden and Norway to fulfil their obligations under Article 16, paragraph 3, of the Covenant. It would then have been more difficult for Sweden and Norway to refuse than it was later on.

It is also my opinion that although the expulsion of the U. S. S. R. from the League was perfectly justified, it was a mistake—and an illogical mistake—to expel it without applying sanctions. ROBERT DELL

New York, March 21

The Irish "Thrubble"

Dear Sirs: Florence M. Baker's article called De Valera's Dilemma in your issue of March 9 is a clear and concise exposition of some of the main problems that confront Ireland. It is too bad the editors of The Nation didn't render the author better assistance by omitting the harsh cartoon that accompanied it. Borrowing the old British eighteenth- and nineteenth-century cartooning of the ape-Irishman does not so much enlighten as antagonize.

Miss Baker's article amply confirms my own opinions regarding the conditions she touched upon. The outcome may be similar to what took place in France or perhaps more like the Spanish and Mexican internal explosions. No doubt she knows that Ireland is at a terrific disadvantage as compared to the countries mentioned because for generations two sets of Christian loyalties have competed there—subserviency to the Pope and his minions, and to the British crown and its minions, with complete understanding between the Pope and the crown, and complete misunderstanding between the competing faithfuls, which may or may not have been planned that way.

In my opinion the I. R. A. represents a fermentation in the minds of a powerful Irish minority who know something is the matter and are determined to find out what by clearing the decks of the Irish ship of state, both North and South, of all British interference. Then when the alleged bogy of English oppression is laid, it should be easy to identify the real oppressor. I for one should like to have a box seat to watch Holy Ireland in action.

RICHARD BARRETT

Gary, Indiana, March 20

Working for the Wealthy

Dear Sirs: There is one problem which is never mentioned in the daily press or even the liberal magazines. That is the plight of the large number of workers on the private estates of the wealthy.

A few employers, of course, really did lose a large part of their fortunes in the crash of 1929. Of these we do not expect anything. Also a few, like the du Ponts of Delaware, whatever their other sins, do treat their help quite lavishly. These places have been truly described in Ferdinand Lundberg's "America's Sixty Families." But the majority seem to have no civic pride, public spirit, or social conscience whatever. The wealthy and patriotic citizens make no attempt to solve the unemployment problem even in their own communities, which depend greatly on employment and trade from the estates. Instead they have added to the problem by reducing their staffs drastically and cutting wages to a subhuman level. At the approach of winter they take mean advantage of unemployment insurance by unnecessary lay-offs of day laborers. When these men return in the spring they must catch up with the work as best they can. Yet on Long Island work can be carried on outdoors during most of the winter. A great many tasks have been neglected or skimped in recent years. Thousands of acres of woodland have not yet been cleared of the debris of the hurricane of 1938.

Conditions in servants' wings and men's quarters are often deplorable. Poor and scanty food, small stuffy rooms, dirt, antiquated plumbing and heating systems (or no heat) are not uncommon. Everything for the "help" is skimped. Some of our local merchants and small business men still blame Roosevelt and the New Deal for their trade troubles; but we who are close to the wealthy know, if we are honest, that the real cause of economic distress, in this section at least, is a monstrous sit-down strike of capital. Thousands of dollars are wasted on automobiles, parties, trips abroad or to the South and West, gifts to the Republican Party, etc., but a few hundred cannot be spent to give steady work through the winter, on jobs crying to be done, to faithful workmen. R. M.

New York, March 20

Southern Strikers Need Help

Dear Sirs: Twelve hundred luggage workers, who with their families total more than five thousand persons, are now in the eighth week of a bitter strike against the American Hardware Company of Petersburg, Virginia. We have been forced to wage this strike in defense of our elementary right of collective bargaining, for the preservation of our union, and for a little more decent working conditions.

The American Hardware Company is the largest trunk and luggage firm in the country and sells its products to the most important department stores, chain stores, and mail-order houses in the country. It charges the same prices for its merchandise as other luggage manufacturers, yet our wages are less than half as much as the wages of other luggage workers. Most of our workers, including mechanics with twenty-five or more years' experience as skilled trunk makers, are getting between 30 and 40 cents an hour and making on the average, while working, about $14 a week.

When the strike was called on January 30, in spite of the unusually bitter cold that then prevailed our people walked out nearly 100 per cent. Since then the company has obtained injunctions against us limiting our pickets to three at the entrance and restraining us from all kinds of legitimate strike activities. Many strikers have been arrested and fined $50 each on some trumped-up charge, and a number have jail sentences hanging over them.

The union's main problem from the beginning has been to feed the strikers and their families and to give them fuel. So in the first week of the strike we opened a special strike kitchen and a commissary. We are also distributing wood, coal, or oil.

Lately a concerted drive has been started by the landlords to press the strikers for rent, threatening them with evictions; also the electric-light company is threatening to shut off their lights and in some cases has already done it, and the city authorities are pressing them for water bills. The strikers are also beset by loan sharks, who have been charging them about 50 per cent interest and are now threatening to take away their furniture. A great deal of sickness is prevalent, and we must take care of their medical requirements. Many of the strikers need to have their shoes repaired and a new pair of overalls provided in order that they may go on the picket line.

The American Hardware Company is hoping to break the morale of the strikers and force them into submission, but the workers are full of courage and determination to continue the strike until they can obtain a fair and just settlement. However, if they are to hold out, they must have financial assistance. We have received substantial aid from organized luggage workers throughout the country and have also had donations from the American Federation of Labor, the International Ladies' Garment Workers, and other local unions, but our needs are so great that we must appeal to all friends of labor, particularly to those who are interested in a strong labor movement in the South, to help us win this strike.

Please make checks payable to Luggage Workers' Union, Local 52, 18 Leigh Building, Petersburg, Virginia.

E. A. BARKER, President
C. A. HALL, Secretary-Treasurer

Petersburg, Va., March 28

Independent Artists' Show

Dear Sirs: Since 1917 the Society of Independent Artists annually has brought a long line of hitherto unappreciated painters and sculptors to the attention of museum directors, collectors, and gallery owners. But there is another important function which the forthcoming exhibition will again perform, not only for the artist, but for the general public as well.

The Works Progress Administration did not see fit to sell at modest prices the paintings and sculpture produced under its auspices, but there is still one way by which the average American can possess original works of art at a price within his income. The exhibition which the Society of Independent Artists will open in the galleries of the American Fine Arts Society on April 19 offers this opportunity to the public. By cultivating his taste so that he can recognize a good painting or a fine piece of sculpture, even without a famous label, the intelligent man or woman can acquire at a moderate price what may very well be the artistic discovery of tomorrow.

Meanwhile, the society offers for the twenty-fourth time an invitation to men and women, professional and non-professional, to submit paintings or sculpture, with the assurance that every work will be accepted and hung in strict alphabetical order. The no-jury, no-prize basis on which the society was founded has permitted numerous artists to exhibit who had been refused by galleries that were later proud to hang their works. JOHN SLOAN, President

New York, March 27

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT DELL was for many years the correspondent of The Nation and the Manchester Guardian at Geneva. He is now lecturing in this country.

RICHARD H. ROVERE is a free-lance writer living in New York.

EDGAR M. JONES is a Washington newspaperman who for several years has paid special attention to radio problems and the duties of the FCC. His work appears in various trade papers.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP, poet and critic, is the author of "Now with His Love" and "Minute Particulars."

ROBERT VAMBERY has written several plays and served as dramatic adviser to a Berlin theater.

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

GEORGE JOEL is on the staff of the Dial Press.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 13, 1940 NUMBER 15

The Shape of Things

THE "DRAFT ROOSEVELT" FORCES LOOK TO Illinois, which holds its Presidential primary next week, for a landslide vote that will dispel any third-term doubts in the White House, but so far the Democratic Presidential primaries have revealed nothing we did not know before. The vote in Wisconsin, as earlier in New Hampshire, showed that the President could have the Democratic nomination if he wanted it, and it also showed that Mr. Garner commands a sizable minority in the party. Mr. Roosevelt is unopposed in Nebraska, where the primaries are being held as we go to press, and interest is concentrated on another fierce contest between Dewey and Vandenberg. If Dewey makes as good a showing as he did in Wisconsin, his chances for the G.O.P. nomination will be increased. If he polls a vote far ahead of his rivals in Illinois, it will be hard to take the nomination away from him. Roosevelt carried Illinois by 700,000 in 1936, and next week's primaries there will be regarded largely as a kind of trial heat between the two chief contenders before the big race. Another primary fight of some importance was staged in New York, where a split between the right and left wings of the Labor Party ended with the latter's victory in the city at least. Both sides were still claiming victory in the state.

*

EVEN TWO SUCH STOUT COLUMNS AS THOSE of General Hugh Johnson and Miss Dorothy Thompson cannot offer Wendell Willkie adequate support for a Presidential candidacy. Indeed, he himself seems to be without illusions about the possibility, as McAlister Coleman points out in his article on page 469, although he is willing enough to accept the nomination if, by some miracle, it is offered him. Meanwhile, he is glad to hammer the New Deal wherever a platform is provided. Last week he made two speeches advocating a return to old-fashioned economic liberalism—a doctrine with uncomfortable implications for tariff-minded Republicans. Speaking to the Boston Chamber of Commerce, he accused the Administration of creating a "dark legend" about the morals of business, with the result that public confidence in the business man had been undermined and recovery inhibited. Mr. Willkie conceded that cases of dishonesty and abuses had occurred but protested that the government was killing the patient to cure the disease. His argument suggested a belief that a certain amount of buccaneering is inevitable if private enterprise is to function vigorously, and hence the task of government is to cover up, rather than expose, the lapses of business. Most defenders of private enterprise are so sanctimonious that this frankness makes a refreshing contrast. We are inclined to agree with Mr. Coleman that it is a pity Mr. Willkie hasn't a better chance for the Republican nomination. He has more ability and personality than any other anti-New Dealer in sight and would make an opponent worth fighting.

*

MAYOR LAGUARDIA HAS SMEARED HIS OWN reputation for courage by his attempt to sidetrack the issues involved in the Bertrand Russell case. His action in cutting the vacant post at City College out of the budget for next year, which has yet to be approved, probably does not prevent the Board of Higher Education from appealing Judge McGeehan's scandalous decision. But it has had the effect of confusing the public and may also be regarded as an underhanded method of putting pressure on the board to abandon the whole matter. We would have more respect for the Mayor if he had placed himself squarely behind the religious bigots who are hounding Russell. As it is he stands self-convicted of moral cowardice. We note sadly that the New York Times has apparently placed itself in the same dock, for "the world's greatest newspaper" has yet to express itself editorially about this burning public controversy. In shining contrast is the nation-wide rally to Dr. Russell's defense of educators who realize, as Dr. Harry Carmen of Columbia has pointed out, that Judge McGeehan's decision opens the door "for pressure groups, with the aid of a court, to object to appointments on other grounds—economic, political, and intellectual." On another page we publish a letter from Ely Culbertson, who fears that the quality of education open to his children will suffer if the Russell case is allowed to become a precedent. Mr. Culbertson backs his protest with a check to aid the funds for defense, and it occurs to us that other parents might like to express their indignation in a similar way. All money received by The Nation will be forwarded to the Civil Liberties Union, which is handling Bertrand Russell's defense and has established a special fund for that purpose.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE LONG-PROMISED SPRING CLEANING OF the British government hardly seems worth the dust it has raised. A number of ministers have changed places, but the general aspect of the administration is little altered, and public anxiety about its efficiency is hardly allayed. It remains to be seen, however, whether Winston Churchill, who while remaining head of the navy also takes on the chairmanship of a committee of defense ministers, has really been given an opportunity to direct and coordinate general strategy or whether his new appointment is merely a piece of window-dressing. Apart from this the most hopeful change is the ousting of William S. Morrison, whose handling of the Ministry of Food had been severely criticized. The appointment as his successor of Lord Woolton is the single example of an infusion of new blood into the government. Woolton, formerly Frederick Marquis, is a Manchester business man known as an able and socially enlightened organizer.

*

NEW COMPLICATIONS IN THE FAR EAST HAVE arisen in recent weeks as a result of the overshadowing effect of the European war. In extending the blockade to the Pacific, the Allies have risked possible entanglement with either the Soviet Union or Japan. Thus far the Soviets have shown no disposition to carry their protest against the Allied action beyond the note-writing stage, but Japan has threatened to use its navy, if necessary, to prevent undue interference with its shipping. Its stand appears to have checked, at least temporarily, the strong pro-Japanese drift in British foreign policy which many feared would lead to British recognition of the new Wang Ching-wei puppet regime. Following Hull's lead, Lord Halifax has announced that the British government will continue to recognize the Chinese government at Chungking. This statement has served to allay the doubts which were aroused a few days earlier by the speech of Ambassador Craigie stating that Britain and Japan "are ultimately striving for the same objective." Britain's attitude toward Chiang Kai-shek's regime will undoubtedly be influenced in the near future by the outcome of China's efforts to obtain increased Soviet assistance. But it will also be affected by any action, or lack of action, on the part of the United States in response to Japan's latest threat to American interests in the Far East.

SECRETARY HULL'S NOTE TO MEXICO ASKING for arbitration of the long-standing dispute over the Mexican confiscation of American-owned oil properties appears, on the surface, an innocuous document. It is mild and conciliatory in tone, and it carries no threat of retaliation in case the request is not honored. Actually, however, it is loaded with dynamite. Mexico is in the midst of a bitter political campaign. Although the oil question has not been one of the primary issues, General Almazán, the opposition candidate, who is believed to be financed by American interests, has attempted to make political capital out of Cárdenas's difficulties with the United States. In accentuating these difficulties at this moment, Secretary Hull has given birth to the suspicion that his note was deliberately timed to influence the election. As further grounds for this suspicion we have the known fact that Cárdenas has repeatedly maintained that the oil controversy was a domestic issue, not subject to arbitration. Secretary Hull must have known that his suggestion would be rejected. The question, then, is why he should have offered it at this particular moment. To make the situation worse, some of the news stories reporting the note pointed out that an unfavorable reply from Mexico might lead the Senate to pass the bill now before it repeals the Silver Purchase Act—a step which would have catastrophic effects on the Mexican economy.

*

IT WAS A FOREGONE CONCLUSION THAT the Socialist Party, at its convention in Washington, would again nominate Norman Thomas as its candidate for President. It was also expected that the party would take a stand not only against American entry into the war but against steps "short of war" to aid the Allies. There was, however, a minority which urged that the extension of economic aid to England and France might hasten the defeat of Germany and make American military participation less likely. From a longer perspective, perhaps the most significant note was struck by Maynard Krueger when he said that "we Socialists want to see the conduct of the public's business enterprises at least one step removed from direct government control. Public ownership and operation of a business does not mean that it has to be completely centralized . . . it is even desirable that a substantial amount of competition be maintained among the various decentralized units of any industry organized by public enterprise." The Russian lesson was obviously very much in the air at the convention, as it is wherever Socialists gather these days.

*

THANKS TO THE INTERVENTION OF LEWIS a transit strike in New York City was avoided and a last-minute compromise reached between the Mayor and the Transport Workers' Union. The compromise represented a victory for the union since in effect it pledged the city's Board of Transportation to take over collective-bargaining contracts along with the private subway and elevated lines. The contracts themselves are still subject to judicial interpretation, but whether they are ever tested in court will depend on the good faith of the board and the good sense of the union. A test would certainly come if it became necessary to enforce the union-shop clause in the contracts. The union, which is powerfully organized, might find it wiser to leave an occasional stubborn dissident alone rather than risk an unfavorable court decision. If the LaGuardia administration wishes to bargain collectively with labor on the subway lines, there are no insuperable legal obstacles. If it does not wish to do so, it can find plenty of legal excuses for an anti-union policy. The Board of Transportation, in other cases, has argued before the courts that the operation of subway lines is "a proprietary, not a governmental function." We agree. And we believe that the Board of Transportation, like any other proprietor, ought to obey the law on collective bargaining.

*

THE SUPREME COURT HAS NOW SUSTAINED, by refusing to review it, the excellent decision of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals which on November 8 of last year ordered Tom Girdler's Republic Steel Corporation to rehire the men involved in the strike of 1937 and pay them "lost" wages then estimated at $7,500,000; what the actual amount will be depends on the extent to which men have already been reinstated. In addition the company is ordered to withdraw recognition from the plan of employee representation and its successors at its Ohio plants, and to cease discouraging membership in the C. I. O. No doubt Republic Steel will continue to resist; its countersuit against the C. I. O. and its affiliates for $7,500,000 "damages" is still pending. The workers who died in the attempt to force Tom Girdler to observe the law cannot be "reinstated," but they have won at least a measure of retribution in this resounding victory for the union and the National Labor Board.

*

IT IS HARD TO BE RESPECTFUL OF THE JUDGE who has just fined the St. Louis Post-Dispatch $2,000 and sent two of its leading executives to jail for contempt of court. The jurist in question is Circuit Court Judge Thomas J. Rowe, and we suggest that he seems to be a fit subject for an investigation by the Missouri legislature. The Post-Dispatch case arises out of an indictment for extortion returned against a state Representative named Thomas M. ("Putty Nose") Brady and a deposed boss of the Moving Picture Operators' Union named John P. Nick. Brady was charged with having collected $10,000 from theater owners with whom Nick was trying to negotiate a wage increase. After Brady allegedly collected the $10,000, Nick decided wages were high enough. Judge Rowe dismissed the case against Nick without letting it proceed to trial of the facts and later suggested that the district attorney drop the charges against Brady. It may be that Nick and Brady are pure as driven snow, but other courts in Missouri do not seem to think so. Another circuit judge found that Nick received the $10,000 paid to Brady by the theater owners, and ordered Nick to hand over the money to the union. The St. Louis Court of Appeals has affirmed and the Missouri Supreme Court has refused to review still another court order ousting Nick from control of the union. Under the circumstances it is easy to understand why Ralph Coghlan wrote an editorial and Daniel R. Fitzpatrick drew a cartoon criticizing Judge Rowe.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 461

EDITORIALS:

- THE WAR SPREADS 464
- THE DIES OFFENSIVE 464
- PICKPOCKETS, INC. 465

CARIBBEAN REFUGE by Freda Kirchwey 466

MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT:
IV. WENDELL WILLKIE'S HAT IS ON HIS HEAD by McAlister Coleman 469

WRITERS IN THE WILDERNESS:
III. KATHERINE ANNE PORTER by Margaret Marshall 473

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 475

IN THE WIND 476

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 477

PROLOGUE TO FEBRUARY a Story by Franz Hoellering 478

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

- THE DEFENSE OF BELLES-LETTRES by Louise Bogan 480
- THE WORLD OF WILLIAM FAULKNER by Louis Kronenberger 481
- A RELIGION OF SCIENCE by Jacques Barzun 482
- AMERICAN CREEDS by Reinhold Niebuhr 484
- "YELLOW BOOK" OF THE WHITE WAR by Robert Dell 484
- LIFE OF WASHINGTON by W. E. Woodward 486
- EUROPEAN HANGOVER by Rustem Vambery 487
- YORK STATE HUCK FINN by Louis B. Salomon 488
- THE WORLD OF DESIGN by Douglas Haskell 489
- ULTRA-POETICAL, SUPER-AESTHETICAL by Maxwell Geismar 490
- DRAMA: TWO STARS by Joseph Wood Krutch 492
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 492

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

The War Spreads

THE flames of war have suddenly blazed up in Scandinavia and threaten to sweep over the rest of neutral Europe. Using the British action in mining Norwegian territorial waters as a pretext, Germany has invaded Denmark by land and water and attacked Norway. Denmark, with little more than paper defenses, has surrendered quietly and agreed to accept German "protection," but Norway, more favorably placed strategically and in a position to receive aid from the Allies, has declared that it is at war with Germany and is apparently resisting. As we go to press, news from the north is confused and incomplete, but Nazi landings are reported on the Norwegian coast as far north as Trondheim. If true, these mean that Germany was secretly transporting troops through Norwegian waters before the British navy moved in with its mines.

So far Sweden has not been attacked, but a full mobilization has been ordered and troops are being rushed tc the southern provinces. It seems unlikely that it can escape the fate of its neighbors, particularly as it offers the most practical route for the invasion of Norway. Moreover, there appear to be well-founded fears of aggressive German action against other neutrals. Reports have just come in of an ultimatum from Berlin to four Balkan powers demanding the right to police the Danube. An alleged British plot to block the river serves as an excuse. Belgium and Holland also seem to have been given cause for fresh alarm and are reinforcing their frontier defenses.

At this juncture it is rather futile to discuss who is responsible for spreading the war. Germany has violated international law from the outset and has persistently and with considerable success attempted to force the Scandinavian states to accept its own very unneutral interpretation of neutrality. But the Allies, too, have flouted legality on numerous occasions, even if they have not, as their enemy has, taken toll of neutral lives. The conduct of war according to a strict set of rules has never been much more than an ideal, and when one belligerent adopts the methods of totalitarian warfare, the other is not likely to handicap itself by sticking to higher standards. For their part in the newest development both sides will find justification in reasons of military expediency.

For months the Allies have been toying with the idea of establishing a northern flank. While the question of Allied aid to the Finns was still in the balance, Germany stepped in and warned the Scandinavian states against allowing the passage of any Allied troops to Finland. At that time, presumably, Berlin considered that the extension of the war in this region would be contrary to its interests. But the assumption behind that policy was that there would be no serious interference with its freedom to import iron ore and other supplies from Scandinavia. Thus the Allied decision to tighten the blockade in the north at all costs produced a new situation to which Hitler, as is his custom, swiftly adapted his strategy. If he is successful in overrunning the whole peninsula, possession of the Norwegian Atlantic coast will provide him with innumerable submarine and air bases permitting an intensification of the counter-blockade which would be extremely serious for the Allies. It is doubtful, however, whether this advantage would prove decisive, and against it must be set the disadvantages of damaging Scandinavia as a supply base. For instance, the occupation of Denmark means that that country will soon have no surplus of food to export to Germany, since its animal husbandry is almost entirely dependent on imported feed.

In any case it is unbelievable that the Allies will permit Germany to seize Norway without putting up a strenuous fight to gain control of the country themselves. It is difficult to see how a firm German hold can be established quickly unless the British fleet is driven off the coast. It will be necessary, however, for large numbers of Allied troops to be moved swiftly to Norway if the advantage gained by German initiative is to be offset. Once again Berlin seems to have scored over its slower opponents.

One factor of decisive importance will be the attitude of Russia, and the spread of war to the north provides something of a test of the declared Soviet policy of neutrality as between Germany and the Allies. If Stalin chose to turn the forces which he still has in the Petsamo region against northern Norway, he would furnish Germany important aid, since this would extend the necessary area of Allied operations, threaten the Swedish northern frontier, and put that country in a vise.

The Dies Offensive

MARTIN DIES'S spring offensive against democracy continues. Because his current victim is ostensibly the Communist Party, many people who ought to see the larger range of his attack remain apathetic. In Congress there is only silence. Three years ago people were saying that it was foolish to attack Martin Dies; he would "destroy himself." Now liberal Congressmen explain that it is dangerous to attack Martin Dies; he will destroy anyone who obstructs him.

Mr. Dies's newest subterfuge is shrewdly devised. He does not propose to ban the Communist Party. He asks only for its membership lists. The request seems innocent and plausible; when the Communists refuse to comply, the atmosphere of suspicion is heightened. In actuality the demand for the Communist Party's rolls is virtually a death warrant for the party. Mr. Dies knows this; he knows that publication of party membership would expose thousands of Communists to economic reprisals, and would prevent almost any new recruitment. As the Civil Liberties Union has pointed out, any party has the right to protect its members from "exposure to contempt, prejudice, or antagonism." We hope that the courts will sustain this view. But to Martin Dies traditional democratic safeguards have never mattered. The methods his committee has employed in the last fortnight vividly reflect his contempt for minority rights. In Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore Communist headquarters have been raided, records seized. In Pittsburgh a party leader's home was searched. Sometimes Mr. Dies's agents use the formality of search warrants. Sometimes they ignore the formality. The point is incidental to their real objective.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

And when Communists resist they are cited for contempt. Five have already been cited for refusing to tell all to the Dies committee; others face similar action. Mr. Dies does not propose to ban the Communist Party. He will decapitate it. Few voices have been heard in protest [illegible] the modern version of the Palmer raids proceeds. Isolated and courageous was the action of Federal Judge George A. Welsh, who ordered the arrest of two Dies committee raiders and a detective after their Philadelphia invasion. Expressing the hope that the Supreme Court would ultimately review the committee's actions, Judge Welsh pleaded that "we in this country do not sacrifice liberty on the altar of patriotism." He asked that Mr. Dies refrain from using the seized documents until the legality of the seizure had been established. Mr. Dies promptly inserted them into the record of the committee.

The issues raised by these developments go beyond the immediate legality of the raids or of the demand for the membership lists. Obviously the lists have no relevance to responsible investigation. Even Mr. Dies may have grown belatedly alarmed at his own excesses; his proposal for legislation to compel the publication of membership lists of "foreign-affiliated organizations" sounds like an afterthought designed to thwart criticism of what has already been done. Presumably the legislation would embrace the Socialist Party—affiliated to the Second International—and many peace societies with international ties, as well as the Communist Party. The definition of "foreign-affiliated" is nebulous. Mr. Dies's definitions always are. But the consequences of such a measure are clear. It would provide a "Who's Who" of American radicalism as future reference for employers and G-men. Less objectionable is the measure proposed by Congressman Voorhis, calling only for the registration of foreign-allied groups, without disclosure of their membership files. But liberals in Congress might profitably spend more time fighting Martin Dies on the crucial issue and less time cautiously striving to improve on his suggestions. That issue is the right of minority parties to function without interference and persecution unless they are guilty of criminal acts. Mr. Dies has exposed no such acts.

Once again the Administration is on a spot marked out by Dies. But its plight is partly of its own making. Mr. Dies now says that the President must declare himself categorically on the legislation proposed. If the answer is no, Mr. Dies will announce that the White House is shielding the Kremlin. If the answer is yes, he will have won a momentous victory in his crusade against civil rights. Again Mr. Dies can't lose. But the alternatives are partly the result of the Administration's failure to combat Dies resolutely when the anti-red fever was lower. Now defense of civil rights, where Communists are involved, has become politically precarious.

Nevertheless the vicious circle must be broken somewhere. The Administration has tried the silent treatment, and it has failed. There still remains a wide, if inarticulate, body of sentiment that could be rallied now by forthright action. In Boston and Philadelphia leading citizens have protested against the Dies invasion. There are many people in the country who dread the approach of a new Palmer era, and see Dies as its forerunner. They recognize that the Dies committee is a deadlier peril to the republic than all of the menaces and pseudo-menaces it has exposed. Mr. Roosevelt could crystallize this feeling by bluntly saying no to Martin Dies and announcing that democracy can still afford to let freedom ring.

Pickpockets, Inc.

IT IS hard to keep a straight face, even in Wall Street, on hearing some of the horrified protests now rising against the new Wagner-Lea investment-trust bill. It may be that this is another underhanded attempt by subversive influences to discourage that freedom of investment thought necessary for recovery. But there are simpler explanations. After 1927 there was a mushroom growth of investment trusts of various kinds. From 1927 until 1935 a total of $7,000,000,000 was invested in them. Some 4,500,000 Americans handed over part or all of their savings to these trusts on the assurance that they would thus enjoy expert guidance and larger incomes. During that period the presumed master-minds of finance managing these companies succeeded in losing or looting more than a third of the capital intrusted to them. The average return paid the investor was less than 3 per cent, and in the case of the so-called management investment trusts, less than 2 per cent. To put it in another way, a business so risky that more than a third of the capital invested in it was lost paid smaller returns than could have been obtained in government bonds.

Investors lost almost $3,000,000,000 in these investment trusts, but in many cases wily promoters enriched themselves. The story of the United Founders group of investment trusts is illustrative. This group started in 1922 with a cash investment of only $500. It had $500,000,000 intrusted to it by November, 1929. By November, 1935, this sum had shrunk to $50,000,000. Virtually 90 per cent of the money invested had been lost. But the promoters fattened on catastrophe. According to the facts uncovered by the SEC investigation of investment trusts, C. Foster Coombs, one of the four original promoters of United Founders, had made $30,000,000 in 1929 in cash and securities from his enterprise. United Founders was a group of interlocking investment companies, and within this complex financial organism many strange things could occur. For the three-year period 1928 to 1930, the United Founders group reported total net investment profits of approximately $43,300,000. Not one penny of it was real. On the contrary, according to the SEC report, this "profit" actually hid a loss of $3,300,000. The loss had been covered and the "profit" created by intercompany transactions.

Section 30 of the Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 instructed the SEC to investigate investment trusts, and we can do no more at this time than indicate the nature of the findings in the voluminous reports it has been making on the subject. While a considerable number of investment trusts are conservatively and honestly managed and have good financial records, a great many have differed only in complexity from ordinary swindling. It has proved hard even to punish those responsible, much less provide restitution. Alfred A. Cook, counsel for the trustee of Continental Securities Company, told the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency during the hearings on the Wagner-Lea bill of the experience of that bankrupt investment company. In 1937 and 1938 "a group of plunderers" stripped Continental's investment portfolio of everything except $50,000 worth of securities. The loss to investors was $3,250,000, and although several of the company's officers were tried for larcency, all were acquitted.

The Nation is not prepared to indorse every provision of the Wagner-Lea bill, either as regards investment trusts or investment counselors. The bill seems, if anything, a mild measure dependent for its effectiveness on a militant SEC. But the main principles embodied in it seem to us essential if investors are to have some degree of safety in the future. It seeks to eliminate the corporate devices by which the investor has so often been plundered by the promoter. It would end the conflict of interests that made investment companies a source of profit to their directors. It provides for strict supervision of the accounting methods which have made it possible in the past to hide the true condition of investment companies and the true nature of transactions in which they were engaged. The practice of starting an investment company on a shoestring and a glib tongue would be ended. One provision would require an investment of $100,000 to organize an investment company. Another would limit its size to $150,000,000 in assets. We cannot believe that these provisions would interfere with any legitimate business practices. And unlike some people in Wall Street, we do not have so low an opinion of the capitalist system as to believe that it will be fatally undermined if investment bankers are not permitted to pick pockets.

Caribbean Refuge

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

I TRAVELED in one of the cars that took the first three settlers to Sosua, the new refugee colony in the Dominican Republic. We left Santiago de los Caballeros, chief town of northern Santo Domingo, soon after breakfast. In the party were Mr. Perlstein, manager of Sosua; a married couple, young doctors from Vienna, named Klinger; a still younger secretary, Miss Dannenberg; an official of the Dominican Department of Agriculture assigned to be our supervisor and guide; my husband and myself. The doctors and Miss Dannenberg had lived as refugees in Trujillo City for more than a year and had been selected as members of the resident staff at Sosua. In the cars were also the luggage of the three settlers, a few staples with which to begin housekeeping, lunch for everybody, and a cat. The cat was an important member of the party and a prospective colonist, though a Dominican rather than a refugee.

The road from Santiago was good part way, very rough toward the end of the trip. But as the road grew worse, the country became more and more beautiful. Green mountains and fertile valleys showed that rainfall was plentiful. The small plantations along the way were fairly comfortable; children and animals looked healthy. The people of this region are prevailingly light brown, lighter than in the southern part of the country. Several Dominicans had mentioned this to us with special emphasis as if its slightly smaller proportion of Negro blood was evidence of superior qualities in the population of the north.

We drove about three hours. Then, suddenly, as we rounded a shoulder of a high ridge, the land fell off toward the sea, and Sosua lay below us. We first saw the beach, white and sleek, bending around the green-blue water of the bay. Then we saw hills and pastures reaching down to the shore, and a collection of red roofs. The two Austrian doctors, our fellow-passengers, looked for the first time at the land that was to be their home, perhaps for the rest of their lives.

Sosua is a tract of land of more than 26,000 acres lying on the coast of Santo Domingo about eleven road miles from Puerta Plata, the principal port on the north side of the island. About 5,000 acres are rolling, cultivated pasture, and the rest is hilly country grown over with brush or tall timber. The land is well watered; the soil will grow a number of crops—fruits and vegetables for the settlers (mangos, avocados, bananas, plantains, oranges are now growing wild), and yucca and tobacco, cacao and coffee for sale. There is good pasture for cows. Mahogany and other valuable timber grow in the forests. Near the shore, placed among trees, stand some thirty houses, white with red roofs, well built and well kept. The largest will be the office and community center of the settlement. The others will shelter the first batch of settlers—150 to 200 people. Water is piped to the houses; they have electricity supplied by a small plant on the place.

Land and houses belonged originally to the United Fruit Company. The property was abandoned as a banana plantation about fifteen years ago, and only two years ago was bought by President Trujillo, who has kept it up as a private estate.

When the Intergovernmental Committee for Political Refugees was set up after the Evian conference, only one country answered its appeal with a generous, unqualified offer of asylum. That country was the Dominican Republic, better known in the past for the exiles it has turned out than for hospitality to victims of persecution. The representatives of Trujillo in London offered on behalf of his government to take up to 100,000 European refugees as colonists. No conditions were made except that the settlers should be carefully selected; the country needs farmers and skilled workers and a few professional people and technicians.

Trujillo's offer was examined and checked by several refugee groups, including representatives of the President's Advisory Committee. Every one approved the project, and the Dominican Republic Settlement Association was founded to make a final survey of the possibilities and then to undertake the actual establishment and financing of the colony. James N. Rosenberg is the president of the association and Joseph A. Rosen its vice-president. Dr. Rosen, an agronomist, was for years the operating head of "Agrojoint," which settled 300,000 Jews on 3,000,000 acres of land in the Crimea between 1922 and 1936. Mr. Rosenberg was chairman of the board of that great enterprise. Both know the problems of large-scale colonizing.

For two months this past winter Dr. Rosen studied the possibilities in the Dominican Republic. The Settlement Association was given the choice of several good tracts of agricultural land for the first colony, and all were explored by Dr. Rosen and his assistants. He finally selected Sosua as the most suitable. From a strictly agricultural point of view, one or two other areas were better. But in the qualities that go to make a successful colony—fertility, existing facilities such as houses and electricity and a good water supply, variety of soil and altitude, healthful climate, a deep-water anchorage, and, not least, natural beauty and a delightful bathing beach—Sosua led all the rest.

The next steps were political. Mr. Rosenberg set out for the Dominican Republic with an impressive delegation which included representatives of the Department of State and of the Intergovernmental Committee. They too examined and approved the selected site; within two weeks a contract was signed between the Dominican government and the Settlement Association providing for the immediate admission of 500 refugee families. More generous terms could hardly be imagined. The settlers will come in without paying the customary $500 entry fee; they are guaranteed freedom from discrimination or persecution; they may bring in personal possessions and equipment duty free; the property of the association is not subject to taxation. When the contract was ratified, Generalissimo Trujillo made over his Sosua estate as a gift to the Settlement Association. Exactly thirty days after the contract was ratified we drove to Sosua with the first members of the settlement's staff.

When we stopped at the door of the large, fine community house the cat jumped out first. He went to work inspecting his new quarters, avoiding the hearty welcome of a large police dog. The rest of us walked up the steps and through the rooms. They are furnished handsomely, if a little solemnly, with Dominican mahogany—large pieces, manufactured in the country. The further side of the house opens on a wide porch. Two low columns flank the steps. On each, when we stepped out, stood a peacock spreading its tail in the sun. Beyond were fruit trees, a rough pasture, then low cliffs and the blue sea, with blue mountains across the bay.

Caretakers were in the house, and, together with the new arrivals, they produced lunch on the porch—a good lunch, with wine to celebrate the occasion. We drank to Sosua, and everybody felt pleased and excited. No one spoke of the days of terror that stretched out behind; the sunny peace of the present was enough for that hour.

Some 500 families will be settled at Sosua. The association plans to bring them in gradually, as accommodations are made ready and suitable colonists are selected and money for their transportation and settlement is raised. Some of the refugees will be taken directly out of Germany; some will come from camps in Norway and Sweden and Holland. Trained young men and women will be sought as the first settlers. Ultimately it is planned to give each family an individual homestead of eight or ten acres, though the major crops will be raised and marketed collectively.

If the colony at Sosua is a success, more land will be secured and other settlements started. The beginning at Sosua looks small compared with the total problem—a few hundred families out of millions. But what Trujillo has done other governments can do. The example of the Dominican Republic has already had an effect, and negotiations are under way in a dozen different countries for the settlement of both German and Spanish refugees.

Why has Trujillo opened his country to the persecuted victims of dictatorship in Europe? Why has he given a huge and valuable tract of his own land as a haven for the exiles? Why does he show no concern over the introduction into his tight little dictatorship of some 2,000 Spanish republicans, every one a political exile?

I asked these questions myself before I went to Santo Domingo, and after I came away everyone I met asked me. The answers are not difficult to give as soon as one recognizes the wide differences between dictatorships in Latin America and in Europe.

Trujillo is not a fascist. During the Spanish war he even supported the Loyalists. Like every other dictator in the countries to the south of us, he describes his state as a republic. In so far as they do not inconvenience him, the forms of democracy are observed. (The Dominican Senate and Chamber of Deputies ratified the contract with the Settlement Association.) Trujillo is purely a personal dictator, unhampered by ideology. He does what he pleases. In ten years of absolute rule he has made himself enormously rich. Political opponents have been imprisoned or exiled or killed. He has taken their lands and other properties for such uses as he saw fit. He has given wealth and jobs to his relatives and chief supporters. Two and a half years ago, as Nation readers will remember, Trujillo's troops massacred many thousands of Haitians living in the northern part of the country. These people were poor, landless black men and women who had come into Santo Domingo to work on the sugar plantations and had settled down inside the frontier.

On the face of it, this record would seem to offer rather meager security to refugees from other tyrannies in Europe. But it is not wise to go merely by the record. Trujillo can be magnanimous when he happens to feel like it; and he can be a statesman. He has used his power to build up his country as well as himself. The country needs settlers; it is rich and undeveloped. Above everything else Trujillo desires to make it a "white" republic. The obsession with color in Santo Domingo dominates every upper-class mind. White or near-white workers are held to be vastly superior to the obviously colored ones. And Haitians, in their own country or in Santo Domingo, are looked upon with fear and abhorrence. The massacre was only mentioned by Dominicans twice in my hearing; both times it was spoken of as "the incident" and dismissed as of little consequence.

The Dominican Republic and Trujillo, its dictator, want white settlers. Ironically, the bitter race prejudice in the little Caribbean republic creates a haven for victims of a different race prejudice in the Reich. Jews are white, they are Europeans; they will bring in energy and higher standards of life and better ways of doing things. They will mingle, eventually, with the population, increasing the precious proportion of white blood. The same reasoning applies to Spaniards, about 2,000 of whom have come to the Dominican Republic. I asked a Spanish refugee in Trujillo City why the Dictator allowed Spanish radicals to come to Santo Domingo. He smiled without any rancor and said, "We are white and we can breed. That is enough." Not even political radicalism outweighs these considerations.

Several other minor considerations raise the stock of the refugees in the eyes of Dominicans. One is financial. The colonists imported by the association will bring money into the country. It is estimated that the cost of transporting and settling a family will be about $1,000. A substantial part of this will of course be spent in Santo Domingo. A second consideration is the prestige such a colony will bring to Trujillo and to the country. His standing will be raised in the eyes of other nations; President Roosevelt and the United States State Department, who at least disapproved of the slaughter of the Haitians, can be expected to look with more favor on Trujillo in his role as savior of the refugees. A third consideration is linked to the second: Trujillo naturally resents American control of Dominican customs, and so of its finances. He also resents the special preferences granted to Cuban sugar. A group of influential Americans, like those sponsoring the Settlement Association, will have an interest in promoting Dominican rights and Dominican prosperity in Washington.

These motives are neither better nor worse than the motives of most governments. Their very selfishness is a fair guaranty that Trujillo's promises will be kept. The refugees, especially those who come in under the wing of the Dominican Republic Settlement Association, stand a good chance of peace and happiness—at least as long as Trujillo holds power. And interested persons in all countries will watch with close attention to see how the Dominican government carries out the terms of its own agreement.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Men Who Would Be President

IV. WENDELL WILLKIE'S HAT IS ON HIS HEAD

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

OLD IRON PANTS was in fine fettle on the afternoon of November 20, 1939. The best-known American cavalryman since George Armstrong Custer was killed by the Indians was riding high at the luncheon of the Bond Club of New York at the Bankers' Club at the top of the Equitable Life Building around the corner from J. P. Morgan. General Hugh Johnson had galloped through his prepared speech and was now answering questions about possible Presidential candidates on the Republican ticket. He shied a bit when the name of one of the most prominent members of the Bankers' Club came up, saying something about Tom Dewey's lack of experience. And then a bond-peddler shouted, "What about Wendell Willkie?" and the General charged. Iron Pants then and there nominated Wendell Lewis Willkie, president of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, for President of these United States. The following week Arthur Krock of the New York Times, who had been restrainedly boosting Mr. Willkie for the past two years, seconded the General's nomination in his column, and the Wendell Willkie boom got under way.

Let's make it plain at the start that Mr. Willkie does not take this business too seriously. To newspapermen who reached him at Atlanta, Georgia, on the night of General Johnson's nominating speech, he said jocosely, "In view of the speed with which the federal government is taking over my business, I'll probably have to be looking for a new job shortly. General Johnson's is the best offer I've had thus far." To the writer he said the other day, "I know I am not going to be nominated for President. I have no ambition to be nominated for President. I have, however, been very anxious to put over certain ideas and have written and spoken of these ideas. Because of that, some people have suggested that I should be a candidate for President. I do not take this talk seriously. Several people have asked me whether, if I were nominated, I would accept. In order to preserve my intellectual integrity I have said yes, if it were on a platform in which I believed. I have, however, consistently refused many offers of financial help, all offers to seek delegates, and any kind of political assistance."

Mr. Willkie has been around. He knows that the president of an electric-utility holding company, indorsed by ex-cavalry generals, Times columnists, and hate-happy bond salesmen, bankers, and insurance men would somehow lack a popular appeal. So bowing to Mr. Willkie's good sense, we'll drop the Presidential-possibility talk and stick to the president of the Commonwealth and Southern and his views, who and which, in all conscience, are interesting enough.

Since 1933, when geography and his natural ability set him down in the Tennessee Valley as the top man of the privately owned electric utilities of those parts, he has been conducting a raucous, bitter-end warfare against the New Deal and all its works—especially its works in concrete and mortar—that has won him the grudging admiration of even the most starry-eyed New Dealers. And as for the haters of That Man, they are near to tears as they read under their exorbitantly priced electric lights the latest Willkie summons to rebel against the brutality of governmental attempts to supply cheap and abundant power to the underlying population. To be sure, some of the language of liberalism which Mr. Willkie employs in the Saturday Evening Post, the Hearst syndicated articles, the Atlantic Monthly, and the New Republic seems a bit far-fetched to his most devoted followers. What have civil liberties, the democratic process, and free enterprise got to do with pouring it into That Man? But on second thought Mr. Willkie is quickly forgiven for these liberal lapses, in view of the magnificent manner in which he stands up there and swaps blow for blow with the White House.

This is not to imply that all New Deal haters approve the Willkie tactics of howling to high heaven via radio and rostrum, newspaper and magazine. There are those in his own industry who wish that Wendell would be less articulate. However, none of this internal muttering ruffles one dark-brown hair in Mr. Willkie's abundant crop. He knows well enough that the tactics of the holding-company executives of the twenties made them and their pyramided monstrosities a stench in the noses of all decent Americans. Mr. Willkie wasn't around when Sam Insull was setting up the "Super-Power Poison Squad," as the People's Legislative Service called the National Electric Light Association. He wasn't there when Merlin Aylesworth made his famous remark at a convention of the N. E. L. A.: "Don't mind the expenses. The public pays." As a matter of fact, when the private-utility skulduggery was at its height, Mr. Willkie was practicing law in Akron, Ohio, defending, among others, rubber workers whose civil liberties had been violated.

It is said of Mr. Willkie that he is a "depression success." And it is said, invidiously, that it was just the Willkie good luck that he didn't appear on the utility scene until after the Big Blow of 1929. This is unfair. He never would have ridden with the old "kilowatt klan." His inheritance of a long tradition of genuine liberalism, his early democratic training in the little town of Elwood, Indiana, where he heard his father and mother, both lawyers and both liberals, talk progressive politics with Henry Georgites, La Follette men, and Socialists—this conditioning would have kept him clear of the holding-company hi-jackers of the twenties. It's against the Willkie grain to whisper in the dark. He is happiest when he is up on a platform tearing his expensive shirt over the way the government is manhandling free enterprise.

No master of irony could have devised a better plot sequence than the one which just the other day landed this small-town, big-framed Hoosier in a director's chair in Mr. Morgan's pet bank, the First National, still talking an indigenous American liberalism.

Elwood, where Mr. Willkie was born in 1892, was then a town of some 10,000 population. It is in the natural-gas belt. It had its normal quota of rebel spirits who gathered at the home of Circuit Court Judge Willkie, Wendell's father, and enjoyed hearing the Judge, and later on the Judge's son back from the Culver Military Academy, tear into the trusts. When Wendell went to Indiana University, he soon became known as one of the leaders of the campus radicals. Paul McNutt, who went to the university a few months ahead of Willkie, was already careering. The future self-anointed candidate for the Presidency on the Democratic ticket was up to his handsome eyebrows in college politics on the conservative side of the fence. Though Willkie and his rebel roughnecks were mildly derisive of the way McNutt pushed himself to the head of every organization from the presidency of his class to leading man in the university dramatic society, they were shrewd enough to figure that the McNutt formula of self-promotion couldn't very well fail in a world where most men prefer sitting around swapping stories, drinking beer, or playing games to collecting prospective constituents. When Willkie and McNutt were graduated in 1913, it was the latter whom most people picked as the more likely to succeed. Willkie was an able youngster, but a bit wild in his views, such as those on the abolition of inherited fortunes.

Willkie spent a year at Oberlin and was admitted to the bar in 1916. Big, good-natured, laughter-loving, and a horse for work, he made friends and obtained clients easily, and pretty soon the Akron law firm of Mather, Nesbitt, and Willkie was handling important electric-utility and railroad litigation in the rubber town. After representing a future Midwest subsidiary of the far-flung Commonwealth and Southern, Willkie became associated with Judge John C. Weadock, and in 1929 Weadock and Willkie became chief counsel for C. and S.

The year 1929 is an important one in utility history, for on January 7 of that year there was filed with the Secretary of State of Delaware the certificate of incorporation of the United Corporation. The formation of that holding company marked the entrance of the banking house of J. P. Morgan and Company into the power field, telling the world that the electric-power industry had reached full financial maturity. It was the announced intention of the House of Morgan and its ally, Bonbright and Company, to foster "closer relations among the great public-utility systems in the East"—or, in less fancy language, to buy controlling interest in operating companies in the center of the heaviest electrical traffic in the country, where rates to small consumers were frozen at monopolistic levels. Through the mystic technique of share-for-share swappings United acquired the important stock of the United Gas Improvement Company of Philadelphia and the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, the latter monopolizing the gas, electric, and transportation facilities of the Garden State. It was in the course of these involved transactions that Mr. Morgan and his partners, as was revealed at the Pecora hearings, thought up the chummy idea of issuing United shares to a preferred list of friends, financial writers, and deserving politicians at prices less than were charged to the public later on.

On May 23, 1929, Commonwealth and Southern was formed to combine the properties of three holding companies—Commonwealth Power Corporation, Penn-Ohio Edison Company, and Southeastern Power Company. United subscribed for 22.2 per cent of the shares and warrants of the C. and S., and U. G. I. subscribed for an additional 11.1 per cent. The Niagara-Hudson Power Corporation next entered United's domain and then the Columbia Gas and Electric. But by this time the deepening depression halted further extensions of United. Just how all this handing around of paper contributed either to the needed integration of electric facilities or to the national economy as a whole Mr. Willkie, who doesn't like any references to the Morganatic origins of his company, may be left to explain. That it did, however, contribute to the joint coffers of Morgan and Bonbright is evidenced by the fact that in June, 1933, the total profit realized by Morgan as promoter of the United was $19,200,000 (not including the take of the individual partners) and that Bonbright cleaned up $24,850,000.

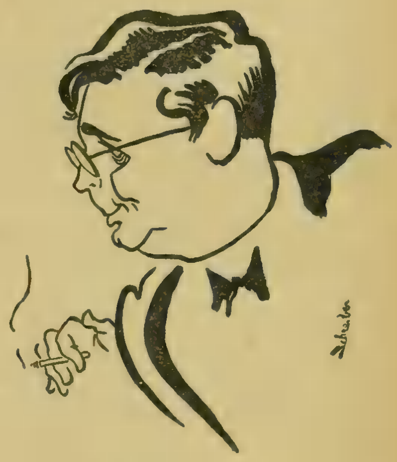
In 1933, the same year that the United stopped swapping, Mr. Willkie was elected president of the C. and S. to succeed B. C. Cobb. He headed a $1,128,501,778 system of electric companies sprawled over the map from Michigan to Mississippi.

A short four months after the big-muscled lawyer had settled down at the president's desk, he let out a howl whose reverberations have rung round the country with increasing volume ever since. For in May, 1933, the Seventy-third Congress of the United States created the Tennessee Valley Authority "for the purpose of maintaining and operating the properties now owned by the United States in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, Alabama, in the interest of the national defense and for agricultural and industrial development and to improve navigation in the Tennessee River and to control the destructive flood waters in the Tennessee River and Mississippi River basins." To this end the Authority was commissioned to construct dams and reservoirs, to manufacture and sell fertilizer at Muscle Shoals, and to produce, distribute, and sell electric power. It was, of course, this last which brought the full-lunged rebel yell to Mr. Willkie's lips.

The troublesome dichotomy which runs through all Mr. Willkie's speeches and writings now appeared in full public view. As a liberal, the former follower of the elder La Follette could hardly object to any steps which would alleviate the wretched lot of the poor people of the valley. Cheap fertilizer, checking of soil erosion, flood control—all to the good. But cheap power? At Birmingham, after a year of TVA, Mr. Willkie approved the industrial-expansion program of the Authority but decidedly did not approve the Lilienthal allocation of 52 per cent of total costs to power production. At White Sulphur Springs, at a convention of investment brokers, he first sounded the ruination note. He predicted that if someone didn't do something quick, TVA would ruin the private utilities. A year later he was taking in more territory by saying that "the utilities are the first industry to stand against the socialization of all industry."

At the outset the difficulty with Mr. Willkie's case was that it wouldn't stand up in the court of public opinion. When TVA and Mr. Willkie arrived almost simultaneously in the valley, the four big operating companies now gathered under the aegis of the C. and S. were doing the usual private-utility job of taking off the cream in the cities and letting the farms go dark. Wendell Willkie, the liberal, knew well enough that here was a normal functioning of any private monopoly of public resources. No one needed to tell him how rarely farmers outside Elwood, Indiana, for example, would get their mail if the Post Office were in private hands. But Wendell Willkie, president of the C. and S., looking with atrabilious eyes at the drop in utility stocks which followed the announcement of the TVA's minimum rate to farmers of 75 cents a month, got hot. When TVA rates to the cities and small towns, beginning at the much-fought-over Tupelo, came down to those charged by the publicly owned Ontario Hydro and the municipal power companies of the Pacific Coast, Mr. Willkie got hotter.

It is significant that the first groups to recover from the effects of Mr. Willkie's oratory were his own customers in the valley. When Chattanooga, for instance, got a chance to vote for TVA power in 1935, it did so, three to one. C. and S. sent $20,000 to the Chattanooga Citizens' and Taxpayers' Association, which had sprung to arms in defense of the Tennessee Electric Power Company, a Commonwealth subsidiary. The association bought itself a newspaper to offset George Fort Milton's courageous editorials in behalf of TVA in the Chattanooga News, and in addition saw to it that advertisers boycotted the News. It also informed the voters that teachers' salaries would be cut if TVA won the election, wept for widowed and orphaned stockholders, and dished out all the hoary anti-public-ownership scare stories. All to no avail. Though the methods employed by Mr. Willkie in this and other elections throughout the valley indicate that at times his play is rougher than it is fair, no one can accuse him of lack of frankness. When a Congressional committee found out about that $20,000, the only comment made by the president of the C. and S. was that he was sorry that it wasn't more.



Wendell Willkie

Pretty soon Mr. Willkie had persuaded himself that he was being persecuted by a governmental tyranny animated by the personal venom of the President of the United States. At a speech at the Town Hall Club in New York in 1935 he spoke of Roosevelt as "a member of the rentier class with money made in the speculative days of the railroads." The most famous peace conference which Mr. Willkie held with the President was in the fall of 1937, and as a result of that two-hour session both conferees issued sharp press releases which only served to widen the breach between them. In the President's version, Mr. Roosevelt had wondered what prevented Mr. Willkie from financing his Midwest companies, which were far removed from the TVA. Mr. Willkie, according to the President, had replied, "the general feeling," meaning the general feeling of uneasiness on the part of potential investors in utility stocks. The President had been amused at this. In Mr. Willkie's release on the peace pow-wow, he said that he had offered to accept the Administration's theory of "prudent investment" as a basis of valuation for rate-making purposes and to eliminate some of the "writing up" of which the holding companies were accused if the government would allow the holding companies to preserve their status quo.

Though every financial statement of the Commonwealth and Southern showed a neat profit—in 1937 it was more than $15,000,000—Mr. Willkie finally threw up his hands and announced that he would sell the properties of his company in Tennessee to the TVA. David Lilienthal had taken literally Jonathan Daniels's remark that "the South was sick of the dark" and was selling electric light at a price that bore some relation to the cost of generation and transmission. Unlike Mr. Willkie he didn't have to worry about widows and orphans, the ups and downs of the stock market, the fantastic salaries of executives, or advertising appropriations for friendly newspapers. When, last August, Mr. Lilienthal handed Mr. Willkie a check for $44,728,300, with more to come, the latter said, "This sure is a lot of money for a couple of Indiana farmers to be kicking around."

Homespun talk of this sort disarms Mr. Willkie's bitterest critics. No matter what you think of his views, you can't help liking the man, and always there is the thought that if he hadn't been counsel for the defense of so vulnerable an institution as the holding company, old-fashioned American liberalism would have had in him a doughty champion. Of course it just doesn't make sense for Mr. Willkie to shed tears over what he calls "the free-enterprise system" when he is head of a system which symbolizes monopoly in its crudest form.

Although Mr. Willike and his admirers profess to see no chance of his being nominated for the Presidency, he has of late been engaged in hammering out what might seem to an innocent bystander a fairly comprehensive platform, just in case. Arthur Krock, in a recent column commenting on an article of Mr. Willkie's in Fortune, wrote, "He made the best analysis of the case against the New Deal which has come to the notice of this correspondent, and therefore would be the clearest campaign leader against it." And though Mr. Krock hastened to add that his man "probably cannot be nominated by the Republicans," it is interesting to note that Mr. Willkie in that same Fortune article tackled the subject of this country's foreign policy.

The headings of his many articles indicate the general Willkie thesis. Idle Money—Idle Men, published in the Saturday Evening Post of June 17, 1939, explains that "government regulation, government competition, and government discouragement of investment are the three elements that compose the fear which dominates the business man and the investor today." When the people are stirred sufficiently to "force the government to abandon those hostile policies" we shall put both idle men and idle money to work once more. Brace Up America! in the Atlantic Monthly for June, 1939, says in summation, "We do not need to rescind any of the laws regulating industry; but we need to amend them so as to encourage new enterprises which can absorb our idle money and our idle men." This, says Mr. Willkie, is "a program for the assertion of one more of our neglected liberties—that of free enterprise—with the same vigor as we assert our liberties of speech, of press, and of religious worship." In Fair Trial, in the New Republic, he returns to the subject of civil liberties for free enterprise and says, "It is well to remember that any man who denies justice to someone he hates prepares the way for a denial of justice to someone he loves." This was a rehash of the love-and-hate theme he developed in the Saturday Evening Post under the heading With Malice Toward None. In that emotional piece Mr. Willkie said that after being pestered by regulatory boards in Washington he liked to drive around the Washington Monument, the Lincoln Memorial, and the home of Robert E. Lee, thinking the while how those three men would have treated the utilities with love in their hearts instead of hate.

In a recent speech at Toledo Mr. Willkie said that things have got so bad that the government now occupies the position which some people thought industry held in the twenties. "Not even a totalitarian state," he cried, "has more financial powers than those exercised by the present Administration." The Fortune foreign-policy essay was easier on the Administration in that it indorsed the reciprocal trade agreements. Mr. Willkie, however, does not think the Administration was consistent in lending money to Finland with restrictions against its use for war materials. He would furnish military supplies to all nations attacked by an "aggressor."

Mr. Willkie enjoys the distinction of being a literate person fallen among utility men. He prefers reading to golf and cocktail parties, especially reading English history. He recently wrote a scholarly review of a biography of the young Melbourne and is at work reviewing a life of the elder Pitt. In a way, like Miniver Cheevy, he was "born too late." He would have been an adornment to the British Liberal Party when that organization was more than Lloyd George and wind. Then he could have agitated for the widening of the democratic processes and the reform of the poor laws, haunted neither by specters of holding companies nor by the smiling countenance of Jerome Frank of the SEC.

Still, it's too bad that he doesn't take seriously this running for you know what. There is more fire and go in the man than in the whole colorless smear of Deweys, Tafts, and Vandenbergs. But we promised not to talk about that.

Writers in the Wilderness

III. KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

IT IS related that when Daniel Boone discovered smoke rising from a cabin only a hundred miles from his own he pulled up stakes and moved on because he didn't like being crowded. His great-great-great-great-granddaughter Katherine Anne Porter also admits to what seems to be a congenital need for "elbow room," both as human being and as artist. Writing of herself in "Authors Today and Yesterday," she says:

> All my intense growing years were lived completely outside of literary centers; I knew no other writers, and I had no one to consult with on the single vital issue of my life. This self-imposed isolation, which seems to have been almost unconscious on my part, a natural way of living, prolonged and made more difficult my discipline as an artist. But it saved me from discipleship, personal influences, and membership in groups.

Like her forbear Miss Porter has blazed her own trails and lighted her own fires, and if I may press the analogy so far, has made a clearing in the wilderness from which rises a solitary smoke.

Miss Porter was born in 1894 in central Texas, which happened to be trail's end for one branch of a family which has been wholly American since 1775 and in some of its ramifications since 1680. Before it was American it was Scotch, Irish, English, Welsh, Dutch, with a dash of French and Spanish. I am told that a documented history of half a dozen of its branches would trace quite accurately the history of the country, its land-seeking migrations, its political, economic, social, and even religious permutations—for whereas Daniel Boone had a Pennsylvania Quaker childhood, Miss Porter's background is Southern Catholic. Her name family has been in the South since 1775. In that year a remote grandfather Porter settled in Bowling Green, Kentucky, having come from Pennsylvania. Others settled in Tennessee "and set up little academies in the wilderness." They settled, too, in Louisiana and in South Carolina. It was Miss Porter's grandparents who went to Texas, where they joined a community of Kentuckians.

The "little academies in the wilderness" indicate that these were pioneers who carried a cultural pack along with their desire for more and better land. And this fact has its bearing. The household into which Miss Porter was born was one of a long connected line of households imbedded in America, one shoot of a vine far-spreading but firmly rooted in the American past; it also had what must have been a rather extensive library, ranging from the classics in old translations, through Shakespeare, the eighteenth-century novelists, Pope, Swift, Dr. Johnson, including the "Lives," Rabelais, Voltaire, the Brontës, Scott, Dickens, and Thackeray.

We may assume therefore a sense of permanence and continuity despite wanderings, and an atmosphere in which writing and reading did not seem alien, in which culture was not a highfalutin word but a known and accepted part of life. I do not mean to imply that these two factors had anything primary to do with making a writer; but certainly they affected the air and soil in which a particular talent developed. The world of literature was at hand to be discovered by that first fine passion for reading that is often thwarted for lack of books or wasted on the haphazard and meager bookshelf of the average household in a country where getting and spending is both work and pastime and where books are largely extraneous to the prevailing way of life. Miss Porter had absorbed at fifteen what many another only begins to know exists at a later age, even though her intense growing years were lived outside of literary centers. Shakespeare's sonnets were reality for her at fourteen. At fifteen or so she read the Russian novelists; at about the same time she was imitating Laurence Sterne in the course of what she says was for years almost a secret apprenticeship to a craft. Some time later she came upon Yeats, Joyce, Pound, Eliot. Writing in the Partisan Review last summer, she said that she could write an autobiography based on her reading until she was twenty-five, a statement which reflects the intensity of an early life spent in isolation, to be sure, but an isolation peculiarly rich in nourishment and stimulation. This secret interior life seems to have been more real than the real world. And as so often happens in the case of the imaginative, in-turning individual, her actual experience, though it included marriage, divorce and remarriage, jobs, an almost fatal illness, and much moving about, remained external and peripheral. Looking back, she observes that her knowledge of the world she lived in developed very slowly. And we may be sure that the process was one of instinctive absorption rather than of conscious frontal attack; every one of her stories testifies to that.

Miss Porter spent her childhood in Texas and Louisiana. She received what little formal education she had at small Southern schools for girls. It was scant and fragmentary, however, because she was a traveler from an early age. She has lived in New Orleans, Chicago, Bermuda, Mexico City, New York, Berlin. She spent considerable time in Paris after she received a Guggenheim fellowship in 1931. Only the writing, the interior life, was constant. In the article quoted above she said:

> As soon as I learned to form letters on paper, at about three years, I began to write stories, and this has been the basic and absorbing occupation, the intact line, of my life. . . . I made no attempt to publish anything until about ten years ago, but I have written and destroyed manuscripts quite literally by the trunkful. I say trunkful because I have spent fifteen years wandering about, weighted horribly with masses of paper and little else.

The first fruits in book form of Miss Porter's long apprenticeship appeared in 1930 when "Flowering Judas," a volume of six stories, appeared in a limited edition. In 1935 the collection was reissued together with four additional stories. Since then one more book has appeared containing three "short novels" under the title "Pale Horse, Pale Rider" (1939). At forty-five, therefore, she has published two books and a few stories scattered through the magazines. Yet her first book was enough to establish her reputation as one of the most accomplished of American writers of fiction. Unlike many writers Miss Porter did not learn her craft in public. The "promising" stage of her development was never exhibited. What we have had is the finished product. This has undoubtedly been one element in the sparseness of her production, though not the important one.

An examination of the title story of that first book easily explains the unanimous and joyous praise of critics accustomed to deal with bulk and "promise." This story is still to my mind one of her very best. The prose has extraordinary purity and concentration; it is delicate yet strong, and very clear; all the dross has been distilled out. What is more important, it never gives the effect of irrelevant or insipid prettiness, never therefore becomes a "style" because it never once, for its own sake, becomes separated from the story she has to tell, either its characters or situation; and what is most important, the story itself flows from reality as directly as a spring from a mountain side. The language, for all the skill one knows must have been employed, never appears as more than the medium, an invisible substance, through which reality makes itself manifest. It is only afterward, when one reflects that the way in which this particular reality has been made manifest is both significant and inevitable, that one becomes conscious of the deep-working sense of form. A second reading yields as much pleasure as the first, though of a different sort, for the subtle and sure coordination of form, substance, and style creates its own suspense. In this sense Miss Porter is a writer's writer, yet her stories have such seeming effortlessness and simplicity, they communicate reality so directly and vividly, that they have often aroused responses from the most unexpected and non-literary quarters. Needless to say, not all her stories reach the high point of Flowering Judas. Hacienda, for instance, is relatively poor. Yet most of them have the quality of uniqueness. Her capacity for absorbing varieties of experience is not limited by their disparity; consider, for instance, A Day's Work, which appeared recently in The Nation, and Flowering Judas or Noon Wine. The result is that taken together her stories give an impression of range out of proportion to their number.

Because of her very excellences, the critical excitement roused by Miss Porter's work has been part expectation. I shall not be the first to wonder publicly what the future will show and whether Miss Porter's talent is adapted to the longer, sustained form of the full-length novel which is demanded willy-nilly of every good writer of fiction. I raise the question not only because it has been an issue with the critics but because it provides as good a frame as any for an analysis of her special qualities as a writer. It would seem, moreover, to be an issue in her own mind. Her work shows a progressive reach toward longer forms; and her use of the term "short novels" to describe the three 20,000-word stories in her last book seems to suggest both defense and aspiration.

As I have already indicated, Miss Porter's creative process in relation to her material is that of intuitive absorption rather than the frontal attack based on conscious intellectual formulation.

> My whole attempt [she has written] has been to discover and understand human motives, human feelings, to make a distillation of what human relations and experiences my mind has been able to absorb. I have never known an uninteresting human being, and I have never known two alike; there are broad classifications and deep similarities, but I am interested in the thumb-print.

The panorama, with its furniture and stage props, social or political, cannot engage her. She will never write a "novel of American life," for the large generalization is alien to her. She will never attempt to conquer confusion or chaos by describing it, as American writers do over and over again—with results interesting or dull but never final. Her writing proceeds out of clarity achieved.

Both in conception and execution her work seems to me to bear the relation to prose that the lyric bears to poetry. Her intelligence is extraordinary, but it is akin to that of a poet rather than, say, of a novelist like Henry James, who was also interested in the thumb-print but had both the strong desire and the capacity for broad formulation which the long flight requires.

So far as I can see, Miss Porter is driven by no compulsion to impose order on the confused and chaotic American wilderness. She hates many of its manifestations and suffers from them, but the sense of detachment from public life, including her own, the "self-imposed isolation which seems to have been almost unconscious," remains. Considering the long-winded and inept attempts to make order which pour from the presses every year in the form of half-realized and half-concealed autobiography, I have no reproaches. The thumb-print in the wilderness may have a limited significance, but the large formulation in this particular time and place is pretty likely to be false.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Given these considerations and Miss Porter's bent, I think her best work will continue to be done in the shorter forms. Of the stories in her last book, Noon Wine seems to me superior to Old Mortality, good as it is, and much superior to Pale Horse, Pale Rider. Old Mortality resembles the novel rather than the short story; naturally, being slower paced, it lacks the tension and suspense which Noon Wine shares with Flowering Judas. But it lacks also the compensating depth and range of the novel. As for Pale Horse, Pale Rider, it verges on the sentimental and gives an impression of diffusion and fabrication which are almost non-existent in Miss Porter's work as a whole.

My own demand is for more short stories of the quality of Flowering Judas. Yet I believe that Miss Porter's productivity, in public, will continue to be limited. Her pride in craftsmanship is one element. I also suspect many an unfinished manuscript. She works in spurts of energy followed by periods of inertia. This suggests what her best stories show, a pattern of creative impulses which are intense but relatively short in span. It makes for freshness in each new story; it does not indicate quantity production. But in setting up a "little academy" of form in the wilderness Miss Porter has made a valuable contribution to American writing.

Miss Porter lives at present in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, where she has plenty of elbow room. She is a social being—with extraordinary personal and social charm—who likes talk, visiting, and "plain playing." The practical arts of cooking and gardening engage her, and on one occasion, I am told, she practically denuded the surrounding neighborhood of fruits and vegetables for an orgy of canning.

In the list of her more serious avocations music comes next to books. In 1933 her "French Song Book" was published privately in Paris. It is a collection with music of old songs in the original and in translation. She likes best music up to Mozart; she is fond of the old stringed instruments; and her preoccupation with musical forms seems to me apparent in the structure of such a story as Maria Concepcion.

[This is the last of a series of articles on American writers.]

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Sterling: Fears and Facts

THE pound sterling, once the rock-like symbol of international capitalism, has ceased since the war to be a free, universally acceptable currency. It has not suffered the nightmare transformations of the mark, which for years has been broken up into a series of practically unconnected currencies, but it has taken on a split personality, and the cleavage has rapidly widened in the past few weeks.

At the outbreak of hostilities last September the British exchange-control authorities, who for a long time had been holding the dollar-sterling rate at around 4.70, stepped aside and let the market take its own course, though at the same time stringent restrictions on the transfer of funds abroad by British residents were instituted. When selling pressure lessened and the rate was around 4.00, the control took charge again. An official rate of 4.03 was then established, at which perforce the majority of London exchange transactions have since taken place.

The British merchant purchasing American steel sheets must now obtain the dollars he needs to meet the bill from the Bank of England, and pay for them at the official rate. Similarly the exporter of goods to the United States or the capitalist who has sold American stocks on Wall Street must turn over the dollar proceeds to the authorities, accepting sterling in exchange. But not everyone who wants to turn sterling into dollars is permitted to use the official channels, and consequently a "free" market has developed in New York and other financial centers. An American resident who possesses a bank balance in Britain, or who receives dividends from an investment there, may receive permission to remove his money. But the authorities will not provide him with dollars, and hence he must seek exchange in the free market, where rates fluctuate in accordance with supply and demand. Until recently the demand has been fairly well maintained by importers and others with bills to pay in Britain, who have naturally sought to obtain sterling where it was cheapest. As a result, the free rate, after an initial plunge in September, recovered, and remained for some months only a few cents below the official quotation.

Recently, however, free sterling has slumped sharply. Last week it dropped at one moment below 3.50, and at the time of writing it is 3.57. This movement is the result of new regulations introduced in Britain in an effort to increase the supply of dollars in the hands of the authorities. Thus exporters of certain goods of which Britain or the empire has a near-monopoly—tin, rubber, jute, and Scotch whiskey are leading examples—must now make out their invoices in certain specified foreign currencies, which must of course be exchanged at the official rate. This means that the American importer of whiskey can no longer economize by buying free sterling. And since genuine Scotch cannot be obtained from any other source, this popular British product will bring in more dollars to the Bank of England.

At the same time the cessation of demand for sterling in the free market by importers of goods of this kind naturally tends to depress its dollar value. This, in turn, means that importers of competitive British goods, such as textiles, are able to pay for them more cheaply. In some quarters this aspect of the situation has caused protests, and the action of the British government has been described as an example of exchange manipulation for the purpose of obtaining trade advantages. It must be acknowledged, however, that the effects of the war on Britain's balance of payments have been such that sterling, whether free or controlled, can hardly be considered artificially depressed. On the contrary, it is standing at an unnaturally high level and is being maintained there by a constant drain on Britain's gold and foreign investments.

For generations Britain's imports have vastly exceeded exports, but payments for shipping and other services, and the return on foreign investments, enabled it to balance its international accounts and keep sterling on an even keel. On the outbreak of war, however, imports jumped tremendously. True, purchases of certain foreign luxuries were either restricted or prohibited, but this did little to offset the insatiable demands of the war machine. Moreover, economic dislocation caused a simultaneous slump in exports, and although there has been recovery in this department it has not kept pace with the increase in imports. As a result the adverse balance of trade has risen in the first six months of the war to over $1,844,000,000, representing a rise of 51 per cent over a year ago. Continuance of this trend implies that Britain, in order to balance its accounts with the rest of the world, will be compelled to draw on capital reserves to the tune of at least $2,000,000,000 a year. In these circumstances, it is hardly surprising that every possible step should be taken to economize in the use of foreign exchange and to tap new sources where possible.

Some measures which the British government has taken are decidedly inconvenient to American interests. Tobacco growers feel aggrieved when British cigarette manufacturers turn to Turkey; California fruit farmers protest when Britain reduces its consumption of fruit and buys only from the empire, where payment can be made in sterling; cotton planters curse when Lancashire switches more of its orders to Brazil, with which business can be done on a barter basis; industrialists are alarmed when they hear of an intensive British export drive in Latin America.

Against the harm suffered or feared by such interests must be set the fact that actually American trade has received a very considerable stimulus from the war. In the first two months of this year exports have expanded by $283,769,000. Imports have risen, too, but only by $105,356,000, and the increase has largely been in raw materials with no sign of "dumping" by means of depreciated sterling. Nor has Britain cut into our Latin American markets. On the contrary, we seem to have gained a large part of Germany's extensive business in that direction. All in all, there is little evidence of harm done to American business as a whole by British war-time financial and commercial policies. In fact, the European conflict has brought us a significant expansion in business, which, while not justifying the term boom, is helping to sustain our economy by offsetting to some extent the decline in government spending.

In the Wind

THE SALEM (Oregon) Chamber of Commerce invited journalist Richard L. Neuberger to address its members and told him to select his own topic. He informed the Chamber that his subject would be "Why I Am a Liberal." Shortly afterward the invitation was abruptly withdrawn. The Chamber also announced that a secret program committee would henceforth choose speakers—and subjects—for meetings.

ALTHOUGH THERE has been no official explanation of the change, Father Coughlin's broadcasts since his one-week disappearance from the radio have been significantly nonpolitical. He talks almost exclusively on religion and avoids controversial issues. Two possible explanations are: (1) he wants the furor over the Christian Front exposure to subside; (2) he has finally been curbed by church authorities.

LONDON REPORTS (on unreliable authority) the appearance of the following ad in a Nazi newspaper: "Parrot, Lost. . . . Will finder kindly return to the address below. Note—the opinions of the parrot are not those of the owner."

A NAZI propaganda film, "The West Wall," was recently scheduled for exhibition at the German House in St. Louis. The directors of the House canceled the showing because many St. Louis Germans affiliated with the House don't like Hitler. . . . All ex-members of the Ku Klux Klan are being circularized in the current effort to bring the Klan back to national prominence.

WHILE THE BREACH between John L. Lewis and the White House undoubtedly has many causes, intimates of Lewis insist that personal rebuffs play a crucial part, especially F. D. R.'s rejection of Lewis's advice on appointments. It is said that Lewis vigorously proposed the appointment of Josephine Roche as head of the Federal Security Administration; Paul McNutt was named by the President. The same thing happened with NLRB appointments.

SOCIETY NEWS: "Five attractive, amusing, and intelligent socially eligible Bostonians (two couples, one bachelor), short of funds, would like invitation to spend week-end with well-to-do Aryans with good cellar. References furnished and required. Box 719-D."—From the Personals column of the Saturday Review of Literature.

RUSSIAN NEWS: "Twenty-two years of Bolshevism have made the Russians a runty race. Their stature has been reduced eight inches."—Editorial in the Chicago Tribune. . . . "All [the Soviet prisoners] were tall, broad-chested, silent fellows."—Dispatch to the New York Times.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

FROM a reader of The Nation comes a letter not unfamiliar in tenor written from Belleville, Illinois, the town in which some of my ancestors settled in search of tolerance after their flight from German autocracy in the eighteen forties. This correspondent is much perturbed because I ventured to object to Franklin Roosevelt's becoming a candidate for a third term. "Why," she writes, "do you never miss an opportunity to denounce the President? He has accomplished far more than any other President of recent years, but never have I heard one word of praise from you. It is always denunciation. You say he should do more for home conditions. He has done a good deal more than most Presidents." And then this delightful person says out of her broadmindedness that she is telling on me to the editor of The Nation and assuring Miss Kirchwey that if I continue in "this Hoover-like vein" she will be "forced to take the New Republic instead of The Nation."

At first I thought I would consign this letter to the waste-paper basket, where I have thrown so many hundreds and thousands like it during the four decades of my newspaper activities, but then I fell to thinking. I wondered just how many such had come into my hands and how large a percentage of them wound up in the same way: "If you don't write as I want you to write, I'll read somebody else." I reflected, too, on how many of the writers had been guilty of just such false statements as the lady made about my comments on the President. Again and again and again when I have received letters protesting against my or Freda Kirchwey's or somebody else's articles in The Nation, or the Evening Post, or the Nautical Gazette, or some other publication I owned or edited at the time, I have been simply appalled at the evidence they offered of how little the average reader read or remembered of the articles in the publication to which he subscribed. One leader that offends them is singled out and all the rest forgotten. The years of service that the paper may have rendered to them, the enormous amount of useful information they may have obtained from the editors and contributors, go for naught. This lady, for example, says The Nation is a "wonderfully fairminded periodical," which "always gives credit where credit is due [outside of my page] and goes after hypocrisy and injustice in a truly admirable manner." Yet she is ready to deprive herself of this admirable paper because one old contributor fails to please her!

Well, I could show her many, many pages of mine in which I have praised Franklin Roosevelt and the New Deal. I have said, for instance, that the President has done more for labor than all our other Presidents put together, that his social-welfare legislation has at last put the United States abreast of other great nations. I might even recall that I praised his Chicago "aggressor" speech when other liberal editors damned him for it. I might point out to her that the President himself, although I do oppose him from time to time, is broadminded enough to let our friendship continue and flourish. But what would be the use? The fairmindedness she praises in The Nation is not hers if she will not allow an honest journalist the right to differ from her hero in the White House.

There is, however, a serious side to this letter. An unreasoning enthusiasm for a political leader is a dangerous thing in any country. The passionate devotion to Franklin Roosevelt felt by so many people, their belief that he can do no wrong, and that there is no one else who can serve and save the Republic at this time, is nothing new in our political life. Theodore Roosevelt had his following which felt that he could never err. One of them said to me, when I proved to him that T. R. had been guilty of an ethically improper act, that it didn't make any difference to him what the President did: if he killed his own mother, this man would still be for him. Now we have the F. D. R. fanatics, who believe either that he can do no wrong or that the good he does entitles him to do some wrong—at least he should not be criticized for it.

This is a most dangerous attitude for any considerable part of the electorate to take. It emboldens the executive in question to go beyond his powers and to do things he would never think of attempting if there were a keen, intelligent, objective, and critical public opinion confronting him. If Franklin Roosevelt should be given a third term, it would, in my judgment, encourage him to pursue policies and to exercise powers that would be gravely detrimental to the future of this country—here I am again offending the objector I have quoted! Yet in this crisis of the Republic it is essential that public men should be judged by the highest standards; no amount of personal admiration or affection such as I feel for the President should free me or any other independent journalist from holding the scales even so far as is within our power. Certainly this is not yet a one-man country, nor has the time yet come to hold any man beyond criticism, however numerous his good deeds.

Prologue to February

BY FRANZ HOELLERING

[The following episode, from a forthcoming novel, takes place in Vienna two weeks before the February days of 1934, when the Socialists, besieged in the Workers' houses and hopelessly outnumbered, made their last heroic stand against the troops of the Dollfuss regime.]

THE council meeting was held in the Workers' Home. The committee had proposed using one of the secret meeting-places where the workers were accustomed to take refuge from the hostile state. But Hippmann had opposed this move. His argument had been that they were more safe from spies in the Workers' Home; behind it was hidden the unexpressed desire to deprive the mounting tendency to conspiracy of a background that encouraged it.

At the long green council table and along the walls sat fifty men and several women. Most of them were in their working clothes; they had come directly from the factories. When Hippmann entered, the tired backs straightened in unison. The union representative, Müller, interrupted his whispered conversation with the district secretary.

At the table sat the older committeemen. They were all known to Hippmann; they were his friends, upon whom he had been able to depend at elections. The party, acting through these calm and steady men, had resisted all revolutionary temptations when its power was absolute at the collapse of the empire, and had determined upon the slow and difficult course of evolutionary democracy. "As they did not become presumptuous in those days, so they will not despair now," thought Hippmann, as his greeting, "Friendship," was answered with a heavy chorus of "Friendships" and with deferential nods and cordial handclasps. The greeting sounded less spontaneous from the corners opposite the head of the table, where a seat had been reserved for him next to the chairman. Up there were grouped men of a different type, younger men with determined faces. Against his will Hippmann's heart was drawn toward them. In their midst he saw Scheller, tall, thin, a soldier rather than a party functionary.

The chairman put out his hand toward the little bell in front of him; the silence was complete before the gesture ended. The bright little trill leaped over the long green table between the many serious faces as over a meadow. The formalities of opening the session were quickly disposed of. The representative of the governing council of the party was given the floor.

Hippmann put together, neither too slowly nor too quickly, the papers which he had been turning over during the brief address of the chairman. It gave him time to overcome a disturbing train of thoughts and impulses, of hesitations, of contradictions, even of fear. He waited another moment, already on his feet, a moment of concentrated perception comparable to the tension of the actor emerging upon the stage. This tension, as he well knew, was communicated to his audience, and he must feel it vibrating back before he could begin to speak.

It was a delight to the speaker Hippmann to conceal his technique. In contrast to many of his comrades he knew that politics was not everything; he had learned that his hearers were most grateful for good handy sentences which they could take home into their private lives. He avoided all the superiority of the expert; he remained a human being with imperfections, guarding the connection between ideals and daily life. He awakened the feeling in his audience that he knew far more than he said, and that he could have been, even outside the political field, a leader and a counselor of men. Now and then he inserted into his argument a statement no one could contradict, and allowed it to give color to more doubtful ones. He was capable of interrupting a complicated analysis of the political situation with the affirmation of the fact that two times two is four, as if he had been saying nothing else in more difficult passages. Precisely calculated gestures, which habit had made second nature, bridged the chasm between what was said and what was left unsaid and perhaps better not said. Bad speakers called him an actor. Let them be jealous! It was not true that he misused his talent; he was no demagogue. He said what he thought. Or thought what he said. Which came first, the speaking or the thinking? —this question sometimes caused him moments of discomfort, especially when he was tired. But he was over fifty, and he had become a public institution. This institution had to go on functioning.

The spokesman of the party's governing council began with the unexpected observation that readiness to stake one's life on one's convictions was the first mark of an ethical personality. He pronounced this sentence slowly and in his most earnest manner. A tone of finality vibrated in his voice and evoked in the hearts of his hearers memories of the truly elevated moments of their lives. Weary eyes shone. The oppressiveness changed into solemnity. It was the old and ever-effective magic of Hippmann; when he spoke, the most exhausted piece-worker felt once more like a human being. The opening of his speech was of course a bid for favor. But not even Scheller felt it to be so. Hippmann's reputation as a fighter was firmly founded. Since he had become known to the broad party masses in 1917 as organizer of the famous January strike against the continuation of the war, he had voted in every crisis for the more radical solution. In 1919 he had been in favor of a thorough cleaning out; in the crisis that followed the burning of the Palace of Justice in 1917 and even more vigorously during the past month of March he had demanded the general strike and the arming of the Defense Corps to uphold the democratic constitution. He had earned the right to criticize the radical opposition. The party council knew what they were doing when they sent him, thought Müller, the union representative, who began to write figures on the pad before him: 1919, 1927, 1934; again and again, large and round.

BURLINGAME

Passing on to the order of the day, Hippmann offered excuses for the organizers of last Saturday's demonstration, who had flouted the party's orders. How well he could understand them, their impatience and their élan! That thousands of workers had responded to their call was reason enough to take them seriously. It would be a grave error to dismiss them as irresponsible fanatics. They were the advance guard of the workers of Vienna. If, nevertheless, he was obliged to condemn the demonstration unreservedly, it was in the first place not for the merely formal reason that it had been a breach of party discipline but for the much more decisive one that during a crisis in which the party's very existence was at stake it was inexcusable to play with fire. To stage a demonstration and then permit it to be dispersed without effective resistance—that was always a grave mistake. If war, then war! Half actions were bad actions. They disappointed friends and encouraged enemies. They were simply bad politics. It was such actions that he had come here to condemn. And he had come for a higher purpose, to contribute to the clarification of every mind before it was too late. For he could give to even the most impatient his assurance that a decision was imminent.

Thus it was well always to begin with fundamentals. Who was the enemy? Whom must they fight? Was it the government? Or the Home Guard allied with the government and bent on taking it over? Was it the National Socialists, who opposed both? Behind the government stood the League of Nations, public opinion in England and France, and the Catholic church; behind the Home Guard stood Italy; and behind the National Socialists, the Third Reich. The government itself was not united. Its democratic wing was eager to make peace with the workers in order to protect the country against a German putsch or plans for annexation; its Home Guard wing was pro-Fascist and relied on Italian help against Germany; the dominant center, though inclined to make common cause with the Home Guard, was unable to come to a decision. These facts raised many questions. Were the workers of Austria strong enough to fight three opponents at once? Could they make use of the conflict among these opponents? Was it still possible to maneuver? Were all these opponents equally dangerous or was there a chief enemy? "Such is our situation, such are our problems," said Hippmann and took a sip of water to give his hearers time to grasp all the complications implied.

Continuing, he answered his own questions one after the other. It was as simple as ABC, or at least his manner made it seem so. Chief enemy: the National Socialists; compared to them the Home Guard was almost a cultural movement. Enemy number two: the Home Guard as the foe of democracy. Enemy number three: the government itself as long as it did not, at least in principle, restore the Parliament and freedom of press and assembly. The party could agree to a necessary limitation of formal democracy during a period of its probable abuse. In this case the common fight would be waged against the common enemy, the National Socialists, and for the very independence of Austria. Was that not clear?

"Clear." The firm voice of Scheller resounded through the room. "But enemy number three confronts us daily with Home Guard, police, and soldiers. We see no desire to come to an understanding with us."

"I can assure you, from personal knowledge, that forces in the government are working toward an understanding with us . . ."

"We have no faith in those forces," Scheller interrupted. "The government undermines our position by every means in its power. Its ally, the Home Guard, demands our destruction. The great industrialists and landowners are eager to kill two birds with one stone. That's their idea. It's also the idea of the Italian politician . . ."

The chairman rang his bell, but at a gesture from Hippmann permitted Scheller to continue.

". . . and the question is, whose support will the government rely on in its struggle with National Socialism—on ours, that is, on the people of Austria, or on Italy? I am convinced that the government has determined to pay Italy its price—our annihilation. The enemy we must fight, whether we want to or not, is this government. There is a last chance that the government will free itself from the Home Guard's clutches, if we are strong and determined, if we force them to it."

There was a murmur of applause from the group surrounding Scheller. The older men at the table looked expectantly at Hippmann, who went on in his friendliest tone.

[Continued on Page 493]

THE DEFENSE OF BELLES-LETTRES

BY LOUISE BOGAN

A NEW review, Horizon, devoted to literature and art appeared in England in January, 1940, and has now reached its third issue. In view of the battering that belles-lettres have been subjected to in the preceding ten years, this event deserves serious consideration. During times of economic crisis, when leaders of organized "class struggle" take over, the lines of communication must be kept clear at all costs. Ten years ago literature as "fine" or pure art was found to hamper these lines. Language had its purpose to serve, and its purely formal and delight-giving manifestations not only wasted time but obscured the issue. Some aspects of writing as an art, however, were found hard to clear away. But they could be slandered. "Ivory tower" became a term and image greatly execrated. It was suggested that bombs be dropped on it. To its defenders the imaginary "refuge" sometimes resembled a border fort, with the slings and arrows coming over in relays.

Early in the thirties, after the first mass desertion of intellectuals from the field of aesthetics, open fighting was general. This was the "We'll put you all behind tractors!" period, and feeling ran high. During heated discussions it often seemed likely that bookcases containing the less "useful" products of man's pen needed actual physical defense, to save certain volumes from being thrown into the fireplace or out the window. After 1935 all this changed. The attacks became more insidious and genteel. Highly moral "challenges" were issued. The bullying still went on, but in a nicer way. "Pantry poets" were mentioned, and poets who resembled "gentlemen's gentlemen." Poetry became "the deliverer of the people" in dinner-party speeches. Shakespeare and Dante were brought in as poets whose work was "native to the actual world." Not a word was uttered concerning contributions to life made, for example, by Villon, Mallarmé, Rimbaud, Baudelaire, Thomas Campion, Heine, Leopardi, or Alfred de Vigny. Mere valets, one and all!

This second period was actually more destructive of good sense and fine standards than the earlier name-calling. In America, when devotees of the class struggle merged with the bourgeoisie, they allied themselves with the culture hungry, a deadly species known to young societies. Art must be ironed out into acceptable gentility. "Give us something morally uplifting which we can understand" covered the implicit "Give us something creatively rigid which we can use [and make a profit on, both spiritually and materially, if possible]. Give us something boiled over, watered down, slick, mechanically perfect; something to open our tear ducts and still our conscience, while giving our minds no trouble." The "revolution" found itself in a spot; in the exact spot which every American writer worth his salt had always taken steps to avoid.

Let us examine the term "ivory tower." To whom was it first applied, and by whom? Many commentators, including, on one occasion, the present writer, have gone astray, and attributed the phrase to Vigny himself. The matter was publicly settled once and for all by E. M. Forster, who correctly attributed the term to Sainte-Beuve, who applied it in 1837 to Vigny. And why was Sainte-Beuve's term, as applied to Vigny, hardly one of opprobrium? Born in 1797, four years after the execution of Louis XVI, Vigny died in 1863, when the absolute power held for ten years by Napoleon III was undergoing its first revision. "Vigny had lived through regimes so different," writes a recent biographer, "that everything in the universe seemed to him unstable. Poetry and thought alone remained safeguards and protectors." Like Stendhal, Vigny was an early and ruthless critic of the crude standards of a beginning bourgeois rule. In "La Maison du Berger" he described the artist, not as a cowardly renegade, but as a companion of the holy Muse. It was politicians, the interested and the arrivistes, who were fighting on the other side.

Le pur enthousiasme est craint des faibles âmes
Qui ne sauraient porter son ardeur et son poids . . .

And where, one may now with reason ask, would the great poetry of the generation succeeding Vigny have found a base and a champion if Vigny had not held out against the signs of his "times"? Without Vigny as forerunner it is difficult to imagine Baudelaire or even Flaubert. The art of writing in France, sweeping onward and upward with Victor Hugo, without Vigny's example might have struck a period repulsive in its hollowness and sententiousness, instead of developing, from Baudelaire, into a series of schools from which the best modern writing in all languages directly stems.

After Edmund Wilson's "Axel's Castle" (1931) no book concerned in a disinterested way with the development of English and American literature since 1900 appeared until the publication of Cyril Connolly's "Enemies of Promise" in the spring of 1939. Connolly brought the development down to the present. With wit and insight he traced down innovators and defined schools. From the death of the English aesthetic movement after the imprisonment of Wilde, through the rise of the Hearty Genteel Georgian and Mandarin Prose (Strachey, Woolf, Huxley, including the English translation of Proust), through the appearance of Hemingway's Tough Guy and Spender and Auden, to the end products of the "writing-for-the-masses" enthusiasm, Connolly gives chapter and verse—dates, tables, and examples.

What, Connolly asks—and it is he, with Stephen Spender, who has launched the new review, Horizon—must the writer now do in order to breast the confusion and write a book which will have some chance of survival? He concludes that it would be a good thing at present if the writer took Gide's advice and dared to swim against the current. Can there be a revival of imaginative literature possessing, the influences merging, "that discipline in the conception and execution of a book, that planning, which gives simply written things the power to endure—without which the imagination reverts to the wilderness"?

Will the almost psychopathic hatred and distrust of "pure" writing, fostered by political parties, continue or by degrees fade out? Whole new regions have developed for writers' exploration during the years they have spent documenting their surroundings or indulging in bad-tempered baby-talk. Can a review dedicated to disinterested comment upon literature and the life it at once derives from, deepens, and delights now survive, or are the guilt-fear-hatred hold-overs of the last decade still too unresolved to allow its survival? Are there no young people with talent and detached minds, eager for refreshment and example? Will the ivory tower continue to be represented as a coward's refuge, and not as the workshop, stronghold, and place of meditation without the concept of which no generation can produce the combined brave fighter, sensitive thinker, and good workman known to all ages as the artist?

The World of William Faulkner

THE HAMLET. By William Faulkner. Random House. $2.50.

I DON'T suppose it makes sense to call a book wonderful, and then proceed to dismiss it. But I have come away from "The Hamlet" conscious of its prodigious talent, yet unwarmed, unmoved, and unrefreshed. The book's poetry is close, at times, to magnificent—but it is poetry of the senses only, without regard to the emotions. The book's sly, perverse humor is undeniable; yet it is a humor which, for the very reason that it moderates the horrors it plays upon, somehow robs those horrors of the dignity and importance which alone would justify them. The book's imaginativeness has enabled Faulkner to create something like a world of his own; yet that world is too artificially lighted and too demoniacally propelled to mean anything as revelation. I suppose that Mr. Faulkner's world chiefly disappoints me by seeming inhuman, so that—for all Mr. Faulkner's gifts—it never seems of first-rate interest. (It has a first-rate fascination, but that is not the same thing.)

Mr. Faulkner's forte, like that of the South he inhabits, is decay. A certain romantic streak prevents him from doing a really bang-up job on the decay of the Southern aristocracy; but when he gets going with pore whites, absolutely nothing inhibits him from exploring the most polluted streams and malarial swamps of the subhuman spirit. In "The Hamlet" he introduces the Snopes family, a clan that sometime after the Civil War descended on a Mississippi settlement called Frenchman's Bend and left its mark there. There was old Ab Snopes, whose popularity was a little diminished by his reputation for burning down other people's barns; and Mink Snopes, who soon was involved in murder; and Ike Snopes, an idiot boy who fell in love with a cow; and above all, Flem Snopes, who, using his father Ab's arsonical tendencies as a club to browbeat the town, eventually came to own it.

If I have touched on the Snopes activities with a touch of levity, I suppose it is because—once I had come out from under Mr. Faulkner's spell—they seemed a little too bad to be true. The story of Flem Snopes is really extraordinary in itself; so is the tale of the girl he married; so is the tale of the idiot boy. But the Snopeses as a tribe are somehow a lot less horrifying than any one particular Snopes, just as one Kallikak would seem a very painful subject, but a dozen Kallikaks might appear to be rather nice playmates for one another. The point is that something most shocks or terrifies us because it seems out of line; you must set the abnormal against the normal to grasp how abnormal it is. Mr. Faulkner, in "The Hamlet" as in much of his other work, provides us with no sense of contrast. If it is his great gift to be able to create a world of his own, it is his equally great limitation to make that world a little too different from ours to seem entirely convincing—or, I am tempted to say, relevant.

I certainly don't quarrel with Mr. Faulkner's material—we all are aware of the things that go on in the South, and after Freud we are all educated to believe that vice is better called pathology. I quarrel only with Mr. Faulkner's handling—with what often seems to me Mr. Faulkner's exploitation—of his material. For one thing, I am forced to have my reservations, in terms of its importance as art, about a world into which pity does not enter and out of which great suffering never comes. From Villon to Dostoevski one encounters a humanity comparable to Mr. Faulkner's, which may horrify, but with which one always feels kinship. One feels almost no kinship with the Snopeses; there is something a little too spectacular about them. There is something, for that matter, a little too spectacular about Mr. Faulkner. His people are grotesques because he is interested in grotesques; but they are seldom great grotesques, because there is something twisted and puny about them. As for Mr. Faulkner's writing, it continues as it has been. Marvelous in a way as it is, there is something so overloaded and monstrous about it that it not only sins against taste, not only sins against meaning, but—so far as I am concerned—ends by seeming unpleasant, like dirty lace.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

A Religion of Science

DANGEROUS THOUGHTS. By Lancelot Hogben. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

PROFESSOR HOGBEN preaches scientific humanism, but since his brief exposition of it in The Nation last year he has persuaded himself that it is a dangerous creed—dangerous, that is, to himself—for it implies an unwillingness to choose between Marxism and fascism. From between the jaws of this nutcracker Mr. Hogben has continued to expound his doctrine by means of essays and lectures, fifteen of which, reprinted together, constitute "Dangerous Thoughts."

Judging by Mr. Hogben's lusty tone, the nutcracker is not squeezing his middle very hard, and judging from what he says about it, scientific humanism is not much more enticing than the two dogmas supposedly flanking it. The humanism is a microscopic kernel rattling around in an exceedingly hard-shelled nut of science; and the science is merely old-fashioned "scientism" ranting and storming in the most dispassionate and scientific manner at everything not itself.

Professor Hogben, as is well known, is the author of two best-selling attempts at the popularization of mathematics (for the million) and science (for the citizen). He believes accordingly that if we only go on researching with one hand and popularizing with the other, we shall be able to construct a really scientific society able to use in full measure the fruits of existing mechanical power. Naturally, political power will have to be lodged with those who have made mechanical power possible—the scientists. But in any case, moral forces will remain irrelevant, indeed disturbing, influences.

Any dissenter from this Saint-Simonist view gets short shrift at Mr. Hogben's hands, for it is plain to him that such dissent comes from scientific ignorance, and Professor Hogben is teacher, apostle, and high priest of science all in one. Scorn is his chief emotional resource, and he has even invented for his crusade a new talisman of authority. It consists in beginning a good many sentences to which no exception can be taken by the layman with the words "As a biologist." Then later on, in discussing capitalism or free trade, he asserts that they were "a biological failure," or that "biologically speaking, it must be said that, etc." By this means Professor Hogben's competence reaches out like a pseudopod to assimilate what it will, and can at the same time administer a swift kick to the undisciplined.

Considered as a teacher, Professor Hogben is nothing if not contradictory. He thinks the layman grossly ignorant of the impact of science upon society; he thinks human beings morally and mentally lazy, yet not naturally sinful, and at the same time quite capable of learning wisdom from popularized treatments of science. He also thinks scientific specialists in close touch and remarkable harmony with one another, so that when a man like C. E. M. Joad, who knows as much science as is good for any non-professional, makes a sound remark about the need for philosophy, Mr. Hogben biologically leaps on him, taunts him with being a mere professor and not a research man, and shatters him with the accusation of impudence.

It is clear that Professor Hogben wants us all to become choir boys in his church—happily not yet established—to chant the praises, not of the Lord who made him, but of him and his caste who have a corner on the Lord's grace. This lust for lordship is in fact quite open. Our author sighs for the days when Huxley reigned supreme, and he wishes that he too could annihilate Professor Joad's reputation by fiat as St. Thomas Henry would have done. The end in view is in both cases above reproach: light and learning for the greater good of mankind; but, alas, a familiarity with the zoo and a Jehovah complex are not sufficient guaranties of infallibility. Professor Hogben proves it on every page by an innocent display of second-hand misinformation on every subject not mathematical or biological. He thereby shows that the specialist without humility had better stick to the job where his arrogance is condoned in return for the perfection of his results. I hasten to add that three of the fifteen essays in this book, those, namely, dealing with John Wilkins, Sir William Petty (in part), and Scottish science in the late eighteenth century, seem to be excellent studies of important though little-known matters. It is when Professor Hogben talks about Hegel and Darwin, political economy, history, psychoanalysis, religion, and the humanities generally that he becomes the Dogberry of scientific humanism.

Nor are his manners any more sociable than his views. He expresses the utmost contempt for professors—though he is one himself—quite as if they were a recognizable race whose stigmata had failed to "take" on only one member of the tribe. Yet elsewhere Mr. Hogben attacks all race theories as superstitious (a good instance of scientists not agreeing), and lays the heavy hand of his sarcasm on the eugenists, who are after all only seeking to do to men's bodies what Mr. Hogben wishes he could do to their minds.

It is curious in this connection that seeing contemporary mankind as unregenerate and pig-headed, Professor Hogben should be concerned about maintaining their numbers. Population alarms delight him—though Honi soit qui Malthus pense—and he is proud of having four children, whom, he tells us incidentally, he prefers to those four others, the Brothers Karamazov. Add to this critical note his assertion that the two-child family is a psychological habit, that there is a more real life in a pub parlor than in academic groves, that professors' wives arouse his distaste, and you have a cross-section of Mr. Hogben's feelings about the future of the race.

He says somewhere that for a mistake in reasoning about facts, and not for a factual error itself, he would "plow" Sir Arthur Eddington. For a complete inability to organize his sentiments and attach them to coherent ideas, Professor Hogben should be similarly plowed, preferably by a psychoanalyst. None of his confusions would matter if he held a chair of philosophy or history or even psychology. But he himself has said it, and it is greatly to his credit, he is a biologist. Therefore a good many of our contemporaries whose native wit has been scattered by the impact of science will believe as gospel truth such statements, however improbable,

BURLINGTON PUBLIC LIBRARY

This amazing tribute

"From time to time there appears a book which is likely to be the best that will ever be written on a given subject. The description of life in Spain by George Borrow, and of Arabia by Doughty and Lawrence, cannot be superseded. This is the quality of the book that Mr. Hauser has written about Shanghai."
— P. W. WILSON'S FRONT PAGE REVIEW, NEW YORK TIMES

HAS SPOTLIGHTED THIS THRILLING BOOK TO SUCCESS

Shanghai
CITY FOR SALE
by Ernest O. Hauser

A biography of Shanghai, a dramatic story of the white man's pioneering which reads, continues the feature review in the New York Times Book Review, like a battle between Greeks and Trojans at the gates of Troy.

PEARL S. BUCK, Asia: "Shanghai has always been more than a city . . . It has had a life of its own, important and strange, and the biography of this life now appears in a fascinating book." $3.00

New Honor for Katherine Anne Porter's

PALE HORSE, PALE RIDER

Awarded on April 3rd a gold medal instituted by the Society for the Libraries of New York University for "distinctive contribution to imaginative literature" in 1939. Three short novels. 4th printing, $2.00

Kay Boyle
Three short novels

THE CRAZY HUNTER

"A story to stand with Steinbeck's 'The Red Pony'." — Sterling North, Chicago Daily News. "At her best in this book, Miss Boyle demonstrates that she is one of the best short story writers in America." — Peter Monro Jack, N. Y. Times. $2.50

Desmond Holdridge

END OF THE RIVER

The author of "Escape to the Tropics" and "Witch in the Wilderness" writes a moving novel of a South American Indian, a boy who was catapulted into "civilized" life, whose fate is typical of the impact of "civilization" on an unspoiled human being. $2.50

Hans Habe

SIXTEEN DAYS

A novel of the Munich crisis, wherein three people's personal tragedy develops against the background of impending doom. "A powerful and thoughtful novel that must command respect as a genuine literary achievement in a field that is cluttered with merely tendentious fiction. . . . This is literature, as opposed to journalism and propaganda."
— Ben Ray Redman, Saturday Review. $2.50

Neil MacNeil

Without Fear or Favor

A complete and absorbing picture of a modern metropolitan newspaper, telling how news is gathered, transmitted, edited, put to press in four or five hours; explaining how every department works; the first and only book of its kind, and by an assistant managing editor of The New York Times. $3.00

George T. Davis

A Navy Second to None

N. Y. Times Book Review front page review: "The history it traces, the questions it poses in its final chapter are of tremendous importance to the future of the nation . . . Mr. Davis has done a thoroughly valuable, intensely interesting and prodigiously documented job, which will long be a credit to his name and of fundamental importance to any understanding of American naval policy."
— Hanson W. Baldwin. $3.75

Fred B. Millett

Contemporary American Authors

Containing biographies and bibliographies of over 200 authors, and a critical survey which itself is of book length. More factual information than in any other single volume. 716 pages, $3.75

Hazelton Spencer

The ART and LIFE of WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

"By all odds the best compendium of Shakespeareana ever written and is right up to this date of 1940. It presents all that the inquisitive layman need know, and more than most scholars do."
— N. Y. Times Book Review
495 pages, many illustrations, $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY, 383 Madison Ave., New York

silly, or self-contradictory, as are uttered by an F. R. S. or couched in jargon. I would not say that Mr. Hogben's every statement is silly, but I do say that the main danger in his dangerous thoughts is their inconsistency and repeated untrustworthiness. The "younger' British biologists" have been palmed off on us as thinkers long enough. On his very first page our author tells us that if either the Marxists or the fascists win the day, he will be put to the torture "unless I apply my biological knowledge to the task of devising ways of terminating a hopeless existence with less personal inconvenience and discomfort." Was more pompous folderol ever put together to say "I shall commit suicide"? Mr. Hogben's vaunted youth may excuse him, though it is doubtful, in Bradley's famous words, whether most of us have ever been quite so young as this. JACQUES BARZUN

American Creeds

AMERICAN FAITH. By Ernest Sutherland Bates. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

THE late Ernest Sutherland Bates was an astute observer and student of religious life and of its relation to social and political affairs. When therefore his publishers issue a posthumous book, completed just before his untimely death, dealing with the religious foundations of American life, one opens such a work with keen anticipation. But it must be admitted that the book does not fulfil one's hopes. It is primarily a chapter-by-chapter account of various forms of Protestantism—their European origins and their development on American soil. As far as they go, the chapters are interesting enough. But they do not give a picture of the whole. The analysis of interrelations between religious and political life remains minimal. Thomas Hall's "Religious Background of American Culture," published a decade ago, is a much more adequate and important contribution to the subject.

In tracing the origins of American democracy it is important to know just how the Calvinism of New England and the deistic rationalism of Virginia were mixed in the creed of early America and what element each contributed to the total. Similarly the relation of rational liberalism and sectarian evangelicalism in the Jacksonian democratic movement on the frontier is intriguing and important. Mr. Bates describes each of these movements separately but never uncovers their relation to each other. He comes close to answering the first question in his appreciation of the economic realism of James Madison, to whom he rightly assigns a high place among the intellectual founders of our republican form of government. Though Madison was a Virginian and a deist, he did not share the general optimism of the deists. His conception of a perpetual class struggle in society and his theory of pluralistic government as an instrument by which this struggle would be beguiled into a more or less stable equilibrium may have been the intellectual force which brought the Calvinistic pessimism of New England into agreement with the optimism of the thought which Jefferson typifies so perfectly. Despite Mr. Bates's appreciation of Madison's realism he assumes generally that only optimists contributed to the establishment of American democracy. On the whole, this is of course correct. Probably one reason why America to this day has a more optimistic social creed than any other modern nation is that religious and secular culture combined to establish this optimism. The optimism derived from the French encyclopedists and that which had its source in the pietism and utopianism of evangelical sects was perfectly mixed and compounded on the American frontier and became the unshakable creed of America. But the fascinating conflict and coincidence of optimism in these rival creeds are not studied here.

Mr. Bates has, in other words, written a book not on "American Faith" but upon "American Creeds," and for good measure he has included even sects of limited historical influence, such as Owenists, Fourierists, Mormons, and the Oneida Community. We are usually left wondering at the conclusion of a chapter just how this interesting little tale fits into the total epic of America.

There are some historical inaccuracies, though the book generally maintains a high standard of scholarship. Calvin is accused of having "set out deliberately to justify the acquisition of capitalistic profits." This is hardly an accurate description of Calvin's very guarded, qualified, and hesitant justification of interest. Mr. Bates is not aware of the degree to which Max Weber's and Ernst Troeltsch's thesis on the relation between Calvinism and capitalism has been qualified by other historians, notably R. H. Tawney. In interpreting the Reformation he makes the Reformation slogan "justification by faith" mean "inward inspiration" as against the Catholic ideal of "outward authority." This is not just to Catholicism and is not accurate in regard to the Reformation. Sectarian Protestantism, that is, the Protestantism of Quakers, Baptists, Methodists, and the like, may have emphasized "inward inspiration." But the orthodox Reformation meant to assert by its doctrine of "justification by faith" that the Catholic doctrine of "infused grace" was too optimistic in regard to human nature and claimed too great a perfection for the Christian. Against this optimism it asserted that a believer was "saved" only in the sense that he was forgiven, not in the sense that he was good. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

"Yellow Book" of the White War

THE FRENCH YELLOW BOOK. Diplomatic Documents (1938-1939). Published by Authority of the French Government. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

THIS is a publication of great importance, although it is naturally far from being a complete history of French diplomatic activity during the period. As in all such cases the documents have been selected, and the omissions are no doubt as important as what is included. One suspects that the proportion of omissions is particularly large among Bonnet's own dispatches. The number of cases in which there is no reply from him to dispatches from the French diplomatic representatives is considerable. In many of these cases it is evident that he must have replied. In the Yellow Books concerning the affairs of Morocco before the last war a very large number of Delcassé's replies to ambassadors were omitted. I was told by an eminent person that they were omitted because they were so compromising.

This "Yellow Book," however, is more complete, more honest, and more informative than the British "Blue Book," which includes no diplomatic documents earlier than May 28, 1939, and gives Chamberlain's speech at Birmingham on March 17, 1939, but not his speech in the House of Commons two days earlier.

The remarkable dispatches of Coulondre, who succeeded François-Poncet as French ambassador to Berlin in November, 1938, alone make the book worth reading. They show him to be a man of keen insight and sound judgment, and subsequent events have demonstrated how extraordinarily well-informed he was. If his warnings had been listened to, much might have been avoided. It is clear from his dispatches that many of us, including myself, were mistaken in thinking that Hitler never believed that England and France would act if he attacked Poland. Although he sometimes wavered, he seems to have been convinced as early as the end of May, 1939, that a German attack on Poland would probably mean a general war. The decisive factor was the Russo-German pact of August 23, 1939. One of the most interesting documents is that of June 1, 1939, in which Coulondre reports that General Keitel and General von Brauchitsch had been consulted by Hitler and had told him that Germany had very little chance of winning a war unless the neutrality of Russia was secured, but would probably have the victory if it was. The opinion at the time in the German Foreign Office was that Hitler would not risk war if he had to fight Russia as well as England and France, but would risk it if Russia remained neutral. The responsibility of the Soviet government is thus demonstrated. Stalin let war loose on Europe.

The documents also make it clear that the German annexation of Bohemia and Moravia on March 15, 1939, was no surprise to the French and British governments, which were accessories before the fact. Three weeks after the signature of the Munich agreements Hitler told François-Poncet that England and France had made a mistake in promising to guarantee the frontiers of the new Czechoslovakia (No. 18), and it was evident in December, 1938, that the German government would not observe the agreement (No. 35). On February 8, 1939, the French government formally asked the German government for its "views" on the question of the guaranty provided for in the Munich agreements, and on March 2 the German government replied with a refusal to fulfil its undertaking and, to quote Coulondre, intimated "that the Western powers have no longer any right to interest themselves in Central European affairs." From that moment the intention to attack the remnant of Czechoslovakia was clear. Coulondre's account (No. 77) of the hours of torture to which Hacha, a sick man, was subjected until at last, at 4:30 a. m. on March 15, 1939, he signed the death warrant of his country is the most poignant diplomatic document that I have ever read.

It appears that for some time before Litvinov's dismissal on May 4, 1939, Berlin believed a change in Soviet policy to be possible, and immediately after the dismissal Hitler began to consider an understanding with Russia. From the first the partition of Poland was suggested (Nos. 123, 124, and 125). The fact that Hitler had on three occasions—in September, 1938, and in January and March, 1939—vainly

RANDOM HOUSE BOOKS

WATCH BELOW

The Story of Tramp Steamers and the Men Who Sail Them

By William McFee

Illustrated by GORDON GRANT

NO one but William McFee could have told this story. . . out of his years at sea he has fashioned this narrative of the lowly iron ships that have borne the world's burdens since the days of the packets, and are still doing so despite blockades and submarines . . . a story of hard-bitten crews, strange ports, and exciting adventures. $3.00

A novel by WILLIAM FAULKNER about the Snopes family
—GETS WILD ACCLAIM!

■ " 'The Hamlet' is Faulkner at his best . . . I have seen nothing to compare with it in the field of fiction this year . . . much of 'The Hamlet' is nothing short of superb."—N. Y. TIMES.

● "Passages incandescent with undeniable genius . . one of the most dazzling and inchoate talents in contemporary letters. The reader who takes in the show exposes himself to so furious a narcotic cyclone of Poe, Melville, Mark Twain and original Faulkner that the best he can do is to hang on to his hat and wits."—TIME.

■ "Pages [illegible] validly exciting and [illegible] magnificent as anything in modern fiction."—N. Y. POST

THE HAMLET

SECOND PRINTING IN TEN DAYS

421 pages, $2.50

CLARA SCHUMANN

A Romantic Biography by JOHN N. BURK

Wife to Robert Schumann, inspiration to Brahms, herself one of the world's greatest pianists, she dominated the musical scene for nearly seventy years! "A natural, charming book about a natural, charming woman."—THE NATION "The lives of Clara and Robert Schumann make one of the most moving love stories in the annals of art."—N. Y. TIMES. Illustrated, 448 pages, $3.00 tried to induce the Polish government to join in an attack on Russia (No. 114) no doubt made him inclined to join with Russia against Poland. It is evident that he hesitated a great deal before finally committing himself. One of Coulondre's dispatches (No. 194) confirms Frederick Kuh's information in The Nation of March 16 that Hitler decided to close with Moscow early in August, 1939.

RANDOM HOUSE • 20 E. 57 ST. • NEW YORK

The interesting reports of telephonic communications in Appendix III show that both the French and British accepted at first Mussolini's proposal of a conference, and that this was the cause of the delay in declaring war on Germany. The text of the French reply is not given. Mussolini did not invite the Polish government to the conference. To Bonnet's inquiry whether Poland would agree, Beck replied: "We are in the thick of war as the result of unprovoked aggression. The question before us is not that of a conference, but that of the common action which should be taken by the Allies to resist. I have heard nothing, moreover, from any quarter of the Italian plan." For once one can sympathize with Beck. One would like to know some of his later remarks when he awaited the common action in vain. The sad lesson of this "Yellow Book" is, "Woe to the countries that are guaranteed by England and France!" The English translation of the book is excellent. ROBERT DELL

Life of Washington

GEORGE WASHINGTON. By Nathanial Wright Stephenson and Waldo Hilary Dunn. Oxford University Press. Two Volumes. $10.

WE HAVE here a monumental work. Its two volumes weigh six pounds and contain nearly half a million words. The evident purpose of the authors was to produce a completely definitive biography of George Washington, to cover the subject so thoroughly that nothing more could be said. Professor Dunn, in his preface, writes, "At this time no biographer dares hope that he can present anything startlingly new about Washington. The field has been well gleaned." That is quite true. The only sound reason, therefore, for writing another biography of this great figure in our national history would be to shed new light on his character and motives; or to depict him on the broad canvas of his background, which would necessarily include sharp and clear sketches of his associates and contemporaries; or to put the Washington saga in the form of a simple narrative, alive with human understanding and drama, for the purpose of making Washington live in the minds of millions who now think of him only as a shadowy name.

Unfortunately, the present work does not fall into any of these classifications. The authors have no new concept of Washington's personality; they reveal nothing that is not already well known. Everyone knows that he was practical-minded rather than philosophical in temperament; that he was a man of great inner force; that he had a commanding presence; that his high temper was usually repressed; that his activity was physical rather than mental; that he liked fine clothes and dancing and fox-hunting; that his quiet courage never left him even in the most appalling circumstances; that he understood the military strategy of waiting, which made him a great general although he seldom won a battle; that his personal habits were orderly; that he had spells of mental lethargy; that he always acted as a gentleman should act, not by plan or calculation but by instinct. All these Washingtonian qualities are set forth in the two volumes, but they are so confused with insignificant details that a clear picture of Washington can be observed only through the reader's imagination.

The mass of inconsequential facts given in this work—many of them hardly worth recording—is so overwhelming that one is dazed and lost in them as in a wilderness. They represent a beaver-like persistence and energy that ought to be rewarded by a medal, or maybe by a Pulitzer prize. But on the other hand the economic causes of the American Revolution are discussed with such casual brevity that a reader who is not already well-informed will be puzzled as to how it came about. In the index there is no reference to the Mercantile System or the Stamp Act. However, the authors state definitely that they have purposely refrained from going into the history of the times. Yet much of the history of that period is also the history of George Washington. If you do not know the revolutionary impulse that brought the Continental Congress into being you are not likely to know the reasons for many of Washington's doings.

His associates appear as mere cardboard figures. In Alexander Hamilton the authors say that Washington "had not only an able, energetic, and zealous adviser but a genius as well, a man of far vision and almost unlimited resourcefulness." That is very good, but Hamilton's interesting origin and his remarkable youthful precocity are not mentioned. His operations in refunding the public debt and establishing a national currency are related in a most inadequate and cloudy fashion, though his financial operations were among the outstanding features of Washington's Presidential term.

Lafayette appears suddenly in this story of Washington's life, but nothing is said of his dramatic departure from France, his influence on the American Revolution, or his high standing in the French governing aristocracy. Benjamin Franklin's letter to Congress about Lafayette is not mentioned at all. General Nathanael Greene, who next to Washington was the ablest commander of the American side, never emerges as an outstanding personality. The authors fail to state that Benedict Arnold—before his treachery—was regarded as a general of great ability and daring. The descriptions of the battles of Brandywine and Monmouth are so cluttered with trivial details that readers will have much difficulty in figuring out just what did happen.

Notwithstanding its obvious shortcomings, this biography is an impressive book, and in some ways a valuable one. It is scholarly, accurate, and full of facts. But it is quite evident that its authors were overwhelmed by their vast accumulation of data, and that they lack the gift of story-telling.

This reviewer predicts that the book will be given much space in the literary periodicals, that the reviews will be highly favorable, and that it will be praised as an important contribution to American historical literature. Thereafter it will be entombed on the shelves of public libraries, where for many years it will be looked upon with great respect and seldom read. W. E. WOODWARD

European Hangover

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO EUROPE. By Geoffrey T. Garratt. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

ONE of the familiar kidnapping cases of Greek mythology was that of the Phoenician princess Europa, whom Zeus in the form of a white bull carried off, swimming with her to Crete. History has now repeated this myth in a slightly modified version: some not exactly white bullies have assumed the form of Zeus to kidnap fair Europe and hold her for ransom. Such things happen when neither the morality of a people nor the police force is strong enough to curb the dominant gangsters. However, no explanation of the disaster is satisfactory unless it bares the remote causes inherent in the social structure.

It is from the watch tower of liberalism that Mr. Garratt has surveyed the European scene, the historical and sociological background of which he knows so thoroughly. He finds that the danger to peace in nineteenth-century Europe arose from an "unhealthy competition spirit among the larger powers." Democracy, supposed to safeguard peace, has never been "seriously tried over the greater part of the Continent." In both Great Britain and France "pluto-democracy" ruled after the World War. The author has doubts as to the effective existence of that mysterious force called "public opinion," though he admits that it functions as a mild "revisionary body" and that even English Conservatives can be frightened "by some real change in public opinion at home."

In Mr. Garratt's view the collapse of German democracy, a post-war patchwork at best, opened the road for aggression. From 1931 English and French reactionaries encouraged it by condoning each successive act of aggression, first by Japan, then by Italy, and finally by Germany. In criticizing Munich the author is perhaps more bitter than he should be. The fact remains that in spite of the colossal sums of money spent on the fighting services since 1931 Britain was unprepared in 1938. Mr. Garratt's presumption that a changed public opinion brought pressure to bear upon government policy is probably correct. That is how the war started, and the author has no misconceptions about it. He admits that it may be the beginning of a new "Dark Age," but he hopes that the United States, keeping out of the war, will take European "ideas and aspirations in safekeeping." The author seems to share, although in a more polite form, A. P. Herbert's yearning: "God protect us against a German victory and an American peace."

Being both a journalist and a scholar, Mr. Garratt is well informed, has a witty pen, and is as unbiased as is compatible with his liberal persuasion. Save for some slight inaccuracies, such as his statement that A. Ballin, the Kaiser's friend, was a Cabinet minister and his writing Wilhelmsplatz for Wilhelmstrasse, his factual statements are as reliable as contemporary history in war time allows.

To one of his similes, that the events of the last years "have been like the successive acts of a Greek tragedy," I would not subscribe. It was not the mysterious forces of an "irresistible destiny" that brought on the climax of the war. As Count Keyserling wrote after the World War, "Men have sown causes for over four years and now are surprised

"Caviar of the season." — Lewis Gannett

Summer's Lease
By
E. ARNOT
ROBERTSON

"A study of family life almost as cruelly incisive as 'The Way of All Flesh' and more compassionate . . . The record of an inquisitive intelligence set down with humor and clarity and sharp observation . . . unusually rich and readable." — Time Magazine. $2.50

The Spanish Adventures of
Washington Irving
By CLAUDE G.
BOWERS

"The Spain of Irving's day smolders on every page of Bowers' book — throbbing with passion, instinct with aristocracy, filled with mellowness and hospitality — a land of beauty and cruelty and courtesy, backward, bandit-ridden and absolutely beautiful." — New York Times. $3.00

Alexander the Great
By
LEWIS V.
CUMMINGS

Never has the great empire builder been made so contemporary as in this biography by an American who has flown over the region of his conquest and studied it at first hand. A three dimensional picture of one of the greatest of all dictators. With maps. $3.75

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

SINCE FIFTY

by William Rothenstein

Further recollections of the author of "Men and Memories," this time covering the contemporary period, 1922-1938, and such diverse intimates as Kipling, Bridges, Beerbohm, Housman, George Moore and Ramsay MacDonald. $5.00

"MR. SECRETARY"

by Ben Ames Williams, Jr.

A novelized "autobiography" of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War under Lincoln and Johnson. The story of the secret inner life of one of the most ambitious (and most honest) of our famed public leaders. $2.50

MUSIC FOR THE MULTITUDE

by Sidney Harrison

"As helpful an introduction to the art as has been produced," says the London Times Literary Supplement, and Musical Opinion labels it "a classic." $2.50

HOW GREEN WAS MY VALLEY

by Richard Llewellyn

"In my time, no man has poured so much minted gold into the printed page, nor opened the world's eyes to such beauty." Los Angeles Times. $2.75

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, NEW YORK

at the effects they reap." Mr. Garratt is not surprised, but he believes that "the European tragedy lies in our own minds." Unfortunately it is easier to kill men than to change their misdirected mental energies. Men's minds have become the victim of ambitious leaders with grandiose delusions, disciples of George Sorel's "Study of Violence" who have used the aftermath of war to put his theory into practice. It may take some time for Europe to get over this vainglorious hangover, for which not only the power-drunk megalomaniacs are responsible, but still more the combination of industrial capitalism with nationalist imperialism. That is what has happened to Europe. RUSTEM VAMBERY

York State Huck Finn

CHAD HANNA. By Walter D. Edmonds. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

THAT Mr. Edmonds knows how to tell a good yarn is no news to readers of "Rome Haul" and "Drums Along the Mohawk." His roustabouts, farmers, Indian-fighters, innkeepers talk in an earth-bound, juicy idiom only too rare in historical fiction, and his racy prose never revels in its own expertness, never diverts attention from the action.

For "Chad Hanna" he has gone once more to his favorite stamping-ground, the Erie Canal country, time 1836. Young Chad, stable hand and general helper at the Yellow Bud Tavern in Canastota, grew up the hard way: not knowing his parents' names or even his own age within five years, he ran away from an orphanage, drove horses for canal-boat captains who paid such waifs mainly in strappings, and finally cocked his wandering feet on the tavern porch railing beside those of old Elias Proops, pensioned Revolutionary veteran and long-distance spitter. In spite of his apparent lack of gumption Chad applies himself to the ticklish job of helping a runaway slave elude his pursuers, becomes so involved with the law that he joins a small, three-wagon circus just then conveniently passing through the town. "Huguenine's Great and only International Circus and Equestriole" enjoys the services of a wide-awake business agent, Mr. Bisbee, and a couple of first-class equestrians, but aside from these and a mangy lion named Oscar it is pretty small shakes, playing mostly the backwoods circuit, trying to buck the competition of the big Burke and Walsh menagerie, which disposes of stubborn rivals by the most up-to-date gangster tactics. Chad bolsters up the morale of the little show, sees it through fights, storms, hard times, even the death of Oscar, and of course he falls in love with a lady rider—in fact, with two lady riders. All of which could be just another adventure yarn if it were not for Mr. Edmonds's skilful workmanship and minute acquaintance with the folkways of New York State in the 1830's. Chad is a somewhat older Huckleberry Finn, and you will find it almost as much fun to follow him along the bumpy roads of the Canal country, driving tent pegs, learning the circus lingo, trading punches with the Burke and Walsh mugs, as to mosey down the Mississippi with his immortal prototype.

"Chad Hanna" has abundant zest and hearty exuberance, plenty of movement with a vivid sense of real back-country life. It will sell well, and deserves to. LOUIS B. SALOMON

BURLINGAME PU LI Burlingame

The World of Design

MAGIC MOTORWAYS. By Norman Bel Geddes. Random House. $3.50.

DESIGN THIS DAY. By Walter Dorwin Teague. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.

NINE CHAINS TO THE MOON. By Buckminster Fuller. J. B. Lippincott Company. $4.

THE first two of these books have been written by the men who supply the drama in the shapes of everyday objects for millions. Eight million persons are reported to have braved the queues to view the "Highways and Horizons" exhibit at the World's Fair in New York, of which "Magic Motorways" is the designer's exposition. The same skill that was applied there to the flow of people through a magnificent spectacle is applied in the book to a flow of words, pictures, and ideas directed to setting up desire. In its own terms the performance is a splendid one, and is worth the assiduous study of publicists working in a democracy. Incidentally, no one man could have managed to have held his course so securely, keeping a technical subject within the range of popular understanding, interest, and absorption rate. Such books, produced by an "office," are examples of cooperative endeavor.

The hidden significance of "Magic Motorways" lies, of course, in the fact that the whole motor industry is behind it, with the purpose of maintaining the steady and enormous flow of government subsidy, in the form of highway expenditures, which we have been skilfully led to accept as a matter of course. By contrast, every housing project has to fight for what subsidy it gets. If the shelter industries were capable of producing literature such as this, there would be no serious "housing problem."

"Design This Day" is recommended to the layman who would like to make a rounded survey of the many considerations that go into creating a useful shape. The book is concerned not only with "fitness to materials, to purpose, to technique," but with such formal requirements as proportion and balance. There are few of those sententious pronouncements that characterize most popular books on "modern" design; on the contrary there is an almost exaggerated desire to fit the present into the picture of "eternal laws," with the result that the nature of changes now under way is inadequately understood and explained. For example, to the very degree that the "golden mean" (very clearly explained) had meaning to the Greeks because it was a product of their characteristic science (geometry) applied to their characteristic problems (building and sculpture), it means less in an age working with a more abstract mathematics and producing complicated instruments: you do not determine the relations of gears by the golden mean or dynamic symmetry, and this difference, soaking through the whole world of design, is what we need to explore.

Though "Design This Day" will be found very useful as a primer, it offers almost nothing for the more advanced student and ought, in fact, to be entitled "Design Just Yesterday"; such are its viewpoints. Just as Thomas Mann has found that the literary artist can no longer ignore politics, so the industrial designer finds that his problem is funda-

SPRING 1940
NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS FROM CHAPEL HILL

HOUSING IN SCANDINAVIA
by John Graham, Jr. ● The Scandinavian programs and procedures and the amazing metamorphoses they have effected in urban and rural housing are recorded by a man who has a long-standing familiarity with American housing problems. Illustrated. $2.50

GOD BLESS THE DEVIL
by James R. Aswell and others ● Tall tales, "whopper" stories and folk yarns from the Tennessee hills. Illustrated. July 27. $2.00

THE FLIGHT FROM THE FLAG
by George W. Dalzell ● The stirring adventures of Confederate cruisers in their war on Yankee shipping and the continuing effect of their success on the American merchant marine. Illustrated. July 27. $3.50

ALIENS AND THE LAW
by William M. Gibson ● A study, from the legal aspect, of the protection of personal rights accorded aliens in the U. S. April 20. $3.00

THE LEGAL STATUS OF THE NEGRO
by Charles S. Mangum, Jr. ● A review of the laws concerning relations of the white and colored races enacted since the Civil War and their interpretation by state courts. May 25. $5.00

FOLK PLAYS OF EASTERN CAROLINA
by Bernice Kelly Harris ● The second volume in The Carolina Playmakers Series. A group of seven one-act plays successfully produced by the Carolina Playmakers and written by the author of Purslane. $2.50

SOME 17TH CENTURY WORTHIES
by R. Balfour Daniels ● A delightful group of twenty-two familiar essays on literary figures, notable and otherwise, of the seventeenth century. April 27. $2.00

WHAT COLLEGE PRESIDENTS SAY by Edgar W. Knight ● A study of higher education, taken from speeches and writings of college and university heads. $3.50

RED CAROLINIANS
by Chapman J. Milling ● A history of the Indian tribes inhabiting South Carolina from earliest times to their present far-flung homes in Oklahoma and Utah. June 22. $4.00

THE NEGRO IN CONGRESS, 1870-1901
by Samuel Denny Smith ● Biographies and evaluations of 22 Negro Representatives and Senators. May 25. $3.00

THE AGADIR CRISIS
by Ima C. Barlow ● A study of the issues in the second Moroccan crisis that endangered Franco-German relations and thereby threatened the peace of Europe in the early twentieth century. April 20. $4.00

POSITIVE DEMOCRACY
by James Feibleman ● Democracy in theory and practice—where it has failed, and how it can be made to work. $2.50

THE HUMAN MEANING OF SCIENCE
by Arthur H. Compton ● Three lectures, delivered under the John Calvin McNair Foundation, on science's contributions to living and its relation to religious thought. $1.00

HUMAN NATURE WRIT LARGE
by F. Creedy ● A critical examination of Western society. $3.00

The University of North Carolina Press · Chapel Hill, N.C.

PROLOGUE TO WAR

By Elizabeth Wiskemann

"The German drive against Europe's small states, with its inevitable arrival at war, is brilliantly analyzed by one of the best in the field."—Philadelphia Inquirer. $3.00

A CONCISE HISTORY OF ITALY

FROM PREHISTORIC TIMES TO OUR OWN DAY

By Luigi Salvatorelli

Translated into English by Bernard Miall. "A superbly organized cultural history done in a scientific-factual style."—New Yorker. $5.00

MINARET AND PIPE-LINE

By Margret Boveri

Translated by Louisa Sieveking

A history of the past and a survey of the present in the near East by an outstanding authority. $5.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS • 114 FIFTH AVE., N. Y.

HUMANISM vs. CHRISTIANITY

IF YOU BELIEVE the Bible stories—direct creation, fall of man, redeeming savior, heaven and hell—join a Christian church, fast, pray, deny yourself pleasure in hope of eternity with the angels.

IF YOU BELIEVE that following the highest principles, without theology, will enable mankind to realize the greatest happiness on earth, become a Humanist. Then you can practice birth control, divorce, remarry, eat meat on fast days, play cards on Sunday and read The Arbitrator without offending your conscience.

SEND 25 CENTS

For a six months' trial subscription to the only Humanist periodical in the eastern states.

THE ARBITRATOR
114 East 31st St., New York City

A NEW LIVING NEWSPAPER PLAY
Dramatising health as excitingly as "One Third of a Nation" did housing.
CARLY WHARTON & MARTIN GABEL present
"MEDICINE SHOW"
By OSCAR SAUL & H. R. HAYS
NEW YORKER Thea., W. 54th St. CI 6-2737
Evgs. 8:45. 1st Matinee Wednesday (April 17)

Opens Friday
Opening Night 83c to $2.20.
Subsequently Entire Orch. and Mezz (Except Sat. Night)
1.10 & 1.65
Balcony, 55c, 83c $1.10.

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Reader's Service Division
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

mentally affected by those who hold political and economic power. No one who has taken the trouble to observe the actual design of this day can try, as Teague does, to slur over "führers and commissars" as mere passing nuisances.

In the light of the present moment it seems important to call attention to a book published a year ago and not given the popular attention it deserves. The minute one emphasizes "führers and commissars" as influences over design, it is expected that one will go along with the social diagnoses of Lewis Mumford. On the contrary, the deep value, for real students, of Buckminster Fuller's "Nine Chains to the Moon" is that it departs radically from Mr. Mumford's characteristic attitudes. In warning it must be said that the book places every hurdle of eccentricity in the reader's path. Penetrating these eccentricities and a number of errors, the reader finds an absorbing drama of the current industrial world in fresh terms. Also, he finds constant emphasis on the breaks—called the "random element." In other words, the active worker in fields of design is encouraged by precept and example to hold his mind ready, adaptable, mobile, swift in converting openings. It is a quality of utmost value this minute. The difficulty with a solemn, comprehensive "planning" approach like Mumford's is that it tends to believe that nothing can be done until everything is done. Infatuation with the togetherness of the all makes serious rifts appear to be complete breakdowns. Self-seeking interests always use the rifts; it is time for the generous to absorb the technique of swift conversion. DOUGLAS HASKELL

Ultra-Poetical, Super-Aesthetical

OSCAR WILDE AND THE YELLOW NINETIES. By Frances Winwar. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

REMINDING us that if our achievement is evanescent our follies are perennial, Miss Winwar's study is an "Only Yesterday" of the nineties. Colorful, acute, if not often more than that, "Oscar Wilde" presents a fine cavalcade of decadence and eruption: the earnest aestheticism of Ruskin, the New Hellenism of Pater, Lily Langtry, whom Wilde, "wishing her classic perfection lighted by some intellectual beam," brought to Newton's lectures on Greek art, Swinburne, Dowson, Beardsley, Hopkins, Solomon, and the rest of that generation who lacked only a Gertrude Stein to pronounce their epitaph. And across the Channel their French counterparts, the Rimbauds, Verlaines, Huysmans, and Moreaus, beside whom, it must be admitted, the English aesthetes are like Dickensian infants.

Piecing together a balanced and honest study of Wilde is in itself a difficult job in view of the diverse accounts of Harris, Douglas, Ross, who often contradict each other and sometimes, as in the case of Lord Douglas, themselves too. Having read her Havelock Ellis, moreover, Miss Winwar brings to her study, if not always complete understanding, greater psychological insight than Wilde's previous biographers. As the popular literary historian of the nineteenth century Miss Winwar needs no further words of introduction, but I'd like to add that this seems to me her best work so far. Her error usually lies in her sympathy. If she, unlike Wilde's everyman, doesn't kill the thing she loves, she tends to damage it by an excess of affection. Here, however, allowing her wit and realism fuller play, she makes her work harder and more effective. Tracing Wilde's disordered personality to Speranza, who is probably the oddest and most odious mother in literary chronicles, relating his work to the aesthetic movements of his time, viewing his final tragedy against the Victorian moral dogmas, Miss Winwar has performed a valuable service. Her Wilde emerges as a social being rather than an esoteric excrescence. The incredible Oscar becomes credible.

Perhaps all too credible. For using Wilde thus as the figure of his society, Miss Winwar has in large part taken from him his own gallant conception of himself. The apostle of the new freedom is now merely the symbol of a curious middle-class orgy, first of release and then of repression. This unique and dazzling personage, with his infantile emotions and abstract loves, his black silk stockings, velvet jackets, and publicity mania, this entrepreneur of his own genius, this "ultra-poetical, super-aesthetical, greenery-yallery, Grosvenor Gallery, je-ne-sais-quoi young man," becomes almost, as it were, a case history for the analyst, a problem in deviation for the anthropologist, a study in cultural trends for the sociologist. Thus society chains us all, and those who, like Wilde, fled from a hostile and materialistic environment revealed their descent in their denunciations. "Gentlemen," Wilde said on his deathbed, "I fear I am dying beyond my means," but he had in fact lived, as generally we all do, strictly according to them.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

CONTRIBUTORS

McALISTER COLEMAN has long been active in the fight for lower electric-light rates and the extension of public control over the industry.

FRANZ HOELLERING was a journalist in Berlin until Hitler came to power. He is a native of Vienna, scene of the novel of which we print Chapter 9 in this issue. It is to be published by Little, Brown and Company later this year.

LOUISE BOGAN, poetry critic of the New Yorker, is the author of a book of verse, "The Sleeping Fury."

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, dramatic editor of Time, is a frequent contributor of literary reviews to The Nation and other periodicals.

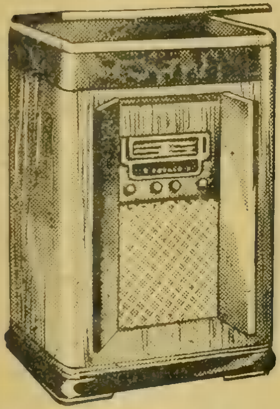
JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia University, is the author of "Culture in the Democracy," "Of Human Freedom," and other books.

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "George Washington," "A New American History," and "Lafayette."

DOUGLAS HASKELL, formerly on the editorial staff of the Architectural Record, has written regularly for The Nation on housing and architecture.

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.



12 TUBE RADIO + RECORDER + RECORD PLAYER + P. A. AMPLIFIER

THAT'S THE NEW

LAFAYETTE

Radiocorder

☆

Custom Built

BY LAFAYETTE FOR ONLY

$159.50

☆

$15 BRINGS THE RADIOCORDER INTO YOUR HOME WITH OUR CONVENIENT PAYMENT PLAN

There's no end to the thrills Lafayette brings you in this amazing new Radiocorder. It has a brilliant 12 tube radio, a built-in record player—and it's equipped to make records! Not just records of your favorite radio programs. A real microphone and high fidelity record cutting head are standard equipment. You can make records of your own voice . . . the voices of children and friends. Come in and see this beautiful and versatile instrument today. The low price tells you how easy it is to own. Now discover how easy — and thrilling — it is to operate.

LAFAYETTE RADIOS

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

BRONX, N. Y. . . . 542 E. Fordham Rd.
JAMAICA, L. I. . . . 90-08 166th Street
CHICAGO, ILL. 901 W. Jackson Blvd.
NEWARK, N. J. . . 24 Central Ave.
BOSTON, MASS. . 110 Federal St.
ATLANTA, GA. . 265 Peachtree St.

Don't Miss An Issue!

To keep THE NATION coming regularly just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $............

☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

Special Introductory Offer
☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name . . . .
Street . . . .
City . . . .
State 4-13-40

Extra postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c.

DRAMA

Two Stars

VINCENT SHEEAN'S comedy drama "An International Incident" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) serves as a starring vehicle for Ethel Barrymore, who recovers her youth and plays a "glamorous" heroine once more. It also serves as a vehicle for the author's opinion on the subject of our current World War and the role which the United States ought not to play in it. Unfortunately these two functions rather get in each other's way, with the result that the piece is neither fish nor fowl nor good red propaganda. A great deal of the available time is spent in permitting the minor characters to agree enthusiastically that the lady impersonated by Miss Barrymore is a paragon of wit, charm, beauty, and je ne sais quoi. In what remains, Mr. Sheean can explain only very sketchily indeed that the Allies are not really crusaders for liberty and that, so far as the bulk of citizens are concerned, it behooves them to win the war for their rights within each separate government before concerning themselves greatly over the question which national government is going to dominate Europe. If I understand him aright, he is, in other words, trying to say that the class war is more significant than the present international struggle; but he is, at the same time, so busy keeping Miss Barrymore important that he rather suggests an earnest young radical at a tea party. It is terribly difficult to explain Marx between compliments to the hostess's costume and replies to that all important question "How many lumps?"

Miss Barrymore plays an American-born woman who has lived most of her life in England and been married to various important people. When the play opens, she has just come to America for a lecture tour, and she is confronted at her hotel by a young reporter who tells her that her lectures about the charm of English life are propaganda whether she knows it or not. This young reporter turns out to be a distant cousin from her own home town, and by Act II he is confessing that he is desperately in love with her—principally because he has heard about her "glamour" all his life and she is to him a sort of faraway princess. He cannot persuade her to requite this passion, which, I must say, seems to me a bit too adolescent to be taken seriously in a man old enough to understand world politics, but he does persuade her to visit a picket line with him. She gets bashed over the head by a policeman, confesses that this experience has enabled her to understand what the young man has been talking about, and then returns to England with another old school tie whom she has just agreed to marry. At one time I took it for granted that the story was about to develop into a conflict between love and honor, with the young reporter torn between his passion for the lady and his hatred of her as a "class enemy." But not even this possible connection between the two themes is made, and the glamorous role apparently written for Miss Barrymore continues to seem quite irrelevant to Mr. Sheean's political thesis. In one sense the play is not badly written. The dialogue is literate and reasonably convincing. But it is also rather plodding and pretty consistently dull.

I suspect, moreover, that there is a reason for the failure of the play more fundamental than those suggested by any of the technical deficiencies alluded to. A successful political comedy cannot be written merely by providing a few comic embellishments to an essentially earnest argument. Comedy implies an inclusive attitude toward life as a whole, and Mr. Sheean is certainly not a man to whom a mood of detachment and irony seems appropriate considering the present state of world affairs. Even a born comic writer like Mr. Behrman finds it difficult to maintain the tone of comedy when dealing with certain subject matters. Mr. Sheean's attempt to be light succeeds only in creating an effect of superficiality.

"Lady in Waiting" (Martin Beck Theater) has been dramatized by Margery Sharp from her own very popular novel "The Nutmeg Tree," but it also is first and foremost a "vehicle"—this time for the blonde and obstreperous comedienne Gladys George, who takes a bath on the stage, kicks an English lady aristocrat in the rear, and otherwise enjoys herself. Friends who have read the novel tell me that the story of the adventures of a rowdy but good-hearted American cast by fate into a respectable British circle has been broadened considerably, but the audience plainly enjoys it, and also approves very highly of Miss George's spirited performance. As for myself, I think that I should have liked the latter better if Miss George had been less inclined to ask so plainly for the laughs which, I must confess, she gets. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

WHEN the record reviewer of the New Statesman and Nation is not discussing an American orchestral recording that he can call bad, he calls an inferior European recording as bad as an American. From this sort of thing one realizes after a while that the gentleman (he is a Sackville-West) not only has an ear which can perceive the harshness of the recording in Toscanini's set of Mozart's G minor, but has the attitude toward things American with which some Englishmen—even some of the Englishmen who write in a magazine like the New Statesman and Nation—keep themselves warm in a cold world, and which prevents this one from crediting America with its occasional successes—chiefly Stokowski's recordings, which reproduce to an amazing degree the rich sound he produces with the Philadelphia Orchestra. But in saying this I am myself not denying the failures, among which I include some of the Boston Symphony's recent recordings: in Beethoven's Second the reverberation made the sound of the orchestra coarse; and even without this reverberation the tone in Haydn's Symphony No. 102 had an extreme and harsh brilliance in place of the sensitive glow that I am accustomed to hearing in Carnegie Hall. In the new set of Debussy's "La Mer" (Victor: M-643, $6.50) the brilliance is not harsh; and having heard the orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, a few weeks ago I know that the records reproduce the brilliance one hears in this hall if one sits anywhere but in the extreme rear (and the microphones, of course, are placed in the front). But the sounds which are reproduced with startling clarity and fidelity on the second and third records of the set are heard in a slight haze on the first record, and in some places are seriously distorted; and on my copy of this record the splendor of the midday sun at the end wavers in pitch.

All this is important because it is the refinement and subtlety of his sonorities that make Koussevitzky the outstanding conductor of Debussy's "Nuages," "Fêtes," and "L'après-midi d'un faune." These sonorities are heard in "La Mer"; but this is a much later and much more complex work, and its more complex organization of material involves many more subtleties of pace; and here a surprising thing happens: Koussevitzky is often criticized, and often justly, for inflating slight changes of pace into enormous ones, as he does occasionally in this work; but although Debussy directs that the second movement be played "dans un rhythme très souple" and implements this general direction with particular ones like "Cédez," then "Animez," then "au Mouvement," Koussevitzky's pace here and during most of the first part of the movement is almost metronomically rigid. The importance of this is that Debussy's directions represent a purpose in his mind, an effect which he wants and which is not achieved when Koussevitzky does not obey them. And though Koussevitzky does this evidently because he does not sense from the directions what Debussy wants to achieve with them, I, listening, feel an inadequacy at these points. There are a few details of this sort, but only a few; and they are flaws in a highly impressive performance of the work.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The records issued originally by the New York Post, which I discussed in the issue of March 2, are now being distributed all over the country through newspapers, schools, and local committees by the National Committee for Music Appreciation, National Press Building, Washington, D. C. The low price has caused enormous quantities of these records to be bought by people who have found the Victor and Columbia prices prohibitive; the enormous quantities have made possible the low price; and what began as a scheme for promoting newspaper circulation has thus developed into a large-quantity-low-price system of record production through which for the first time the potential usefulness of the phonograph record in the diffusion of music in the nation is actually being achieved (the low price of the Decca repressings has been nullified by the poor quality of many of them). The system is one by which social usefulness can be combined with financial profit; but until now Victor and Columbia have preferred the profits without social usefulness of high-price-small-quantity production; and they still do: not only is Victor maintaining its Red Seal prices, but Columbia is stepping up its Masterworks prices to the Victor level.

The social usefulness of the phonograph record is achieved not only by the sale of records at low prices but by the lending of records precisely as books are lent; and the National Committee has taken an important first step in this direction by presenting fifty copies of each of the ten sets in its series to the Newark Public Library for free lending. Newark was selected, says the director of the National Committee, because it is "a typical American city and the center of a North Jersey community which seems to offer an exceptional opportunity for acquainting a large number of persons with this great music." I would say that a community more remote from the large music centers would have offered a better opportunity for the purpose; and I hope that the National Committee's next step will be to extend its generosity to such communities all over the country. And after that there will be another step: to extend the collection beyond the National Committee's present ten sets. This may be a step for the libraries themselves to take: it may become a matter of course for them to use their funds for records as well as books.

B. H. HAGGIN

Prologue to February

[Continued from Page 479]

"Comrade Scheller takes the dark view. That is his right. But there are many comrades, with perhaps even greater experience and insight than he, who are convinced we can strengthen the government's democratic wing by passive tolerance. Their aim is the same as Scheller's, only they want to reach it by a bloodless way without the risk of civil war with consequences no one can foresee. They say that the government will recover its reason. Scheller asserts that it has none left. This difference of opinion constitutes our crucial problem. And since no man can be sure which is right and which is wrong, I am persuaded that we must be ready for either eventuality. Such is my solution of our differences."

Now the men at the table applauded. The eyes of the union leader spoke a "very good" as Hippmann reached for the water once more, not for oratorical reasons this time but because his tongue really cleaved to his palate. An unhappy feeling came over him. He was arguing well; he was contending with more shrewdness than he himself approved against a simple worker. But what did words mean to this man Scheller? He yielded not an inch; that he could see.

He went on rapidly. They must prepare for peace, for a Viennese peace against the barbarism of Berlin; they must demonstrate their strength by calmness and unity, and neither provoke nor allow themselves to be provoked into action; they must enlighten public opinion in the great democracies, appeal to the League of Nations, rally the comrades in England and France, not forget that the French Minister of Foreign Affairs was a Socialist. And at the same time rely upon themselves, expect the worst, prepare the general strike as answer to any decisive attack on the republic, and keep the Defense Corps intact in spite of all regulations and arrests. Every confiscated store of arms must be replaced by two new ones. Nerves must be kept steady. Let the enemy come out of his trenches and advance—when it was war, then war! "That is my opinion and, let no one confuse you, that is also the tactic determined upon by the supreme council of the party. Whoever breaks our front, however excellent his motive, has no longer a place in the party. Our solidarity is our strength. But those of another opinion should openly profess it."

The speaker sat down amid the applause of the old guard. Among the opposition no hand stirred. The chairman proposed a resolution exacting the strictest discipline and warning against a repetition of any public action not sanctioned by the governing council. Debate on the question followed at once. It was almost eight o'clock.

Hippmann took another sip of water, but the flat taste of his words remained in his mouth. It had been only another of those speeches of appeasement that he had been delivering month in and month out. In half an hour the resolution would be passed and everybody

Now in Stock

BALLAD FOR AMERICANS
Stirringly Sung by
PAUL ROBESON
Two 10" Records—Four Sides
VICTOR ALBUM P20—$2.00
ERIC BERNAY'S MUSIC ROOM
133 West 44th St. LOngacre 3-4420
OPEN TO 10 P. M. — ORDERS MAILED PROMPTLY

LAFAYETTE
PHONOGRAPHS—RADIOS AT THE MIDTOWN SHOWROOM
OPEN TO 10 P. M.
ERIC BERNAY'S MUSIC ROOM
133 W. 44th St. LOngacre 3-4420

would go home. How many hundreds of resolutions had he caused to be passed in his life? And to what end? What labor of Sisyphus! Scheller was much better off; he had no doubts. If he could only get out of this stuffy room, into the street, out of the district, and go to strange places, be alone and unknown. Not to have to act. To be permitted to think once more, from the very beginning. How tired he was. . . .

One committeeman after another spoke for the resolution. Then suddenly a railroad worker asked skeptically how the party proposed to educate the members to be ready to fight if it never permitted even a partial action. There was applause from the opposition. Another speaker, a white-collar worker with spectacles, declared, obviously against his will, in a tone of apology, that he had been delegated by his group to demand that the party leadership should "not imitate the shameful example of the German comrades but lead the Austrian proletariat, with arms in their hands, against the enemies of democracy." The opposition applauded more violently, and then the union leader, Müller, asked for the floor.

Müller was an honest man who sent his four children to the very best schools despite his small salary. Bosses and employees equally valued and feared him. There was no getting around his facts and figures and his tough leathery way of insisting on them again and again. Easy victories in wage disputes gave him no pleasure; he was proud of compromises arrived at with difficulty. He knew only facts and the logic of facts. He detested the formulations, half-emotional, half-intellectual, that the politicians used. Such phrases as "with arms in their hands" he could not bear. Only his old Viennese coachman's mustache betrayed his warm nature. His voice clicked like an adding machine.

"I am, thank God, no militarist. But this much I do know, that we have not enough fists and not enough weapons to offer effective resistance to the military power of the government, which, including the army, the police, the gendarmes, and the Home Guard, amounts to at least 100,000 men. I am also told that bombing planes, tanks, artillery, and poison gas are more effective than rusty rifles. No, in a purely military conflict with the government we are lost, even if every Defense Corps man is a hero. We have just one effective weapon, and that is the general strike, if it succeeds. It must be thoroughly prepared, and the provocation for it must be powerful enough to command the adherence of every shop. We union people know how hard it is these days to carry through even a small strike. The fear of unemployment is stronger than the desire for better working conditions. There are more and more strike-breakers. These are facts which even Comrade Scheller cannot deny. There are periods of advance and periods of retreat, even of retreat with losses. We must gain time. Every day of peace is a day won . . ."

The opposition burst out noisily. A young fellow plunged forward to the council table. "And when is an occasion grave enough for a general strike?" he cried. "The suppression of Parliament wasn't enough for you. And of course you can't start a civil war over such trifling issues as the freedom of the press or the Supreme Court. Don't you realize that we're being slowly choked to death? Soon we'll have nothing left to fight for. We must get out of this blind alley into which you have led us. Every day of peace drives us deeper into it."

A second young worker, obviously a Defense Corps man, came forward. "And if we wait until you think that a general strike might succeed we won't have a gun left. They're confiscating arms every day. They know why. They are afraid of us, not of you. That's their tactic: first to disarm us and then to attack us. And you defend them."

"They don't want to fight at all, these capitulators," cried the first of the two young men, shaking his fist at Müller.

Violent protests rose along the table. The chairman rang his bell, but the voices drowned it out. Hippmann sat without stirring, the leader listening to the voices of the people. Müller restored order by leaving his place and going slowly up to the two young men. He stopped just in front of them. Complete silence fell.

"You're too young, both of you, to be able to insult me," he said in a trembling voice, his face pale with rage. "But because you are so young and have as yet no insight of your own, and since some day the responsibility you want to assume so frivolously will be on your shoulders, I'll tell you what would happen if we made mistakes today. It would simply be the end of us—the end of a cultural work of decades and the end of the finest workers' movement in the world. And the end of all those who have built it up through sacrifice after sacrifice. The personal end of all of us."

In early issues of

THE Nation

Meyer Levin's
CITIZENS
Reviewed by Margaret Marshall

Louis MacNeice's
AUTUMN JOURNAL
Reviewed by John Peale Bishop

Hippmann heard Müller returning to his place, every step, it was so still. He felt a motion through the stillness, the turning of many heads, and Hippmann knew without looking up that Scheller was about to speak.

Scheller had risen. "Comrades," he said, as the silence deepened still more, "I do not speak now in the name of the traffic union of my district. Its attitude, on the whole, is not very different from that of other shops. They say that they will join in a general strike if the word is given; I don't know how it will be when we get that far. No one can foretell that today; too many sins have already been committed. Comrade Müller has gone over all the reasons for prudence which he thinks we ought to keep in mind, and I'm quite sure that each of them is sound enough. But in my opinion the battle can no longer be avoided for the simple reason that the enemy is forcing it upon us. It is too late for speech-making. Since we shall have to fight it is better to fight at once, today and not tomorrow, before the Defense Corps is disarmed and all its leaders arrested. Every day of peace is a day lost. I speak in the name of a great group of workers who look upon it as their duty, without further question, to defend the republic. For no one denies any longer that this republic is being betrayed every day by its government. We want simply to carry out the provisions of the party program. Our former confidence in the party leadership is dead. We are afraid it might deliver us up to our enemies without striking a blow, just as the leadership of the German party did with the workers of Germany. This possibility we must and will prevent. I beg Comrade Hippmann to tell the council that our patience is at an end. After the fifteenth of February, that is two weeks from today, we shall no longer consider ourselves subject to its direction unless in the meantime it gives up its tactics of retreat. Yes, the demonstration we organized was a test of strength. It had nothing to do, however, with the government or the police. It was a demonstration against the party leadership. Comrade Hippmann has called us the advance guard of the workers of Vienna. I promise you we will seek to deserve this name. We will fight, and if necessary, to the last man."

Every hard, unemotional word struck home. Something unalterable sounded in every sentence. Fear, incomprehension, confusion, resignation to a long-expected fate were visible on the faces of the old guard. No one stirred. There was no applause, no sign of agreement or indignation. It was as if the command to war had been given, as if death stood in the room.

"We have listened patiently to a declaration which means nothing less than overt rebellion. Irresponsible comrades whose numbers I do not know wish to impose their will upon the party, to rule by threat its elected officers and in this hour of greatest danger to desert to measures of despair. Comrade Scheller and his friends have put themselves outside the party. I shall move for their exclusion. The whole world is caught up in processes of such colossal change that they will determine the history of man for many generations. It is not for a handful of rash men to imagine that they are wiser than the whole class to which they belong. But we shall repulse also this attack. Traitors will be treated as traitors."

The last sentence cracked like a whip. Scheller stood with lowered head, eyes fixed on space. Slowly he raised it and advanced one step. The silence and the tension were now almost unbearable.

"Comrade Hippmann, who by the way has shown his true face at last, is quite right," he said, emphasizing every word. "We are violating the party laws. We must be excluded. I was ready for that. But I must confess that it hits me harder than I thought it would. I have lived my whole life, since I was able to think, within the party. Just before the war, when I was an apprentice, I entered the youth organization. My whole existence, everything beautiful that raises us above eating and drinking, everything good, has come to me through the party. Only through its teachings I became a human being; I am at home in the party as nowhere else. It hurts, and I can't imagine being outside it . . ."

He interrupted himself. There was still much that he wanted to say, but it was all private. The sad feeling that mounted in him was also not good. More rapidly he continued:

". . . But don't you see that it's no longer important whether we can win or not. The important thing for us is to prove that our ideals are worth our very lives. Otherwise the others would be right. If we die fighting, our ideals will live."

Scheller sat down abruptly, although he did not seem to be through. The men of the old guard were silent as if they were listening to the unsaid as well. There was a pause in which the chairman, holding the little bell firmly in his hand, looked uncertainly from Hippmann to Müller and back again. Finally he asked, "Does anyone else wish to speak?" Evidently no one. He turned to the principal speaker, to allow him to make his final remarks. But Hippmann waved his hand. No final remarks. The resolution condemning the demonstration and breach of discipline was adopted by a large majority.

Hippmann heard the formalities of closing proceed around him while the final remarks he had refused to make worked within him. Why did he not make them? He could have been conciliatory. He could have begun with Scheller's love and reverence and gratitude for the party; he might have expressed a deep sympathy for this feeling, which was so much more than loyalty to an organization, rather the symbol of the profound cultural aspirations of the poor, laboring human being. Starting with that, he could have expanded the order of the day into the infinite. Leaving petty politics behind him, he could have talked about culture, the future, humanity, good and evil, the imperfection of the created being and his innate yearning for perfection—a fountain of beautiful and stimulating mysterious words to refresh these weary men who had come from the machines to consider how best to defend their little freedom. Freedom—he could have pronounced the word in such a fashion that it would have had a single unequivocal meaning, would have meant the whole of life, the very right to breathe and the right to think. He could have got hold of this Scheller with words and shaken his very heart. "Confidence in our sacred cause and courage, but not the courage of desperation." He heard himself saying it, but he was not saying it. A bad day. Why had he let things come to this? Did he want everything, finally, to come to an end?

Then he heard the moving of chairs and the scraping of feet and said, "Goodnight, children," and whispered to the chairman that Scheller was to wait for him. Quite aside from party discipline, premature action was madness. . . . Hippmann's mind worked as he pressed many calloused hands. They liked him, these men. These handclasps were really the single thing that remained of his whole life. And weren't they worth more than everything else? If only the air had not been so stuffy; they should open the windows. When Hippmann looked for Scheller, he was gone. It cut him to the very heart. "He wouldn't wait," someone said.

The chairman, who always thought it an honor to accompany the speaker of a meeting to the tramway or to an automobile, was the first to notice how Hippmann, when he tried to rise, sank slowly forward and swept the bell from the table with his arm. He rushed to his side, supported the fainting man, made him lean back, and opened his tie, collar, and waistcoat. Someone ran into the hall calling for members of the Worker Samaritans, quite forgetting in his excitement that the Socialist Red Cross had long been outlawed.

Hippmann recovered quickly. It was only a passing attack of weakness. He had them often now. Too little sleep, no vacation for years, no relaxation, and always these exciting arguments and explanations in halls filled with foul air. The chairman wanted to get a taxi, but Hippmann declined. Without a word, waving farewell and thanks with a still uncertain gesture, he left the hall. The chairman and secretary followed him softly, at a distance, down the stairs. Then, near a tattered "Merry Widow" poster, they stood and looked silently after the tall man, whose left shoulder was pulled down from years of carrying a heavy briefcase, until he disappeared into the mist of the late winter night.

[Copyright, 1940, by Franz Hoellering.]

TIME says:

"A survey which, but for the war, might last week have been the biggest news to U. S. business."
—September 11, 1939

—Does DISTRIBUTION
Cost Too Much?

This non-partisan, fact-finding survey shows just how much the various distribution services cost and where the consumer's dollar goes. The suggested "Program of Action" contains important recommendations, which have been widely and favorably commented on in the press and by economists and business men. 420 pages. $3.50

Descriptive leaflet on request

Twentieth Century Fund
330 W. 42nd St., Room 2007-C. New York

Letters to the Editors

"Hoosier Hitler"

Dear Sirs: Milton S. Mayer's article on "Pretty Boy McNutt" in your issue of March 30 is one of the best of many articles on that Presidential aspirant which I have read.

Nevertheless, I think Mr. Mayer, like many other writers, spoils his picture by one serious omission, or perhaps more accurately, a misstatement, concerning McNutt's activities in Terre Haute. The reason I dubbed the Governor a "Hoosier Hitler" was not because he sent troops to Terre Haute at the request of local authorities; most governors would have done the same, although the local authorities greatly exaggerated the danger. The general strike was over in twenty-four hours.

I called McNutt a "Hoosier Hitler" because he extended to Terre Haute and Vigo County exactly the same military rule which Mr. Mayer correctly describes in Sullivan County, and continued that military rule from six to eight months, long after the troops were withdrawn. It was only after I had held a public demonstration meeting that its rigor was relaxed. No man in American life has invented a more skilful way to evade the constitutional guaranties of civil liberty than this. Simply by perpetuating military law after the need for the physical presence of troops had passed, McNutt made himself, through the military, completely the master over the ordinary rights of citizens. If this doesn't justify the title "Hoosier Hitler" I don't know what does.

I think Mr. Mayer also is guilty of playing down Mr. McNutt's imperialism. He is a very skilful advocate of the retention of the Philippines, and that on frankly imperialist grounds—grounds that would make me profoundly distrustful of him in the White House.

NORMAN THOMAS

New York, April 5

A Clarification

Dear Sirs: In my article on Thomas E. Dewey which appeared in The Nation for March 16, 1940, I mentioned George Z. Medalie's name, and I find that I may have left an inference that Mr. Medalie was tied up with the Albany beer barons. I thought I had clearly negated this suggestion, but since my mention of Mr. Medalie may be subject to another reading, in deference to him I am happy to state that I never intended to imply such a connection.

JOHN RICHMOND

New York, April 3

Conspiracy in the Northwest

Dear Sirs: The March 23 issue of The Nation carried an article by Herbert Lundy called The Laura Law Murder. In my opinion, this piece might far better have been titled Smoke Screens Out of the Northwest, for it blankets the real issues as thoroughly as smoke from a Washington State forest fire.

Laura Law's murder, the raid on the hall of the Finnish Workers' Federation, the numerous acts of violence directed against labor organizers and their sympathizers, the open calls for vigilante action by employer groups, and the failure of the local authorities to maintain law and order are clearly the result of a conspiracy on the part of big business interests in the Northwest to deprive the population of their civil rights.

The situation in Grays Harbor County is not unlike that which recently existed in Bloody Harlan County in Kentucky. But although the Department of Justice has had submitted to it a detailed analysis of the existing situation, it has so far failed to act.

There is now in the process of formation a national committee which will have as its main task the bringing about of an investigation by the Department of Justic. Dick Law and the working people of Grays Harbor County need the support of all those who recognize the necessity for defending our civil liberties. Anything that will tend to lessen that support gives further strength to those who would subvert the Bill of Rights to their own personal interests.

Quite obviously, these same people hope to hide the real facts from the general public by fanning into flame prejudices aroused by the Soviet-Finnish war and the alleged pro-Communist sympathies of some of Dick Law's defenders. It is regrettable that Mr. Lundy has failed to see through these devices or to emphasize the real issues for the benefit of Nation readers.

LOUIS P. BIRK,
Vice-President, Modern Age Books

New York, April 4

A "Bertrand Russell Fund"

Dear Sirs: Four years from now, when my son and daughter enter college, I want to realize an old hope that they will profit by association with minds as honest and as rich as Bertrand Russell's. The court decision voiding Mr. Russell's appointment to City College makes me fear that my children may be subjected instead only to association with children handicapped by bigoted parents and a faculty selected by politicians.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of sincere and thinking United States citizens concur with the New York Board of Higher Education. But I do not want merely to register a conviction or a sense of outrage. I know that court tests are costly; and that lost liberties are costlier. So I inclose my check for $50 made out to The Nation, confident that your readers, under your leadership, will further swell a fund dedicated to Bertrand Russell's reinstatement—or let it read, the reinstatement of American civil rights.

ELY CULBERTSON

New York, April 5

Let's Look at the Record

Dear Sirs: I have never read such mean-minded personal vilification as Lovell Thompson stoops to in his review of Claude Fuess's "Calvin Coolidge" in your issue of March 9. I presume from the tone of the article that Mr. Thompson is a worshiper at the shrine of the Great God Roosevelt. If so, how would he welcome such comment on his hero (post mortem, too) as he bestows on Mr. Coolidge—"runt with a pickle puss." Attack a man on his record if you will but not for his physical characteristics. Mr. Thompson's review, moreover, hardly considered the book, but was merely an attack on the man. Really, this sort of thing isn't worthy of you. Hitherto I have always thought The Nation honest and fair.

JOHN E. HERZOG

Bradford, Pa., April 2

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is idexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 20, 1940 NUMBER 16

The Shape of Things

THE GREATEST JOURNALISTIC SCOOP OF THE war to date is Leland Stowe's account in the New York Post and Chicago Daily News of how Oslo was betrayed to the Nazis and fell into their hands with scarcely the firing of a shot. And the "gigantic conspiracy" itself is the most sensational coup so far carried out by the masters of cunning in Berlin. According to Mr. Stowe, the conspiracy was so thoroughly and faultlessly organized that every key position in Oslo, including those commanding the actions of Norway's defending forts and ships, was in German hands before the invaders arrived. Norwegian boats were ordered to put their men ashore unarmed and did so without questioning the authenticity of the order; Norwegian forts were ordered not to fire. Mine controls were cut. Only one mine-layer which did not receive the false orders went about its business—and sank the cruiser Emden; one fort missed the orders and is said to have sunk the cruiser Blücher. But fifteen hundred Germans walked into Oslo unchallenged. Afterward the woman in the telegraph office who had addressed Mr. Stowe in English spoke German. Two days later 20,000 more German troops were landed. All over Norway, including Narvik, the German espionage accomplished similar if smaller miracles. It is undoubtedly preparing such miracles in other small nations whose independence the Reich aspires to "protect."

*

THE DECISION OF THE BOARD OF HIGHER Education in New York City to carry the ouster of Bertrand Russell to the higher courts was an act of simple justice which the case demanded; but in the face of the pressure applied by assorted bigots and politicians, it was also an act of courage for which the board deserves the highest praise. Mayor LaGuardia had long since ranged himself with the McGeehans and the Bishop Mannings; the Corporation Counsel had the effrontery to say in a letter to the board that "the vindication of the board's position . . . will best be served by not taking an appeal." Every teacher in the country should be grateful to the board for standing firm against an attack on academic freedom all the more dangerous for being launched in the country's largest city.

*

THE BEST NEWS SO FAR IN THE PRIMARIES is the defeat of Senator Edward R. Burke for renomination on the Democratic ticket in Nebraska. His victorious opponent, Governor Cochran, is pledged to support the New Deal, which Senator Burke has consistently knifed. Cochran's election in November should end the embarrassment Nebraskans must feel in having such completely dissimilar representatives in the Senate as George W. Norris and Edward R. Burke. Nebraska may also have helped to decide who will be the Republican Party's Presidential candidate by the vote it gave Thomas E. Dewey as against Senator Vandenberg. The Nebraska figures have increased the New Yorker's chances for the Republican nomination, as did the results of the primaries in both Wisconsin and Illinois, where the voters seemed to prefer him to Vandenberg. The huge six-to-one lead piled up by Mr. Roosevelt over Vice-President Garner in Illinois at least indicates that no third-term bogy will make Illinois voters prefer a conservative to a New Dealer. That feeling is not limited to Illinois.

*

IN THE NEW YORK PRIMARIES OF APRIL 2 the right-wing group of the American Labor Party, faithful to Franklin D. Roosevelt, won a victory over the left wing, faithful to John L. Lewis. Led by Alex Rose and Luigi Antonini, the right wing charges the opposition, headed by Morris Watson and Eugene P. Connolly, with Communist leadership and with an attempt to make the A. L. P. a front for the Communist Party by traditional Trojan-horse and rule-or-ruin tactics. The Watson faction, which calls itself the Progressive Committee to Rebuild the American Labor Party, accuses what it terms the Old Guard of fraud in the subsequent meeting of the state committee. Specifically the Progressive Committee charges that proxies were obtained by misrepresentation, coercion, and bribery. The Rose-Antonini faction returns the accusation and says that the Watson forces were discredited on the floor when several delegates put in an unexpected appearance and disavowed letters purporting to have come from them naming progressive proxies. Naturally there is speculation as to whether the party faces a split. The size of the Watson vote indicates that whether or not the left wing is dominated by Communists, it represents a sizable rank-and-file opposition to the present party leadership. If the Watson faction is in fact a Communist wedge, it is hard to see what it would gain by withdrawing. It is more likely to continue its present policy of hamstringing the leadership by court injunctions, an opposition press, and other hampering devices. Rose supporters say that it has cost the Watson faction some $30,000 so far to carry on such activities. If this is true, it would be enlightening to find out who put up the money and whether there is more to come.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE CHRISTIAN FRONT CONSPIRACY TRIAL has thus far produced little that is startling or revealing. Every effort is apparently being made—by the prosecution as well as by the defense—to keep Coughlin's name out of the proceedings; likewise the names of his respectable mouthpieces in Brooklyn, from Edward Lodge Curran down. Prospective jurors were asked whether they had read such inflammatory journals as Life and Look (suspected of hostility to Coughlin); they were not asked whether they read Social Justice or the Tablet. The defense attorneys contend that their clients were preparing to defend the republic against a "Communist uprising." They charge that the chief government witness was planted in the Front by "Communists" as an agent provocateur. When one of the defendants abruptly commits suicide, his attorney blames it on "threatening letters" from "Jews and Communists." All this is obvious camouflage; it is the stale war cry of anti-democratic groups everywhere. But the prosecution, seemingly reluctant to tread on Catholic toes, finds itself on the defensive. The whole trial has an air of unreality and unimportance because of the taboos which prevail. If only seventeen men were involved in the terrorist plans, they were scarcely a menace to the republic; if Coughlin and his cohorts in high places knew what was happening, the plot assumes greater proportions. Unless this question is answered, the trial may prove to be without meaning.

*

AS THE NEXT FISCAL YEAR APPROACHES, the Administration has rightly become somewhat panicky at the prospect of cutting the WPA to conform with the President's January budget estimates. Instead of admitting his error, the President has permitted Colonel Harrington to appear before the House Appropriation Committee with the suggestion that the Woodrum amendment of last year be withdrawn so that the appropriation can be drawn on as needed, thus making it possible for the Administration to come back for more funds if necessary. Colonel Harrington pointed out that the adoption of the President's budget estimates would require that the WPA rolls be cut from the present level of 2,300,000 workers to an average of 1,350,000 for the 1940-41 fiscal year—a reduction of over 41 per cent. About $1,500,000,000 would be required to maintain the WPA rolls at around 2,000,000—the average for the past year. A reduction below the 2,000,000 mark at the present level of employment would obviously invite a repetition of the 1937-38 recession. But instead of asking Congress to write a blank check by eliminating the Woodrum amendment, the Administration would do well to get behind the Pepper bill, which by fixing the relief expenditures for the year at the realistic figure of $1,627,000,000 would permit the WPA to be maintained at its present level.

*

AN ATTEMPT WILL BE MADE IN THE NEXT few days to put through the Barden amendments to the wage-hour law as an aid to "agriculture," although the real purpose of the amendments is to exempt canning, packing, sugar, tobacco, and lumber interests from minimum-wage and maximum-hour restrictions. California and the rest of the Pacific Coast have been made familiar—by the Associated "Farmers"—with the technique of using farmers as a front for banking and big-business interests. The Barden amendments represent the first effort to apply the same technique on a national scale. Senator James T. Murray in a radio debate with Congressman Barden said he didn't think intelligent farmers were "going to fall for this bluff." But too many Congressmen may.

*

ADOPTION BY THE SENATE OF THE BILL extending the Trade Agreements Act for three more years represents the most significant victory achieved by the New Deal at this session of Congress. Although the Administration forces were strong enough to turn back all proposed amendments, the margin by which they were rejected was uncomfortably small. Putting partisanship above the interests of the country or of their constituents, the Republicans to a man supported every amendment as it came up. They were joined not only by conservative Democrats like Glass and Johnson (Colorado), but by Senators Bone, Pittman, and O'Mahoney, who ordinarily support the Administration. Even Minnesota's two Farmer-Labor Senators, Shipstead and Lundeen, and the Progressive La Follette were lined up with the reactionaries on this issue. The Democratic split was largely on sectional lines. Many conservative Southerners joined with the urban New Dealers in support of the bill, while the Western Democrats aligned themselves with the Republicans on the wholly erroneous theory that certain mining interests were likely to be endangered by the reciprocal trade program. Although the victory is an important one in principle for economic liberalism, its practical significance is yet to be seen. The application of the idea of reciprocity in the post-war world is bound to be even more difficult than in the thirties, when it was none too easy.

*

JAPAN'S BID FOR CONTROL OF SHANGHAI'S International Settlement was decisively set back by the victory of the Anglo-American bloc in last week's municipal-council elections. Stimulated by a vast increase in the Nipponese population of the Settlement during the past few years, the local Japanese sought to overthrow the gentlemen's agreement under which seats on the council have been apportioned among the various nationalities and to seize outright control by force of numbers. They neglected, however, to take fully into account Shanghai's antiquated electoral system. In addition to having a strict property qualification which restricts suffrage to a small minority, Shanghai permits plural voting for large property owners. Ordinarily, only a handful of voters bother to turn out for the elections. This year, faced by a determined challenge from the Japanese, the large British landowners not only turned out but split their holdings so as to create additional taxpayers, and thus easily turned back the Japanese threat. The defeat comes as a bitter blow to Tokyo, for the International Settlement has been a thorn in its side ever since the occupation of the Chinese areas of the city in 1937. Seizure of the Settlement by force of arms has been threatened several times in the past, but seems hardly likely now in view of Japan's present efforts to win British support for the "New Order in Asia."

*

TOM GIRDLER'S NAME WILL FOREVER BEAR the bloody stain of the Chicago Memorial Day massacre, but he had the cheek to tell a stockholder at the annual meeting of Republic Steel that the company has never been opposed to organized labor. "Some of my best friends," Girdler said, "are in organized labor." A stockholder's suit for $12,850,000 brought against him and his fellow-directors for losses incurred through their anti-labor policies makes some interesting allegations as to the kind of "friends" Girdler may have in the labor ranks. Among the unauthorized and costly acts cited in the stockholder's complaint is the employment of labor spies and provocateurs. The suit would hold Girdler and the other officers and directors accountable for the expenditure of $200,000 on spies and strike-breakers, $300,000 for the purchase of munitions used against strikers, $100,000 for advertising the company's labor policies, $7,500,000 for the back pay that must now be given to reinstated strikers, $2,500,000 for loss of business during the strike, $2,000,000 for liability to strikers and their families for personal injuries and deaths, and $250,000 for legal fees spent fighting the original Labor Board order now approved by the Supreme Court.

*

DISTURBING REPORTS ARE COMING FROM the Bonneville Dam power project in the Pacific Northwest, where Dr. Paul J. Raver of Chicago has recently succeeded the late J. D. Ross as administrator. Ross was a lifelong advocate of public ownership, but Raver has loudly proclaimed neutrality in the struggle between public and private power agencies. This is in direct contravention of the Bonneville Act, which specifically gives preference in the sale of power to publicly owned systems. Herbert S. Marks, brilliant young attorney for the TVA, who formerly was secretary to Federal Judge Julian W. Mack, has just resigned as Bonneville general counsel because of his disgust with Raver's policies. This situation makes all the more imperative a regional authority on the Columbia River similar to the TVA. Now three separate bureaus—the Army Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation, and the Bonneville administration—handle government projects on one waterway. Coordination is poor, and there is costly duplication of overhead. Senator Norris has long been convinced that a Columbia Basin Authority should be established.

*

"FRIENDS OF THE LAND," A NEW SOCIETY which held its organization conference in Washington recently, deserves the support of the growing army of citizens concerned with conserving our natural resources and repairing the damage done to America's heritage by three hundred years of reckless exploitation. Backed by men of all political parties, its purpose is to educate public opinion about the importance of all kinds of conservation work relating to the soil, forests, water, and natural life. Research and field work in this subject, which have expanded so greatly in the past ten years, have driven home the lesson that no one group of specialists can cure sick land. The combined skills of the soil expert, the agronomist, the hydraulic engineer, the forester, and the biologist are needed to solve the problem. Still more important, the interest of those who live on and by the land must be enlisted, and one of the achievements of the Federal Soil Conservation Service has been its success in obtaining the cooperation of farmers. But with all that is being done by both federal and state authorities, wind and water continue to deplete our primary national capital—the soil. Vigorous propaganda is needed to obtain public support for efforts on a still larger scale, and that is the task which "Friends of the Land" promises to perform.

War, Unlimited

GERMANY'S lightning assault on the northern neutrals should have dispelled the last hopes of the small states of Europe that they could keep clear of the conflict. Either they must comply with Hitler's every command, in which case the Allies may consider their neutrality no more than a blind, or they must be prepared to be seized when German strategy requires it. Even humiliating subservience to Berlin will not save them. No small country stretched the definition of neutrality to meet German policies farther than Denmark, but this did not save it from being taken into "protective custody" when plans for the conquest of Norway called for a preliminary occupation of Denmark.

The news of German action in the north sent a wave of terror through the other small states. In many capitals, correspondents reported, the atmosphere became positively hysterical as rumors of new Nazi strokes in all directions burned up the wires. Holland and Belgium once again put their defenses on a war footing. In the Balkans there were reports of German concentrations near the Hungarian and Yugoslav borders and of an ultimatum sent to all Danubian border states demanding that Germany be allowed to police the entire length of the river. As news came through that Norway was resisting and the British fleet in action, the tension relaxed a little, but fears persist that a new coup will not be long postponed. Actually, Germany is not so likely to strike at another neutral, unless it is Sweden, while the success of its Norwegian venture is still in the balance. Hitler's policy has always been one bite at a time. He likes to grind one small state to a pulp so that it can be held out as a horrible example to others of what happens to those who resist German might. To move against either the Balkans or the Low Countries at this moment would be to risk a dispersion of forces and give new openings to the Allies. Hence, while there may be threats in various directions to discourage the dispatch of assistance to Norway, the launching of a new invasion seems improbable unless failure of the northern campaign calls for quick action elsewhere to restore prestige.

On the other hand, the Allies may now try to force a showdown. They are rumored to have made offers of protection to Holland and Belgium in the past week, and they are redoubling their efforts to defeat German economic pressure in the Balkans. For some time the British and French governments have been urging the neutrals to line up on their side. They have pointed out that safety is not to be found by cowering in the neutrality ditch, for when Germany is ready to seize a new victim, it may be too late to organize help. Even if some small states survive the war without invasion, it is argued, their hopes of retaining full independence depend on an Allied victory. There are few neutral leaders who would dispute this fact—in private, at any rate—but this does not hinder their desire to make the best of both worlds by keeping clear of war and yet eventually reaping the fruits of Nazi downfall. The fate of Denmark and Norway has provided a jolt to such wishful thinking, but terror of the ruthless German war machine is such that only actual invasion is likely to bring any neutral into the Allied camp. However, if London and Paris really begin to compete in firmness with Berlin and insist that neutrality no longer be molded to Nazi orders, Germany may feel impelled to seize the initiative as it has done in the north. So far as the Balkans are concerned, the question of forcing a showdown is complicated for the Allies by uncertainty regarding Russian and Italian reactions. There have been reports in the past few days of Soviet concentrations near Odessa close to the Bessarabian frontier. It is not believed, however, that Moscow will set the match to the Balkan powder barrel. But should Germany move against Rumania, the Soviets would probably repeat their strategy in Poland, seeking both to take possession of territory to which they have claims and to strengthen their defensive position.

It would be hard, also, for Mussolini to maintain his policy of non-belligerency if war spread to the Balkans. He has a foothold in that region since his rape of Albania, where incidentally large numbers of Italian "workmen" are reported to have been sent recently, and he has close treaty relations with Hungary and Bulgaria. But Mussolini is realist enough to want to continue as a "non-belligerent" until he is fairly certain which side will win. His sympathies and his hopes undoubtedly lie with a German victory, but a great many Italians fail to share his views. They do not want to fight, and particularly they do not want to fight Germany's battles. Even Mussolini's great propaganda machine seems unable to change these feelings. In fact, it has ceased to attempt the hopeless task of making the Italians love the Nazis and is now putting all its emphasis on the military strength of Germany, and the desperation of the Allied cause. Thus the Norwegian attack has been played up as an astounding German triumph, and the heavy losses incurred as a result of the British counter-attack are being minimized. In this way the Italian people are being schooled in the idea that the only way for them to share in the spoils of war is to play jackal to Germany's lion.

Can the Allies afford to take notice of the increasing hostility of the Italian government and force it to declare where it stands? That is a military as well as a political question which no layman can easily answer. It is known, however, that some members of the French General Staff were in favor of making Il Duce put up or shut up right at the start, believing that the plains of Italy were the best place to outflank Germany. Now that the war has spread all the way to the Arctic Circle they may be more doubtful about this strategy, but this, of course, may in turn steel Mussolini to make the plunge. For each widening of the conflict tends almost inevitably to spread it still farther. The myth of a localized or limited war has been drowned in the Norwegian fjords.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Truth Will Out

WHAT an investigating committee fails to do is sometimes more revealing than what it does. The Smith committee was appointed to investigate the Wagner Act and the Labor Board. Congress authorized the investigation because of charges that the act and its administration by the board were hurting business. One would think that the first, the obvious, and the important question to be answered would be the effect of the act on industrial strife. "No evidence on the matter was introduced by counsel for the committee. . . ."

The quotation is from the minority report filed by two members of the Smith committee, Representatives Healey and Murdock. The evidence they themselves present on this question is arresting. It is well known by now that the number of strikes, of men involved in them, and of man-days lost fell sharply after the Supreme Court upheld the Wagner Act in 1937. Equally significant is the minority's comparison of industries subject to the Wagner Act with those which do not come under its provisions. In 1938 the number of strikes dropped 48 per cent in industries under the act as against 29 per cent in others. The number of man-days idle because of strikes declined 71 per cent in the former as compared with 51 per cent in the latter. The number of organized workers grew from 3,600,000 in 1935 to more than 8,000,000 in 1939, but more labor disputes are being settled without strikes and fewer employers are violating the act. In 1936 complaints of unfair labor practices constituted 81 per cent of new cases filed with the board. In 1939 the proportion of unfair-labor-practice cases had dropped to 65 per cent.

"No evidence on the matter was introduced by counsel for the committee." Were Chairman Smith and his two colleagues of the majority afraid of these figures? Did they conceive it to be their task to smear the board rather than to find out what effect the Wagner Act has had on labor troubles? The committee's conduct has made the answers clear. But until the minority made its report few people realized to what extent the Smith committee resorted to distortions and evasions in order to buttress the conclusions with which it started. We cannot do more than touch on the 45,000-word document in which the minority have presented their analysis of the hearings and of the committee's report.

The majority report submitted an amendment which would abolish the board's Division of Economic Research. In support of that amendment it cites testimony by Dr. Lubin, Commissioner of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor. It quotes Dr. Lubin as saying that at least twenty economists in his bureau are "engaged in activities similar to those performed by the Division of Economic Research." It reports Dr. Lubin's statement that his bureau had received many requests from the board for statistical work and had never refused such requests, except when the staff was inadequate or the board had wanted information in too short a time. The implication is that the board's Division of Economic Research is unnecessary and duplicates work already done by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The majority report does not mention Dr. Lubin's specific testimony that the work of the division in no way duplicates the work of the bureau. It does not mention his further opinion, expressed in the hearing, that it was "very definitely" necessary for the Labor Board, like other administrative agencies of the government, to have its own division for the collection and analysis of statistics bearing on its work. This suppression of inconvenient testimony to give a completely false picture of what Dr. Lubin really said is characteristic rather than exceptional. The minority report cites one case after another of "similar editing."

In the Berkshire Mills case the majority report left out one entire paragraph and several phrases from a letter by Edwin S. Smith to give a misleading impression of his conduct. In its discussion of the Inland Steel case it managed to overlook such a trifle as the Chicago Memorial Day massacre in its effort to make it appear that the board solicits litigation and foments labor trouble. The committee ignored admissions by its own chairman in making its much-publicized charges of "lobbying" against the board. The majority report dwelt at length on the need for "separation of functions" but passed over the fact that the board's trial attorneys, trial examiners, and review attorneys are in separate divisions and that "the board's instructions impose the strict requirement that there shall be no fraternization between trial examiner and trial attorney." Review attorneys are "under strict injunction not to communicate with or discuss cases with trial attorneys, nor, unless by special permission, with trial examiners." The minority report says, "There is no evidence in the record that these instructions have been violated, except upon such rare occasions as to be of little significance." It indicates that Chairman Smith and his two colleagues of the majority were seldom bothered by the absence of "evidence in the record" to support the findings they wanted. The committee was supposed to collect facts, but produced instead an anthology of gossip and slander. "We deplore the fact," says the minority report, "that during many weeks of investigation, counsel for the committee submitted only evidence derogatory to the board." This is the investigating committee that accuses the Labor Board of being unfair in its procedure and biased in its attitude.

Fifty Years of Pan-Americanism

FOR most persons the headlines from Scandinavia probably caused last week's celebration of fifty years of pan-American cooperation to pass unnoticed. But it is not without significance that the week which saw Europe plunge into all but complete anarchy in its international relations marked a half-century of steadily increasing cooperation among the twenty-one American republics.

The symbol of inter-American cooperation throughout these years has been the Pan-American Union, which was established April 14, 1890, at the close of the First International Conference of American States. Originally set up as a purely commercial organization, it has rapidly expanded its activities into practically every field of international relations. In this respect it has served as a model for many of the non-political activities of the League of Nations. And its activities have contributed to the common interests of the American republics in such a way as to strengthen bonds that originally were none too binding.

For it must be admitted that Pan-Americanism has developed under severe handicaps. In theory, the American republics are bound together by two basic ties—geographic propinquity and a common loyalty to democratic traditions. Actually, neither of these has been as significant as is ordinarily supposed. The large cities on the east coast of South America are nearer to the Old World than to the population centers of the United States. And although all the Latin American countries are nominally republics, the democratic tradition is rooted in only a few. Moreover, throughout the greater part of the half-century the United States has been engaged in frankly imperialist activities in the Caribbean which have engendered deep suspicion throughout South America. It has been felt, with good reason, that so far as this country was concerned Pan-Americanism was merely a cloak for imperialist penetration.

That Pan-Americanism has survived and developed is a tribute to the essential validity of the idea. The Americas do constitute a natural economic unit, and it is only logical that intra-hemisphere trade should enjoy rapid development. Moreover, it has been shown that the American republics, with minor exceptions, not only desire peace but possess a capacity for living together without resort to armed force to settle their disputes. And they have succeeded, except in the World War, in keeping aloof from Europe's quarrels. It is not necessary for us to be isolationist to see the desirability of strengthening these peaceful traditions, or to urge that steps be taken in common to preserve the security of the Americas.

The importance of such common action has been brought home by Germany's seizure of Denmark. Anxiety has been felt lest the war come to the American continents through an ultimate Nazi claim to Greenland. While the danger of this seems extremely remote, there are obvious advantages in a joint stand by the American republics as opposed to unilateral action by the United States under the Monroe Doctrine. Whether the exigencies of the war will bring about genuine inter-American solidarity remains to be seen. Much will depend on the United States. The transition from "dollar diplomacy" to the "good-neighbor" policy has allayed some of the mistrust with which the Latin American countries long regarded the United States, but it takes time to overcome the suspicion of many generations. One blunder such as Secretary Hull's recent note to Mexico may destroy the gains achieved by years of effort. If we can put aside bullying tactics and become a good neighbor in fact as well as in word, Pan-Americanism may reach a vigorous maturity in its second half-century.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 497

EDITORIALS:

WAR, UNLIMITED 500
TRUTH WILL OUT 501
FIFTY YEARS OF PAN-AMERICANISM 502
CAN WE STAY NEUTRAL? by Freda Kirchwey 503
HITLER'S GREAT GAMBLE by Keith Hutchison 504
"STAMPING" OUT HUNGER by Jane Whitbread 507
HOW CHINA HELPS ITSELF by Nym Wales 509
WHO WANTS GOOD MOVIES? by Arthur L. Mayer 511
JOHN A. HOBSON by S. K. Ratcliffe 512
IN THE WIND 513
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 514

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 515
WHY HITLER SUCCEEDS by Hans Kohn 515
PITT—CHAMPION OF LIBERTY by Rustem Vambery 517
LEONARDO by Morton Dauwen Zabel 518
WAGON TRAIL by Louis B. Salomon 520
IN BRIEF 521
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 521
DRAMA by Joseph Wood Krutch 522
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 522

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

*

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Can We Stay Neutral?

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AMERICAN foreign policy is being made in Oslo Fjord and Narvik and on the Swedish frontier. It is being modified by rumors of Nazi plans for invading the Low Countries. It will depend on the behavior of the British fleet in the Skagerrak and on the intentions of the German government toward Greenland. If these struggles look remote to isolationists, it is only because they are afflicted with a convenient nearsightedness. The unanimity with which isolationist Senators and Representatives decided that what was happening in Norway was too bad but of no greater concern to America than, say, an earthquake in Turkey showed a mental myopia both dangerous and unrealistic.

This is not to say that Hitler's attack on the Scandinavian nations and his threats against Holland and Belgium directly impinge on American neutrality. Unless worse follows, we shall undoubtedly remain neutral. The Administration has met the new developments, as it has those that came before, without panic. The actual steps taken have been obvious, cautious steps. The area barred to American ships has by Presidential proclamation been extended to include all the waters around Scandinavia. A Treasury order has forbidden the transfer of Danish and Norwegian funds to prevent Germany from looting the foreign resources of its victims. And the President has issued a strong statement condemning the attack on the two Scandinavian countries, saying that if civilization is to survive, "powerful neighbors" must respect the independence of small nations. Altogether the moves made in Washington have been only those dictated by immediate circumstances. But close observers report a new anxiety in high places, and the President's speech to the Pan-American Union showed the extent of his concern.

Until last week the possibility of Allied defeat was a distant threat even in the calculations of the Administration. Last week it pushed forward and demanded consideration. Officials discussed the possibility of German control of Greenland, Denmark's one possession in our hemisphere. And their speculations ranged ahead—but perhaps not far ahead—to the consequences of a Nazi thrust into Holland. What, in case of such a move, would be our policy in regard to the Dutch islands in the Caribbean? Or suppose the Japanese should attempt to seize the Dutch East Indies, source of America's rubber supply. Could the British fleet protect those rich prizes and the trade routes that lead to them? If not, what would the United States do about it? Throughout the indecisive days of the past week, such questions were asked openly in the press and on the air, privately in government offices in Washington.

The success of the British fleet in Narvik harbor and its vigorous action in the waters off southern Norway have relieved the tension to some extent. But the fact that the policy of the United States depends in any degree at all upon local victories or defeats of the British navy should give every American food for thought.

Democracies don't go to war, these days, unless their safety is clearly threatened and the threat is felt by the population. This has often meant, in the course of Europe's progress toward catastrophe, that the democracies have realized their danger when it was too late to prevent invasion or defeat.

Democracies move slowly because the people want peace. I believe this simple desire is more important today than capitalist fear of the social upheavals that will follow war or the counter-fear of the workers that war will mean repression and reaction. Those emotions exist. But the craving for peace, the desire—basically mature, if not, as the Nazis claim, decadent—for a continent ruled by law and not by violence, is common to the majority of ordinary citizens in all countries. When the ordinary citizen controls the government, the result is likely to be delay and compromise. This may mean that democracy, like some paleolithic monster, has lost its capacity to defend itself and so to survive. But few of us who hesitate are ready yet to grant that we are lost. The democracies have at least one weapon that Hitler lacks. Once they are forced to a decision they fight because they want to fight, and they fight for what their whole people want: a chance to live out their lives in relative freedom and to solve their problems, domestic or foreign, with a minimum of brutality and disorder. This is the one hope that emerges from the growing record of democratic procrastination and defeat. It is flickering unsteadily along the rugged coast of Norway, burning dim in Sweden and the Low Countries. The world waits in doubt and agony to see whether it will be vindicated.

The United States shares all the reluctance and desires of the European democracies. It wants peace. It will not go to war or knowingly move toward the edge of war without feeling certain that its vital interests are clearly and immediately involved. Those who see in the European struggle an indirect challenge to the democratic way of life may shout their warnings; Americans will not listen unless the threat rolls close—geographically, not only ideologically close.

We are prepared to hold on to our neutrality even if it means subsidizing aggression in every corner of the world, because the price of abandoning neutrality may be war. We have, it is true, tempered our neutrality to the most pressing needs of the democracies in Europe. We have modified the law just enough to allow Britain and France to get arms as long as they have money, in the typical democratic hope that the war will end before we are called upon to modify it still further or abandon it altogether. The anxiety now evident in Washington is occasioned by the possibility that the moment for a new decision may be close at hand.

While I believe that the Administration is honestly trying to keep the nation out of war, I also believe that the President and his advisers consider an Allied victory essential to the survival of democracy and the safety of the United States. Mr. Roosevelt came close to saying so in his latest statement. Faced by a genuine danger of Allied defeat, the Administration would, I am certain, favor a much less "neutral" policy. It would hate to fight a Presidential campaign on such an issue, but the course of the war may force it to.

Of one thing, however, I feel sure. The United States will not be tripped or tricked into war by the machinations of the government or the subtle pressures of British propaganda. We shall hold tenaciously—too long, perhaps—to our neutral safeguards, and give them up only if we are convinced that the defeat of the Allies is probable and imminent. We shall give them up, if we have to, one by one, hoping that each extra fragment of aid will turn the necessary trick. And if we finally become involved in the war, we shall probably send free materials and ships and withhold troops until the need for men becomes overwhelming. It is a common assumption that a nation cannot be "half in and half out" of a major war. I do not share it. This war is being fought by reluctant, unhappy nations, haggling and negotiating as they move slowly into the conflict. We would have an even better chance than they to hold back; and our temper insures that we would take it.

Such a prospect can hardly be called a "policy." It is rather a train of events which may happen. The United States is not likely to act either more boldly or more timorously or more wisely than the other democracies. And its actions are likely to follow the same logic. This is not a logic of "dynamism." It leaves the initiative to the enemy and gives him all the early advantages. But it is based on such sound instincts of decency that it is difficult wholly to disparage. The democracies may lose as the result of their hesitations; but if they win, their victory will be worth having for the very reason that they were reluctant and slow to anger.

Hitler's Great Gamble

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

HITLER, said Winston Churchill, reporting to the House of Commons on the first phase of the great naval battle off Norway, has made "as great a strategic and political error" as Napoleon's disastrous invasion of Spain in 1808. "German positions throughout Norway," Berlin claimed almost simultaneously, "are so thoroughly consolidated that there is not the remotest possibility they could be dislodged by English and French forces."

Which side is right? Has Hitler again taken the democracies by surprise and kidnapped two more small but valuable states while they were losing time in debate? Or has he made a false move and been caught far out on Germany's weakest limb—its inferior navy? By the time this article is in print, events may have answered these questions decisively: or both sides may obtain footholds in Norway and settle down to a prolonged struggle. At the moment the situation is far too confused to permit any attempt at prophecy. But it may be worth while to discuss the motives for Germany's spring to the north and to make some estimate of the military and economic stakes involved.

The merest glance at a map is sufficient to indicate the strategic advantages which Germany can obtain from control of the Norwegian coast. Its innumerable deep harbors with their narrow entrances, easily defended by mines and coast artillery, afford wonderful submarine and cruiser bases. They would make possible counter-blockade measures on a far wider front than at present and enormously increase the difficulties of the British navy. Again Bergen is many miles nearer the north of Scotland than Cuxhaven and is a far better base for aerial attacks on the British fleet. The flat lands of Denmark also offer sites for air fields, enabling raids to be launched from more points than are available at present, and increasing the possibilities of surprise. Against such advantages must be placed the dangers of extended communications and the opportunity offered to the Allies, if the Norwegian coup fails, of establishing an "alternative front." Germany has built many of its vital war factories near the Baltic coast. Should the Allies recapture Norway, these would be dangerously exposed.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame

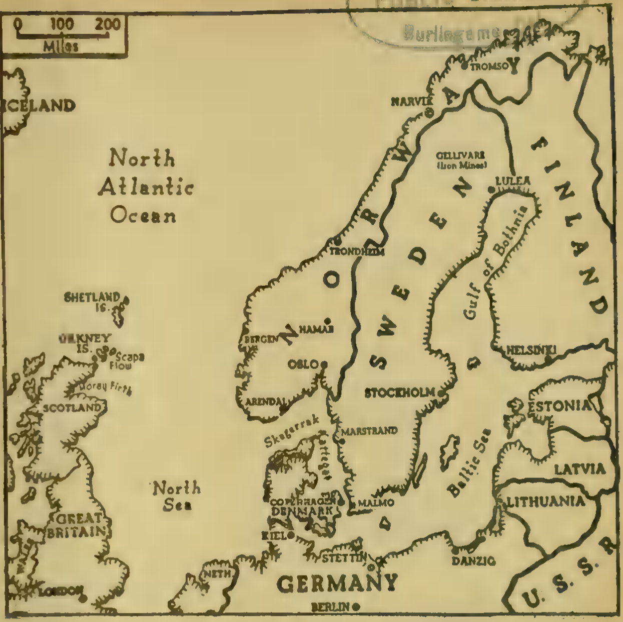
The economic benefits which accrue to Germany from the seizure of Denmark are not so great as some commentators have suggested, and if the rest of Scandinavia is brought under German control, there will be serious liabilities to set against new assets. For these countries, while affording rich possibilities of loot, are likely to be crippled as going productive concerns if their imports from the west are cut off. Danish output of butter and meat is dependent on the purchase of corn and other feed from North and South America; Norway cannot raise enough food, particularly cereals, for its own population; Sweden's highly developed metal industries require copper and other raw materials not available at home. All three countries, moreover, import nearly all the coal they use, principally from England. It is doubtful that the overburdened mines and transport system of the Reich could make good in this direction. The Swedish iron-ore mines are, of course, supremely important for Germany, but to attempt to win them by battle means to run the risk of their destruction.

It may be argued that at least Germany can prevent the Allies from drawing on Scandinavian supplies. Denmark's butter, eggs, and bacon, Sweden's timber and cellulose, and Norway's chemicals are all extremely valuable to the British: They can, perhaps, obtain alternative supplies, but these must come greater distances, thus increasing the strain on the merchant marine.

The fact that both sides had a good deal to gain by keeping Scandinavia outside the war was really the strongest reason these little countries had for the belief that they could remain neutral this time just as they had during the first World War. They are all states which have long sought peace and ensued it. They were enthusiastic supporters of the League of Nations from the beginning, and taking its promises seriously they were encouraged to reduce armaments to a minimum and use their surplus wealth for social welfare. By 1936 they had become somewhat disillusioned, and after the sabotage of the League by the great powers during the Ethiopian War, they made, together with Finland, a joint announcement of their unwillingness to participate again in the application of sanctions under Article 16 of the Covenant. Simultaneously they strengthened the ties among themselves, adopting similar neutrality rules and consulting frequently on common political and economic questions. At one time, indeed, it seemed probable that the northern bloc might reach an agreement for mutual protection and achieve a coordinated defense policy. This hope was completely shattered, however, by the action of the Danish government in refusing to consider any "entangling alliance." There is good reason to believe that this decision was strongly influenced by intimations from Berlin that it disapproved of any military engagements, even though purely defensive, on the part of its small neighbor.



Last summer, when I was in Scandinavia, the many government officials I talked to all declared that in the event of war their countries would remain strictly neutral, and they expressed confidence in their ability to make their neutrality respected. Unofficial persons were much less certain about their ability to keep out. They knew what strong pressure was already being exercised by the Nazis, who were constantly interfering and attempting to dictate to the Scandinavian states their neutral duties. Objections were raised to any newspaper article critical of the Nazis as being "unobjective," while at the same time German money lavishly subsidized favorable propaganda. Obviously under war conditions such pressure was likely to increase tremendously and provoke counter-pressure from the other side. It was difficult to see how the Scandinavian states could avoid becoming the victims of a contest in intimidation.

The memoranda delivered by Germany to Norway and Denmark attempt to justify German action on the ground that the Allies were plotting to seize these countries. This is denied in London, but it may be true. It must be remembered, however, that Britain and France had hesitated about sending aid to Finland owing to Norwegian and Swedish opposition, and that, unlike their opponent, they still have some reputation for international morality to lose. On the other hand, they had violated Norwegian neutrality in the Altmark incident, responsible quarters in Paris and London had talked frankly about the necessity of stopping the Norwegian gap in the blockade, and finally they had sown mines in Norwegian waters, although this action was taken after the German invaders had already started.

How plausible is the theory that the Allies, by hinting at a move against Scandinavia, were aiming to goad Hitler into overt violation of northern neutrality? Were they making a deliberately weak bid in the hope that Hitler would attempt a grand slam without sufficient trumps in his hand? The advantages to the Allies in luring Germany to attack Norway may have seemed twofold. In the first place, it would enable them to establish a northern front; in the second, it would mean that a comparatively large part of the German fleet would have to emerge from its safe anchorages to guard a long line of communications, thus giving the vastly stronger British navy a chance to destroy it.

The German General Staff must have known that they were gambling. Probably they were encouraged to do so by a long series of triumphs which had led them to despise the enemy—always a dangerous thing—and by the belief that they could compensate for naval inferiority by their stronger air fleet. For the success of the German plans it was essential that they should establish themselves so strongly in the strategic centers seized as to preclude their early recapture, and that they should not lose command of the Kattegat and Skagerrak, through which reinforcements and supplies from Germany must pass unless Sweden were also to be invaded.

Reference to the map shows how vital to both sides this acute-angled bottleneck leading from North Sea to Baltic is and explains the fierce fight over its possession that is going on as I write. In planning their invasion of Norway the Nazis sought to close this gap with mines and submarines, so that their transports could safely make the short run from Danish waters to Oslo. The British fleet, however, fought its way through the Skagerrak and inflicted heavy losses on the German vessels carrying reinforcements and supplies. But they were not able to close the net completely, for some troopships are since reported to have reached Oslo safely. It is still too early to know whether Churchill can make good his boast that "all ships in the Skagerrak and Kattegat will be sunk." If he can, Germany's invading army will be cut off.

In this event Germany will either be compelled to abandon its attempt to conquer Norway or be forced to use the alternative route through Sweden. There have been rumors already of demands on the Swedish government to permit the passage of troops and supplies through its territories. Premier Per Albin Hansson has publicly denied that any such demand has been made. He added that any attempt to violate Swedish neutrality would be sternly resisted by all means in Sweden's power. These are by no means negligible, and German invasion of this largest of the Scandinavian states would turn its northern gamble into a major military campaign.

To a much greater extent than its neighbors Sweden has increased its military preparedness in the past few years. Fully mobilized, it could place in the field more than half a million trained and well-equipped soldiers. It has strong coast defenses and a navy powerful enough to cause a great deal of trouble to the weakened German fleet. Finally, its air force comprises several hundred modern planes capable of severely harassing an enemy trying to land troops. Consequently, conquest of Sweden would demand not a handful of divisions such as has been detailed against the much smaller and weaker Norwegian army—which in any case was taken by surprise and not expected to put up a serious resistance—but half a dozen or more army corps. This might involve withdrawing troops from the west front and would certainly militate against the launching of a simultaneous offensive elsewhere. Tactically the German attack on Norway was a brilliant piece of staff work. Long and intricate planning and meticulous timing were necessary to make possible those unheralded leaps in the dark on five widely separated cities. Had the Norwegian forces received the briefest warning, it is inconceivable that these comparatively small expeditions could all have attained their objectives practically without loss. At Narvik, it would appear, treachery was a factor, and it may prove that at other points too defenses were sapped in the same manner.

"WANT A LIFT, LITTLE GIRL?"

Once in possession of their objectives the German landing parties were strongly placed to resist counterattack. They could turn the Norwegian fortress guns against any British assault, and in the narrow fjords their attendant planes could advantageously be used to attack warships unable to maneuver freely. There are, of course, many other places on the Norwegian coast where an Allied force might land. But the Germans are in possession of all towns having railroad connections with the interior. An army attempting to land elsewhere, in order to attack them in flank, would be severely handicapped by lack of communications, for along the entire length of the coast mountains tower high above the sea and there are few roads.

Undoubtedly the German command has chosen strong positions, and its little armies of occupation will be hard to dislodge. Nevertheless, the best tactics will not compensate for bad strategy. It is difficult to see how the Norwegian coast can be permanently held and utilized by the Nazis unless they are able to beat off the British fleet and compel it to give Scandinavia a wide berth. This is a formidable undertaking, and failure in it will mean that, for the first time, Herr Hitler has gambled and lost.

◆

In the speech already quoted Winston Churchill said, "We have probably arrived at the first crunch of war." The vivid phrase wrenches the heart of anyone who has known the civilization which Scandinavia has created and sees it now between the jaws of Mars. It is a grim reminder of the nature of the present conflict, which, for all its slow beginning, threatens to spread rapidly and destructively. The Scandinavians hardly expected to escape; not a few of them believed that it might prove better in the long run to line up with the Allies. For while their opinion of British and French policy was most unflattering, they were convinced that German victory in Europe would write finis to their independence and their democracy. In their dark hour most Norwegians will console themselves with the thought that in contributing to the defeat of Nazism they are genuinely fighting for the survival of a way of life absolutely opposed to totalitarian ideals.

"Stamping" Out Hunger

BY JANE WHITBREAD

NEW DEAL efforts to cope with the farm problem have been the subject of more criticism, ridicule, and political attack than any other phase of the Administration's program. That fact makes more striking by contrast the wholesale acclaim which has greeted the Food-Stamp Plan of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation. This happy brain child was born after months of preparation and planning, in which grocers' trade associations played no small part. It was announced simply as an experiment to be "tried" in a few localities before being extended. A triumph of simplicity, it provides for the issuance of orange tickets to persons on relief at the rate of one dollar's worth a week at the minimum, and for the free distribution of fifty cents' worth of blue stamps for each dollar's worth of orange tickets. Both orange and blue stamps can be used at any store in the selected area. The orange stamps will purchase any grocery product except tobacco, beer, and liquor. The blue stamps will buy only articles on a list of food products designated "surplus" by the FSCC.

The food-stamp experiment was introduced on May 16 last in Rochester and is now operating in nearly sixty areas from Hartford, Connecticut, to Shawnee, Oklahoma. Passage by Congress of the special $85,000,000 appropriation now in conference committee will make possible its expansion to 125 cities. But even if this appropriation is not obtained, the 30 per cent of custom receipts by which the FSCC is at present supported will enable it to extend operations to 100 areas by June 30. The plan will then be reaching four or five million relief eligibles.

On the opening day in Rochester 22.5 per cent of the 10,000 eligible families waited in line to receive their first food stamps. Since that time the percentage has risen to 75.9 per cent. In all the areas now covered an average of 61.7 per cent of all eligible persons is taking advantage of the stamps. Six hundred cities have requested to be included in the plan, with mayors, bankers, and editors echoing Frank Grimes, president of the Independent Grocers' Alliance of America, who said, "I know of no other project that has met with such enthusiastic approval."

The wide acceptance won for the scheme can be credited largely to the Commodities Corporation's president, Milo Perkins. A former paper-bag manufacturer and an ardent admirer of Stuart Chase, Mr. Perkins was well qualified to discover retailers' objections to the various FSCC plans for surplus disposal. The method of direct purchase and distribution had a major fault from the business man's point of view: it eliminated the middle man's and grocer's share of the business relief customers might bring. With remarkable deftness the stamp plan smooths hurt feelings by helping the farmer, feeding the needy, and paying the grocer, too. Designed to supplement rather than replace the direct purchase and distribution of surpluses, it performs many useful services. When large quantities of various local or national surplus commodities are distributed through local welfare agencies at specified weekly or bi-weekly intervals, perishable foods, in many instances, spoil before they can be used. The food stamps, used as currency at stores, make distribution constant rather than intermittent. Moreover, they allow the users to select their own menus. And in addition, the blue "surplus" stamps, which increase the food allotment of persons on relief by 50 per cent, enable them to fill out their diet with items which low-income families cannot usually afford but which are indispensable for health. Many of the foods currently designated "surplus" by the Secretary of Agriculture are the so-called "protective" foods—dairy products, eggs, fruits, and green vegetables.

That the Food-Stamp Plan moves surpluses through regular retail channels, while the direct-distribution method distributes them through specially established outlets, is perhaps the most obvious advantage from the business man's point of view. At the same time that it is combating malnutrition, the plan is expanding the domestic market for farm products in a manner beneficial to the food-distributing trade. In Rochester, while business in well-to-do neighborhoods did not improve appreciably in the months following the plan's introduction, it increased 12 per cent in low- and middle-income areas. Six per cent of this was the direct result of stamp business, and the rest may be indirectly attributed to the plan. In Des Moines as a whole food sales increased 5 per cent in twelve weeks after the plan's inauguration, while in the low-income areas of the city they increased 16 per cent.

The authors of the Food-Stamp Plan were influenced in their thinking by the potentialities of the low-income market for farm products. Basing his remarks on the Report on Consumers' Expenditures of the National Resources Committee, issued shortly before the plan was launched, Milo Perkins told a grocers' convention last summer that "40,000,000 Americans are living in families whose average cash income is only $9 a week. . . . About one-half of these 40,000,000 persons are getting some form of public assistance . . . they spend an average of about $1 a week a person for food; that's 15 cents a day . . . 5 cents a meal!" When the weekly allowance for food of a percentage of these people is increased 50 per cent by the stamp plan, how do they spend the addition? A partial answer to this question is found in a report recently issued by Mr. Perkins, based on blue-stamp purchases made in six areas during three periods—from July 16 last to September 30, from October 1 to December 15, and from December 16 to January 16. Apparently from 5 to 21 per cent was spent for vegetables, from 13 to 17 per cent for fruit, from 17 to 25 per cent for butter, from 17 to 26 per cent for eggs, 10 per cent for pork lard, and 23 per cent for pork. Before the addition of pork to the surplus list, roughly 50 per cent of blue-stamp purchases consisted of butter and eggs. It was estimated then that if the plan were extended to cover 75 per cent of the entire relief population, it would develop a market for these products 12 per cent greater than the present entire national consumption of butter and eggs. The addition of pork, however, caused a considerable drop in butter and egg purchases, creating a more balanced consumption picture for surplus products.

Stamp-plan authorities are wary of making estimates as to the possible additional market for surplus foods which may develop. Mr. Perkins said in December: "The stamp plan makes possible a much broader market for farmers producing commodities for which there is an elastic consumption, such as dairy products, poultry products, fruits, and vegetables. . . . This wider distribution will do more than provide a new market for surpluses; ultimately it can bring about a better price level for an entire crop, especially in the case of those commodities which happen to be selling very much below parity." Even more sanguine, the FSCC Annual Report stated, "It was evident early in the program that the stamp plan promises significant new markets for various agricultural commodities."

The authorities are making no prophecies about how soon the plan may affect surpluses sufficiently to raise prices. Logically, higher prices would put the "protective" foods out of reach of relief families and block the plan's aim of combating malnutrition among this group. However, such a development is a very remote possibility. Should it materialize, the FSCC would probably try to replace the "protective" foods whose prices had skyrocketed by others of similar nutritive value; for example, cheese might replace eggs. The theory is also advanced that increased demand for blue-stamp products might lead farmers to produce more of them. In taking this step they would switch from the production of cotton and wheat. If the plan is influential in bringing about a substantial shift in the crops that farmers plant, this would seem to be its greatest long-term contribution to the American economy. Although all statements are hedged round with qualifications, the FSCC's preliminary studies do show that increases in the food expenditures of the lower third of the people will mean increased consumption of butter, eggs, fruit, vegetables, and meat rather than of corn and flour.

No one is more aware than the plan's authors of the tremendous problems connected with any effort to move surpluses and raise farm prices. The FSCC stresses the fact that the stamp plan is not a substitute for the direct-purchase-and-distribution method, which this year will move some $80,000,000 worth of surplus commodities, but is designed to supplement it. With relief eligibles participating 100 per cent it will add $100,000,000 to the nation's total food outlay of some $15,000,000,000.

How China Helps Itself

BY NYM WALES

Manila, March 4

ON AUGUST 26, 1938, a small event of large significance occurred in China: the first unit of the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives was set up. When that little group of refugee blacksmiths organized a cooperative foundry in a village in the farthest interior province, they laid the foundation stone of a movement that may revolutionize the life of Chinese villages.

On October 31, 1939, a squadron of Japanese bombers paid a special visit—they announced their intention in Hankow beforehand—to the village of Paochi in Shensi in order to annihilate this new industry. By accident they succeeded in destroying the foundry. But the blacksmiths did not run away, as city workers have so often been forced to do since Japan began its systematic campaign to destroy competitive Chinese industry. Helped financially by other cooperatives which had by that time been established, they simply picked up the steel fragments of the bomb and what remained of their machinery and moved into other quarters. Now they are operating again, and the fragments have doubtless become part of a new anvil.

Japanese bombers can never again find this foundry except by another accident. It looks like any other house in the hundreds of villages on the landscape. To destroy it they must destroy a whole village. Japan can certainly afford to do this. But it cannot afford the bombs, planes, and gasoline required to annihilate all the villages in China suspected of harboring industrial cooperatives. And even if Japan did undertake such an extravagant enterprise, the cooperatives would simply go out and create new industry in other places. It costs only $50 (U. S.) to start a surgical-gauze cooperative, for instance; $100 will start a candle- or soap-making unit; $200 a cotton-weaving cooperative. A $700 cooperative will employ 100 refugees—$7 will give a man a permanent job. This soon takes his family off relief. Later on, when the money has been paid back at 6 per cent or 8 per cent—and most of the cooperatives are able to do this—it will be applied to another unit and will give another man a livelihood. Commodity goods are at such a premium that the cooperatives make a profit almost immediately.

The people behind the cooperatives have found a way to launch an economic offensive against the invader that cannot be met with military force, a solution of the problem of how to industrialize the backward interior. Japan's plans for economic empire in China can never succeed if China industrializes itself in self-defense, thereby holding its own market, creating its own commodity production, and supplying its armed forces with equipment.

The history of this little industrial-cooperative movement is one of the most interesting stories that have come out of the war. One should never give up hope in China. As soon as one feels that all is lost, some meteoric phenomenon like this appears and one realizes again the immense vitality immobile in this vast nation. Nowhere else on earth can so much be done with so little. For the cost of one super-battleship America could finance enough industry in China to keep its armies fighting indefinitely, and that loan could eventually be repaid instead of being scrapped like a battleship. It would seem more intelligent to keep a million Chinese soldiers in the field than to build a big navy to combat Japan's imperial ambitions. The $100,000,000 that goes into a battleship would be not less than 1,000,000,000 yuan at the present rate of exchange. If we dug up that much idle gold in Kentucky we could probably create 480,000 industrial cooperatives in China and give jobs to 8,000,000 refugees. From August, 1938, to May, 1939, the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives administration established 1,200 registered cooperatives with a capital of about 2,500,000 yuan, the membership numbering 20,000 persons. Actually, this sum probably provided a livelihood for 50,000 individuals, including dependents. Our billion yuan would take care of 400 times as many. This could not have been done even in China before the war. Only the blockade, the dearth of capital and commodity goods, and a labor pool of from thirty to sixty million refugees made it possible.

It sounds fantastic. But so is the whole story of Indusco. According to an unofficial estimate made in October, 1939, the total value of the monthly production of the whole chain of industrial cooperatives (1,470 units) averaged almost 5,000,000 yuan. The total field investment was about 3,630,000 yuan. This means that capital was being turned over, in terms of production value, 1.4 times a month, or 16.8 times a year! The few private factories that exist are making similar records, but they have no future. Transportation costs, hazards of war and bombing, and lack of efficient management limit their opportunities. Village cooperatives supply the local market, move to the source of raw materials, pay no attention to bombing, utilize labor power to the fullest since the members are working for themselves, and have a foolproof management.

Most of the cooperatives are producing consumer commodities, but a few are already sniping directly at the Japanese by filling orders for war supplies. For example, the weaving and tailoring units of the Northwest Headquarters (five administration headquarters have been established) in the second week of last December delivered 40,000 padded overcoats to the central armies, made with cotton that would otherwise have gone to Japan. At the same time they are filling an order for 250,000 army blankets, made with wool that was formerly exported to Japan through Tientsin to make winter clothing for the well-clad Japanese troops. (Chinese soldiers never dreamed of woolen blankets before. They used cotton ones imported from India or padded quilts.) Lu Kwang-mien of the Northern Headquarters states that in six weeks his units also filled orders for 30,000 pounds of medical cotton, 30,000 pounds of bandages, and 100,000 hemp sandbags. Ninety per cent of the output of the canvas cooperatives there goes to make stretchers.

Indusco is not yet making munitions on a large scale, but the cooperative machine-shop in the Northwest has produced, besides machinery for various industries, a usable sub-machine-gun, a Mauser pistol, an automatic rifle, and an ordinary rifle. Hand grenades can be made for fifty cents a piece. This same shop turned out 70,000 in one month. The guerrillas in North China are begging for a dynamite plant. At present they have no high explosives with which to blow up Japanese lines of transportation.

The Indusco movement shows what possibilities are latent in China. The whole thing has been done by a handful of Ford-trained engineers and foreign-born technicians with a little more than average imagination and good technical education. With adequate financial support, which they have never received, they would soon build up the movement to formidable proportions. The C. I. C. administration has a hopeful plan to create 30,000 cooperatives in a vast crescent from Inner Mongolia to the southern sea. All it needs is money at low rates of interest—a most difficult thing to obtain in China today. It now has centers in every one of the eighteen provinces except Kiangsu (Shanghai area), Hopei, and Shantung. Mobile industrial units are functioning behind the Japanese lines in Anhui and Shansi—with funds contributed from overseas Chinese and Americans in the Philippines—and very close to the front in other war zones.

The progress of this little movement is in many ways a test for China, determining whether its economic resources can be developed and whether political unity and mobilization of the population can be achieved. A good omen, and one of the most amazing things about the movement, is that it has received the backing of the whole, usually divided, Soong family; it is without doubt the only project to benefit from this miracle. Madam Chiang Kai-shek originally sponsored it upon the recommendation of the British Ambassador, Sir Archibald Clark-Kerr, who also secured the appointment of Rewi Alley as technical adviser. Dr. H. H. Kung is chairman of the C. I. C. administration in Chungking and holds the purse-strings. Madam H. H. Kung made a loan of $100,000 and contributes her moral support. Madam Sun Yat-sen is honorary chairman of the Hongkong Promotion Committee. T. V. Soong has obtained bank loans amounting to 1,200,000 yuan, and is a member of the International Committee for the C. I. C. Productive Relief Fund in Hongkong, of which his efficient bank manager, S. J. Chen, is treasurer. This committee handles contributions on the revolving-fund principle and is the liaison for promotion committees abroad. The Episcopal Bishop of Hongkong, the Right Reverend R. O. Hall, is chairman, and Dr. Chen Han-seng of the Institute of Pacific Relations is secretary. Since its formation in June, 1939, the committee has handled nearly 2,000,000 yuan in private loans and relief contributions.

China has today reached a crucial moment in its economic history. Conditions are favorable for a vast industrial movement—millions of refugee workers, immense untouched natural resources, a constant demand for unavailable commodity goods, a blockade creating a wall against foreign imports, a European war preventing economic pressure and dumping by the great powers, war-time destruction crying out for rebuilding. The situation calls for an industrial development comparable to that which took place after the Civil War in America or, in more recent history, under the Five-Year Plan in Russia. In Russia they had to liquidate the kulaks to insure the free labor necessary. In China the Japanese invasion has created a huge army of potential factory workers.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Who Wants Good Movies?

BY ARTHUR L. MAYER

EVER since its birth the motion-picture industry has been under fire from a host of unofficial, self-designated critics, as well as from those whose profession is criticism. Its improprieties have been castigated by reformers, its standards by educators, its immaturity by intellectuals, its banality by art lovers, and its trade practices by government attorneys. Liberals have been chiefly disturbed over its reluctance, as Dudley Nichols put it, "to use the strong materials of life." In the words of Archibald MacLeish, "Hollywood is in trouble at the box office . . . and the reason its pictures lack the fourth dimension of life is precisely that they do not know their own time, do not present their own time, do not belong to their own time, and therefore quite naturally have lost the interest of their own time."

The lack of Mr. MacLeish's "fourth dimension," however, has not seriously affected a producer like Louis Mayer of Loew's, Inc. Far from being in trouble at the box office, his company last year made close to $10,000,000. By concentrating on escapist themes he has paid consistent dividends to his stockholders and awe-inspiring salaries to himself and his fellow-executives. Neither he nor his competitors will adopt a different policy unless box-office grosses convince them that their patrons demand pictures with social content. So far they have seen no indication of any such demand. In this, although in little else, they are in complete accord with exhibitor opinion as expressed by Frank H. Ricketson, a circuit operator, in his new book "The Management of Motion Picture Theaters." "Pictures built on themes of special interest other than pure entertainment," Mr. Ricketson says, "are of little box-office value . . . propaganda pictures miss the aims of good attractions. Churches, schools, and libraries may educate and moralize; the theater rightly offers only amusement."

Neither "Confessions of a Nazi Spy" nor "Juarez," which were highly praised by the social-minded, were included in any of the lists of the ten most popular pictures of 1939 compiled by exhibitors. They made money for their producers, but in the domestic field they were not so profitable as the escapist pictures in which Robinson, Davis, and Muni had previously appeared. There is a demand for films with social content, but it exists among people who do not regularly attend the movies, and who, when given the opportunity to patronize such pictures, fail to do so promptly enough or in sufficient numbers to offset the defection of those who seek amusement exclusively. Time after time, when exhibitors have presented a mature, realistic picture to empty seats, a few lonely liberals arrive after the picture is no longer being shown and seem considerably annoyed that it has been withdrawn.

Last year, for instance, RKO Radio hatched an unpretentious "B" picture entitled "Boy Slaves." It showed, somewhat luridly though without exaggeration, child-labor conditions in the turpentine camps. Its distinction was not its direction or star value but its courage. It was a thrust at injustice and cruelty by men who risked their jobs in making that thrust. No large first-run exhibitor in New York City was equally gallant, and it had to be booked at the Rialto Theater. Previews were shown to a large number of progressive organizations. Most of their comments indicated keen disappointment that Cagney, Gable, and Flynn had not been cast as the boy slaves, and that the pitiful peonage conditions were not shown in beautiful technicolor. We received many such suggestions but little cooperation. "Boy Slaves" was sold down the river, and it can be safely predicted that no further productions dealing with child labor will come out of RKO studios for many years. It should not be surprising if they specialize henceforth in timely stories like "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" and "Swiss Family Robinson."

An even more disastrous experiment was the importation of "That They May Live," a French anti-war picture which showed the Verdun dead rising from their graves to prevent another holocaust. It was produced during the period of appeasement and could not be shown today in any European country. We are fortunate that we are still able to see such pictures in America, and that we have critics who call them to public attention. Frank Nugent of the New York Times wrote of "That They May Live," "Poignant . . . significant . . . performances of dignity, sincerity, and depth. Your eyes will not leave the screen." And Howard Barnes of the Herald Tribune said, "Daring . . . striking . . . challenging . . . not to be missed!" Nevertheless, after "That They May Live" had been shown for three weeks at the Filmarte, both exhibitor and importer were glad to close it. This theater, which once paid $45,000 for a film about the unfortunate love affair of a prince and a beautiful commoner, was unable to pay the distributor anything. To date the picture has had three bookings. Not a single pacifist organization has moved a finger to bring this dynamic piece of anti-war propaganda to the attention of the public.

Apparently the horrors of war, although they may be endured on the battlefield, are too terrifying to be witnessed on the screen. An equally effective, if less horrifying, film was Herbert Kline's "Crisis." This able young producer was sent to Czechoslovakia by a few public-spirited men. He was in the Sudetenland during the Nazi invasion and returned with so timely and deeply moving a picture that the National Board of Review ranked it the sixth best of the year. But it was not the six-hundredth at the box office, where it took in less money than the average travelogue. Its failure was not due to indifference or hostility on the part of exhibitors. Both Warner and Loew's tried to show it, but the public did not wish to be harrowed or educated. Even fewer dates have been obtained for "The City," that grim yet gay indictment of the chaotic modern metropolis. "The River" and "The Plow That Broke the Plains" were shown widely only because they were distributed gratis for purposes of propaganda. Pictures like "A Man to Remember" will long be remembered for its amazingly low grosses, and "Make Way for Tomorrow" made way rapidly for livelier entertainment.

There would be no value in stressing these mishaps if there were not signs of a new phase in motion-picture production. I am not referring to television, technicolor. or fourth dimension, but to maturity. If picture audiences so will it, the exclusively escapist days of adolescence are over. There have recently been released five of the most socially important films ever produced: "Abe Lincoln in Illinois," "Grapes of Wrath," "Of Mice and Men," "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet," and "The Fight for Life." In the offing are Charlie Chaplin's "Dictator" and Herbert Kline's "Lights Out in Europe." Both within and without the industry powerful voices are being raised in protest against these pictures. Martin Quigley, publisher of the most influential trade paper, writes of "Grapes of Wrath": "It may be wondered why . . . such an unpromising field of material was prospected." Abe Myers, attorney for the leading independent-exhibitor organization, charges that "such books as 'Of Mice and Men' and 'Grapes of Wrath' are too filthy to be permitted in American homes." Martin Dies, who has already attributed "Blockade," "Fury," and "Juarez" to Communist influences, will probably consider Steinbeck's pictures conclusive evidence for his contention that Hollywood has become an outpost of Moscow.

All pictures contain elements of propaganda, but those I have mentioned are propaganda for democracy, peace, tolerance, and economic and scientific progress—for the things that civilized men hold most dear. Under the much-condemned block-booking system they will be exhibited in every American city and hamlet. Not the praises of the liberals or the laments of the conservatives but the attitude of the picture-going public will determine the success of these pictures and consequently the future course of film production. If they do not prove popular, it will not be possible to ascribe the dearth of pictures with social content to routine-minded producers, stupid exhibitors, censorship, or distributor-controlled theaters. On the other hand, if they are widely attended and widely appreciated, pictures will cease to serve exclusively as aphrodisiacs for tired business men, vicarious adventure for romantic matrons, and dream weavers for adolescents. They will be able at least occasionally to speak universal truths and help to mold a nation's development.

John A. Hobson

BY S. K. RATCLIFFE

IF JOHN A. HOBSON, a highly valued contributor to The Nation, had been an American instead of an Englishman, his career would have been markedly different from the one which came to an honored close in London on April 1. Great universities would have competed for his services, and his reputation would have been far more extensive. But I doubt whether that seemingly frail physique would have borne him into his eighty-second year, whether his labors would have been as fruitful or his life as happy. He was altogether English, and yet—to use the phrase he applied to one of his heroes, Richard Cobden—he was an international man, while his social philosophy and method of approach made a special appeal to students and older readers in North America.

Hobson took pleasure in saying that he came from the middle of the middle class, and was born in a town of middling size in the middle of the English Midlands —Derby. At Oxford he was contemporary with Henry Nevinson and Graham Wallas. His hopes on leaving the university were doubtless set upon an academic career. His training, like theirs, had been in Classics. When he entered upon his analysis of the industrial and financial system there were few chairs of political economy in England and none of sociology. In after years he was constantly labeled professor. But this eminent master of social philosophy, with an enviable gift of public speech, was never offered a university appointment. He belonged to the select company of creative thinkers who have been professors-at-large.

It was an unlikely personal encounter which brought his conversion to the twofold theory of underconsumption by the masses and the fallacy of excessive saving, which he regarded thenceforward as mainly responsible for the dislocation of capital and the miseries of labor in periods of bad trade. Toward the end of his long life, in "Confessions of an Economic Heretic," he wrote an engaging account of "Hobson's revolt." He had lived to hear the doctrines of J. M. Keynes proclaimed with a resonance never dreamed of in connection with his own essays in persuasion, and to witness his old radical heresy become the dynamic element in many a New Deal devised for combating the latter-day crisis of capitalism. Here, to be sure, was a remarkable triumph for a quiet and persistent thinker. Moreover, in one special field Hobson's contribution was at once original and decisive. Forty years ago, as the Boer War was taking shape, he made a tour of South Africa which furnished him with the basic substance for his indictment of imperialism, one of the books by which governing minds have been changed and national policies rebuilt.

For some sixteen years after 1906 Hobson was a member of the brilliant group of journalists who met in Westminster at the weekly lunch table of H. W. Massingham's Nation. Among his colleagues on the paper were L. T. Hobhouse, H. W. Nevinson, L. T. Hammond, C. F. G. Masterman, F. W. Hirst; and in the final stage H. M. Tomlinson and Harold J. Laski.

Hobson in politics was a Liberal stalwart, always wholly detached. The regular party position was impossible for him, since by conviction and habit of mind he could not be other than of the left center. His fear of state bureaucracy kept him apart from the Socialists; but on the other hand he was never tempted by laissez faire. Of that he had been born free. He knew the modern world to be inevitably collectivist. He believed that, within certain bounds which we could not hope to break, the essentials of democratic freedom could be preserved. In his vision wealth and welfare were socially one. And in world affairs he was an unswerving advocate of complete collective security.

Throughout a full half-century the tall figure of J. A. Hobson was very familiar in the London best known to many among us. In conferences of many kinds he was a welcome speaker, for he had a happy gift of satiric humor. In discussions he could be depended upon for an extempore utterance so perfectly phrased that the verbatim report needed no correction. Whenever the summons came for a public stand upon any one of the issues which to him represented the rights of the citizen and the values of the commonweal, there promptly and whole-heartedly was he. His name would be given without hesitation; his voice and pen were at call. His courage was unfailing; he was entirely incorruptible.

It happens that as I finish this very inadequate tribute, my eye falls upon a sentence written by Dorothy Thompson in praise of an American public man whose ways and works make a striking contrast to those of our English friend: "He has a passion for the preservation of society, which is probably the noblest passion that a human being can have." I could not find a truer word for John Atkinson Hobson.

In the Wind

WHEN SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS visited Hollywood recently, he spent a good deal of time with Charlie Chaplin. For his visitor's benefit Chaplin acted out scenes from his forthcoming film "The Dictator." He said to Cripps, "After Hitler sees this picture he'll never dare open his mouth again."

ALTHOUGH MAYOR LAGUARDIA'S move in eliminating Bertrand Russell's post from the city budget—thus obstructing legal action—surprised many observers, persons connected with the affair anticipated his act. The truth is that on the eve of the Board of Higher Education's meeting to reconsider the case LaGuardia privately urged its members to rescind the appointment.

THE POLICE GAZETTE advertised recently in a newsdealers' trade paper. The ad reproduced the Gazette's first cover, which appeared in 1845, and its latest. The 1845 cover carried the line: "Love and Murder in Brooklyn." The 1940 cover read "Love Rackets and Murder on Broadway."

MAX EASTMAN has been recognized as one of Soviet Russia's severest critics for a good many years. But only a fortnight ago the Reverend James M. Gillis, editor of the Catholic World, announced that "those who are keeping count of American leftists now awakening to the truth about Soviet Russia must chalk up another name: Max Eastman."

THE FAILURE of "Abe Lincoln in Illinois" to "go" at the box office has started a flurry of stories. The latest, reports Variety, is about a conversation between Max Gordon, producer of the picture, and Charles P. Skouras, of Fox-affiliated theaters. "Max," shouted Skouras, "they don't want Lincoln."

DESCRIBING THE visit of Erik Colban, Norwegian Minister at London, to the British Foreign Office shortly after the Nazi occupation of Norway, the New York Times reported: "Incidentally, it is said that if a diplomat has to lose his country there is nobody in the diplomatic business so comforting to talk to as Lord Halifax."

DURING THE recent Socialist Party convention at Washington a diminutive member of the Young People's Socialist League was handing out leaflets on the sidewalk. A brawny policeman accosted him and tried to make him move on. The Socialist refused and started to take down the policeman's number. "Listen," said the policeman plaintively, "I'm an American citizen and I've got my rights."

INCIDENTALLY, WHEN the Socialist Party nominated Norman Thomas for President for the fourth time, one newspaperman suggested as the campaign slogan: "If not now, why not eventually?"

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

San Francisco, April 10

SO THE blow has fallen and the Nazis have struck. From now on, in my judgment, the war will be in full swing. Both sides are now fighting for their lives. From now on there will be hitting below the belt and above the belt by both sides; no attention will be paid to any laws of war or to any attributes of neutrality. When the English decided to violate international law in the Altmark case, the die was cast. Sowing mines off Norway was the inevitable next step. Seven months of inability to get at the enemy was bound to make both sides take desperate chances and stop at nothing, and that is what we are going to see. It is, of course, impossible at this writing to know whether the English had really planned to block the Danube. It would not be surprising if it were true. This is a war of nerves as well as of economics, and the elevation of Winston Churchill to a position of control of the defense services was proof that the British government felt that the time for drifting was about over.

The amazing thing about the attack on Denmark and Norway is that the Germans were able to make it a complete surprise, though the preparations must have been known to thousands. The moves on Czechoslovakia and Poland were foreshadowed by a warning press campaign; the Nazis themselves tipped off the world to what was coming. But only a few straws in the wind warned about Denmark. Two weeks ago a Norwegian fisherman who had sold fish to a German submarine captain reported that his customer had told him that in a very short time German submarines would be so common at the particular place where the transaction occurred that no one would pay any attention to them. From Paris came reports that the Germans were massing on the Danish frontier and that some of them were practicing loading and unloading transports. But these and other stories were not played up and seemed to belong in the ordinary category of war rumors. Certainly it looks as if the British had been caught napping, but as to that we shall know more before these lines appear in print. We only know today that from all appearances the Germans have scored an initial success in the surprise move which every general tries for.

That the occupation of Denmark and the invasion of Norway gravely endanger the position of England is obvious. People are saying out here in San Francisco, where I am writing, that Denmark will be to Hitler what Belgium was to the Kaiser. I doubt it; I do not see how this move can make Hitler any blacker than he was before. And unfortunately it places the German air fleet in a most advantageous position to strike at England. I do not doubt that the Nazi military men who told me last fall that the blow would come about May 1 and would lead to the destruction of every English city on the coast had this in mind when they spoke so confidently. However, the English must also have had this contingency in view. Only the other day their Chief of Staff, General Ironside, echoed the Prime Minister's words that Hitler had "missed the bus" because he did not strike last fall when England was relatively unprepared. The months that have passed since then have undoubtedly been utilized to the full to safeguard England's shores and to line them with anti-aircraft guns. But I confess that it has seemed to me as a layman that the Germans were getting rather the best of it if one might judge from the Scapa Flow attacks. It is impossible to prevent an alert enemy air fleet from profiting by weather conditions which no human being can control.

Now the English and Germans are at each other's throats, and we shall see in the next two or three months whether Hitler's star will continue to rise or will begin to set. On the basis of my experience in Germany last fall I have been asking myself how the ordinary German will react to the news that his country has again taken over a small neighbor. From all that I hear, and especially from Anne O'Hare McCormick's admirable reports, the anti-English propaganda of Goebbels and his miserable press has been having considerable effect. So I very much fear that many of the German people will believe that Hitler is telling the truth when he says he is "protecting" Denmark and Norway for their own good. None the less, I am certain that many others will no more be blinded by what has happened than they were by the horrible misrepresentations about Poland and Czechoslovakia. They will be heartsick, but what can they do? Every conversation I had with persons of such views ended in that way—"What can we do?" Unfortunately, the greater the success of Hitler in Scandinavia, the more difficult will be the expression of any feeling of indignation in Germany at the destruction of the independence of still other countries.

The worst of it is that if the English now attack the Germans in Denmark and Norway, all the devastation that will take place in those unfortunate, innocent, and lovely little countries will be laid by the Germans at England's door!

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE OFFICIAL reports of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, otherwise known as the La Follette committee, fill many volumes. Their hundreds of closely printed pages contain the most detailed and extensive documentation of industrial warfare ever made. Within the dun-covered books moves a colorful procession of workers, employers, stool pigeons, strike-breakers, police officers, speaking their own language; in the long dialogue of Q. and A., characters and interests, prides and prejudices, hopes and fears are dramatically or casually revealed.

To read almost any one of these volumes is to wish that it might be put into coordinated form and printed in big type for Everyman to read. In "Citizens" (Viking Press, $2.75) Meyer Levin has done just that with the volume which contains the results of the committee's investigation of the Memorial Day killings in 1937. Mr. Levin, who was an eyewitness at the prairie edge of Chicago on that warm May day when nine people were fatally hurt and many others wounded by police guns and clubs, wrote the very vivid account of the parade and the killings which appeared in The Nation at the time. He has now written the whole story as fiction. To give it shape and meaning beyond mere reporting he has projected it through the eyes and mind and feelings of a doctor, Mitchell Wilner, his central character, who almost by accident becomes an actor in the drama and then, driven by a compulsion he cannot down to find out why and how it happened, is drawn deeper and deeper into a research he had not planned. Interspersed through the main story are fictional biographies of the victims.

"Citizens" is an absorbing book. One reads to the end of its 650 pages. Yet as a whole it has the interest and power of good reporting rather than of fiction. It tends to fall apart because the character of Dr. Wilner is not sufficiently well realized to weld it together. One feels that, consciously or not, the objective in inventing the character of Dr. Wilner was not so much to create a character as to educate the public; Dr. Wilner is Mr. Levin's pupil, and parts of his progress take on a primer-like quality. At times the writing goes soft after the fashion of so much didactic "left" writing of the past decade.

Aside from the mixture of motives underlying the conception of the central character, there is another flaw. Perhaps it is too much to demand that Dr. Wilner should find out why and how it happened, in the deeper sense; but the introduction of such a character inevitably introduces the demand, and the fact that Mr. Levin does not satisfy it, that Dr. Wilner's search is not resolved, weakens the book as fiction. One feels that Mr. Levin would have done a better job of educating the public if he had succeeded in creating a character. But he has written an excellent and very moving account of a tragic episode. It should be read, particularly by those "citizens" who assume that industrial warfare "in another county" does not concern them.

JULIEN BRYAN, who has photographed his way through many strange parts of the world, had neither the intention nor the desire to be in Warsaw during the siege that preceded its fall to the Nazis. He merely thought it would be a good idea to get a few background pictures in a country where war seemed certain to strike, but not quite yet. On the morning of September 3 he took a train out of Bucharest not aware that war had begun. The first bombing came fifteen minutes after the train had crossed the Polish border and continued at intervals during the four days it took to get to Warsaw. By that time, September 7, the diplomats had left the city. Mr. Bryan remained until September 21, when hostilities ceased for three hours to allow foreigners with passports from neutral countries to leave. He got his background pictures—of a background plowed by German bombs—and even managed, by a ruse, to get them safely back to America; but the most indelible print of all he carried back in his own mind, of human suffering, fear, and courage, of people going about their business in a city continuously under fire and doomed to fall.

The photographs which accompany the text of "Siege" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.75) are excellent; but it is a dismal commentary on the state of the "modern" mind that they would be more striking or tragic or horrifying if we had not seen them before—with Spanish or Chinese or Finnish instead of Polish women and children, the madonnas of our age, staring at us out of the ruins of homes and hospitals. Yet Mr. Bryan's close-up of a Blitzkrieg is striking enough even for the "jaded" observer. MARGARET MARSHALL

Why Hitler Succeeds

FAILURE OF A MISSION. By Sir Nevile Henderson. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

SIR NEVILE HENDERSON was British ambassador to Berlin in the crucial years from 1937 to 1939. His report of the aims and outcome of his mission is neither a great literary nor a great human document. Nevertheless, it is a revealing and important book, not because it contains any startling new facts, but because it illuminates convincingly the minds of Sir Nevile Henderson and Mr. Neville Chamberlain, which are essentially the minds of the average Englishman or American. Some of the traits brought out in this book are definitely upper class, as in the naive dissertation on hunting, but on the whole we find here the dominant Anglo-Saxon attitude of the last two decades. It is this attitude which explains the success of Hitler. Sir Nevile Henderson deplores the failure of his mission, to which, we have no reason to doubt, he was sincerely devoted. He failed because he completely misunderstood the nature of the forces with which he had to cope. Even today he does not comprehend the fundamentals of fascism, or the strength of its antecedents in German history and thought. The genuine force of the revolution which fascism prides itself on being entirely escaped his anti-metaphysical, rational, liberal, nineteenth-century mind; therefore he blames the failure of his mission on the personally evil character of Hitler and von Ribbentrop and finds much kinder words for Mussolini and Göring. He attributes to Hitler, and he makes out a good case for his view, "lust for dominion, complete amorality, and inability to consider any or anybody's outlook except his own"; but he attributes to Hitler alone what is fundamental in the movement and is to be found in the very many millions, not only in Germany, who see in Hitler the most successful representative of a new attitude or philosophy supposedly ascendant in our day.

When Sir Nevile came to Germany in 1937 he was, like his chief, influenced by three sentiments: his sympathy for the German people, his conviction that wars do not settle anything, his belief that the Treaty of Versailles had wronged Germany and should be righted. These views, which were partly based on emotions, Sir Nevile shared with the majority of Anglo-Saxons. These opinions explained his policy of appeasement, behind which was the firm wish of the English and French peoples not to go to war unless their own territory was invaded. Sir Nevile had a great affection for the German people—without much understanding of their history or of their real situation and aspirations; he hated National Socialism for its crude anti-Semitism and primitive brutality, but he thought that it had good aspects too, and that as long as it confined itself to Germany and to Germans, the Western nations could not and should not oppose it. He did not understand that there are no good or bad aspects of fascism, but that fascism forms a whole, shaping the minds of men under its influence into an attitude fundamentally opposed to all principles of liberalism and of international cooperation, and therefore necessarily aggressive against democracy. He did not understand that fascism was a movement bent upon expansion, and that Hitler was interested in liberating the Austrians—from themselves—and the Sudeten Germans—from Masaryk's democracy—only because these steps furthered his relentless pursuit of world power. Seeing in fascism only a momentary aberration from the accepted liberal course of modern civilization, Sir Nevile had a deep suspicion of any ideological opposition to National Socialism, of any war for democracy, not understanding that fascism was fighting a ruthless war against democracy and that this war had entered its definitive stage as far back as 1936.

A few months before the outbreak of the war Mr. Chamberlain said: "War wins nothing, cures nothing, ends nothing." These historically untrue platitudes explain also Hitler's success. Even a war which wins nothing may defend something. Sir Nevile tells how he found Chancellor Hitler in his study before a very large globe which he has always before his eyes. Unfortunately the democratic statesmen and peoples keep no globe before their eyes. They still continue to see all events as isolated happenings, and thus make Hitler's successes possible. In a very naive way Sir Nevile remarks that Munich was unavoidable because, in spite of the strength of the Czechs' Maginot line, their southern flank was exposed to German attack. But he forgot that this was only the result of the occupation of Austria, which had occurred six months before. In March, 1938, Sir Nevile regarded the annexation of Austria as the righting of an alleged Versailles wrong, not as the necessary preparation for the domination of the whole of Central and Southeastern Europe, an ambition which Bismarck's Germany could not realize because Vienna was then independent of Berlin. But the blindness was not confined to Anglo-Saxon liberals; it was shared by many other people who were neither Anglo-Saxon nor liberals, for example, Colonel Beck, who helped Hitler in all his plans against Austria and Czechoslovakia and thus prepared the annihilation of Poland. It was the intellectual and moral confusion of all the statesmen and peoples whom fascism has foreseen as its future victims which made Hitler's astonishing successes possible and threatened to transform the retreat of democracy into a rout.

There are many passages in the book which will almost drive the reader to despair. Sir Nevile accepts, as many people in England did, all the most blatant pieces of propaganda put out by Hitler in 1933—that it was the Treaty of Versailles which had created him and that he had brought order out of the chaos and distress which followed Germany's defeat in 1919. As if life in Germany under the Weimar Republic from 1924 on had not been orderly, and in the fields of culture and justice, of administration and social legislation infinitely more civilized and promising than it became under Hitler. Sir Nevile says rightly that the militarization of the Rhineland in 1936 offered the democracies the last opportunity to say no without being obliged to go to war to enforce that no; but only a few pages before he says that, whatever attitude the British might have adopted toward Hitler, the result today would be the same. Again and again we find expressions which show that Sir Nevile could grasp reality, as when he says that "the Nazi Party was Germany; it was merely wishful thinking to imagine anything to the contrary"; but then again he fills whole pages with wishful thinking. His mind is entirely concentrated on Germany and England; it is curiously blank as regards France and bitterly prejudiced against the Soviet Union and in favor of Italy. He wonders why Hitler did not stop, at least for several years, after his success at Munich, and so insure peace and welfare for the German people. That would have been "common sense." But fascism despises common sense, peaceful progress, and economic welfare. Henderson and the democratic public in general try to measure the fascists with the yardsticks of liberal rationalism, striving for security and economic well-being. But the fascists live in a world of different values, where words have a different meaning. Henderson tells one characteristic anecdote about the negotiations at Munich. When Mr. Chamberlain pointed out that the Godesberg memorandum was a sheer dictate—the word always applied by Hitler to the Treaty of Versailles—imposed on a country voluntarily surrendering part of its territory without previous defeat, the Chancellor replied: "It is not a dictate; look, the document is headed by the word 'memorandum.' "

Although the book throws little new light on recent Anglo-German relations, it presents clearly mind-processes which are in no way confined to England, to the English Prime Minister, or to his ambassador, and which explain Hitler's successes. In that respect the book is not only an important document of the times, but also a warning to the many democrats who still continue to indulge in wishful thinking about the nature of fascism and the scope of the threat which its success implies.

HANS KOHN

Pitt—Champion of Liberty

MR. PITT AND AMERICA'S BIRTHRIGHT. By J. C. Long. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $3.50.

IN THAT resplendent galaxy of representative figures—Swift and Defoe, Pope and Dr. Johnson, Hogarth and Chesterfield, Rodney and Clive—whom Bonamy Dobrée collected in his anthology of the eighteenth century there was scarcely a more lustrous personality than the elder Pitt, the Earl of Chatham. Mr. Long needed no excuse for adding this elaborate, scholarly, and yet delightfully diverting volume to the biographies by Lord Macaulay, Lord Rosebery, and others. The one he does offer—that "prior biographers . . . have seemingly underestimated" the significance of Pitt's activities and speeches—is hardly borne out by what Macaulay wrote of the Earl of Chatham: "He was adored by the people; he was admired by all Europe; he was the first Englishman of his time; and he had made England the first country in the world." No one has penetrated more deeply into Pitt's life and work than Mr. Long, whose research has unearthed many hitherto unknown facts, but his "biography" is much more than his hero's life story. It is the history of a traduced and maligned epoch, a true description of social life in the eighteenth century, a serious discussion of the efforts to develop an "almost degenerated England" into a vast "empire of freemen."

It was an unnecessarily broad hint to caption some chapters of this admirable book The Cliveden Set—Cliveden at that time being the seat of a Whig opposition gathered round Prince Frederick—or Troubles at 10 Downing Street, or Paris-Madrid Axis, for the parallelism is obvious enough even without these allusions.

In spite of his interest in the smallest details of Chatham's life, Mr. Long emphasizes the dynamic drama of his career, from the parliamentary battle in the Commons between Pitt and William Murray, who having won the Latin competition at Oxford thought himself a superior person, to the historic scene where the hero of the drama, having made his last speech in defense of America, collapsed in the House of Lords. Emerging from this apparent theatricalism, the central fact of Pitt's career never grows dim in Mr. Long's fascinating narrative. All his life he fought for the freedom of men in a free country, being perhaps unconsciously aware that only by preserving constitutional liberties could the aristocracy preserve its political power. Statesmen in our day who are anxious to uphold the imperiled political power of capitalism apparently do not follow Pitt's example.

In Mr. Long's view the Earl of Chatham was "a man of rare force and judgment" who although vain and ambitious could "submerge his claims in the interest of a united coun-

HARPER

NATIVE SON

By RICHARD WRIGHT

The sensational best seller that has awakened a nation's conscience. "The Grapes of Wrath of 1940."—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune. $2.50

THIS IS OUR CHINA

By MME. CHIANG KAI-SHEK

China's First Lady tells the story of her country's determined struggle to build a better life. Of particular interest are her illuminating views on bringing revolutionary changes to an ancient order. $3.00

SINCE YESTERDAY

By FREDERICK LEWIS ALLEN

The Thirties in America, by the author of Only Yesterday. "Conveys the impression of the American people telling their own story in autobiographical form."—N. Y. Times Book Review. Illustrated. $3.00

INSIDE EUROPE

1940 War Edition

By JOHN GUNTHER

Anticipates the news of world events—gives you the facts behind the headlines: events, personalities, background—everything you want and need to know. $3.50

INSIDE ASIA

By JOHN GUNTHER

Reveals what is going on in the seething Orient—and what it means to us. $3.50

THE ART OF LIVING

By ANDRÉ MAUROIS

Out of his brilliant studies of the lives of the great this famous biographer has evolved a philosophy of living that satisfies the needs of men and women in the modern world. $2.50

REVOLUTION: WHY, HOW, WHEN?

By ROBERT HUNTER

"A brilliant contribution . . . by a pioneer in the field. A fascinating blend of personal reminiscence, broad historical sweep and highly condensed, significant economic detail, presented vividly."—Simeon Strunsky, N. Y. Times Book Review. $3.00 try." One of his English biographers, Professor Williams, calls him "our greatest orator and our greatest war minister, but never perhaps so great as when in the evening of his days, he failed by his exertions to save America for England." Not only did this most dazzling of British statesmen defend English liberties against Bourbonism abroad, the refined Hitlerism of a more cultured century, and against attacks at home, as in the Wilkes case, but by conquering Canada and securing the mastery of India in the annus mirabilis 1759 he laid the foundation of a British Empire which in his inspired vision was to develop into a voluntary union of self-governing nations. The Earl of Chatham was the first to call America a "nation"; in his brilliant defense of Americans he insisted that England "had no right under heaven to tax America"; and by saying, "I rejoice that America has resisted," he stood firm for liberty and independence as "America's birthright."

HARPER & BROTHERS • NEW YORK

In 1766 South Carolina erected "in grateful memory" a statue of William Pitt at Charleston. Fourteen years later a shell from George III's artillery broke off the right arm of the statue—"incredible irony of history" symbolizing perhaps the king's dislike of his late minister. Not even a malevolent criticism could maim the monument Mr. Long has erected to the memory of William Pitt.

The real hero of his book, however, is not William Pitt but the birthright of America as represented in the traditional unity of Anglo-Saxon liberty in the struggle against the tyranny both of the dictator and of the mob. Just now, when some unscrupulous business men and shortsighted politicians are doing their utmost to drive a wedge between the two representatives of this Anglo-Saxon unity, when the misconception of capitalist interests threatens to overshadow human interests, this timely recognition of the English origins of American liberty deserves not only due appreciation but the interest of all intelligent readers on both sides of the Atlantic.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Leonardo

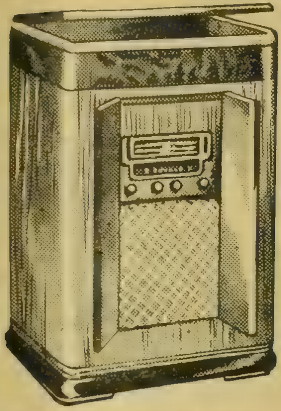
LEONARDO DA VINCI: AN ACCOUNT OF HIS DEVELOPMENT AS AN ARTIST. By Kenneth Clark. The Macmillan Company. $5.

THERE are many definitions of genius, all of them doubtless unsatisfactory, but the one that best suits the working purposes of unendowed humanity is simple. A genius is a man who never does enough. A talent, a temperament, a minor light, or a mediocrity—a Correggio, a Berlioz, a Congreve, or a Liszt—is safe in his degree. Mankind accepts him as a definer of its limits and a flatterer of its incompetence. He fixes comfortable boundaries to our practical intelligence and never lifts us to a height too perilous for the average temerities of spirit or imagination. He fits into the scheme of existence and enhances its bleakness or defeats. But with geniuses of incontestable rank no simple gratitude is possible. They leave the normal dimensions and incapacities of humanity behind and stand against their own vision of divinity. Every defect, frustration, and evasion is mercilessly exposed. Their glimpse of truth imparts the fear of an exposure, it dismisses pretexts and excuses, and it brings us to the edge of the abyss. Enemies of half-truth and imposture, they tell us that finally the ways of salvation are not many but one. And because they offer a single and ruthless form of truth, our only revenge is to resent them as pretenders to godhead and to humiliate them as men. It is the Beethovens, Dantes, and Leonardos who incite critics and romanticists to their boldest liberties. Every generation scolds, remodels, or scales them down to its own convenience. The works they wrung from labor and agony become the stalking-horses of any random journalist or undergraduate whose mythology of values they have disturbed. Like all custodians of truth they must pay for the honor a price never exacted of the limited talent who stays within the recognized sanctions of human comfort and compromise and so halts safely this side the chilly summits of revelation.

Leonardo is preeminently an example of their fate. He has been subjected to almost every protest and deflation of which science or criticism is capable. Where reverence of his art is effusive it is suspected of perversity. Engineers who find his machines fantastic, critics who find his designs artificial or his vision synthetic, and psychologists who find his nature abnormal have substantiated this perversity in the fitful, impractical, and sinister tendencies of his genius. His venerators have done him the disservice of romanticizing his career and temperament beyond the ordinary license permitted by a meagerness of facts and documents. Vasari and Peter, excited by legend and unaware of the exact canon of his works, gave him the mystic proportions of a seer, and Merejkowski, Rachel Taylor, and Antonina Vallentin have converted his history into swollen romances of Renaissance culture. In our age of unrivaled reason and hard-headed sense he is the favorite butt of deflaters of aestheticism. His notebooks have been dissected by Aristotelians, his symbols and images indexed by Freudians, his machines dismissed by experts in ballistics and hydrodynamics, and his military and ecclesiastical projects derided by humanitarians. The one feature of Leonardo that remains untouched—yet still clumsily misinterpreted to the lay mind—is the supreme and invulnerable one: the vision whereby he brought intellect to meet with instinct, form with intuition, and reality with mystery at the subtlest possible point, and so brought fully into art, in their total complex, the radical traits of the Western mind and "the central problem of creation."

Sir Kenneth Clark has written the book exactly needed—following the researches of the Richters, MacCurdy, and Berenson and the consequent decline of Pater's influence—to rescue the magnitude of Leonardo's achievement from the clouds of poetic interpretation and technical analysis; and he has written it so candidly, with so fine a balance of grace and scholarship, that it surmounts its fragmentary character as a book of lectures and becomes a lesson for critics of art. His knowledge of the pictures and drawings is expert; his sense of Leonardo's human qualities and deviations is delicate; his insight into the formal and symbolic inventions, as into the subtleties of the "Trattato," is sharp; and he writes with a firmness of suggestion and definition that makes him the best English art critic since Roger Fry. He is good in defining "the tradition of linear grace and fancy, the tradition of Lorenzo Monaco, Fra Filippo, and Botticelli," to which by his un-Greek nature Leonardo belonged, as against the tradition of scientific naturalism of Masaccio and Verrocchio toward which by training and intellect he tended. He is as reasonable in proposing the analogy of Picasso's restless experimentalism as in suggesting that Leonardo's "constitutional dilatoriness" was redeemed from paralysis of will by an unflagging seminal faculty comparable to the disordered intellect of Coleridge. He knows how, in supreme moments, Leonardo's aesthetic, literary, and scientific impulses were resolved through a command of "abstract harmonies and structural subordinations" that make his greatest pictures as "inexhaustible" as a masterpiece by Bach. He corrects Valéry's idealistic view of the "symmetric instinct" by showing Leonardo caught in the transition from the logical system of scholasticism to the experimental realism, not yet resolved into a faith in natural law, of the Renaissance. He is prudent enough to recognize Freud's essay as—in the absence of all but the sparsest evidence—necessarily speculative, but sensible enough to reprove "those who wish, in the interests of morality, to reduce Leonardo, that inexhaustible source of creative power, to a neutral and sexless agency." Tracing the secret of temperament in the coloristic qualities and epicene forms of the pictures themselves, he knows the mixed appeals that have won dubious apologies for Leonardo's motives, but he also knows that Pater happened to strike in at least three phrases of his "marvelous cadenza" on the Mona Lisa the salient elements in his genius. He is accurate in defining Leonardo's temperamental defects: his hostility to classicism and disdain of the arte meccanicissima of sculpture (an aversion largely to Michelangelo), his failure in the synthetic faculty, his weakness in normal sensuality, the disorder of his contributions to iconography and plastic vocabulary, his misleading influence on Luini and Sodoma, the mixed elements of "The Last Supper," and his curiously regressive belief that "one cannot have beauty and utility together, as may be seen in men and fortresses."

There is, however, no effect of reducing Leonardo's prodigious resources to the level of common sense or mechanical analysis. Clark can quote so judiciously from the "Trattato" that a random passage has the effect of revealing the force and insight of the whole. And, to speak of only one of his attributions, he is so acute in perceiving the Leonardesque quality of the Cecilia Gallerani at Cracow—especially the Leda-like twist of the ermine, "its stoatish character, sleek, predatory, alert, yet with a kind of heraldic dignity" that gives "in epigrammatic form the motive of the whole composition"—that he makes this portrait indispensable to one's grasp of Leonardo's power and its animal one of the miracles of painting. He brings Leonardo within reasonable comprehension without for a moment simplifying his greatness, and thus succeeds in clarifying the range of his resources and insight, the "obsessive interest" in waves, rocks, clouds, and sinews by which he extended the language of paint, and his reach into the depths of the human mind by which the rocky landscape of the Virgin or the Mona Lisa becomes one of the immortal images of spiritual divination. Clark has written, in short, one of the most distinguished of recent aesthetic studies in any field. Its value lies not only in what it does to rationalize the place in history of a man who is "a standing refutation of the comfortable belief that all great men are simple," but in what it does to make that man credible as



12 TUBE RADIO + RECORDER +
RECORD PLAYER + P. A. AMPLIFIER
THAT'S THE NEW
LAFAYETTE
Radiocorder
☆
Custom Built
BY LAFAYETTE FOR ONLY
$159.50
☆
$15 BRINGS THE RADIOCORDER INTO YOUR HOME WITH OUR CONVENIENT PAYMENT PLAN

There's no end to the thrills Lafayette brings you in this amazing new Radiocorder. It has a brilliant 12 tube radio, a built-in record player—and it's equipped to make records! Not just records of your favorite radio programs. A real microphone and high fidelity record cutting head are standard equipment. You can make records of your own voice . . . the voices of children and friends. Come in and see this beautiful and versatile instrument today. The low price tells you how easy it is to own. Now discover how easy — and thrilling — it is to operate.

LAFAYETTE RADIOS
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
BRONX, N. Y. . . 542 E. Fordham Rd.
JAMAICA, L. I. . . 90-08 166th Street
CHICAGO, ILL. 901 W. Jackson Blvd.
NEWARK, N. J. . . 24 Central Ave.
BOSTON, MASS. 110 Federal St.
ATLANTA, GA. 265 Peachtree St.

THE DUTCH
by Adriaan J. Barnouw

A portrait study of the people of Holland, by a Dutch-American who writes authoritatively of the citizens of one of Europe's danger spots. "With wisdom and worldly knowledge, and with a light touch that one does not always associate with the Dutch, Professor Barnouw has assembled what most of us need to know about the land of Rembrandt and Erasmus." —New York Times. $3.00

HARDY OF WESSEX
by Carl J. Weber

The story—never before told in full—of the making of a great writer and of the way that writer, Thomas Hardy, made great books. "This is easily the best available biography . . . Well-written, painstakingly accurate, comprehensive . . . will supply the wants of both the general reader and the scholar for a good many years."—Boston Evening Transcript. $3.00

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

You are cordially invited to attend
THE SECOND
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS
DINNER-FORUM

Speakers:

JAY ALLEN ROBERT DELL
W. H. AUDEN ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
JOSEPH BARNES LOUIS FISCHER
RALPH BATES QUINCY HOWE
CESAR SAERCHINGER

Distinguished Foreign Correspondents and Writers who will participate in an informal discussion on

THE ISSUES OF
THE SECOND WORLD WAR
at the
HOTEL COMMODORE
Lexington Ave. & Forty-second St.

at seven o'clock
Thursday, April 25, 1940

Reservations: $2.50 per Plate

Auspices:
Spanish Refugee Relief Campaign,
381 Fourth Avenue, New York City, N. Y.

MEXICO
via The Open Road
— SUMMER 1940 —

[illegible] trips for college students—3 trips for their elders—and a trip for prep school boys and girls.
More than mere sightseeing—Programs and contacts arranged by a distinguished committee, headed by the Minister of Education—Definite rates and reservations (Important in view of the unprecedented trek to Mexico).

For circulars and all particulars address

THE OPEN ROAD
12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York

A NEW LIVING NEWSPAPER PLAY
Dramatizing health as excitingly as "One Third of a Nation" did housing
CARLY WHARTON & MARTIN GABEL
present
"MEDICINE SHOW"
By OSCAR SAUL & H. R. HAYS
NEW YORKER Thea., W. 54 St. CI 6-2737
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:50

"Most controversial theatrical work in town."
—Watts, Her. Trib.
ENTIRE ORCHESTRA
$1.10 & $1.65
BALCONY & MEZZ.
55c to $1.65
At all performances except Saturday Nights, when scale is 83c to $2.20.

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Reader's Service Division
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

one of the greatest who ever lived and to render our understanding of his powers more intelligent than our customary reactions of amazement, dismay, and resentment allow.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Wagon Trail

DON'T YOU CRY FOR ME. By John Weld. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

AFTER reading this novelized account of the Donner wagon train's grueling trek to California in 1846, it should be several days before anyone has the gall to complain because the sink is not draining or the chicken is tough or the cigarettes are all smoked. Luckily for the author, the sufferings these early emigrants endured are a matter of record; otherwise many a reader would shake his head unbelievingly, thinking, "I couldn't bear even half so much, and no one else could either." How much hunger, cold, sickness, pain, frustration can a human being stand? The answer, for these continent-crossers and probably for everyone, is: far more than you could possibly imagine.

Out of Independence, Missouri, they rolled in the early summer, nearly a hundred brand-new wagons loaded with the supplies prescribed by the "Emigrant's Guide," but most of them carrying many unnecessary belongings in flagrant disregard of that manual's warning against excess pounds. Winding across the prairies, they sang, "It rained all night the day I left; the weather it was dry . . ."; to Laramie—"The sun so hot I froze to death . . ."; and over the first mountain ranges—"Oh, Susanna, don't you cry for me, I'm off to California with a banjo on my knee." But already oxen were weakening, wagons breaking down; beds, chests, stoves, clocks strewed the trail as drivers learned that excess weight really did take its toll; an occasional wooden cross marked the end of the trek for a worn-out wife or for a hot-tempered emigrant shot in a quarrel. Then the salt flats and the desert, with supplies dwindling, water too precious to be priced in terms of gold, treacherous Indians picking off the livestock from ambush. Real privations, more dissension within the party itself, a sharpening of the will to self-preservation. Then mountains again, early winter, and snow. Faced with the absolute impossibility of taking wagons through the drifts, the remainder of the caravan abandoned their canvas-topped homes, moved forward on foot, were soon trapped among the hills. Apparently doomed, they lived on like animals, feeding on remnants of ox-hide, sinking daily to lower and lower bestial levels, yet refusing to give up and die. Finally fifteen of the least emaciated set out on improvised snowshoes to seek help from Sutter's fort perhaps a hundred miles away. A few of them got through, but only by eating the carcasses of their companions who succumbed on the way.

Mr. Weld's book opens slowly, lumberingly, like the wagon train he describes, but once under way it brings one searingly close to the grim reality of those racking months, to the inexplicable urge that drives men across deserts, swollen rivers, snow-locked mountains—and keeps them going long after they should by all rights have dropped dead in their tracks.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

IN BRIEF

THEIR OWN COUNTRY. By Alice Tisdale Hobart. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.50.

Stephen and Hester Chase, central figures in "Oil for the Lamps of China," return to America in the late 1920's. Stephen, having been forced to resign from the oil company, finds a growing sense of insecurity permeating the business structure of his homeland, from truck-driver to executive, each rank specializing in its own brand of chiseling to safeguard jobs or power. After a few skirmishes with New York firms, he takes over the management of an industrial-alcohol plant in a small Kansas city, sees it through depression, sabotage, crooked competition. Interesting, but not so engrossing as Stephen's and Hester's adventures in China.

A STRICKEN FIELD. By Martha Gellhorn. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $2.50.

Miss Gellhorn tells a story of Prague between the seizure of the Sudetenland and the final absorption of the unfortunate Czechs by Germany. Herself a newspaper correspondent of wide experience, she reveals the plight of the Sudeten refugees and the disillusioned Czechs largely as it appears to a woman journalist, Mary Douglas, who has not yet grown calloused to injustice and suffering even after watching the civil war in Spain. Persecution, violence, bestial cruelty, abject fear—these are the threads of a pattern which has already appeared in at least a dozen novels of present-day Europe, and for which ultimate credit must go to the Nazis, inexhaustible purveyors of horror-story plots. Sickening enough against a background of Berlin, Hamburg, Vienna, the atrocity pattern irritates an even more sensitive nerve when Czechoslovakia becomes the victim in the trap, because at every turn, subtly but inexorably, one is reminded that the democracies (1) delivered up the Czechs to the butchers, and (2) took only half- or quarter-hearted measures to rescue the poor wretches for whom, because of their racial origin or liberal views, failure to escape meant torture and death.

DE QUINCEY: A PORTRAIT. By John Calvin Metcalf. Harvard University Press. $2.

This extremely direct and charming view of a man of letters who was a genius as well as a victim of opium is the product of intimate knowledge of sources, written and unwritten, and a fine example of the art which conceals scholarship. The style is polished, sympathetic, and delicately humorous—admirably suited to the subject.

FILMS

"LIGHTS OUT IN EUROPE" (a Look-Ampix living-history feature) by the American Herbert Kline and the Czech Alexander Hackenschmied, who gave us "Crisis" last year, was filmed in England, Poland, Danzig, and on the western front from May to December, 1939. It is easily the most dramatic, most eloquent, and most revealing picture yet made about contemporary events, even surpassing "Crisis" in many respects. No reels could be taken in Germany proper and none of the Russian invasion of Poland. Nevertheless, the German side of the front is made perfectly clear by the sequence which pictures the war preparations of the Nazis in Danzig and the bombing of Polish refugee trains by German planes—shots of unforgettable horror.

The picture begins in London in the days after Hitler's march into Prague. The slow realization of the Chamberlain government that there will be no peace in our time as long as the Hitler regime exists expresses itself in a hundred measures which change the atmosphere and the aspect of the streets of London. Alexander Hackenschmied photographed these changes not merely with technical skill and an unfailing sense of pictorial values but with an astounding recognition of the essential, telling details. His work has the same relation to the general run of newsreels that the inside stories of really informed correspondents have to mere news dispatches. We have all seen newsreels showing the introduction of compulsory military service in England, or the building of flimsy air-raid shelters in backyards, or the speed-up in airplane factories, but here these events are seen and reported by somebody who knows what they mean and who shows their relation to the great drama of which they are a part.

From England the film switches to Danzig and Poland, reporting the preparations for war on both sides. And then war comes, swiftly and undeclared. Its horror leaps from the screen, and it will strike you almost as it did the poor Polish peasants who found themselves suddenly among ruins staring at the cadavers of their burned livestock. Back in London and on the western front we see England in the first weeks of war. Most impressive is a farewell performance for soldiers going to the front at which they sing, "We'll Hang the Washing on the Siegfried Line." They sing the song, but one can see on their faces that they know it will not be so easy as that.

James Hilton has written a commentary for the picture, which is spoken by Fredric March. It is adequate when it consists of straight explanation and hopelessly confused when more is attempted. The opening statement that the picture is designed to show the futility of war is nonsense. As if Hitler would leave anybody the choice of fighting him with spiritual weapons. Equally empty is the statement at the end-title that there has never been an attempt at "a peace to end war." And there is in the picture itself a corresponding contradiction. It begins quite naturally as a militant anti-Nazi film, but suddenly vague pacifist overtones are accentuated; the graves of the soldiers of the war of 1914-18 are shown again and again. The reason for such forced inconsistency is not difficult to detect. It lies obviously in the Soviet-German pact. Its effect on the people of England and France is, significantly, not shown, but its effect on the producers of the film is clear. They became, to say the least, confused and began to censor reality. Starting out in May, 1939, to fight fascism, they found themselves suddenly in August propagandists for an "imperialistic war"—this is the impression given by the omissions and the accents in the second half of the picture. Fortunately their material remains more impressive than their confusion.

"Rebecca" (Selznick), though produced at great expense, is unconvincing and in the middle part even boring in spite of Hitchcock's direction and such excellent actors as Laurence Olivier, Joan Fontaine, and Judith Anderson.

BOOK BARGAINS

Publishers' overstock at rock bottom prices. You'll be delighted! Order now while in stock. Postage free on $2 min. order; otherwise add 5c per book.

Literature & Society: Albert Guerard. $3.00 list. 50c
Francis the First: Francis Hackett. $2.50 list. 50c
Rockwell Kent's Greenland Book, Salamina 50c
Famine: Liam O'Flaherty (Lit. Guild) 50c
Wall Street Under Oath: Ferdinand Pecora 50c
Movers and Shakers: Mabel Dodge Luhan 542 pages, $5.00 list. $1.00
Story of the Human Race: Henry Thomas A biographical history, $3.00, [illegible] pages $1.00
Encyclopedia of Music and Musicians By Parkhurst and deBekker. 662 pages $1.50
Cezanne by Vollard, 33 halftones; Renoir by Duret, 60 halftones; Degas by Vollard, 68 halftones; Manet by Duret, 48 halftones. Each book contains 8 color plates, 7¾x10¼. Ea. $1.00

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
[illegible] Broadway, corner Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

"Young Tom Edison" (M.G.M.) is a pleasant though sweetened biographical picture in which Mickey Rooney gets a chance to show his talents in a legitimate part.

The Hays office informs me that Mr. Hays never made the remark—attributed to him in this and other columns—that better pictures are produced today not because the producers have become more mature but because the movie writers are better versed in their profession. So far as this denial implies that Mr. Hays would not want to subscribe to such an attempt to shift responsibility I am satisfied.

FRANZ HOELLERING

DRAMA

NO OTHER performer on the American stage can act worried quite so elaborately or so convincingly as Miss Pauline Lord. "Suspect" (The Playhouse) gives her several opportunities to do just that, and she takes advantage of them with all her accustomed virtuosity. Unfortunately, however, there are a good many other moments in a mechanically constructed play which moves clumsily and creaks as it goes. Written by the same Edward Percy and Reginald Denham responsible for "Ladies in Retirement," "Suspect" also is an attempt to give the audience a genteel attack of the horrors; but its methods are even more obvious, and it is far too slow in getting to the point. Miss Lord is a retired ax-murderess now living in quiet seclusion, surrounded by provincial curates and cricket-playing baronets. Naturally they get quite a turn when they find out who she really is. And it's a jolly good thing that they don't see what the audience sees just before the curtain goes down.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

IF I had to choose between Columbia's new set of Mozart's Symphony K. 385 ("Haffner"), made by Beecham with the London Philharmonic (M-399, $4.50), and the ten-year-old set made by Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic, I would find choice difficult. Beecham's style in Mozart is superb, and this performance is one of his best; it is recorded with the fidelity, the spaciousness, the lifelike sharpness of outline that one does not hear in the recording of ten years ago; the new version costs less than the old; and all these facts will make the decision easy for some people. But the qualities of attack, of contour, of texture that are distinctive in a Toscanini performance are reproduced to an astonishing degree by the older recording; they contribute to a performance of the last movement that is breath-takingly lighter and swifter than Beecham's; and these things would, in the end, make choice impossible for me: I would have to have both versions. And that, I dare say, is what others will decide, if they can afford it.

But in the case of Columbia's new set of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, made by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (M-401, $10), and the older set made by Toscanini with the B. B. C. Symphony, there is no such difficulty. In the performance of the symphony, as in the March performance of the "Coriolanus" Overture, one is aware of Mitropoulos's talent as a conductor; but this time one is also aware of his defects as a musician. The forceful personality which gives the conductor power over the minds and wills and bodies of his players expresses itself also in the musician's inclination to extremes in dynamics—to excessively violent crescendos and decrescendos within a single measure, to explosive fp's on a single beat—an inclination unguided or unrestrained by the sense for plastic proportions that one hears in the phrasing of a Toscanini or a Beecham, or by their sense of fitness—which is to say their taste, their feeling for the character and style of the music in hand. To listen to Toscanini's genial, relaxed performance of the first movement of the "Pastoral" and then to Mitropoulos's hectic performance is to listen to someone who has this feeling for the music and to someone who has not—who has a feeling only for sensational effects in dynamics. The one point of superiority of the Mitropoulos version is its present-day recording; but Toscanini recorded his performance only two or three years ago.

Stock's performance of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" with the Chicago Symphony (11179, $2) is very fine; but I recall liking Boult's with the B. B. C. Symphony. Where the new version is superior is in its brilliant recording. Haydn's Quartet Opus 76, No. 5 is not one of his best; but even the qualities it has are not given effect by the insensitive playing of the reorganized Roth Quartet and the almost unendurably harsh recording (M-400, $5). On the other hand good recording is the only virtue of the Kilenyi set of Schumann's superb Symphonic Etudes for piano (X-162, $3.50), and its only point of superiority over previous inadequate versions. As for the Album of Shakespearean Song (M-402, $5), some of the songs—mostly by Thomas Arne—are quite charming, but Mordecai Bauman sings them with a powerful voice that seems incapable of any subtlety of coloring and inflection.

Among several miscellaneous items, Decca's second Album of Harpsichord Music played by Alice Ehlers (Set 62, $2.75) offers dance movements by Purcell, Bach, Couperin, Rameau, and others, which could not be pounded out with less grace by Yella Pessl herself. Then, some readers may be interested in the Columbia "Add-a-Part" recordings of large chamber works and shorter pieces. In these the work is played without the first violin part or 'cello part or piano part, so that a violinist or 'cellist or pianist can have the practice or the pleasure of playing the omitted part in a performance of the work. The records come with a specially contrived complete score, and at the beginning of each movement the correct pitch and tempo are given. I have had no opportunity to try the records myself. And finally I should mention the set of records of the Belgian Congo music heard in the film "Dark Rapture," issued by General Records, 1600 Broadway, New York.

Among recent jazz records there has been nothing to get excited about; but the best, and fairly enjoyable, have been the Crosby Bobcats' "Do You Ever Think of Me," with Stacy at the piano (Decca 3040), and the Bob Zurke "Tom-Cat on the Keys" (Victor 26526). Louis Armstrong has done some good trumpet-playing, up to an exhibitionistic finale, in his "Bye and Bye" (Decca 3011); Art Hodes's "Ross Tavern Boogie" (Solo Art R-2197) is one of the more interesting products of that type of piano-playing, and on the reverse side "South Side Shuffle," which departs from the type, is even better; in "The Blues" Jack Teagarden does some fine playing on trombone against an utterly incongruous gilt-and-plush large-band background (Varsity 8218). Ida Cox shows an excellent sense for pace in phrasing, but every bit of color is gone from the voice; and her singing is too much for me to take with the fine playing of the supporting band. Nor do I enjoy the various Jelly Roll Morton records issued by General Records.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Vigilantes and Pioneers

Dear Sirs: After years of violence and red-baiting culminating in the Laura Law murder and the complete breakdown of law enforcement, the wage-earners and small business men of the Northwest, long harassed by vigilantes and so-called citizens' committees, are hoping that the federal government will step in and clean up the whole rotten mess.

Meanwhile, they are taking steps to defend themselves. Signals and codes are being adopted so that if one family is attacked by vigilantes the rest can go to the rescue. Sounds like the old West! The Aberdeen murder was no flash in the pan; its repercussions have been felt up and down the Pacific Coast. Children bring the fears and prejudices of their parents into the schools, and childish cries of "Pink," "Red," "Vigilante," and "Scab" are the cause of schoolroom scuffles. Townspeople look askance at strangers. Men on the job do not trust one another, and important union meetings have been driven underground.

Fraternal and religious groups are knee deep in red-baiting. Workingmen have been fined for refusing to contribute to the Finnish relief fund. Newsstand dealers have been told by police red-squad officers to keep magazines like The Nation and the New Republic out of sight. One large chain store employs only practicing Mormons, and it is almost impossible for a young person to find work unless he is a member of the National Guard.

If the Aberdeen assassination remains "unsolved," the bloodthirsty vigilantes will feel that they can run little fascist kingdoms of their own, with their own deputized storm troopers, and the so-called citizens' committees will not rest until they force the humble workers to their knees and break up all unions. Already the humble citizens in increasing numbers are taking out "hunting licenses," for the blood of pioneers flows in the veins of these people and if it comes to a showdown the enemy will be met with courage. Let us hope the federal government steps in before this point is reached.

If you publish this letter do not print my name, for it will be noted by the red squad, I'll get a telephone call calling me a rat, perhaps a postcard from the K. K. K., the Better Business League will see that I lose my job, and I'll find myself on the black list of the Chamber of Commerce when I seek another job. Simple, isn't it?

You see The Nation is read with painstaking care by its foes.

Portland, Ore., April 12 M. R.

The Man Who Beat Hoan

Dear Sirs: On April 3, 1940, the world awoke to find that Daniel Webster Hoan was no longer mayor of the Beer City, the City of Homes, the City that Prospered in Spite of a Red Mayor. Hoan had been Mayor of Milwaukee for twenty-four successive years and had given Milwaukee the reputation of being the best-governed city in America: he had practically freed the city government of graft, sponsored the amortization-fund plan that will make Milwaukee debt free in 1943, fought for civil service, fought sales-tax proposals, fought for public ownership—fought, fought, and fought until he was sixty years old and tired.

Year after year candidates had been groomed to beat Hoan, but none succeeded until this spring. Carl Frederick Zeidler was victorious over Hoan on April 2 by 12,000 votes—and 12,000 voters can't be wrong, can they?

Zeidler has been described in Milwaukee papers as "young, tall, blond, handsome, athletic, with a resonant baritone voice." And, according to the papers after the election, "he launched a campaign the like of which Hoan has never faced before." He sang at public meetings, he kissed a lady at a style show, he shook hands all around, he organized young peoples' clubs. As far as his Y. M. C. A. and church background permitted, he was a regular card.

This type of campaign caught the Socialist-Progressive group in Milwaukee napping. Perhaps they forgot that the prolonged depression, totalitarian-state methods of propaganda, and Socialist complacency had created a psychological condition they were not able to meet. At post-mortem sessions they admit that Zeidler pushed Mayor Hoan out of the City Hall because they, the Hoan supporters, were content to sit in office without keeping their political fences mended. They failed to encourage young members of their organization, failed to check the enemy before he became a menace.

Zeidler studiously avoided getting involved in discussions about unionism, unemployment, relief, or taxation, and wound up his campaign with a resonant roar that he would "clean out the City Hall and oust the Socialists."

That threat probably did it—in a city that has not had a majority of Socialists in the City Council for, lo, these many years. ARTHUR P. WIESNER

Milwaukee, April 9

Help China's Cooperatives

Dear Sirs: Dr. Eric Landauer, who is in charge of the Southeastern Laboratory of the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives, has sent me an appeal which I hope will interest Nation readers. I quote excerpts from it below:

> Mme Sun Yat-sen has stated the aims of the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives in the following words: "Japan seeks . . . to destroy our modern industries in order to make our people agrarian slaves. It already has smashed and seized 75 per cent of our machine industry and left more than a million workers jobless. Our people and our government are determined to rebuild productive power even during war time by erecting thousands of small factories throughout the hinterland, even on the flanks of the Japanese-held railways. In order to mobilize the widest participation of the people, these factories are being developed in the form of cooperatives."
>
> Although scarcely more than a year old, the C. I. C. have already established more than 1,500 individual shops. It is planned to set up 10,000 cooperatives in the second year, and 20,000 in the third. The organization operates from five bases placed at strategic points. Each base will have one central laboratory to help any cooperative in the region requiring technical assistance. Specifically, the purpose of the laboratories is (1) to improve the manufacturing methods of the existing cooperatives, (2) to assay raw materials for them and standardize finished products, (3) to make surveys of locally available raw materials and to develop processing or refining methods, (4) to work out manufacturing methods for urgently needed drugs that cannot be imported any longer in sufficient quantities, (5) to train field assistants and technical inspectors for all co-ops in the area.
>
> One such laboratory has been established in the Northwest. A second one is now being set up in the Southeast; its head, the author of the present appeal, is a chemist formerly on the League of Nations Epidemic Commission to China. He and his staff have offered their services free to the C. I. C. and are paid only a small living allowance. The laboratory is being supported entirely by contributions from foreign friends of China. Funds received so far have enabled us to make a start by using improvised and very primitive methods and equipment.

The writer has a list of those things which are wanted most urgently and invites correspondence from all persons who may have equipment, new or used, which might be useful and which they are willing to contribute. In addition, cash contributions are solicited, both for the purchase of equipment which cannot be obtained as a gift and for defraying shipping expenses to China.

I shall be glad to forward any contributions which Nation readers may wish to make in response to this appeal.

WALTER LANDAUER
University of Connecticut
Storrs, Conn., April 10

ROTC at California

Dear Sirs: Mr. Villard's article (The Nation, March 23) concerning a Report on Compulsory Military Training issued by the Associated Students of the University of California was greatly appreciated by those of us who have fought so long to make military training voluntary at the University of California. On March 8 the regents decided by a vote of fourteen to two to maintain ROTC on a compulsory basis. The two regents who voted against it were Governor Olson and Lieutenant Governor Patterson.

This was the sixth time in ten years that the regents have refused to grant the student petition for the abolition of compulsory ROTC. And they rejected it in the face of the largest student plebiscite ever held. With 4,000 students voting, the vote was three to one in favor of voluntary military training.

It is difficult in the face of so many defeats to maintain a militant student opposition to compulsory ROTC. Yet a regent "who preferred to speak off the record" stated after the decision of the board that "we are closer to the abolition of compulsory military training than we have ever been in the past, and it was the existence of a national emergency that bore the greatest weight in the regents' decision." This is the first time that the regents have been forced back to what seems to me to be the "last-ditch stand" of a "national emergency."

MORRIS D. GLICKFELD, Chairman,
A. S. U. C., Peace Committee
Berkeley, Cal., April 8

And at Harvard

Dear Sirs: When I showed Mr. Villard's brief article on the ROTC in your March 23 issue to my military-science instructor, the first thing he did was to call Mr. Villard "just a publicity-seeker." Then he vigorously upheld his own ability to instruct in citizenship as well as military tactics, said that "any form of work is good physical training," and tried to show that the two-year basic course, which takes up three hours of classroom time a week as well as ten three-hour drill periods a year, does not interfere with regular college work.

However, I can furnish a few facts to substantiate some of Mr. Villard's assertions: Our training in actual military practice consists of work with the outmoded 1897 model of the French 75-millimeter gun, whereas the model of that gun now in army use has modifications which make both our practical field work and our data largely inapplicable. Also, though the truck-drawn gun battery has almost completely replaced the older types, we continue to work with horses. Conditions are as unlike combat service as they can possibly be. The guns are in orderly array at the gun park, and we sight at a church steeple across the river and toy for an hour each drill period with old-style, dummy projectiles.

In class we figure out the mathematical data for the old-style guns, and learn certain fundamentals of military discipline, first aid, and military organization. A large amount of time is devoted to propaganda for the "American way." At the beginning of most periods the instructor reads us clippings which may be (1) an article from "a Washington newspaper," condemning Harold Rugg's social-science textbook series for "breeding a generation of future reds and pinks in our public elementary schools"; (2) an article describing an encounter between Socialist strikers and constabulary on a sugar plantation in Manila—"When the employer is good enough to furnish some food and a hut and some clothes for the poor workers, they ought to be happy, but then these Socialist agitators come in and try to make them feel discontented"; (3) an article about the Endicott-Johnson workers, who voted for a small independent union rather than the A. F. of L. or the C. I. O.; (4) most touching of all, a little item complaining that state and federal taxes ate up most of the $200,000 bonus given recently to Mr. Gifford of the A. T. and T.

If this is military training in our "stronghold of academic freedom," what can it be like in schools where it is compulsory? A. P. R.

Cambridge, Mass., April 12

"Wagner Act for Employers"

Dear Sirs: I have just read in the March 23 issue of The Nation what I consider to be the keenest analysis of the efforts to amend the Wagner Labor Act that I have seen anywhere. It is the article A 'Wagner Act' for Employers, by Arthur A. Michael.

I am so impressed with the piece that I am asking for permission to reproduce it in a forthcoming issue of Steel Labor, the official publication of the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee. VIN D. SWEENEY, Publicity Director, S. W. O. C.

Pittsburgh, April 9

CONTRIBUTORS

JANE WHITBREAD is a free-lance journalist who lives in Washington.

NYM WALES is the wife of Edgar Snow, who has been a newspaper correspondent in China for many years. She is the author of "Inside Red China."

ARTHUR L. MAYER has operated circuit and independent movie houses throughout the United States and has helped to produce several documentary films.

S. K. RATCLIFFE, well-known British journalist and lecturer, was a close friend of the late J. A. Hobson.

HANS KOHN, professor of modern European history at Smith College, is the author of "Revolution and Dictatorships."

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is a regular contributor of art and literary criticism.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is idexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 27, 1940 NUMBER 17

The Shape of Things

WHILE THE GERMANS ARE CONSOLIDATING their hold on southeastern Norway, the Norwegians seem gradually to be organizing a stronger resistance in the center of the country and are now in sight of aid. The Allies have established themselves in some force at Namsos and Andalsnes, north and south of Trondheim respectively, and should have a good chance of surrounding the small German garrison in that city. In this case they would command railroads and highways providing rapid communications with the Norwegian forces operating around Hamar. Lacking air bases, however, they may have trouble in countering Nazi air attacks on every town they hold. Authorities in London are discouraging hopes of rapid success in driving the Nazis out of Norway and suggest that they expect large-scale fighting before that object is achieved. To the extent, however, that Hitler has been thwarted in his hopes of overrunning the whole country before the Allies could send aid, a real victory has already been achieved. Unless Berlin is willing to admit defeat and withdraw its troops, a course which would involve tremendous loss of prestige, it will be forced to devote much larger resources to maintaining its position. But at best its single line of communications via the Kattegat is hazardous, and the temptation to force an alternative route through Sweden must be increasing. There are reports of growing German aerial activity over that country, but the Swedes are on the alert and the losses suffered by the German fleet have added to the relative strength of the Swedish navy. Thus the decision to draw Sweden into the fight is not one which Hitler can take lightly.

*

HAS AIR POWER SUPERSEDED SEA POWER? That long-standing controversy is being put to a practical test off the coast of Norway, and the evidence to date suggests that strong navies are not yet outmoded. It is true that Germany claims a great many successes for the bombers it has pitted against British battleships and transports, but Berlin has now reluctantly admitted that the Allies have made landings at several points on the Norwegian coast. The British Admiralty, which on the whole has been prompt in announcing losses and cautious in making claims, asserts that the Norwegian expeditionary force has been put ashore without the loss of a man. Moreover, a British squadron has been able to approach Stavanger and turn its heavy guns on the airport there without meeting serious opposition. There seems, in fact, little doubt that the Allied grip on the North Sea is even stronger than before Hitler launched his Scandinavian campaign. If this impression is confirmed, it will have an important bearing on the major strategy of the war. For Hitler was certainly counting on giving his friend Mussolini a demonstration of the superiority of air power which would encourage him to try conclusions with the Allies in the Mediterranean, where he is relatively stronger in the air than on the water.

*

DON'T LOOK NOW, BUT THE NEW COMMUNIST line seems to be disappearing down a drainpipe. Ever since the end of the Finnish invasion there have been signs of a chill in the air between Berlin and Moscow. Not major signs, but those little telltale indications which in diplomacy spell the difference between love and sufferance. First there was the much-heralded visit that Molotov never made to Berlin; then Ambassador Maisky's suggestions to Lord Halifax that the Soviets were willing to sell war materials to England as well as Germany; then the icy silence in the Kremlin concerning the rape of Denmark and Norway. Add to these portents such straws as the congratulations that Stalin failed to send to Hitler on his birthday and the revised attitude of the Soviet newspaper Trud. Not only does that journal point out that nowhere on earth do the interests of France conflict with those of Russia, but it goes on to chide one of its own writers for having previously depicted Britain as a horseman riding an equine France to battle. Welcoming a possible German-Russian breach on behalf of the Allies, P. J. Philip of the New York Times is discovering retroactively that Russia's foreign policy of the past nine months has been essentially anti-German. Mr. Philip informs us that secret orders have already gone out through the Communist International that the comrades are to "evolve" in their attitude toward the war and even "to join their efforts openly to support the national cause" in their respective countries. Mr. Philip is not beyond wishful thinking, but all the same we advise our readers—and the editors of the Daily Worker —to watch out for the next sharp turn of that old "locomotive of history."

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered [illegible] second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

HULL'S STATEMENT ON THE DUTCH EAST Indies had a significance out of all proportion to its moderate tone. Coming as a reply to Arita's declaration against any change in status of the islands it can only be interpreted as a direct warning to Japan. For all Japan's actions in the past few years point to its intentions to seize these Dutch possessions in case of a German invasion of the Netherlands. The islands contain oil and other raw materials essential to Japanese military and naval operations. Moreover, they are of immense strategic importance in the area which the Japanese navy has long regarded as the logical region for Japanese expansion. And the navy has been restive as a result of the glory heaped upon the army in recent years. Under these circumstances it is hardly likely that Secretary Hull's warning will in itself stop Japan, though the presence of the American battle fleet on maneuver in the western Pacific may. Perhaps even more effective will be the fact that seizure of the Indies would certainly be resisted by the Allies, who dare not allow the islands to fall into the hands of a potential enemy. Whether the Allies are strong enough to stop Japan is far from certain. The situation will bear close watching, lest the East Indies provide the back door for America's entrance into the European war.

*

HOPE FOR A COMPROMISE IN INDIA HAS virtually disappeared as a result of last week's official British statement that "in the circumstances there does not seem to be anything further that the government can do." A call has been issued to All-India National Congress committees throughout the country to prepare for a declaration of civil disobedience. The British authorities have countered with a warning that this campaign will be crushed with the full force at their command. Already the application of repressive measures has gone much farther than is generally realized. The Indian constitution has for all practical purposes been suspended, and the provincial governors have taken over administration as an emergency measure. The Defense of India regulations imposed in September are extraordinarily sweeping. They give British constables unlimited power to arrest anyone suspected of acts which might impede the prosecution of the war. Those arrested are subject to penalties ranging to life imprisonment or death and imposed by special tribunals. Numerous persons have already been seized under these regulations, including Hundi Vishnu Kamrath, secretary of the left-wing group opposed to Gandhi's moderate Congress program. Many Bombay labor leaders have also been imprisoned. In preparation for the showdown over civil disobedience practically all native Indian troops have been moved out of the country. It would seem that only an unmistakable indication of America's interest would save India from a repetition of the brutal repression used against Gandhi's previous campaign of non-violent civil disobedience.

*

MEN IN HIGH PLACES ARE FASHIONING A legal barricade to keep Bertrand Russell out of City College. First there was Justice McGeehan's incredible decision voiding the appointment, then his ruling that Russell could not become a party to the proceedings. Next Mayor LaGuardia eliminated Russell's post from the budget; his corporation counsel obediently advised the Board of Higher Education to drop the case; and now, following the board's refusal to yield, a minority of board members—led by Charles Tuttle—is trying to prevent the board from hiring its own attorney. Thus no stone is being left unturned to obscure the real issues and to avoid their review by a higher court. But the board shows no sign of flinching, and it is doubtful that the issues can be sidetracked. The danger is that complex and protracted litigation will cool popular resentment over the attack on Russell. It is apparent that organized bigotry in New York is prepared to fight the matter out if it takes all year—and the longer the better.

*

IN 1937 AT THE FORD PLANT IN DALLAS workmen were given copies of a pamphlet entitled "Ford Gives Viewpoint on Labor." If the intermediate report to the National Labor Relations Board by Trial Examiner R. W. Denham is correct, company officials did not limit themselves to the gentler methods of persuasion. Denham finds that strong-arm squads were formed of "the most brutal, vicious, and conscienceless thugs in its employ, who could be counted on to accept an opportunity to indulge their sadistic desires in lieu of additional compensation upon any person pointed out to them as a C. I. O. organizer, member, advocate, or sympathizer to be beaten, whipped, tarred, and feathered." On the basis of evidence presented at the hearings before him, the trial examiner accuses the Ford Motor Company of embarking on a program of spying and unlimited brutality in an effort to fight attempts to unionize it. Officials even went so far, he states, as to plan a murder. The record in the case also includes the story told by a dying man to his twin brother alleging that he had been beaten to death by the Ford "strong-arm squad" in mistake for his twin. "Blackjacks, loaded hose, and cat-o'-nine-tails made of rubber stripping and electric-light wire" were among the weapons used by the strong-arm squad, according to the trial examiner. If the practices described in his report are proved and go unpunished, the Bill of Rights can soon be added to Henry Ford's collection of quaint Americana.

*

IN PLEASANT CONTRAST IS THE PICTURE OF the peaceful elections held for collective-bargaining purposes in the plants of the General Motors Corporation. A few years ago General Motors was fighting unionization, as Ford is still fighting it. The new elections and the conditions under which they were held are a tribute not only to the strength of organized labor but to the willingness of a great corporation to adjust itself to changed conditions and abide by the law. The C. I. O. won a three-to-one victory, sweeping Flint, Detroit, Pontiac, Bay City, Saginaw, Lansing, and St. Louis. The A. F. of L. won both plants in Kansas City, home town of Homer Martin, two plants in Norwood, Ohio, and one in Meriden, Ohio. The Mechanics' Educational Society of America, an independent union with an honorable record, defeated the C. I. O. in the Detroit Diesel-engine division. In only one plant, the Harrison plant at Buffalo, did the workers vote for no union at all. The C. I. O. suffered a serious defeat, however, in another collective-bargaining election—among employees of the Consolidated Edison Company of New York. There an older "independent" union merged with an A. F. of L. union to oppose the C. I. O. and won a large majority.

*

THE PRESIDENT HAS BEAT A STRATEGIC retreat on relief by requesting, in a letter addressed to Speaker Bankhead, that he be allowed to spend the $975,000,000 budgeted for work relief during the first eight months of the fiscal year. Should this be done, the WPA could be maintained during the coming year at about 2,000,000, or practically at the same level that has prevailed this year. Opponents of the Administration charge the President with asking for less than he knows will be needed in order to minimize the "spending" issue in the elections. But the President is on firm ground when he insists that no one can foretell the trend of business conditions in the coming year accurately enough to make a satisfactory estimate of relief needs. It is fairly safe to assume that the needs will not be any less than they were during the present year, and there is real danger, as Ralph Hetzel, the C. I. O. unemployment director, and David Lasser have pointed out, that they will be much greater. To insist that the relief appropriation be spread over even an eight-month period is to take the risk of causing unnecessary human suffering.

GEORGE SCALISE, HEAD OF THE BUILDING Service Employees' Union, has been arrested on charges of having extorted more than $100,000—the figure is said to be "about $1,000,000"—from companies that contract to do the cleaning work in New York offices. The arrest was ordered by District Attorney Dewey. There is nothing in Scalise's past, his associations in Chicago, or his conspicuous wealth to warrant the fear that an innocent labor leader is being persecuted. Scalise was never elected to his post, and in general his career would seem to warrant the remark of the assistant district attorney in charge of the inquiry which has now resulted in the arrest, that "the union is to Scalise what a jimmy is to a burglar." Racketeers who have managed to get control of labor unions must be cleaned out as ruthlessly as those who operate in other fields. Certainly the last to defend such men should be the head of the American Federation of Labor, William Green. Yet it was he who sponsored a request to the President for a pardon for Scalise, to wipe off the record a conviction and the penitentiary term he served on a charge of white slavery in 1913. It is not the first time Green has supported a labor racketeer under fire—and thereby supplied ammunition, at the expense of the great body of organized labor, to such labor-baiters as Westbrook Pegler.

*

THE INDICTMENTS ON WHICH BEN GOLD and ten other officers of the International Fur Workers' Union have been convicted of violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Act were returned in 1933—Gold and Irving Potash have been sentenced to one year in prison. Their offenses are alleged to have been committed between 1931 and 1933, when the defendants were in control of the old Needle Trades' Industrial Union. Presumably the acts cited in the complaints have not continued, or the government might have obtained fresher indictments. Why did the Administration leave these indictments lying unused so long, and why were they suddenly revived last September and the defendants rushed to trial? The prosecution was ordered from Washington, and a special assistant to the Attorney General was placed in charge. Appeal of the fur workers' case will provide a clear test of the applicability of the anti-trust laws to trade unions. The issue is blurred by no charges of racketeering or of collusion with employers. That the government seems to have been swayed by other motives than protection of commerce from restraint is indicated by the prosecutor's remark to the court, "Mr. Gold and other defendants are well-known Communists who represent things we do not want in the American labor movement." Thurman Arnold, in court at the time, exclaimed, "He should not have said that." Were Gold and Potash tried and sentenced under the Sherman Act—or the Nazi-Soviet pact?

Gift to Goebbels

REVELATIONS of the extent of Nazi intrigue in Norway prior to its invasion have started spy hunts in many neutral capitals. This country, we may be sure, is not free of German secret agents, but we see no reason for a scare on that account. On the other hand, we may be insufficiently on guard against attempts by Goebbels to use New York and Washington as relay stations in his propaganda network.

In this connection a recent incident is worth examining. On Saturday, April 13, the Berlin press broke out in banner headlines asking, on the strength of a report attributed to the "London correspondent" of the Washington Star, whether British invasion of Holland was imminent. Simultaneously the German Foreign Office issued a warning to neutrals apparently based on the same article. "The old aim of the Western powers," it declared, "thereby appears openly in all its brutal inconsiderateness. . . . More than ever neutrals must realize this and determine their attitude from the viewpoint that—as experience has shown—the Western powers are determined to thrust aside their neutrality at the moment when their political or military aims make this appear to be necessary." Taken in conjunction with reports of new German concentrations on the Dutch border, this Berlin press barrage suggested that an alibi was being prepared for new aggression, with the unwitting aid of a Washington newspaper.

On investigation it turned out that the story quoted was not the work of the Star's London correspondent but that of Constantine Brown, who contributes a regular column to the paper on international affairs. On Friday, April 12, Mr. Brown quoted a report that a British fleet carrying 50,000 to 80,000 was at sea and suggested that, while Norway might be their destination, a landing in Holland appeared more likely. Next day his column was again devoted to this expeditionary force, about which no official information had been published in Europe. He again mentioned the possibility that it was headed for Holland and went on to give detailed information about its composition. According to reliable informants, he said, it was commanded by a French general and consisted of 60,000 French, 25,000 Poles, and a Canadian division. Note how these "facts" dovetail with the familiar Nazi thesis that "Britain will fight to the last Frenchman."

It would be interesting to know the identity of Mr. Brown's "reliable informants." It is hardly possible to believe that "news" of this kind could be picked up at either the French or the British embassy. But the suspicion that it might be traceable to the German embassy is strengthened by consideration of the extraordinary speed with which Mr. Brown's articles found their way to Berlin. According to a statement in the Star, presumably based on full inquiry, not only the Friday column but the Saturday one also was quoted in the German press on Saturday, and a cable in the New York Times makes it clear that Berlin's morning newspapers featured the story. Now the Star appears in Washington about noon, which is 6 p. m. Berlin time. How, then, could Mr. Brown's Saturday story be quoted in Berlin's morning newspapers of the same day?

If the Washington Star has been the victim of a "plant," we can be sure it was an innocent victim, for it is a newspaper which is as stoutly anti-Nazi as any in this country. In an editorial comment on the incident it accuses the German propaganda machine of distorting what was clearly a speculative discussion into a statement of fact. Obviously Mr. Brown's articles were twisted in Berlin, but we would suggest that, in these times, speculations backed up with such circumstantial detail require even closer scrutiny than usual at the copy-desk. As for Mr. Brown, we are willing to believe that his articles were written in good faith, but we think he owes the public some explanation of his gift to Goebbels.

More Check Than Balance

THE Logan-Walter bill, which has just passed the House, might be termed a bill to hamstring government and encourage litigation. Some of the hollowest bromides of constitutional law have been advanced in support of it. It is supposed to spring from a belief in "checks and balances," but it is more check than balance. It is supposed to rest on the principle of "separation of powers," but it would further concentrate legislative and executive powers in the courts. It is supposed to be a practical application of the idea that ours was intended to be a government of laws not of men. But if passed by the Senate it will give us not a government of laws but a government of lawyers. And a government of lawyers means government by those who can best afford to hire them. "The law's delay" was an old complaint in the mouth of Hamlet, and it operates today as in the past to the benefit of the rich defendant and to the disadvantage of the poor plaintiff. The Logan-Walter bill is a bill to make the law's delay longer.

The Logan-Walter bill is the greatest labor-saving device yet hit upon by the enemies of the New Deal. If it passes, they can sit back and wait for the Roosevelt reform agencies to be buried under a landslide of litigation. There will be little need for the Smith amendments to the Wagner Act, and there will be little point in the campaign to amend the laws administered by the SEC. If the Logan-Walter bill passes, the Girdlers and the Hopsons can chase both agencies in and out of the courts to exhaustion. No rule or regulation, no matter how unimportant, could be made by an administrative body without a public hearing if it became law. Any rule or regulation would be at once subject to review in the courts in a suit for a declaratory judgment, and even though it were upheld in the courts the same question could be raised again in other types of suits against the administrative agency. Intra-agency boards of review would be set up in each administrative body, and to those boards any decision, action, or failure to act by an officer or employee of that agency could be appealed; and then appealed from the intra-agency board to the courts. "How far-reaching the bill is in this respect," says the report filed against it by a joint committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, "is shown by the fact that the framers found it necessary specifically to except from its provisions cases in which the aggrieved party was denied a loan or failed to receive employment."

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

It is hardly necessary to deal at length with the legal and constitutional nonsense adduced in favor of the bill. Administrative bodies are arms of Congress, delegates of the legislature. The rules and regulations they make implement the laws they administer. This is a legislative function, but the bill brings it under the courts. The provision for declaratory judgments on rules and regulations is of doubtful constitutionality. The Supreme Court has in the past refused to give declaratory judgments and held itself to the task of passing on the constitutionality of laws only as an incident to the decision of an actual case before it. Due process of law does not require interminable review at every step of the administrative process. Justice is served if the end result and the procedure are subject to final scrutiny in the courts.

The Nation does not believe that the procedures of our various administrative bodies are beyond improvement, but it can see nothing but sabotage on a grand scale in this bill. Behind it are the same forces that are working to end the usefulness of the Wagner Act, and from their loose charges about the "un-American" and "despotic" conduct of the Labor Board we appeal to the words of the Wagner Act's most influential supporter. "The act," he said, "establishes standards to which the board must conform. There must be complaint, notice, and hearing. The board must receive evidence and make findings. The findings as to the facts are to be conclusive, but only if supported by evidence. The order of the board is subject to review by the designated court, and only when sustained by the court may the order be enforced. Upon that review all questions of the jurisdiction of the board and the regularity of its proceedings, all questions of constitutional right or statutory authority are open to examination by the court. We construe the procedural revisions as affording adequate opportunity to secure judicial protection against arbitrary action." The words are those of Chief Justice Hughes.

The Fifth Column

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

MILLIONS of people who have no idea where the words "fifth column" came from now know what they mean. Members of the fifth column are traitors, and there is nothing new about the breed. Throughout the ages there have always been men waiting, as they waited in Madrid, to open the gates to the enemy.

Norway has denied that the virtually unopposed entrance of the German forces at Oslo and elsewhere was the work of Norwegian Nazi sympathizers. German agents were at work, and it is natural that Norway should prefer to hold them exclusively responsible for the trickery that stilled the guns in the dawn hours of April 9. But the circumstantial story told by Leland Stowe and confirmed by other neutral observers is not to be discredited by a mere denial. And the existence of a fifth column is no disgrace to a democratic nation; it is only a deadly danger. Norway did not and could not comb the pro-Nazis out of its population without interfering with the liberties of all its citizens. It permitted "legal" Nazi activities and trusted in the loyalty and sober sense of its vast democratic majority. In normal circumstances this course would have been not only the liberal but the wise one; a democracy is possible only if it has the uncoerced support of the majority. When do circumstances cease to be normal? At what moment does it become necessary to limit the freedom of everyone in order to suppress the danger lurking in a disloyal handful? Norway missed the moment. It behaved like a decent democracy until after the Nazi troops had marched through the streets of Oslo, like soldiers parading on the Fourth of July; the peaceful crowds watching, police guarding the way.

The lesson of Norway is being studied in every other non-belligerent nation—by those close to the center of struggle and those, like the United States, which still can watch the war with some sense of detachment. The precautionary measures being taken are in direct proportion to the nearness of danger. The Swedish government, as Maurice Feldman says on another page, is rounding up some of the known pro-Nazis in the country. It is searching every German ship in its harbors. For the first time since 1648 Holland has proclaimed a state of siege throughout its empire. Restrictions are not yet heavy, but under martial law the government can go as far as circumstances demand. The Netherlands National Socialist Party numbers about 50,000 members, but its importance as a fifth column would be far greater than its normal political strength. As in all countries, Nazi intrigue has penetrated the army—especially the higher ranks—and the government has recently dismissed several known pro-Nazi officers, including the Commander-in-Chief, General F. H. Reynders.

Belgium is taking similar steps to immobilize its own considerable army of potential traitors. Switzerland has adopted even stronger measures. The Swiss government and high command have issued a joint proclamation warning the people to ignore any orders against mobilization or defense in case of attack. If the country should be invaded, the news will be broadcast by every means of communication. The announcement itself will constitute a general order of mobilization. Any counter orders, the people have been told, are to be disregarded.

In Southeastern Europe the danger from German minorities and native Nazi sympathizers is multiplied by hordes of visitors which have lately been flowing over the borders. The Dalmatian coast is overrun with husky Teutonic tourists, cameras in hand—like the vacationing Nazis who filled Danzig and the Corridor last summer. Reports from Rumania indicate that from ten to forty thousand have come in in the past few weeks. Measures are being taken against this pre-invasion, but fear inhibits vigorous action. For the present, watchfulness is the chief precaution. Rumania has announced that no foreigners will be allowed to move from town to town without special permission. Yugoslavia is establishing concentration camps for the accommodation of suspicious strangers. Milan Stoyadinovich, the pro-German ex-Premier, has been put under protective arrest, and the homes of many Germans have been raided. Other countries are taking similar steps; small steps for the present. In Rumania the situation is clouded by the sudden release of hundreds of the Iron Guard from prison and the return of others from exile; and by the conclusion of a new agreement with Germany to fulfil previous contracts for deliveries of oil and wheat in return for arms and airplanes.

Italy presents a different problem. As Germany's "non-belligerent" ally, the chief obstruction to the government's policy is the anti-German sentiment of the country. Mussolini's "fifth column" is the mass of the Italian people. But the government seems to have decided that Italy's hour has also struck; and it is meeting internal resistance by a barrage of propaganda designed to prove that the Allies face certain defeat. Every rumored German success in Norway or at sea is featured; British and French help is ridiculed. Reynaud's bid for Italian friendship last Saturday was ignored.

Nazi methods of penetration work. That is the lesson we have learned again from the invasion of Norway. They work not only in countries with huge German minorities or in semi-fascist countries, but in countries with an unmixed population and sturdy traditions of democracy and liberty. The lesson will be a hard one for Americans to take in. Some of us will dismiss it as remote and irrelevant. Others—more, perhaps—will wish to apply it in the form of ruthless and indiscriminate repression. To ignore the activities of Hitler in the United States would be fatuous. We have a fifth column; its members echo the Hitler slogan and imitate Nazi behavior, and they find support and backing in "respectable" reactionary circles. These groups should be watched and their illegal acts restrained. We should understand what they mean when they denounce the "imperialist" and "plutocratic" enemies of Hitler.

But it would be as foolish to turn on a campaign of repression as to ignore the existence of pro-Nazi activities. The moment for drastic repression has not arrived, and the task of liberals in America is difficult but clear. They must fight to preserve the democratic safeguards contained in the Bill of Rights, while applying to Nazis and their supporters the equally democratic methods of exposure, counter-propaganda, and justified legal attack. And they must learn to distinguish between agents of Hitler and honest citizens, even when the latter behave and sound uncomfortably like the former. Otherwise the Nazi invasion of Norway is likely to end in a victory for Martin Dies in America.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 525
EDITORIALS:
GIFT TO GOEBBELS 528
MORE CHECK THAN BALANCE 528
THE FIFTH COLUMN by Freda Kirchwey 529
SWEDEN'S TROJAN HORSE by Maurice Feldman 531
MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT
V. BURTON K. WHEELER by Robert Bendiner 532
OIL AND THE GOOD NEIGHBOR by Bertram D. Wolfe 537
AUTOMOBILE DEALERS CAN'T WIN by Ruth Brindze 539
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 540
IN THE WIND 541
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 542
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
DON STURZO'S LIBERAL CATHOLICISM by G. A. Borgese 543
TALE OF RELIEF by Louis B. Salomon 545
MEN OF CRIME by Edward Levinson 546
BETWEEN TWO WORLDS by Donald Minot Young 546
QUICK AND EASY by Karl Menninger 547
"WILL RAPTLY MAGNIPOTENT" by Maxwell Geismar 548
CRISTOBAL COLON by James Orrick 548
ART: DOVE AND THE INDEPENDENTS by Paul Rosenfeld 549
DRAMA by Joseph Wood Krutch 549
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 550

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

◆

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Sweden's Trojan Horse

BY MAURICE FELDMAN

FOR all their philosophy of violence, the Nazis are rapidly making war less a matter of arms than of cunning. Through propaganda and amazing organization they have developed to perfection the strategy of the Trojan horse. In Austria they had a comparatively easy task, since about 25 per cent of the population was on their side. Chancellor Schuschnigg's Foreign Minister, Dr. Guido Schmidt, saw to it that copies of all official documents and letters reached Berlin, ordered Schuschnigg's private secretary, Dr. Frölichstal, to instal a dictaphone in his chief's office so the Gestapo could hear all his conversations, and arranged to put an S. S. man in charge of Schuschnigg's bodyguard. In Czechoslovakia the Henleins and the Hachas were used as tools, and ministers and officials were freely bought. In Hungary and Rumania there were, and still are, influential groups financially dependent on the Third Reich. And as the world now knows, even in countries under Social Democratic regimes the Nazis have built up highly efficient organizations for propaganda, espionage, and treason.

The lightning invasion of Norway is the most dramatic example of Hitler technique we have had thus far. The Norwegian Nazis apparently amounted to nothing in the country's political life. Yet when the critical moment arrived, Norwegians in the highest positions in the country's military and civic life deserted to the enemy. Commanders at important points, officers on the General Staff, prominent industrialists and merchants, the rector of Oslo University, and high church officials supported the puppet government of the leader of the Norwegian Nazis, Vidkun Quisling. It had been known in Norway for many years that Quisling was on the Nazi pay roll, that as head of a "propaganda bureau" he was in close contact with Berlin, and that on several occasions he had talked with Heinrich Himmler, head of the Gestapo.

Will Sweden soon find itself in the same situation as Norway? There too the Nazis have seemingly been of no political importance. In the most recent city election in Stockholm they received something like 3,000 votes, and they have failed to capture a single seat in either chamber of the Swedish Riksdag. But they have created an extensive propaganda apparatus and have huge sums of money at their disposal. Holding influential positions in the government, in education, in journalism, everywhere, are avowed Nazis and persons who have close connections with Nazi circles in Berlin. Sweden belongs to Göring's "department." The Number 2 Nazi spent several years in Sweden after the unsuccessful Munich putsch of 1923 and married a Swedish noblewoman, Countess Karin von Rosen. He speaks Swedish fluently and has many friends in the "better circles" of the country. The leader of the Swedish Nazi Party, an active army sergeant named Lindholm, openly considers himself a personal representative of Göring. The sergeant is fond of likening his own career to that of Hitler and tries to imitate him in every way. He publishes several Nazi periodicals and holds numerous mass-meetings. When asked by persons in the audience what he would do if the Germans invaded Sweden, he generally replies: "That is a question I do not care to answer."

Besides the official Nazi Party Sweden has an organization called Svensk-Tyska Riksfoereningen (Swedish-German National Association) which is supposed to be a non-political society but is in fact a center for Nazi propaganda in Sweden. Many of its leaders and officials are men well known in Swedish public life, such as the brothers de Champs, one of whom is a general, the other an admiral, both in active service. Dr. Sven Hedin, the explorer, and several members of the influential von Rosen family are leading lights in the association, which draws members from Sweden's wealthy merchants, army officers, and newspaper publishers. In the Foreign Ministry, the courts, and the university faculties, as well as in the police and armed forces, are ardent and powerful pro-Nazis. Sven Hedin's case is ironic. Though he is one of the most active propagandists for the Nazis, he is one-fourth Jewish, and if he were a German in the Reich he would have been thrown into a concentration camp long ago or driven from the country. Yet he is one of Hitler's best friends and is always invited by the Führer to attend the annual party congress. At a Nazi meeting in Stockholm in 1938 at which Hedin presided, Hitler's "trouble-shooter," Franz von Papen, was the principal speaker. "When I come back to Sweden in ten years," said von Papen, "I hope to walk on German ground." No one in the audience seemed to object to this sentiment.

I visited Dr. Hedin several times in his house in Stockholm and had lengthy discussions with him. He told me that Hitler had often said to him that England, France, and the United States must be smashed as world powers and that Germany would rule the world before 1948. For Sweden there could be only one course: to go along with Germany. If it did this, then Hitler would leave the country alone and permit it to govern itself internally. Dr. Hedin said he regarded Hitler as the greatest genius he had ever met. I asked him if he thought that the Nazi dictatorship was in Germany to stay. "Yes," he answered without hesitation. "It is the most natural form of government for Germany because the German people need Herrenmenschen to lead them. I agree with Hitler that the common people should not interest themselves in politics; they should follow their leaders." Dr. Hedin added that he disagreed with the Nazis on their policy toward the Jews. He believes Germany will solve the Jewish question in a "friendly way" after it attains its "place in the sun."

On Birger Jarls Street in Stockholm is an official German propaganda bureau. But unofficial German activities are more important. The German colony in Stockholm has secret S. A. units. It also owns, in Kummelnaes, near the Waxholm fortress—which controls the entrance to Stockholm from the Baltic Sea—a camp which is allegedly used as a "children's home." There are a lot of children there in the summer time, but many Swedes wonder why it should be necessary to have an "athletic instructor" for almost every child. As press-relations man the German ambassador in Stockholm has the indefatigable Dr. Grassmann, who supplies material to Sweden's leading newspapers. If an article proposed by Grassmann is refused, the newspaper can expect immediate cancelation of all advertising by German-owned firms and their Swedish branch offices. The Deutsche Handelskammer (German Chamber of Commerce) in Stockholm long ago prepared lists of non-Aryan firms in Sweden.

The Swedish government has in recent months begun to take more energetic measures against spies and potential traitors. Laws passed during the Russo-Finnish war under which thousands of Communists were arrested are now being invoked against Sweden's Nazis. Large areas of the country have been closed to foreigners, foreign ships are being carefully searched, an indeterminate number of known Nazis have been rounded up, and a ban has been placed on the sale or distribution of maps without special permission. If the government's action is less drastic than that taken against the Communists, the reason is simple, though paradoxical: the Communists have no influence in Sweden, but the Nazis are strong—and dangerous.

Men Who Would Be President

V. BURTON K. WHEELER

BY ROBERT BENDINER

MOTORISTS driving through Montana in the fall of 1920 found the roads lined with posters depicting a huge bloody hand. Those who slowed down enough to read the legend beneath the gory emblem may have been reassured to learn that the state was not in the grip of some nameless terror; that the road signs were merely a device of the Republican Party and Anaconda Copper to warn the good citizens of Montana against voting for that pro-German, Wobbly, anarchistic Bolshevik Burton K. Wheeler, Democratic candidate for governor. The Harding tidal wave enveloped Wheeler as it swallowed up all Democrats in 1920, but he polled 17,000 more votes than Cox, the Presidential head of his ticket, and displayed a political virtuosity that twenty years have heightened and refined.

Burton K. Wheeler has what it takes to make a good gambler: the shrewdness to gauge chances and the nerve to take them. Bold enough to be a flaming liberal in the early twenties, when only "Bolsheviks" were liberal, he was daring enough to lead the anti-Roosevelt forces in the middle thirties, when only "economic royalists" were anti-Roosevelt. In both cases he staked his political fortunes on a hunch that public opinion was about to shift. His hunch in the twenties, despite his initial defeat, was to gain him a star role in the Senate for seventeen years; his hunch in the thirties may win him or lose him the Presidency of the United States.

Little about Burton Kendall Wheeler reminds one of his New England origin; nothing more, in fact, than a hint of Massachusetts in his enunciation. The language itself and the Wheeler history are those of the West in which he has spent nearly forty of his fifty-eight years. Born in the village of Hudson, the tenth son of a desperately poor Quaker shoemaker, Wheeler managed during his school days to amass $750 with which to study law at the University of Michigan. Shortly before he was to leave for Ann Arbor he lost $500 of his fortune in a bank crash and had to go on working throughout his college days. In 1905, fresh from law school, he moved on to Colorado, partly for his health, and set out to find himself a practice. "Neither at Telluride, at Ouray, or Montrose—in fact, nowhere on the western slope," he says, "did they seem to recognize my legal talents, so I went my way to Montana."

Montana looked scarcely more promising. Offered nothing better than a bill-collector's job at $50 a month in Butte, the young attorney faced west again, determined for no good reason to try his luck in Spokane. But four poker sharps in search of a sucker decided his fate otherwise. Inveigled into a session of stud, the wandering lawyer lost every cent he had and missed his train as well. The latter misfortune hardly mattered, however, since his ticket was included in the last pot. In his penniless state even the $50-a-month job looked good. He settled down and in time opened a cubby-hole of his own.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Most of young Wheeler's practice consisted of personal-injury suits brought by miners against the copper companies. To stem a growing dissatisfaction, the copper barons in 1910 staged one of their periodic fake "reform" campaigns, in which the usual procedure was to single out an ardent champion of the miners, turn his head with the promise of office and the sudden wealth, comparatively speaking, of a legislator's salary, and then mold him into a tractable servant of the companies. It usually worked, and Wheeler must have looked like a natural. He wasn't. He rebelled almost immediately against orders to oppose the election of Thomas J. Walsh for United States Senator. Walsh lost, but two years later he tried again and won. A notable by-product of his victory was the appointment of Burton K. Wheeler as federal district attorney.

No respecter of precedents, Wheeler proceeded to set the state of Montana by the ears. His term as federal attorney was marked by a spate of prosecutions for all the kinds of corruption that flourish in a frontier society dominated by powerful absentee industrialists. It was a period of germination for the causes and antipathies that were to govern his future political life. He started out by smashing the practice of using decoys to catch saloonkeepers in the act of selling fire-water to Indians and ended up by fighting against the manner in which the war-time espionage laws were being applied. He repeatedly refused to indict Wobblies as such and spoke out boldly against the persecution of German-Americans. He made no secret of his opposition to American entry into the war and was rash enough to advocate, in a mining state, government ownership of natural resources and the railroads. Small wonder that his bid for the governorship in 1920 was greeted with the show of bloody hands.

One of the chief Republican talking points in that campaign was that if Wheeler were elected, the mines would close. Wheeler lost, but a year later the mines closed anyway. So when he ran for the Senate in 1922 the Republicans were hard put to it for an issue. The pendulum had begun to swing away from the fierce militarism of the early post-war days, and the best the local G. O. P. could offer was the suspicion that Wheeler wanted to introduce free love into Montana. It wasn't nearly enough, and he went to the Senate by an overwhelming majority.

Wheeler brought to the Senate a brash pugnacity which he was quick to put on display. On his first day the young man from Montana had to be told not to smoke on the floor of the Senate; two days later he was overriding party whips to precipitate a first-class row over a committee assignment. In less than a week he had established himself as a scrapper and the despair of his advisers; within three months he was spokesman for a group of "New Democrats," corresponding roughly to the La Follette group among the Republicans. By the end of his first session he had dug deep into the noisome doings of the Ohio Gang and had greased the chute for its ultimate retirement from public life.

Mr. Smith Going to Washington could not have asked for a more perfect target than the looting apparatus that was the Harding Administration. The "Little Green House on K Street," where Attorney General Daugherty and his chief henchman, Jess Smith, directed fleecing operations amounting to millions, was history's gift to Burton K. Wheeler. His demand for an investigation was a speech that Paul Y. Anderson described as "an attack so savage that even the Senate flinched." Senator Willis of Ohio pleaded that the Attorney General was "as clean as a hound's tooth," but Wheeler carried the day. He was made prosecutor for a Congressional committee of investigation.

Wheeler did his work well. Before the first echo of his challenge hit the public ear Jess Smith was dead—ostensibly a suicide though some think that he was murdered; before the last echo faded away four principals of the Ohio Gang, as well as Secretary of the Interior Fall, had found their way to federal penitentiaries, and the easygoing President of the United States had died in an odor that could hardly be called one of sanctity.

Before Daugherty finally abandoned the Little Green House on K Street he managed to make himself something of a nuisance to Wheeler. Since there seemed no other way of stopping the Montana Menace, Daugherty combed the Wheeler record for something that would discredit him. Secret Service men under the command of W. J. Burns went to work on the case; at one time twenty-nine of them were on the scene in Montana. The net result of their prowling was a charge that Wheeler had accepted a fee for using his influence as a Senator to obtain oil concessions from the Interior Department for a friend and client. Wheeler had in fact acted in behalf of a client named Campbell, who was an oil promoter, but had limited his activity, he said, to representing the man in a suit brought in the state courts of Montana. He was promptly cleared by the Senate, but the department obtained an indictment against him in Montana in April, 1924, just in time to embarrass him in his campaign as La Follette's running mate on a third-party ticket. The case came to trial the following April, and the jury took two ballots—one to go out to lunch and one, after thirteen minutes' deliberation, to acquit Wheeler.

From the point of view of traditional American liberalism Wheeler goes to the 1940 convention with a cleaner political record than any Presidential candidate has been able to show since the La Follette campaign of 1924. Anti-militarist to the core, he has opposed every major arms appropriation on principle. The National Labor Relations Act and the wage-hour law had his active support. Almost single-handed he pushed through the Public Utilities Holding Company Act with its "death sentence" intact, though several staunch New Deal wheel horses had yielded to pressure and even the President wavered. He has always been an exponent of the tax-the-rich school, and fought repeatedly for the highest possible relief appropriations.He warmly supported the Wagner Act, Social Security, SEC, and TVA, and went along on the AAA despite his anti-trust objections to price-fixing. Aside from his voting record and his magnificent job on the Ohio Gang, his chief claim to Senatorial distinction is the monumental work he has done as chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in unraveling the intricate railroad tangle.

Burton K. Wheeler

At first blush the Wheeler record would seem to establish him as the logical man to carry on the New Deal. Senator George W. Norris, leader of the third-term movement, looks upon Wheeler as Roosevelt's only plausible alternative. Yet a great gulf separates him from the New Dealers, and it will be bridged only if the Roosevelt lieutenants conclude that they have no other choice. In part the issue is personal, in part ideological.

Wheeler was the first important liberal to push Franklin D. Roosevelt toward the White House. He spotted the New York Governor as his man as early as 1929 and worked hard to line up the Northwest for him. Through Norris he won over the powerful Huey Long, who at Wheeler's request paid Roosevelt a pre-convention visit in 1932 and later reported to Wheeler: "I don't like your —— but I'll be for him." Six years later Wheeler was to reflect bitterly: "I'm the last man on earth Jim Farley and Roosevelt would let have the nomination."

Interpretations differ as to what happened between 1932 and 1938 that wrought such a change in the relations between Burton K. Wheeler and Franklin D. Roosevelt. The commonly held version is that Wheeler was disgruntled at the deal through which Garner was given second place on the ticket; some say he wanted the post himself. In any event the edge was off his enthusiasm, and it took some coaxing to get him to rally to the campaign. The next shock came when he was left out of the Cabinet. He could hardly complain when the Attorney Generalship went to his old mentor, Tom Walsh, but Walsh died before the inauguration, and when Roosevelt's second choice was Homer Cummings, Wheeler's cup was full. Cummings was a close friend of J. Bruce Kremer, former national committeeman for Montana and long one of Wheeler's bitterest political foes. In any event Wheeler grew progressively disgruntled, and by 1936 he was prepared to support Roosevelt only in preference to Landon and with an enthusiasm that ranged from the lukewarm to the chilly.

Whatever the personal factor involved, there is enough genuine difference between Wheeler's liberalism and the New Deal to warrant a breach on objective grounds. There are two great areas of conflict: concentration of power in the government and foreign affairs. Wheeler is fully prepared for a substantial degree of government regulation, but he is alarmed at the world-wide trend toward centralized political control, and it is noteworthy that practically every brush he has had with the Administration has been over an issue involving federal encroachments that he considered dangerous. He opposed the NRA as government-sponsored price-fixing, fought the Administration on its reorganization bill, voted to end the President's devaluation powers, and was with Borah in every attempt to block a federal anti-lynching law. The issue reached a climax in the fight over the President's plan to perform a blood transfusion on the Supreme Court—a fight that marked a turning-point in Wheeler's career.

The most skilled hand would find it hard to disentangle the motives that led Burton K. Wheeler not merely to oppose the Roosevelt court-reform plan but to command the forces of opposition. Never a believer in judicial impeccability, he was well aware of the social passions that throbbed beneath the black robes. He believed thoroughly that the Supreme Court's measuring rod of constitutionality was a slide-rule, and he knew, too, that the current court was rapidly choking the breath out of the New Deal, most of which he himself believed vital to the country's welfare. Yet long before the rip tide of opposition had set in, Wheeler waded out and attacked with a savagery he had hitherto reserved for the Daughertys and the Falls. On the death of Senator Robinson, Democratic majority leader, which Wheeler attributed to the strain brought on by the battle over the court, he became almost hysterical. "I beseech the President to drop this court fight," he exclaimed, "lest he appear to fight against God." I believe that Wheeler was genuinely moved by what he conceived to be the dangerous casuistry and unconstitutionality of the President's plan. At the same time there were apparent in his slavishness to theoretical purity signs of personal rancor—and something of a holy satisfaction in being able at last to pitch into the Administration for the kind of deviousness he had long suspected but never openly encountered. To satisfy his own frequently expressed conviction that "judicial oligarchy" was a bad thing for the country he offered a constitutional amendment whereby Congress, following a general election, could by a two-thirds' vote override a Supreme Court decision. But as many who had no love for the Roosevelt plan pointed out, it might take ten or fifteen years to get an amendment ratified by three-fourths of the states, assuming Congress could agree on one. In the meantime, what would become of the New Deal—and of the country? To which Wheeler replied, "The trail of true progressivism is long, but it is right."

Whether or not Wheeler wanted to command the anti-court-plan forces, the leadership was forced upon him. The enemies of That Man would not overlook the opportunity of having a crusade against him led by a sworn progressive. As a result Wheeler soon found himself in a weird position. The copper moguls who had detested him for a quarter of a century flooded his office with sticky congratulations. Editorials appeared in the most primitive Republican papers lauding him as the "man who saved the country." He even received letters commiserating with him on the publication of a newspaper picture of his daughter snapped in the act of passing out C. I. O. leaflets to government employees. And acquaintances asked him what they were expected to say when Wall Street men who had always called him a Bolshevik remarked, "What a wonderful fellow, your Senator Wheeler!" Conversely, the tributes of Anaconda and the blessings of the Liberty League sat poorly on the chests of Wheeler's working friends back home. From Dillon came the bitter complaint: "We find you in bed with Hoover, Mills, Mellon, Morgan, and others right down to the little tories who tried to mob you years ago." Wheeler had indeed been mobbed in Dillon back in the 1920 campaign, but the reference was infelicitous; it enabled Wheeler to remind his critics: "When I was driven out of your town, you did not have backbone or nerve enough to stand up and protest." As for his new admirers, Wheeler says he is "realistic" and confidently predicts they will run for cover before he is through.

Wheeler's leadership in the court battle and his almost rabid isolationism combined to draw on him a withering fire from the left, which the current bear hugs of John L. Lewis and a shift to isolation in certain leftist quarters have only now begun to damp down. Most vocal in the left opposition has been former Representative Jerry O'Connell, whom Wheeler helped to beat for reelection in 1938. O'Connell's Montana Liberal keeps up a hysterical drumfire of personal attacks on the Senator's integrity which are chiefly a rehash of accusations first served up by the puppets of Mr. Daugherty back in 1924. O'Connell is on better ground when he charges Wheeler with responsibility for the election of Representative Jacob Thorkelson, most of whose Washington career has been spent in pumping up anti-Semitic bilge for insertion in the Congressional Record. Wheeler was indirectly responsible for Thorkelson's victory through his campaign against O'Connell, but he finds Thorkelson an acute embarrassment today and will certainly try to shake him off in November.

Much of the ammunition used by O'Connell and other left-wing foes of Wheeler consists of the assertion that he has "sold out to Anaconda." No evidence has ever been offered in support. His voting record down to date, particularly on labor, has not been calculated to give copper-mine owners or any other vested interests the least comfort. Wheeler critics—even the New Republic—point to his opposition to the Hull reciprocal-trade program as a sign that he is wearing the Anaconda livery. The reverse is true. Anaconda has heavy stakes in Chilean copper. A reciprocal-trade treaty means that Anaconda can bring its Chilean copper to New York for less than it can market the top of its Montana mines. On the other hand, Montana miners have a sliding wage scale and see no advantage at all in a declining price for their product. Much of this "sell-out" talk has died down since the fiery court-fight days, and if Wheeler recently has not been the butt of the Anaconda press, the most likely explanation is that his enemy wisely, and traditionally, adopted the policy, "If you can't lick him, join him."

Some of the bad blood between Wheeler and Roosevelt has subsided, and Wheeler is doing his best to effect a reconciliation. Two years ago he was telling audiences that he wouldn't support his own brother for a third term. Now he says he will support Roosevelt again if he seeks a third term, but he hopes—and believes—the President won't. Not only does he oppose a third term on principle, but he believes it would be politically unwise on Roosevelt's part, and has told him so. The trend is to the right, he argues, and even if Roosevelt were elected, the country would plague him with a still more conservative Congress than the Seventy-sixth. For that reason he doesn't think the strategy would be worth the sacrifice of principle involved. Nevertheless, if that is the way things work out, he will go along "rather than weaken the liberal group in the party"—a consideration that did not disturb his fight for the principle of an "independent judiciary."

Concerning his own chances Wheeler is a bit coy. "If they handed me the nomination on a silver platter and a certificate of election with it," he says—"I'd be pretty worried." If Roosevelt abandons the field, it may well be that the fifty-eight-year-old Montanan with the shambling gait, the frank tongue, and the eternal cigar, will have something to "worry" about. To be sure he committed the cardinal sin of party irregularity in 1924, and he comes from a state that has only four electoral votes, but in the internecine war in the Democratic Party Wheeler is the only big figure with friends in both camps. His conduct in the court fight and his veiled antipathy toward a third term have made him the favorite of large sections of anti-Roosevelt Democrats without costing him the support which a lifetime of pro-labor activity has won for him from the trade unions. The violent courtship of John L. Lewis has made Green a bit sour, but Wheeler is experienced enough not to throw himself into the Lewis embrace, particularly since he is more than a little suspicious that the C. I. O. chieftain is using him merely as a reminder to the Roosevelt forces that there are other places to go. The Railway Brotherhoods are Wheeler's for the asking. As for Montana's puny electoral vote, Wheeler men will tell you that Montana shares Wheeler with the whole region of the Mountain States, which means 30 votes, and that he can count on entering the convention with no fewer than 125 pledged delegates. His stand against the reciprocal-trade treaties and his long fight for a parity-price act coupled with farm-debt adjustment make him a better bet in the farm belt than Cordell Hull.

Wheeler's bitterness in the court fight, the loose charges that he has sold out to Anaconda, the row with O'Connell, and the responsibility for Thorkelson have all served to surround him with a fog of doubt and vague mistrust as far as liberals are concerned. But his voting record, his speeches, and his remarks in the course of a recent talk I had with him convince me that neither Hull nor McNutt nor any other candidate with half a chance would carry on as much of the New Deal. "The social reforms that have been inaugurated by this Administration," he told the National Association of Manufacturers, "have my hearty approval." Social security, TVA, wage-hour legislation, SEC, and government relief for the unemployed would all be safe under Wheeler. Civil liberties would probably be guarded with a zeal never before seen in this country. All Wheeler's experience has developed in him a detestation of secret police. He has been hostile to the FBI ever since the Daugherty days and is even now engaged in an investigation of wire-tapping by that agency.

Wheeler was widely reported as having told the Congress of American Industry that he favored a balanced budget, but he went on to remark that "periods of national emergency, such as we have been experiencing, put the possibility of a balanced budget beyond the power of either a liberal or a conservative administration." And privately he affirms with even more conviction that as long as we have ten million unemployed the government must continue its spending policy.

His thoughts on unemployment have more conviction than clarity. He believes that people who want to work and are given no opportunity are "entitled to government relief," but they have "a greater right—a divine right—the right to a job." And "either private industry must employ them or the government will." When I asked him what he would do in the face of this most crushing of all problems, he admitted that he was at a loss. "I owe my people more than demagogy," he said, "I can't go to them with a panacea." If elected President, he would call outstanding business and labor leaders into an immediate conference. He would say, particularly to business: "You have been knocking everything the New Deal tried to do. What do you want? What do you think can be done?"

Where Wheeler breaks most sharply with the Roosevelt Administration—and the breach is probably enough to lose him any hope of Administration support—is in the realm of foreign policy. He is profoundly against American participation in the war under any circumstances short of an invasion of this country and against any steps that might lead to such participation. Would he have the United States take any part in the peace? He doesn't think we would have a place at the peace table without having engaged in the war, but he would be willing to have us take part in an international conference for economic reconstruction after the war. In fact, he would like to see Franklin D. Roosevelt go as an American representative, along with a Republican or two, to prevent a repetition of Wilson's sad experience. He is too antagonistic toward the Nazis to consider himself neutral in thought; anti-British though he admittedly is, he would like to see the Allies win. But he would not like to see them subjugate Germany. Along with his passionate isolationism goes a dangerous naivete concerning foreign affairs. He spoke to me of the possibilities of Britain's accepting a Göring peace, and intimated that such an eventuality would not be entirely distasteful to him.

Burton K. Wheeler is not a Great Statesman, nor does he think of himself as one. He is a politician with principles. If he lacks the sense of history of a Roosevelt or a Wilson, he is likewise free of their willingness to be devious in the present for the sake of future gains. He is extremely sensitive to public opinion, and rather than attempt to mold it and give it direction he is for sounding it out and conciliating it at every turn. If a National Labor Relations Act is good medicine but hard to get down, the patient should be cajoled and given small doses, he believes, until he is used to it and ready for stronger treatment. Wheeler would slow the tempo of the New Deal, a policy which might mean a breathing spell for the patient but which, that tempo being what it is, might mean rigor mortis for the doctor. The risk is great, but when it comes to political gambling few players have a surer hand or a cooler head than Burton Kendall Wheeler.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Oil and the Good Neighbor

BY BERTRAM D. WOLFE

APRIL 8 to 15 was Pan-American Week. With due solemnity the President issued a proclamation countersigned by the Secretary of State calling upon churches, schools, and the people generally to observe "with appropriate ceremonies" the occasion on which the "twenty-one American republics commemorate their peace, friendship, and solidarity." Then, with an ineptness that has not before been shown by the State Department under the present Administration, Cordell Hull chose this same week to release his note to Mexico on oil and land claims. Inevitably, Mexico celebrated Pan-American Week with great popular demonstrations of protest. And the other Latin American countries looked on with mounting disquiet.

The best that can be said for the timing of the Hull note is that the Secretary's mind and that of the President were on other matters. The most charitable interpretation would make of it a pre-convention maneuver intended to short-circuit Republican-Garner criticism of Roosevelt and Hull for alleged passivity in the face of Mexican expropriations. Other aspects of the timing do not lend themselves to such charitable explanation. The suspicion will not down that the note was intended to stiffen the united front of the Anglo-American oil companies and forestall a compromise agreement between Sinclair and the Mexican government. All through March these difficult negotiations were progressing satisfactorily, and it was rumored that a draft agreement had been reached.

It is unfortunate that the note came at a time to influence not one but two Presidential elections. Mexico's electoral campaign is long past the convention stage, in fact, is nearing its culmination. The voting takes place in July, and may be followed—as has so often happened —by an uprising of the opposition. Fortunately, such an uprising seems less likely than usual—unless one, or both, of the opponents of the Administration's chosen candidate is led to think that he can count on oil-company subsidies, gun-running from Texas, and other forms of extra-official encouragement. The oil question has figured as a campaign issue, both the opposition candidates having criticized the Cárdenas administration for alienating foreign capital. The Hull note will inevitably be construed in some quarters as an attempt to influence the election and an encouragement to the preparation of an uprising this summer.

In justice to Roosevelt and Hull it should be said that worse notes have been sent to Mexico. But the senders were less emphatic about their good neighborliness. And the document was after all stiff enough to be headlined in the New York Times as a "warning." The nub of the note lies in a doctrine which is enunciated at least four times in its pages. It challenges the "right," the "legality," and the morals of expropriation without "adequate, effective, and prompt compensation." Even a promise to pay in the future is rejected as "not expropriation but confiscation."

History, less severe than Mr. Hull, "recognizes" two distinct kinds of expropriation. One is the kind Mr. Hull is prepared to recognize: a normal action of a government engaged in exercising its right of eminent domain, perhaps to build a bridge or enlarge a harbor. It does not involve any social upheaval or any challenge to the legality or morality of the title to the property "condemned" or purchased. But there is also another form of expropriation, in which a government or people calls in question the legality of the title and its mode of acquisition. Examples of the latter type in our own history are the expropriation of the Crown lands and Tory estates after the American Revolution, the liberation of the slaves during the Civil War—both without compensation—and the repudiation of the loans contracted by the Southern states during the rebellion. This repudiation was made by retroactive, constitutional amendment, as in Mexico, and although many of the bondholders were Englishmen we would not hear of compensation or arbitration or foreign intervention.

An example even closer to the Mexican case is our nullification, without compensation, of the Teapot Dome oil concessions, an act which affected some of the same companies that are complainants against Mexico. The nullification was not by revolution but by simple court action. What a howl we would have set up if some foreign government had attempted to intervene on behalf of a foreign stockholder or company! Yet in law and in ethics the action of the government in the Teapot Dome case paralleled the present contentions of the Mexican government. The bulk of the Mexican oil concessions were secured from the self-perpetuating Díaz dictatorship in ways which violated the fundamental law and public interest of Mexico. Díaz and his actions were later repudiated by the Mexican people by revolution and by retroactive constitutional provision. Thus the Hull note is tantamount to a refusal to recognize the Mexican Revolution. To add insult to injury, the note specifically refuses to recognize the right of the Mexican courts to decide the matter. If Mexico accepted the note's central contention, the country would, in fact if not in form, return to the colonial-feudal status of the Díaz period.

During the course of years of badgering, Mexico, ever conscious of the great power of its neighbor, has let drop its claimed right to undo Díaz's acts without compensation. It professes a willingness to pay, but not at such a rate as would bankrupt its weak economy and force it to grind the life out of its own people. In these years of crisis and debt repudiation we have sent no such hectoring notes to the non-paying European governments. The suspicion is inescapable that our readiness to lecture Mexico in this fashion springs from a consciousness of its nearness and our overwhelming military superiority.

But how, the Mexicans ask, can they pay whatever their courts may determine unless they can sell the oil and break the silent, powerful blockade of the oil companies upon their petroleum export? How can they pay considerable sums while their finances are in crisis, in part as a result of the deliberate raids upon their banking system engineered by the oil companies?

The Mexican peso—whose nominal par is two to the dollar—is selling now at six to the dollar. In this connection also the timing of the Hull note becomes significant, since it followed closely on a recommendation of a Senate subcommittee that silver purchases from Mexico should be discontinued. In that event a further drop in the peso might be expected. (The whole system of silver purchases at inflated prices is silly, but no more so than the silver policy pursued within this country, or the purchase of gold from the South African and Canadian mines at inflated prices.) Moreover, 70 per cent of Mexican mining is done by American companies—with Mexico deriving benefit only from the payment of wages and taxes and the support given to the peso. If we cut off that support to force an oil "settlement," we may find that American-owned silver mines will close down, that the Mexican government will intervene to keep them open by expropriation, and that there will be still more mouths clamoring at the State Department.

The Mexicans distinguish, and rightly, between foreign capital invested in Mexican factories to produce consumers' goods for sale in Mexico, and capital invested in the extraction of Mexico's natural subsoil wealth for sale in the foreign market. The former, the Mexicans contend, has some interest in raising the standard of living of the Mexican masses and thus expanding the domestic market for consumers' goods. But the capital invested in oil and mineral extraction has no such interest—quite the contrary. Since it extracts virtually the whole product for sale abroad, it has a natural affinity for corrupt officials easily suborned to give generous oil and mining concessions and for dictatorial regimes that permit a maximal exploitation of cheap native labor. It is significant that the break with the oil companies came not so much over the amount of wages to be paid as over the amount to be spent on schools, recreation centers, sanitation, potable water, housing, vacations, and social services for employees.

Automatically, such notes as Hull's tend to revive the latent hostility that long divided the Americas into two unequal and unfriendly camps. We may be ready to forget our past history, but our southern neighbors cannot forget so easily. They welcome our recent better manners but insist that it takes more than fair phrases to make good neighbors or convince them that our economic penetration is not to be feared and that the big stick will never again be flourished in the Caribbean. Mexico is the outpost of Central and South America; all of Latin America is watching our treatment of it to see what our good-neighbor speeches mean when translated into action. By pressing the dubious claims of oil, land, mining, power, and railroad corporations, by encouraging them to refuse to come to an agreement with the Mexican government, by demanding that a Mexico in crisis devote all its meager resources to immediate payment of those claims, we are steering toward a new head-on collision with Mexico.

Woodrow Wilson followed a curiously similar trajectory, getting himself involved with Mexico over oil while Europe was at war. He came in the end to regret it. If the present Administration nourishes the idea that intervention in a European war is again a possibility, it is hard to believe that the State Department will deliberately press things to an open break. But one step is apt to lead to another, and error, too, has its own logic. We are dealing with a proud and sensitive nation that is being pressed dangerously close to the wall and is keenly conscious of its material weakness and past grievances. And we are acting in behalf of Anglo-American oil companies that are among the world's most arrogant aggregations of capital. Under such circumstances an open break could come easily.

The Hull note was a serious error, but not an irretrievable one. It preserved enough of the diplomatic amenities to leave a way out other than that of open conflict. Mexico's answer, it is safe to forecast, will be polite, dignified, but in essence unyielding, since to yield would mean bankruptcy and fresh turmoil.

A policy of generosity and neighborliness toward Mexico now would help that unhappy country to solve some of its basic problems. It would even be in harmony with the interests of the oil companies, which may thereby some day receive compensation in the form of a royalty percentage on oil sales. It would raise the domestic market and level of common life in Mexico, to the ultimate advantage of the American consumer-goods industries. In a time of spreading conflict, it would help to create a genuine, tolerant neighborliness which would enrich life throughout the Americas.

Automobile Dealers Can't Win

BY RUTH BRINDZE

THE General Motors Corporation has struck pay dirt again with its campaign advertising the new G. M. price tags. These tags are supposed to give the consumer a break; all charges over the factory price are itemized and the dealer cannot pack the bill. The bad boy whose business manners are now being publicly corrected is the dealer.

Compared to other short ends that the dealers regularly draw from the manufacturers, this one is not so bad. For sometimes dealers have padded the bills, though often enough this has been with sufficient active assistance from the manufacturer to make him an accessory before the fact. At a meeting of manufacturers' executives a few years ago, M. R. Grant of General Motors said: "I deliberately put more handling charge in because I had dealers going broke, and the easiest way to slip them $25 was in the pack."

The "handling charges" were paid by the public; the manufacturer was able to maintain his advertised FOB factory price. In most industries when retailers cannot earn a profit by selling at the price established by the manufacturer, either the retail price is increased or the wholesale cost is lowered. But the automobile business has a different set of rules. That automobile dealers consider the sale of a new automobile a "loss leader," that their profits come from the sale of accessories—white-walled tires, double horns, electric clocks—is one of the more obvious insanities in a crazy economic set-up.

Except in a few instances—when the manufacturer operates a sales unit or bids for government or fleet business—automobiles are sold by "authorized" dealers operating under a franchise from the manufacturer. The system was developed when automobiles were new and the factories were glad to find someone who would undertake to sell their cars. Fundamentally there is nothing wrong with it, but the pressure of belt-line production has turned it into a fantastic caricature of free enterprise. Today the "independent" dealer is actually an exploited salesman who frequently receives no pay for his services. The profits and losses of a sample group of large dealers are analyzed in the recent report of the Federal Trade Commission on the motor-vehicle industry. Even in this preferred group 19 per cent lost money in the relatively prosperous year of 1936. A more comprehensive survey made by the National Automobile Dealers' Association shows that in a ten-year period 64 per cent of the dealers went under.

Dealers are in business to sell automobiles, and 85 per cent of their total business consists of car sales. But this business is done at a loss. The average reported net profit of $19.09 per new car was made on the sale of accessories and from servicing. The manufacturers have not, however, depended on the profit motive to get accessories sold. J. H. Ernst, New York district representative of the Oldsmobile Division of General Motors stated to the Federal Trade Commission that it was Oldsmobile's policy to ship all cars with extra equipment—radios, defrosters, cigar lighters, and the like. Other manufacturers have the same practice. The dealer is told to buy, or else. His business hangs on his franchise. He takes his orders.

These are as broad as the business. They define the accounting system which must be used, the amount of capital which must be invested, the location and size of the show room and display signs, the sum which must be contributed by the dealer for advertising, and the number of cars he must buy, particularly during the "clean-up" period when the manufacturer is about to bring out a new model and wants to get rid of last year's cars. Much of this control is legalized by the provisions in the manufacturer-dealer contract. When the bounds are overstepped, as for example when dealers are forced to take left-over cars, the pressure is carefully hidden. "We have been threatened a number of times," a Ford dealer reported to the FTC, "but of course we have no definite records of these incidents since the factories are very careful about matters of this kind being put in the form of writing. Telephone and representatives' personal contacts were the methods used."

Before the 1940 models were delivered, dealers were still being called upon to "cooperate" so that the factories could unload. These surplus cars must be paid for by the dealers at the regular list price; there is no markdown because the model is already outmoded. The buying public, however, expects, and generally gets, a discount on cars bought at the end of the season. The dealer, not the factory, takes the loss. Often it is such sales that put the dealer in the red for the year.

When the finished cars run off the production line, the dealer must have cash in hand to pay for them. If he has no cash, he gets it by borrowing on his own credit. This method of financing is a hold-over from the old days when the manufacturers were hard up for cash. The big companies brought it up to date by organizing subsidiaries to finance the dealers' buying on the instalment plan. And since this financing business was not very profitable, they obliged the dealer who wanted to enjoy its benefits to use the same companies to handle the instalment buying of his customers. The terms of the companies' specious "6 per cent" plans were frequently higher than the public could obtain from other sources, and this flouting of free competition was so obvious that the government finally proceeded against it. Ford and Chrysler signed a consent decree permitting customers to use financing companies of their own choosing. General Motors unsuccessfully fought the order in the courts.

None of this, however, touches the major financial problem. The manufacturer collects from the dealer on delivery of a new car. But for almost every new car that the dealer sells, he has to take a used car as a trade-in. Even with a conservative policy on allowances, the dealer's working capital is frozen in the cars standing in the used-car lot. And each year this financial freeze-up is becoming worse.

In an attempt to level off the unemployment peaks in the automobile factories President Roosevelt suggested that the date of the automobile show be moved forward, from January to the autumn. This speeded up new-car sales in the winter months and kept the factories running. But the market for used cars is frozen from the autumn until the spring. Moving forward the date of the automobile show has lengthened the period during which the dealers must carry their used-car stock.

If dealers are to stay in business, they must both finance the sale of used cars and sell their quota of new ones. Therefore they must spend money for advertising to increase new-car sales. In 1940 the manufacturers' and dealers' joint advertising fund for Dodge passenger cars amounted to $9 for each car. A $6 charge was automatically added to the dealer's bill, and the manufacturer contributed $3. In 1938 Pontiac dealers were paying $7.50 into a joint fund for each "six" that they ordered and $10 for each "eight."

Men and companies of conservative tendencies are not wanted in the automobile business. Reports from factory representatives in the cancelation file of the Ford Company show the importance to the dealer of being "volume-minded." One of its business analysts decided that the dealer could afford to take a "$50 loss on six to ten additional new cars each month." Apparently the dealer refused to cooperate, for his franchise was canceled. Another Ford agency had its license canceled because it was "ultra-conservative in its sales operations . . . and has frankly and repeatedly told us that it does not intend to be a volume dealer."

The dealer not only has to make his quota, but he has to sell the particular models which the manufacturer tells him to. For example, a Pontiac dealer reported to the FTC that he was "made to take Pontiac eights in order to get Pontiac sixes which were already sold"; a Buick dealer wrote that "the only pressure we have is that we must sell a certain amount of the highest-priced series cars, when we have no market, in order to get the lower-priced series, which are selling fast."

Dealers have attempted to organize and to fight back, but the manufacturers are in a position to discourage such tactics. On the part of the Ford Company this discouragement, according to the Federal Trade Commission, "took the form of threats of cancelation of their dealer agreements." More recently the manufacturers seem to have decided not to interfere with dealer organizations. In fact, last summer the executive committee of the National Automobile Dealers' Association sat in conference with Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., the first time N. A. D. A.'s representatives had discussed factory-dealer relations with a factory executive.

But it will take more than a chat with the big boss to make the dealers independent—and to keep them out of bankruptcy.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

German Aggression and American Business

WITH each expansion in the area of German aggression the territory open to American trade becomes more circumscribed. Hitler's incursion into Scandinavia has placed an impassable barrier between us and an important group of customers, and may prove to have destroyed the credit of a group of nations distinguished by strict observance of bond contracts. If the Allies succeed in driving the Nazis out of Norway, the Scandinavian market may be partially recovered. But if the Germans consolidate their hold and ultimately win the war, America can kiss both trade and investments goodby, for in that event the small northern states are undoubtedly destined to become Lebensraum. However, such an outcome to the war would, in any case, shatter our accustomed methods of foreign trade and leave us no choice but to adapt our system to autarchy and barter.

The Scandinavian countries have long been both excellent customers for American farm and industrial products and important sources of raw materials. With their high standard of living, they have been among the most profitable foreign outlets for automobiles and petroleum products. They have kept their tariffs comparatively low and largely refrained from distorting their economies in vain attempts to become self-sufficient. Thus Norway, whose soil, for the most part, is unsuited to cereal production, was wise enough to buy grain from countries where it could be raised cheaply and concentrate on dairy farming and forestry. Denmark specialized in high-grade foods—meat, butter, eggs—for which cheap imported fodder provided the raw materials. Thus it was a good customer for American corn and oilcake. Other leading exports from this country to the three Scandinavian states included machinery, copper, cotton, tobacco, and fruit.

The outbreak of war last September proved a strong stimulus to American trade with Scandinavia, and for the six months ending February, 1940, our exports to the three states plus Finland were in the aggregate 81 per cent greater than in the corresponding period a year earlier. This increase was partly due to the effects of the war in cutting off competitive sources. Another factor was the desire of the northern states, which in the last war had suffered heavily from the progressive tightening of the Allied blockade, to establish reserves of essential foods and raw materials. In addition, there is reason to believe that some goods ordered by and shipped to Scandinavian firms were actually transshipped to Germany. Recent revelations of the way in which the Nazis had penetrated the Norwegian administration suggest that Allied efforts to control such traffic may have been circumvented to a greater extent than had previously been supposed.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Among American imports from Scandinavia wood pulp and newsprint easily take first place. Norway, Sweden, and Finland provided about 14 per cent of our wood-pulp consumption in 1939 and roughly 10 per cent of newsprint consumption. But if these sources of supply are to be blocked for the duration of the war, the effect on American industry will be even greater than the figures imply. For Britain, which next to the United States is the world's greatest consumer of paper and paper-making materials, has hitherto obtained a very substantial part of its supplies of both from the northern states. Immediately after the German invasion of Norway, British newspapers, already severely rationed, were ordered to make a further drastic cut in size. Britain and other countries all over the world which have been accustomed to buy Scandinavian paper and pulp will now have to turn to Canada and the United States. This is a pleasing prospect for North American paper manufacturers, whose shares have been booming for the past ten days. The demand will probably stretch their capacity to the limit for the first time in years. But publishers and the other innumerable consumers of paper face the possibility of a sharp rise in prices. It is only just to add that the International Paper Company, the largest American producer, has announced that it will maintain newsprint prices at $50 a ton, the quotation in effect ever since the beginning of 1938, until October 1. Prices of other types of paper, however, are likely to be lifted in the near future.

American investments in Norway, Sweden, and Denmark have been estimated at about $225,000,000. Of this total, some $66,000,000 is accounted for by direct investments, such as the large Ford assembly plant in Copenhagen, while the balance is represented by state and city bonds and to a small extent by holdings in Scandinavian companies. The obligations of these countries were among the few foreign bonds which could be held with confidence, and before the war clouds gathered in Europe, market quotations for such issues as Denmark 4½'s and Norway 4¼'s were seldom worse than par. The invasion of Finland struck them a heavy blow, and Germany's swoop has sent them plunging to default levels. Nor is this surprising, for the most scrupulous debtor cannot pay when his business is closed down and his reserves stolen. So long as the war lasts, the prospects of trade earnings in Scandinavia sufficient to cover bond service are remote indeed. The Nazis are reported already to have carried off all gold found in the Copenhagen and Oslo banks. Fortunately a considerable fraction of their reserves had been transferred for safekeeping to New York, and thanks to the Administration's prompt action in blocking the transfer of all Norwegian and Danish funds in this country, this at least is saved from Hitler's itching palm.

In the Wind

NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN recently wrote a book and submitted it to literary agents here. They tried to sell it to all the major publishers in turn, but without success. Each said in effect: "Chamberlain won't sell in America." A national magazine finally purchased the work.

COLUMNIST ED SULLIVAN visited St. Louis recently and described his sojourn there in his daily column. He reported that he had gone to the offices of the St. Louis Star-Times—"in which this column has appeared for some years"—and had been entertained by the staff. A few days later he discovered that his St. Louis outlet was the Post-Dispatch, competitor of the Star-Times.

STORIES ABOUT evacués crowd the London press. The newest is about an elderly spinster who lived in a small country house with a maid. One morning the doorbell rang. The maid admitted a man, heard his errand, then rushed upstairs. "Please, mum," she shouted, "you've got to have two babies, and the man's downstairs."

A FORTNIGHT ago this column reported that the Salem, Oregon, Chamber of Commerce had canceled an address by Richard Neuberger on "Why I Am a Liberal." The story has a sequel. The Salem Realty Board, indignant over the cancelation, invited Neuberger to deliver an address before its members on the same subject. Shortly afterward this invitation was abruptly withdrawn, on the ground that Neuberger's speech didn't pertain to real estate. Now a group of newspapermen are planning to have him deliver the speech.

WHEN OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD spoke at the University of California recently, he quoted from one of Bertrand Russell's books. The audience interrupted him with a vociferous outbreak of applause.

BASEBALL NEWS: "A mill executive volunteered this information to us today: 'We men who run the mills value baseball highly. If we can get our folks interested in ball games, they are less interested in communism and radicalism and strikes. The mills that have the best ball teams have the least labor troubles. There is rarely unrest where there is a good baseball team. Maintenance of a ball team is part of our legitimate expense.' "—Shirley Povich's sports column in the Washington Post.

MEMBERS OF THE A. F. of L. Circus, Carnival, Fairs, and Rodeo International Union picketed the circus when it opened in New York. Among those who crossed the first-night picket line was Matthew Woll, third vice-president of the A. F. of L.

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THERE is no worse phase of the German invasion of Denmark and Norway than that it places in jeopardy thousands of refugees from Germany who have sought sanctuary in those peaceful and unoffending countries. Sweden in particular has been most generous in opening its doors to men and women whose sole sin is that by accident of birth they are not 100 per cent Aryan, and to political fugitives as well. The ties between Sweden and Germany have always been close, and during the last war the sympathies of the Swedes were distinctly with the Kaiser. This was in part due to the constant intermarriage of Swedes and Germans. Even during this war the anti-German sentiment in Sweden has not been as strong as in Norway, where fully 95 per cent of the people have been whole-heartedly on the side of the Allies from the day hostilities began.

The German capture of Denmark was so sudden that not many of the refugees there could have escaped before the invasion of the Nazis. The German exiles in Norway are now no doubt tortured by fear of being thrown into prison. The many in Sweden must also be frantic to make their escape. I am thinking, for example, of a German Aryan who refused from the beginning to resign himself to the persecution of the Jews and who was so active in helping them to get out of the country that finally he was himself compelled to flee to Sweden. For some time past friends in this country, some of whom owe their safety to him, have been trying to bring him here, but the obstacle of quota regulations has been as yet unsurmountable. One shudders to think what will befall this gallant spirit if he falls into the hands of the Germans.

Before me lies the letter of a most estimable German who is living in Stockholm with his wife and three children because his wife is partly Jewish. Had he been willing to put her away he would be in safety today, for his home was in a part of South Germany where he could have continued to carry on his teaching. When the school was told that it must dismiss him, it protested that no more devoted teacher had ever worked for it: in nearly two decades he had helped to mold well the lives of many fine young men, and no more loyal German could be found anywhere. That helped not at all. Even his children with their perhaps one-quarter Jewish blood were ordered out of the school and town because they were "contaminating" the rest of the pupils. He wrote nearly a hundred letters appealing for aid to people who because of old ties of relationship or friendship should have helped. The only responses came from Sweden and the United States. The Germans were too prejudiced or too afraid to help any creature so terrible as a woman with Jewish blood. Efforts to bring them over here failed because of bureaucratic delays; then Sweden stirred and granted temporary permits to enter. It seemed the opening of the doors of heaven to these poor, innocent, hunted creatures. True, they entered on only temporary visas, but the father found the opportunity to teach a little, and friendly human beings whose souls had not been warped by the teachings of the Nazis did everything possible to aid these shipwrecked persons to begin life anew.

What will happen to such as these? Can we Americans not do something to rescue them and by doing so give real aid to the countries now harboring them? I know well the difficulties, especially since some of them are Jews. Yet it does seem to me that if the situation were laid before Congress by the right people, something could be done. Congress could, if it wished, limit the duration of their stay here to two years after the end of the war, or could set up a board to pass upon their fitness then for future residence. If we took them in now we should free the embattled Scandinavians of the necessity of supporting and feeding the refugees when the feeding of their own people is soon going to be a very serious matter. Of course it would be extremely difficult to get them out—our government is going to be hard put to it to bring back the three thousand Americans now in Scandinavia. But the ports of Sweden are still open, and I am sure that the English government would cooperate. At any rate I wish that that fine citizen, Henry Goddard Leach, and the American-Scandinavian Foundation, with which he has so long been associated, might explore this field and see if something could not be done. Merely to attempt it would be a useful gesture.

Since I am sometimes accused of not praising Franklin Roosevelt enough I take this opportunity to thank him for his admirable characterization of this latest German crime. Again and again he has voiced the conscience of America with rare skill and felicity. I know that if his words could be read in Germany they would increase the shame and utter humiliation felt by many of the people. Many who found excuses for the invasion of Austria and Czechoslovakia were outraged when Poland was ravished. The fate of Denmark and Norway will surely increase not a little the opposition to Hitler at home.

BOOKS and the ARTS

DON STURZO'S LIBERAL CATHOLICISM

BY G. A. BORGESE

IN THE present confusion many are looking for help to the Catholic church. Like a wounded battleship Western civilization seems to be running for harbor. Catholicism in the stages of its origins and of its early maturity had been the result of a wide-embracing syncretism. For centuries it had been the real melting-pot of the most vital elements transmitted from antiquity to the Middle Ages. There seemed to be no reason why this blending process should have been stopped in the modern age. Toward liberalism and science, and even toward socialism and revolution, the church might have taken an attitude as supple and penetrating as the one it had taken toward the pagan philosophies of Plato and Aristotle, toward the communes and the kingdoms. The obstacles that were in the way of such an endeavor, however, were not overcome. Under the leadership most often of the Jesuits the church stiffened its conservative defenses. The Syllabus of Pope Pius IX (1864) and the Dogma of Infallibility (1870) are the starting dates of the age that should be called the Second Counter-Reformation. None of the popes who succeeded Pius IX deflected from the path which he had prescribed.

Yet undercurrents of syncretism remained alive. A liberal Catholicism was in the making during the whole of the nineteenth century, both before and after the Syllabus, although it never was made. A theological liberalism, or modernism, strove toward a symbolical and critical interpretation of the dogmas; a political liberalism aimed at a Catholic democracy. Modernist theology was smashed to smithereens by the encyclical "Pascendi" in 1907. Political reformism survived the catastrophe.

A Sicilian priest, Don Luigi Sturzo, as gallant in character as he was keen in mind, founded in 1919 the Italian Popular Party. Powerfully organized, the Italian Catholics mixed in the events of the day and of the years, in a spirit of strict loyalty to the Vatican in matters of faith and morals and in a spirit of advanced democracy in matters of social justice. The two trends were meant to represent and enact the directions suggested and prescribed by Leo XIII's famous "Rerum Novarum." The years of Don Sturzo's action, however, were numbered, not more than five or six. Harassed by Fascism and deserted by the Vatican, he trod the path of exile and has lived since, most honorably, as a refugee in England. His books bring a very valuable contribution to the history and interpretation of our age. The latest, "Church and State" (Longmans, Green and Company, $5), summarizes most adequately his experience and his belief.

Considered as a specimen of learned historiography "Church and State" deserves unrestricted praise for the diligence with which its author has collected the material from nearly two thousand years of strife and effort in the interrelations of secular and religious organizations. This material is offered to the reader in a form which, although popular and fluent, seldom slides down to glibness. On the whole the structure of the book is unified, and the scholarly quality of the information is not impaired by occasional—indeed, very rare—slips, Yet it would be inappropriate to estimate the book predominantly from the angle of scholarly research and discovery. Its real meaning is in its intention and program, in the manifesto of the final chapters and pages. One paragraph on page 551 contains the gist of the whole treatise.

> . . . In the Middle Ages the papacy intervened by authority with kings and peoples; . . . This was what was known as "direct power." In modern times this power was pared away, disciplined by concordats and rules of jurisdiction; the theologians called it "indirect power." . . . Today this power is still operative, whether direct or indirect. . . . It could now be called "directive power." The form has changed, but the substance is the same. It consists in the . . . efficacy of the Christian citizen who succeeds in bending the power of the state, or else in opposing it in the name of Christian morality . . . conducive to a state with a Christian civilization.

Strangely enough there is not a word about Brüning in the whole book, and what is said about the Catholic Center Party in Germany during the Weimar Republic sounds rather noncommittal. Not strangely at all the judgment which the book brings to bear on the Austrian experiments of a Catholic Social State up to the downfall of Schuschnigg is very critical or even outright hostile. The history of the annihilation of the Popular Party in Italy is partly reticent and veiled. There is greatness of heart in the persistence of Don Sturzo's purpose and will in spite of all catastrophes. Unperturbed he still advocates a structure of society in which the church, while revealing the eternal truth, should become the source of inspiration in temporal life, the "directive power" within and above the state.

What are the practical chances for such an organization of society? And how far is it desirable? A first approach to the problem should be in the appraisal of the success or failure of the Roman church in its experimentation of worldly power. For over a thousand years, from the age of Pepin the Short to the breach of Porta Pia which put an end to the Papal State, the Roman Pontificate had a temporal state to administer. Theoretically it should have become a political model. It did not, however; social and economic standards remained hopelessly low, and it would be stultifying to assume that the divine authority ruling Rome and its provinces had any effect in fostering any particular potential of saintliness or virtue in the mass of its subjects. Don Sturzo himself, for all his pious humility toward the popes, cannot but gloss over the social and political history of the Papal State, admitting hurriedly that it too had its troubles.

True it is that the power exercised by the popes in the Papal State was not a "directive one"; it was direct. It would be disturbing, however, to assume as a logically respectable hypothesis that what the church was unable to perform directly it would be able to perform indirectly as an inspiration behind the state. The inference would be a disintegrating dissociation of the authority of criticism from the responsibility of action.

A further approach is given by the record of the church's attitudes toward temporal affairs from the end of the Papal State in 1870 to our day. Theoretically its suggestions to the powers of the earth should have been flawlessly Christian. But they were not so, and Don Sturzo himself cannot pass over in silence the behavior, recklessly reactionary and racial, of the French Catholics in the Dreyfus affair; nay, he must admit that "Leo XIII did not think fit to intervene to prevent the Catholics of France from carrying on so disastrous a campaign." The "Rerum Novarum" and "Au milieu des solicitudes," highly praised manifestos of Catholic democracy, had already been published, but it is not easy to state when and where their general tenets became positive action through the will of the Vatican. The Vatican's attitude toward the reactionary movements in the period between the two wars is too well known to require more than a cursory reminder.

When Don Sturzo writes on page 554 about "the exploitation of the church on the part of nationalists and Fascists and their governments," the reader appreciates the piety and humility of his wording, but he cannot forget that there would not have been any such exploitation if the church had not wanted to be exploited by the Fascist and Nazi governments and to exploit them. The connivance of the Catholic church with Italian Fascism is even for Don Sturzo himself too burning an experience to be disposed of with such slippery and inadequately whitewashing expressions as "a subtle duel, wholly Italian, carried on through partial compromises made with reservations" (p. 487). That the church officially and effectively supported the aggressor nation against Ethiopia is a matter of fact hardly counterbalanced by the vague and inconclusive assertion that not all Catholics felt the same way. Even in its relations with Nazism the long enduring leniency of the church is practical and operative while its protests have remained in a theoretical and sentimental field, especially if contrasted with the church's dogged hostility toward Communist Russia, whose fundamental doctrines are by no means more un-Christian than the Nazi and Fascist ideologies. Nor is it very comforting to learn again what we already knew, that a few well-meaning Catholics abstained from supporting Franco or even gave their support to the Loyalist cause. The fact remains that the Catholic church as a whole was behind the powers of the earth which murdered Republican Spain. All that the church has done or tried to do as a "directive power" in the nearly seventy years during which it could have acted from the experimental vacuum of its wholly spiritualized independence has consistently been along the line of absolutism and reaction. In the "symbolic state" and "city sui generis" which is the Vatican State as it has lived from 1929 to our days, the pope, Don Sturzo admits on page 489, is "at once sovereign and the one true citizen," a rather discouraging symbol of what the ideal state would be if the papacy could have its own way. From the unbroken straightness of this line the encyclical "Rerum Novarum" with its allegedly progressive ideas in the field of social and economic justice stands out, even supposing the interpretation of its enthusiasts is correct, as an alibi—if not as a stratagem, "Papal documents," states Don Sturzo on page 417, "never speak against liberty in general."

Certainly there seems to be no reason why a pope whom liberal and progressive people might call a good pope, a Maritain or a Don Sturzo, should not ascend some day to the Chair of Saint Peter. Let us ask, paging his book again, what Don Sturzo as a pope would and could do. Among the most impressive passages in his "Church and State" is a quotation on page 421 from Montalembert, which he seems to like warmly. "We," said Montalembert, adopting the motto of the Poles against Catherine II, "love liberty more than anything in the world and religion more than liberty" [italics mine]. More striking than Montalembert and the Poles is Don Sturzo himself when he summarizes on page 479 the creed of his Popular Party; "It is liberal (in the wholesome sense of the word) [italics mine] because it takes its stand on the civil and political liberties which it upholds as equal for all, without party monopolies and without persecution of religion, races, or classes." I have reprinted in italics also the word religion, which obviously ought to be in the plural, religions, as are "races, classes." It does not seem, however, that there is any printer's slip. Don Sturzo, in fact, discloses to his reader on page 530 that there is "effectively" "freedom of worship" in Fascist Italy; high praise for Fascist Italy from the gallant anti-Fascist exile, who must certainly know what has happened in Fascist Italy to Protestant institutions and propaganda, and to the harmless people who tried to find a haven for their battered lives in the creed and practice of Quakerism. He also certainly has heard of books, like Martinetti's "Jesus and Christianity," forbidden and seized by the Fascist government, hardly in order to please the liberalism of the church.

There is no freedom of worship in Fascist Italy except for Roman Catholicism, the religion. Don Sturzo too, like Montalembert and the Poles, seems to love liberty above anything else, but his religion above liberty, and there is no evidence that, were he the pope, he would be able to act or would like to act on different premises.

The problem is whether there could ever be political liberty without intellectual liberty, social justice—we mean Maritain's or Don Sturzo's, obviously not Father Coughlin's Social Justice—without a dogma of every man's and therefore also the pope's fallibility. A society with justice and freedom cannot be a society of intellectual criticism without a field reserved to authoritarianism or totalitarianism of any kind. "Liberties," says Don Sturzo once, "are coherent, or they cannot exist." But he blinds himself to the implications of this sentence. Devoutly he has subjected his book to the "Nihil obstat" and the "Imprimatur" of his censors. With the same devotion he has omitted in his otherwise excellent bibliography such first sources as Salvemini's essay on The Catholic Church and the Ethiopian War or as Teeling's book on "Pius XI and World Affairs."

If it is true that liberties are coherent or they cannot exist, an advance of the Roman church on the path of social and economic progress should carry with it a doctrinal reform starting with the abandonment of the Syllabus and with the admission of modernist theology. The next great book of a Catholic reformer after Don Sturzo's "Church and State" should be addressed to the Curia and to the clergy, not to the laity. It should bid a stop to the Second Counter-Reformation. It should be controversial within the church rather than outside it.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

A Tale of Relief

THE TRIUMPH OF WILLIE POND. By Caroline Slade. Vanguard Press. $2.50.

HERE is a novel that is not only an absorbing human story but virtually a handbook of the complex machinery of public relief, which to people with an income is only an unpleasant word but which becomes, to the destitute, a world of interlocking agencies, of petty tyrannies, of officious, ever-snooping welfare workers, of humiliation and undernourishment and cockroaches and smelly cold-water flats with three or four dwellers to a room.

Mrs. Slade, drawing on many years' experience as a social worker, shows relief at its worst and at its best in the Pond family's treatment at the hands of the city agency of the town of Highbridge and at those of the county Board of Child Welfare. Miss Southard, the city's worker, a thin-lipped ex-school teacher with a penchant for exercising power over others, treats each of her "cases" as a problem in the mathematics of keeping so many human beings from starvation with the least possible expense, ignoring through incapacity rather than malice their inevitable deterioration, even the ultimate social deficit resulting from such handling. Under her regime the Ponds, an ordinary, respectable family down in their luck, rapidly lose their physical and moral stamina. Willie, the father, really a tubercular case, wears out his little remaining strength to bring in a few dollars digging ditches for WPA; Sarah, the mother, drained of energy not so much by bearing fourteen children as by hopelessness, lets their vermin-infested rooms grow even filthier as the fifteenth child is on the way; fourteen-year-old Mary takes up prostitution in the hope of assisting the family. When Willie suffers a broken leg, however, the whole picture suddenly changes.

His lung trouble confirmed by the doctors, he is sent to a state hospital to receive excellent care, and his family, because the only wage-earner is incapacitated, is transferred to a county board, which allows them funds for decent living, and to the case-book of young Jean Shonts, who passionately believes that people are human beings even if they have to be supported by the taxpayers. For two years, while Willie recuperates at the sanitarium, the Ponds undergo a general rehabilitation, blossoming out into a healthy and promising group, until the stunning blow falls: Willie is about to be released as cured, the county agency must automatically withdraw its support, and with Willie unable to find a job there is no prospect but a return to the subhuman life of "the Beehive"—that unspeakable tenement from which Miss Shonts had rescued them. Willie's decision to kill himself in order to assure a decent life to his wife and children is no surprise;

HE was one of the young intelligentsia in Russia who took up the cause of the people in the 1900's . . . and became disillusioned when the Revolution failed . . .

HE organized a successful strike among his fellow construction workers on the Grand Trunk Pacific in the Northern Rockies . . . served time as a political prisoner in Russia, Mexico, Spain . . .

HE studied at the Sorbonne . . . at the University of Geneva . . . sold papers on the Bowery . . . panhandled down the Pacific Coast . . . picked fruit in California . . .

Here, in his own words, is revealed the man behind the celebrity America knows, who initiated a world-wide movement with a deck of cards—an amazing, many-sided personality gifted with a keen literary and social perception.

INSIDE TIP . . to "Nation" Readers on what seems destined to be the most unusual biographical work of 1940

"This is the most astoundingly frank and honest confession ever published, probably, with the exception of Boswell's Journals. It makes the famed confessions of Rousseau and St. Augustine seem like the reports of adolescents. Culbertson is a versatile genius, talented in many more ways than in playing bridge. Although he often seems like a braggart, his brags (on careful thought) have justifiable bases, and no writer in the world has been more shamelessly humble in setting forth his weaknesses and short-comings. This is truly the story of a man who not only wants to make his peace with God but with men and with himself."

—BURTON RASCOE

THE STRANGE LIVES OF ONE MAN

An Autobiography by

ELY CULBERTSON

700 pages . . . Illustrated . . . $3.00

At all Bookstores

THE JOHN C. WINSTON COMPANY · Philadelphia

in his position, being a conscientious, affectionate father, he had no other choice.

Though obviously intended to draw attention to the realities of relief—both the giving and the receiving—Mrs. Slade's book makes the travails of the Ponds a warm and absorbing story, not at all like a case history. It poses many disturbing questions. Should society spend thousands on the support of an unwanted child rather than a few dollars on contraceptives? Is it socially thrifty to cure a man like Willie Pond only to force him back immediately into the very conditions that ruined his health in the first place? Should a relief worker let herself sympathize with her clients, or will only an armor shell of indifference preserve her sanity in a heartbreaking profession? The questions are not answered; perhaps they cannot be, but Mrs. Slade deserves a hearty vote of thanks for having suggested them so poignantly in an intensely moving book. LOUIS B. SALOMON

Men of Crime

GANG RULE IN NEW YORK. By Craig Thompson and Allen Raymond. The Dial Press. $3.50.

NEW YORK'S most recent crusade against racketeering, which has already presented the nation with a formidable Presidential candidate, now produces the most authoritative current volume on organized crime in the United States. The recent revelations of the extensive murder-for-pay ring, labeled by headline writers Murder, Inc., would have made a fitting conclusion to this sensational story, but "Gang Rule in New York" has enough raw meat in it without that lurid sequel. Incidentally, the exposure and prosecution of Murder, Inc., by Brooklyn's district attorney, William F. O'Dwyer, raises the question of whether, by some accepted standards, Mr. O'Dwyer would not make a better President than Thomas E. Dewey.

Messrs. Thompson and Raymond, respectively of the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune, are among the most competent reporters in New York City. As a result, their book is almost completely based on bedrock fact rather than on the imaginative sequences with which other crime reporters have filled missing links in their chronologies of racketeering. Our present authors trace the trials and erasures by which the Italian, Irish, and Jewish gangs in New York settled the allocation of territories—East Side, West Side, Brooklyn, and the Bronx—and of jurisdictions—bootleg liquor, gambling, prostitution, industrial racketeering, and so on.

The full lives and colorful funerals of Gotham's men of crime receive due attention, but the more significant interrelations of crime and local politics are not neglected. The most valuable parts of the volume are those dealing with the political allies, frequently also the servants, of the big-shot racketeers. There are fuller portraits than courtroom rules of evidence permit of Jimmy Hines, Al Marinelli, and a heavy complement of former magistrates and district leaders. Despite the hosannas which sing of Dewey as a savior of civic purity, the realistic authors are not convinced that the clean-up in which Dewey played a part—and not an exclusive one—will stick. Being also seasoned political reporters, they conclude that "gang rule in New York is not dead. Stunned temporarily, it seems to be reviving." They point out that many of the "political allies" of the fallen racketeers are still in politics. The weakness in this otherwise excellent book is the lack of proper emphasis on the part played by the owners of American industry in employing the racketeers and their "political allies," virtually all of whom have been on call as professional organizers of strike-breaking mobs. The encouragement of labor-union corruption by employers who would rather pay a racketeer wage than a living wage might also have come in for more attention. EDWARD LEVINSON

Between Two Worlds

PARIS GAZETTE. By Lion Feuchtwanger. Viking Press. $3.

LION FEUCHTWANGER has always been a sort of literary amanuensis to the oppressed minorities. In the last ten years we have had "Success," which dealt with the repression of dissenters in the post-war period, "The Oppermanns," pleading the cause of the Jews in Germany just as it came into Hitler's hands, and now "Paris Gazette," a novel about refugees, Jewish and Christian, from the Third Reich.

Mr. Feuchtwanger never attempts anything on a small scale. This is, so far as I know, his longest book, it is even longer than "Success," which was too long, and twice the length of "Power." In its construction it bears comparison with the building of the coral reefs by countless polyp secretions; the edifice stands, a polished, meticulous, and painstaking work of art—not of genius. It does not have the rush, the grand sweep, that sometimes a shorter novel, a short story, or even a pamphlet, written in white heat and in less detail, can convey. Mr. Feuchtwanger's campaign is a siege, not a Blitzkrieg.

His best medium has always been the historical novel. This book has two leading motifs, which are two actual events of recent history. The first is the well-known kidnapping of an anti-Nazi journalist; the second, the acquiring of a German refugee newspaper by Hitler agents for the purpose of destroying its influence against the Third Reich. The many lesser motifs—the intrigues of the Nazi functionaries against the refugees and against each other, and the domestic affairs, the plots, plans, hopes, loves, political opinions and cultural values of the Paris refugees themselves—are more or less closely linked to these two happenings. This gives a cohesive quality to the work that the author has not always so happily achieved.

A book of this sort—in which, incidentally, practically all the characters are intellectuals—is bound to be a sort of clearing-house for contemporary political, aesthetic, and other concepts. Theories ranging from ultra-left terrorism to right-wing Nazism, and all stops between, have their adherents in these pages, and if there is a declassed two-penny Villon here, so is there a youthful Gide and a Nazified Beaumarchais. But most of the transplanted Germans have their spiritual roots in the middle-class moral and cultural ideology of the nineteenth century. They feel almost as unassimilable in the modern democracies as in the totalitarian countries. One of them, a composer, says: "The old world isn't dead yet and the new world isn't born yet, and this is a horrible age of transition; it's really nothing but a horrible waiting-room." It is a good image.

It was suggested above that Mr. Feuchtwanger's literary crusade does not, so to speak, hit one between the eyes. As an indictment of Hitlerism it is effective by accretion, by the indefatigable piling up of factual material from the press and the underground opposition, by anecdote, comment, song, opinion, speech, and, of course, the story behind each emigrant's exile, voluntary or compulsory. The characters, if they have not been made warm and memorable, have been dissected with clinical dispassion by their creator so far as their mental processes are concerned. Convictions he respects, but no writer is better equipped to track down the true determinants of conviction, which may as easily be prejudice as wisdom. Perhaps his greatest skill, among so many, is this ability to uncover underlying motives and to pull apart the structure of rationalization man builds around his deeds and his thoughts.

DONALD MINOT YOUNG

Quick and Easy

TECHNIQUE OF ANALYTICAL PSYCHOTHERAPY. By Wilhelm Stekel. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. W. W. Norton and Company. $5.

IT HAS become the vogue of late to revise Freud, to streamline psychoanalysis, and to try to make it the equivalent of painless dentistry. If one demurs, one is accused of being a reactionary, of converting science into a religion, and of not being aware of the great social movements that are taking place.

Stekel is a better writer than some of the other revisers of Freud, and has fewer scruples about holding up extracted teeth to show to the startled public. He belongs in that earlier group who fought to make psychoanalysis something quick and easy, who broke away from the conscientious and systematic application of psychoanalytic principles many years ago. The present book was published in German in 1938, but the ideas contained in it have appeared in other publications by this author over a period of twenty years past. To his credit Stekel no longer calls his technique psychoanalysis, but he implies throughout his book that it really is psychoanalysis improved and made safe. Lest any hapless patient fall into the hands of an honest, "orthodox" psychoanalyst, he warns them in the preface that to do so is not only to run the risk of losing a great deal of time and money without any therapeutic result, but may even be the ruination of the individual's mental health—"an analytically inculcated infantilism and an analytically induced brooding-obsession may arise. . . . I have recorded alarming experiences. . . ."

To take Stekel more seriously than he deserves, one can only say that if he had actually contributed to the improvement of psychoanalysis by shortening the time required for psychoanalysis in a way which was convincing in its results, he should and would have presented it before scientific organizations in a position to evaluate his amazing claims. To offer to the public a book in which he threatens with dire consequences those who submit themselves to others than himself, and then to assure these same lay readers that he has devised a method for reducing the time and expense for

12 TUBE RADIO + RECORDER + RECORD PLAYER + P. A. AMPLIFIER

THAT'S THE NEW

LAFAYETTE

Radiocorder

☆

Custom Built

BY LAFAYETTE FOR ONLY

$159.50

☆

$15 BRINGS THE RADIOCORDER INTO YOUR HOME WITH OUR CONVENIENT PAYMENT PLAN

There's no end to the thrills Lafayette brings you in this amazing new Radiocorder. It has a brilliant 12 tube radio, a built-in record player—and it's equipped to make records! Not just records of your favorite radio programs. A real microphone and high fidelity record cutting head are standard equipment. You can make records of your own voice . . . the voices of children and friends. Come in and see this beautiful and versatile instrument today. The low price tells you how easy it is to own. Now discover how easy — and thrilling — it is to operate.

LAFAYETTE RADIOS

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

BRONX, N. Y....542 E. Fordham Rd.
JAMAICA, L. I. . 90-08 166th Street
CHICAGO, ILL. 901 W. Jackson Blvd.
NEWARK, N. J....24 Central Ave.
BOSTON, MASS. 110 Federal St.
ATLANTA, GA. 265 Peachtree St.

A Business Man's Vision of Justice

The Life of Joseph Fels

By MARY FELS

This book tells how a successful business man diagnosed the problem of modern civilization on the basis of laboratory experience providing farm colonies for unemployed workers in England. He found the path of charity beset by two obstacles: The "increment" value of land rose in the vicinity of his colonies, and the resulting high prices prevented the acquisition of adjoining areas; while at the same time, public authorities heavily taxed the farm equipment, housing, etc. And thus, through actual experience, without studying books on economics, Mr. Fels became convinced that both agriculture and business would greatly gain by the transfer of taxation from improvements, machinery, merchandise, etc., to the community-made value of both vacant and occupied ground in country and city alike. This vivid story gives a picture of the economic problem in a wholly new way.

$1.50, booksellers, or

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN & CO.

14 West 49th Street New York, N. Y.

such treatment by 90 per cent, and to support this with a mixture of shrewd and absurd comments on hundreds of intimate excerpts from lurid case histories of his own patients, will be regarded by some as not very far removed from charlatanry.

It should be added in fairness that if 90 per cent of this book is not only ethically but scientifically unacceptable, 10 per cent is intuitively wise and sound. This 10 per cent is scattered through the text and pops up at the most unexpected places. But to find and identify these spots is not worth the trouble of wading through the other 90 per cent.

KARL MENNINGER

"Will Raptly Magnipotent"

HARDY OF WESSEX. HIS LIFE AND LITERARY CAREER. By Carl J. Weber. Columbia University Press. $3.

"WHEN you're born you're done for," remarked Arnold Bennett, himself an example of the Unfulfilled Intention, and no Victorian felt the truth of this dictum more than Thomas Hardy. Mr. Weber's biography, avoiding both the caustic fancy of "Cakes and Ale" and the unrestrained circumspection of Mrs. Hardy's book, gives us the best recent study of this strange career. As an infant, Hardy was pronounced dead. Frail and small, he nevertheless survived, educated himself in an era where proper schooling was, if unedifying, indispensable, struggled painfully to write. Burdened as he was by the marks of this apprenticeship—a passion for polysyllables, an exaggerated respect for learning, a dubious affection for Shakespearean yokels and coincidence—Hardy steadily gained power as a novelist. With his genuine compassion, moreover, for the Tesses and Judes of this world, he just as steadily increased his attacks on the institutions which bound them down.

It is perhaps consoling to recall that once seduction was as difficult to establish as socialism, and Mr. Weber describes the Victorian distemper with a nice humor. He writes fine accounts of the religious ethics of the time, the domestic manners, the literary gossip, the editors, humanitarians, and ladies who demanded their "touch of sentiment"—a touch that was sometimes more like a knockout. It is indeed chiefly Mr. Weber's treatment of Hardy's marriage that one may question, for we are still left with the same perplexing questions which have become a horrid nightmare for the Hardy biographers. If the first Mrs. Hardy was in some respects an anchor for her husband, the anchor dragged the ship after it. In her wifely encouragement she was far from that noble womankind on whom Eustacia was a libel. "Ethelberta" was disliked by Mrs. Hardy because "there was too much about servants." What could she say about Tess, the unhappy milkmaid? And when Arabella came along as a "substantial female animal," Mrs. Hardy fled to the British Museum. Still, says Mr. Weber, there is "no ground for supposing" that Hardy wished his marriage dissolved. I, for one, can suppose acres. Yet if in this instance Mr. Weber's scholarly caution approaches the point of claustrophobia, he does elsewhere portray excellently the trials of Hardy—and his vitality.

For there is a curious sort of grandeur running through this saga of a low-class guy, bitten by a culture bug, frightening a nation, and being whipped down. The sickly infant lived to the age of eighty-seven, and this same dogged persistence illuminates all of Hardy's actions. Suffering with internal hemorrhages he finished "The Laodicean." When his public howled at his frankness, Hardy deleted, and put more into his next novel, and when at last, after "Jude," he gave up the fight, it was merely to transform this energy into his poetry. Whether by sheer effort he made himself a poet or not is still a question, but he was planning a new book for his eighty-eighth birthday. And the second Mrs. Hardy, whom he married at seventy-four, was in some ways so like his first wife that one almost suspects that here too Hardy was attempting to revise his earlier draft. Haunted by his heredity, harassed by his society, without the friendship, love, or children he wanted, Hardy may have believed, like his Clym, that life "was a thing to be put up with." Yet did he have to put up with quite so much of it? That blind, and to Hardy hostile, force of life which he hailed—in one of his inimitable bursts of rhetoric attracting us almost by their deformities—as the "all-urging Will raptly magnipotent" was surely subdued by this man who felt himself so defenseless before it.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

Cristóbal Colón

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS. Being the Life of the Very Magnificent Lord Don Cristóbal Colón. By Salvador de Madariaga. The Macmillan Company. $4.

"WHEN was he born? Where was he born? What was his name? Where did he study? Where had he traveled? What did he know? What was his plan?" As Mr. de Madariaga says, "over four hundred years of time and over four hundred volumes of research" have not removed the grounds for disagreement on these fairly elementary questions about "this mysterious man whose single spirit changed the course of history . . . doubled the size of man's physical world, widened his mental horizon beyond the wildest expectations of the age."

It is certain that the right name to call the discoverer is Cristóbal Colón. It is also certain, or nearly so, that he was the same person as one Cristoforo Colombo, born in or near Genoa. The ripe scholar, scientific historian, and experienced diplomat Don Salvador de Madariaga is not one to make downright, exclusive statements on controversial subjects. Nor is his solution entirely new. But he has marshaled the weight of circumstantial evidence with such a commanding combination of logic and imaginative insight—not to mention the powers of persuasion of which he is an acknowledged master—that he may be said to have "proved," unless positive evidence to the contrary is produced, that Colón was a Genoese of Spanish-Jewish origin.

The scholarship, though minute, is neither heavy nor dry. (It is odd, by the way, to meet "Alexandre de Humboldt" and have him quoted in French.) The man Colón is very much alive, and the story is told with literary ability. The maps, including the end papers, are really enlightening.

JAMES ORRICK

ART

Dove and the Independents

WYNDHAM LEWIS, that herald of the decline and fall of abstract art: would he consider abstract the new paintings composing the current Arthur Dove show? So one wonders, standing at An American Place among these somberly harmonious oils and brightly, freshly painted water colors. References to the natural world, what might be termed subject matter, quite elude the eye in its first glance at most of them. Sheer visual music appears prevailingly to meet it: capriciously moving patterns, of weird shapes and low tones —grays, buffs, rust-reds, emerald-greens, with a material density—which address the eye as ideally and as earnestly as do fugues and other absolute musical forms the ear. And one decides: if Mr. Lewis concluded that these inventions and caprices veritably are abstractions, would he not thus confess that after a brilliant career as the representative of that rarity, the Englishman who takes art seriously, he had lately and temporarily turned into the least bit of a Wyndhambag?

For the reason that the exhibition is the antithesis of the effete; superb and the perfect justification of those who long have been pointing to Dove's position among the major American artists. The paintings' forms are unusually complete this year; the sequences of shapes and colors unusually sustained. Passages of exquisite exploitation of the medium abound—passages in which pure pigment has been given a subtle and mysterious life and direction of its own by the brush stroke; for example, the section of interfused whites and browns in the canvas cryptically named U. S. There are rich tactile values, richly organized, as in Willows. For a first time, too, the tiny water colors are on a level equal to that of the larger oils. But in the end one judges that Mr. Lewis might well consider Dove's a watered abstractionism. As one surveys the patterns, references to the natural world emerge galore. We perceive the striped umbrella and the dunes in Beach; the dawn's early light in Morning; the shapes of waves and hills in What Harbor; those of clouds, bolts, and detonations in Thunderstorm. The truth of the matter is that these pictures give an appearance of deliberate abstraction only for the reason that Dove, in observing his beloved nature and seeing, as he says, "from one point in space to another," has found these points "drawn as any line around a thing to give the colored stuff of it, to weave the whole into a sequence of formations rather than to form an arrangement of facts."

Personally I have long felt the abstract and the representative equally acceptable, equally rooted in human experience. This opinion was fortified by the perusal of a page, in a book by the anthropologist Le Bon, describing the culture of two close-lying islands in the South Pacific. The level of culture in the islands appears to have been one; and in the first of them art was entirely abstract; in the second, entirely representative. The anthropologist merely forgot to state whether the religion in the former resembled Protestantism or Mohammedanism or Judaism, which discourage the use of graven images, and in the latter, Catholicism or Hinduism, which encourage it. As for Dove, it would seem, since classifications are unavoidable, that he had best be called a symbolist painter. His color and form possess an aura, an infinite, warm suggestivity: by its means he has imparted the implications of his whole-hearted, immediate, complex awareness of the soil and the comic, battered, and secret "souls" of those homely American spots he has profoundly made his own.

Quite conceivably, abstractionism may be in a decline, if only because of the word being passed about everywhere that it is dead. At this moment, one of those jury-free exhibitions to which everyone not undergoing a novel sends his paintings might be most revelatory of the patient's health. It might demonstrate the degree to which artists are favoring abstractionism or its opposite. Such an exhibition unfortunately the Independents' is not. True, this society, which was founded by Walter Pach, has been presided over by John Sloan for twenty-three years, and now is holding its twenty-fourth annual field-day at the American Fine Arts Association, has neither jury nor prizes and is entirely democratic. Only, some years ago its coterie of abstractionists seceded and with some foreign help proceeded to hold exhibitions of its own. A few abstractions figure in the current show: one of them, Bird-Beast, the bright little bronze by Marie W. Christopher, charms among the sculptural exhibits. But it is plain that the abstractionists represented constitute a mere rump. Thus we shall have to observe later exhibitions for this particular information, and gratefully accept from the Independents that which they best are qualified to give.

This, as always, is an awareness of still unrecognized talent. For its sake the exhibitions are visited by the gallery people. This year as always the talent is not readily discerned, since again a dusty haystack formed of innumerable instances of the amateur approach hides the needle of skill. At length one encounters it. One of its examples is the double portrait Krueger and Rabin by Hans Weingaertner. In the hard objectivist style, it none the less is built up architecturally and even rhythmically, and has a psychographic interest. Outstanding too is Below 14th Street by Lester J. Ambrose—because of the pattern made of geometric units and the tension created by the opposing inclinations of the buff areas in his canvas's upper and extreme lower reaches. The two pastorals by Caroline Sehlmeyer are touching in their quiet feeling, precious style, and delicate detail. There are other attractive paintings, among them The Source by Byron Brown, with its pungent color and elegant lady. Whether any of these objects are as original as the exhibits by better-known contributors—for example, the two fauve canvases by Milton Avery and the seal-like, not quite savory Gossip by Hugo Robus —is of course a question. Still, what is most important, they emerge and shine.

PAUL ROSENFELD

DRAMA

"MEDICINE SHOW" (New Yorker Theater) is a "living newspaper" originally written for production by the Federal Theater but now sponsored by private persons. Though somewhat less spectacular than "Power" and "One-Third of a Nation" it is forcefully conceived, and it demonstrates once more that the technique worked out for these expository performances is by far the most effective ever devised for using the stage purely as a lecturer's platform. That does not mean of course that the "living newspapers" are, in either purpose or effect, dramas in any accepted meaning of that word. They are not. Their nearest relation is the "documentary" film, and even the documentary film usually strives somewhat more persistently for pictorial effects than the "living newspapers" strive for anything except fact and argument. The subject of the present performance is public health, and it is presented largely through dialogue and tableau more or less after the manner of the "expressionistic" play. But it is frankly only the "message" that counts, for there is little concession to any audience demand for either entertainment or aesthetic pleasure.

Such a performance is limited in its appeal to those interested in its subject matter, and they are, no doubt, the very ones least likely to be ignorant of the facts presented. That there is a demand for "living newspapers" sufficient to pay for their production is still to be demonstrated. I am not even sure that, in view of the other media through which such facts and such arguments can be presented, there is any important function for them. But if the thing is to be done, I hardly see how it can be done more directly or more forcefully.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

SCHNABEL has continued to enrich the closing weeks of the season with unforgettable performances—at his second concert with the New Friends of Music Orchestra, and at his recital at the New York Y. M. H. A. His performances of Mozart's Concertos K. 467 and 482 with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy were not as impressive as the ones with the New Friends Orchestra under Stiedry. The Philadelphia is a superb instrument, but it can play only as well as it is conducted; and in these performances it was conducted by a heavy-handed and tasteless musician. This not only spoiled what the orchestra had to contribute to the works in outlines and textures, but affected Schnabel's playing, since he is unusually sensitive to what the orchestra does in a concerto.

At the Y. M. H. A. Schnabel began—and began not too well—with Bach; and after the Toccata in D, which he played best, came Schubert's early Sonata Opus 147—those opening measures which formerly had sounded to me like the young Schubert's other grandiose attempts at the grand manner, and which Schnabel now revealed as an opening fully equal in genuine and exciting power to those which Schubert contrived for some of his later sonatas. The characteristic Schubertian harmonic surprises in this passage had been no more than characteristic Schubertian harmonic surprises; now in each unexpected harmony, as it was placed by Schnabel in relation to its context, I was suddenly aware of Schubert's reason for it—its breath-taking expressive force. This was only the first of the revelations that Schnabel accomplished in this work; and they were followed by the wonders of revelatory phrasing that he accomplished in Mozart's Sonata K. 576 and Schubert's posthumous Sonata in A.

This recital was the concluding event in the Y. M. H. A.'s celebrity series; and I cannot imagine an artist, a program, and performances less suited to the audience of such a series, and vice-versa. It would be pleasant to think that such audiences, presented with artistic greatness, are deeply impressed; but actually Schnabel's revelations were accompanied by sounds of mystification and boredom from many who were present. And at his second concert with the New Friends in Carnegie Hall a capacity audience created a commotion beyond anything I have experienced at a concert of this caliber. Here the worst disturbance occurred in the seating of the audience: not only were people seated between movements of a work, but they continued to wander down aisles and seat themselves during the movements; and people who had previously wandered down aisles and taken possession of seats they were not entitled to had to be pried out of them. And all this, it turned out, happened because the New Friends engaged fewer than the normal number of ushers. This organization seems able to command any amount of newspaper space for publicity stories about its unique devotion to music—about how it offers its audiences great music, not celebrated performers; how it tells anyone who asks who is going to play next Sunday that Beethoven is going to be played; how it sells out its concerts to subscribers who come to listen to Beethoven and who listen in worshipful silence. But the facts are that from the very first the New Friends has announced not only lists of works but lists of performers—and for the most part big-name performers; that it has done so because otherwise nobody would have come to the concerts; that the only concert that was sold out this year was the one to which people came to hear Serkin play with Feuermann and Busch; that the audiences have been normal concert audiences, with the normal number of people who have been there because it was the place to be, and who have betrayed their boredom in the normal ways. Ordinarily one ignores publicity and considers only the concert; and if I discuss the publicity stories in this case it is because they have a connection with that second Carnegie Hall concert: the New Friends talks about how out of devotion to music it forbids encores and frowns on applause between movements, but it ruins a performance of a Mozart concerto to save $5 on ushers.

Among Victor's April releases is a set of Mozart's Requiem made by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society and Philadelphia Orchestra under Harl McDonald (M-649, $12). It is all right, and even admirable, for a college choral society to work up a performance of Mozart's Requiem with whatever resources it has and give the performance for the students and faculty and other interested persons. But to put such a performance on records; to give the permanence, the prominence, the authority of recording to a performance with what sound like student soloists—a wobbly soprano, a no more adequate alto and tenor, a baritone who cannot encompass the range of the bass part, and for whom this part must be rewritten in a way that robs it of its power (that eliminates, for example, the powerful wide leaps in the "Tuba mirum"); to make this the performance from which countless people are to derive their idea of the work—this is to betray an appalling lack of understanding or conscience.

Recording suggestion: If enough people make their interest known to Victor perhaps it will profit by Schnabel's presence in this country and have him record his performances of Schubert's Sonatas Opus 147 and Mozart's Sonata K. 576, and those extraordinary performances of Mozart concertos with the New Friends Orchestra.

B. H. HAGGIN

THE CHINA AID COUNCIL presents

"I am happy to be the head of the China Aid Council in its work of alleviating the suffering of the Chinese people."
—MRS. SARA DELANO ROOSEVELT,
Hon. Chairman

A Night of Nights for CHINA
STARS OF STAGE, SCREEN, DANCE and ENTERTAINMENT WORLD will appear

"I am delighted to participate. Night of Nights should receive whole-hearted public support."
—HELEN HAYES

CENTER Thea., RADIO CITY 49th St. & 6th Av. SUNDAY EVE., May 5

Tickets 50c., $1, $1.50, $2, $3 and $5—NO TAX—On sale at LeBlang-Gray's, 1476 B'way, cor. 42nd St.; Center Theatre Box Office May 4th and 5th, and China Aid Council, 200 Fifth Ave. Room 850, ALg. 4-0293. Proceeds Chinese War Orphans and Refugee Rehabilitation.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Letters to the Editors

Mr. Dewey's Methods

Dear Sirs: John Richmond's article on Thomas E. Dewey in The Nation of March 16 contains an amazing collection of misstatements. Mr. Richmond says that Mr. Dewey in securing his convictions used many devices "of a kind to disturb people who are vitally concerned with the preservation of civil liberties." He says that some of these devices "violated state law, others brushed aside the canons of professional ethics of the American Bar Association, and many were flagrant abuses of civil rights." These are serious charges; yet no supporting instances were cited—or could be. The argument is pure ipse dixit. The specific charges embodied in the author's cluster of supporting statements were thoroughly aired in our courts right up through the highest Appellate Court. All were specifically answered and exploded to the satisfaction of the judges. However, as one who was a part of the Dewey investigation, I am impelled to answer these statements, first pointing out that, naturally, every proper means was used to give the people militant representation.

No "phony grand-jury subpoenas" were used to bring in witnesses. If subpoenas open to legal attack had been used, some of the recalcitrant witnesses would have had them vacated. Of course, many persons were held under substantial bail as material witnesses. This was done on the basis of valid court orders. A prosecutor who allowed key witnesses to roam about, the prey of suborners of perjury and triggermen, would have been outrageously inhuman, as well as a faithless public servant. Material witnesses were not refused any "legal fee of $3 a day unless they testified favorably." Three dollars a day is a maximum fee which may be paid pursuant to court order, if the judge believes that the facts, including those bearing on the witness's indigence, warrant it. No one was held "incomunicado in the name of protective arrest." Attorneys are still familiar with the writ of habeas corpus. Similarly, defense attorneys could not be arbitrarily "forbidden to speak to witnesses." A serious problem was the impossibility of preventing defendants from frightening or bribing witnesses to stay out of the jurisdiction.

No reward was ever offered "for favorable testimony." On the contrary, all witnesses were searchingly cross-examined, and many were never called upon to testify because it was suspected that their testimony, though largely true, had been embroidered. Of course, many minor criminal figures—for example, prostitutes and madams in the Luciano case—were allowed to earn immunity from prosecution for their own relatively minor crimes by testifying before grand juries without signing waivers of immunity. The defense argument that this impaired their credibility was forcibly urged upon the trial juries—after the prosecution had frankly revealed the facts. The juries, to judge by their verdicts of guilty, apparently saw that important criminals can be convicted only on the testimony of their tools.

No searches or seizures were made without warrant. Subpoenas duces tecum were indeed issued, calling for the production of masses of books and records. They were carefully drawn and leaned over backward in their legality. The proof is the lack of success which attended motions to quash them in court.

In referring to Liberty's purchase from Cokey Flo and Mildred Harris, after the Luciano trial, of material based on their life experiences, Mr. Richmond makes a revelatory error. He says these women received compensation of $2,500 each. Actually they received $1,250 each. The question how much they received is not of any great importance. But the identical error is found in one of the inventive affidavits offered in support of Luciano's motion for a new trial, and nowhere else so far as I am aware. One wonders to what extent Mr. Richmond based all his statements on material cooked up by major criminals and terror-stricken minor figures—which has failed to impress any of our Appellate Courts.

BARENT TEN EYCK

New York, April 10

Rebuttal by Mr. Richmond

Dear Sirs: In reply to Mr. Ten Eyck I wish to say that my sources in some cases were the victims and their attorneys and in others the brief argued by Martin Conboy for Charles Luciano, defendant. Persons who had been served with grand-jury subpoenas have related how they rushed down to the grand-jury rooms and then were immediately taken to the D. A.'s headquarters and questioned. It was only later that they discovered there was no grand jury in session. The list of people called as witnesses in the Luciano trial indicates that those who did not testify favorably for the prosecutor did not receive any legal fee at all, regardless of their indigence. Innumerable prostitutes were jailed before this trial under inordinately high bail and refused permission to see friends or attorneys. The brief states that the defense attorney was refused access to the various persons held incomunicado on the pretext of their being material witnesses, though many of them never took the stand. In fact, the court even denied to the counsel of two women held by the prosecution the right to speak to them in the presence of the prosecutor, although there is no precedent for this kind of action.

Joe Bendix, one of the prosecutor's chief witnesses, testified during this trial that his wife was present in a restaurant with him in 1935 when he spoke to Luciano. As a matter of record, Mrs. Bendix at the period stated was in South America, and the jury was never informed of that fact. It was Mrs. Bendix whom the defense could not find when it wanted to place her on the stand, though the prosecutor, according to his later admission, had her available in the building at that time. It now appears, without contradiction, that while her husband was testifying—at the conclusion of which testimony the defense wished to confront him with his wife—Mrs. Bendix was in "the witness room behind the court," and that shortly thereafter she left the city but remained in touch with the prosecutor and available as a witness. The prosecutor not only failed to call her as a witness; he concealed her whereabouts from the defense counsel who wished to call her.

It is worth noting that Mr. Ten Eyck does not explain the document given to Mildred Balitzer, another principal witness in this case, by Mr. Dewey's assistant, Sol Gelb, witnessed by Frank T. Hogan, which stated that she would not be prosecuted for any offenses or crimes arising out of any testimony heretofore given by her to the grand jury or for any other previous offenses. The prosecutor admits that she testified falsely in this matter and offers an explanation which does not meet the important issue that the jury was permitted to weigh the testimony of this vital witness on the assumption that she was not influenced by any grant of immunity.

The question of illegal searches and seizures was definitely raised in the trial of Fritz Kuhn, and many lawyers assert that these devices have been resorted to even in less important cases.

I do not have to point out to Mr. Ten Eyck which of these practices violate laws of the land, which brush aside the canons of professional ethics of the American Bar Association, and which are flagrant abuses of civil rights, disturbing to people who are vitally concerned with the preservation of civil liberties.

JOHN RICHMOND

New York, April 15

Bertrand Russell and Benjamin Franklin

Dear Sirs: The statement of Bishop Manning and the opinion of Judge McGeehan in connection with the Bertrand Russell appointment have undoubtedly served to awaken fears in the minds of many parents with regard to the influence which the schools may have upon their children's morals.

I am the father of a sixteen-year-old daughter. She is of the same impressionable age as the daughter of Mrs. John Kay. The good Bishop and Judge McGeehan have made it clear that the influence of persons holding immoral views should be kept from the youth of this city.

At this moment the Board of Education is about to erect a new high school, which is to be one of the finest in the United States. This building, which is to be paid for with the taxpayers' money, is to be named in honor of a man who notoriously lived with women other than his wife, who had an illegitimate child by a woman whom he never subsequently married, who publicly acknowledged his illegitimate child, who wrote salaciously on matters of sex, and who entered into a marriage the legality of which was questioned at the time by the church and has always been in doubt because the prior death of the wife's former husband has not been established. This man wrote on the subject of sex in a manner which your magazine would not care to print. In almost any of his biographies can be found, for instance, a letter called "Advice to a Young Man on the Choice of a Mistress" which deals lucidly and lewdly with sex.

In matters of religion he was frequently in difficulties with the church. He described himself as a man who believed not in the forms of religion, but in the Golden Rule, and he was a defender and friend of Thomas Paine. This man's morals were as much out of tune with the church and mores of his times as are Bertrand Russell's today.

True, Benjamin Franklin, like Bertrand Russell, was also a scientist, mathematician, philosopher, and writer. But almost any biography which my daughter might obtain of Benjamin Franklin would disclose to her his immoral sex life and views. Surely, if the employment of Bertrand Russell as a teacher of philosophy is not permitted because of his views on sex, then the Board of Education should not be permitted to build a monument, with the taxpayers' money, to such a man as Benjamin Franklin.

It may be argued that the situation is different because Franklin is dead. But surely the good Bishop and the Judge would not countenance the city's naming a high school in honor of Bertrand Russell one hundred years from now, or in any case, in honor of a man who would have been barred from teaching in that school during his life because of his immoral views and practices. True, Franklin himself will not come in contact with the children, but the story of his life, as told by Carl Van Doren, Bernard Fay, Phillips Russell, and others, is only too easily available. Will not our children naturally seek to learn more about the man in whose honor their school is named and thereby be inspired to read these biographies and his own writings? Is this not exposing them to influences as pernicious as those from which the more righteous elements in our community sought to protect our youth by barring Bertrand Russell? Judge McGeehan, in granting the petition of Mrs. Kay, recognized this, as there was no claim that her daughter would have personal contact with Bertrand Russell at the College of the City of New York, since that school is conducted exclusively for men.

AN ANXIOUS FATHER

New York, April 18

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY

Each Week on the Newsstands

15c per copy

SUBSCRIPTION RATES

Special Introductory Offer

☐ 13 WEEKS $1.00

☐ ONE YEAR $5

☐ TWO YEARS $8

☐ THREE YEARS $11

THE NATION ■ 55 Fifth Ave. ■ New York
4-27-40

Enter subscription for period checked above.

I inclose $.........

Name..

Address..

....

Extra Postage: Canada 50c; Foreign $1

CONTRIBUTORS

MAURICE FELDMAN, at one time editor of Der Tag of Vienna, was on the staff of the Stockholm Tidningen for more than a year.

BERTRAM D. WOLFE has lived in Mexico intermittently over a period of eighteen years, his first article on that country having been published in The Nation in 1924. He is the author of "Portrait of Mexico" and "Diego Rivera: His Life and Times."

RUTH BRINDZE formerly contributed to The Nation a column called Facts for Consumers. She is the author of "How to Spend Money," "Not to Be Broadcast," and other books.

G. A. BORGESE, professor of Italian literature at the University of Chicago, is the author of "Goliath: The March of Fascism."

EDWARD LEVINSON, former labor editor of the New York Post and author of "I Break Strikes," is now director of publicity for the United Automobile Workers of America.

DONALD MINOT YOUNG has written for The Nation, the New Republic, and other magazines.

KARL MENNINGER is the author of "The Human Mind" and "Man Against Himself."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is idexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MAY 4, 1940 NUMBER 18

The Shape of Things

THE ALLIED FORCES WHICH LANDED NORTH and south of Trondheim in an attempt to pinch off the German garrison in that key city are now themselves between the pincers. Immensely aided by their superiority in the air, the Germans advanced rapidly through the long parallel valleys which lead north from Oslo without any serious check until they approached the vital railroad junctions of Stoeren and Dombaas. Meanwhile a British advance guard moving southward toward Trondheim was driven back at Steinkjer by a German column aided by warships operating in the Trondheim Fjord. At the time of writing the Nazi offensive is continuing, but at a slower pace as new Allied troops are reaching the front in large numbers. In London the government has been attacked for dispatching its expeditionary force with inadequate equipment. It is asserted in reply that it was necessary to land some troops hastily to cover the unloading of the main body. This task has been rendered difficult and dangerous by constant German attacks from the air, which have laid Namsos and other ports in ruins. The Allies have been handicapped by lack of air bases, but these are now being improvised, and German command of the air is no longer complete. It is clear, however, that the Germans have been able strongly to reinforce their army in Norway and at present have an edge both in men and material.

*

VON RIBBENTROP'S ATTEMPT TO DEFEND the Nazi invasion of Norway by accusing the British of harboring similar designs has hardly improved Germany's moral position before the world. There is considerable internal evidence that the documents presented in the White Book are forgeries. George Fielding Eliot, for example, has pointed out twelve ways in which the alleged "operation orders," said to have been found on a British officer captured near Lillehammer, depart from the style stipulated in the Field Service Regulations of the British Army. But establishment of the authenticity of the documents would not greatly aid the Nazi case. For while von Ribbentrop accuses the British of having planned by April 6 and 7 to send troops to Norway, it is evident that the German soldiers who were landed at Narvik were actually under way several days before this. The German charge, moreover, appears to fall down completely before the fact that a week actually elapsed after the German invasion before the first British troops were landed, and that these landings bore all the earmarks of hasty and inadequate preparation. Nothing is said in the White Book, it may be added, about a British threat to Denmark; yet the Nazi occupation of Denmark was obviously part of the same prearranged plan as the seizure of Norway.

*

JUSTICE MURPHY HAS MADE A FINE DEBUT on the Supreme Court by handing down two decisions upholding the right to picket. Only Justice McReynolds, last of the old tories, dissented. The Murphy decisions follow the historic precedent established in Justice Brandeis's decision in the Senn case. Brandeis held that picketing is a form of free speech and protected as such under the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment. Justice Murphy's first decision invalidated an Alabama anti-picketing law; his second, a Shasta County, California, anti-picketing ordinance. "Free discussion concerning the conditions in industry and the causes of labor disputes," Justice Murphy said for the court, "appears to us indispensable to the effective and intelligent use of the processes of popular government to shape the destiny of modern industrial society." The Shasta County decision will be a blow to the Associated Farmers, front in overalls for the Pacific Coast's big banks and railroads, which has sponsored anti-picketing legislation up and down the West Coast. Given a continuation of the court's present liberal phase, gentlemen in high hats will soon be gratefully exercising their right to picket—the Supreme Court.

*

HEARST HAS BEEN FRIENDLIER TO HITLER than has any other American publisher. That may or may not be the explanation of the incident to which Senator Pittman called attention on the floor of the Senate last week. The Senator made a speech on April 16 at Reno,

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

Nevada. On April 24 William K. Hutchinson, chief Washington correspondent for the Hearst chain, published a distorted version of the speech, presenting it as if it were an interview given him that day by Senator Pittman. Hutchinson quoted Pittman as saying that the Allies must drive the German army out of Norway within thirty days or face the inevitable loss of the war. Since the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was involved, the supposed statement created a situation here and abroad, and no doubt was read with comfort in Berlin. But the text of the speech actually made by Senator Pittman is quite different from the "interview" published in the Hearst press. Pittman said that if the Allies failed to drive the Germans out of Norway, "Sweden would inevitably be next." If Sweden were also conquered, the Balkans would probably be frightened into submission to Hitler. In that event, he said, victory by France and Britain "would be very difficult, if not impossible." But he went on to say that he was "of the opinion that the German forces will be driven out of Norway within thirty days." This was left out of the Hearst story. No doubt it was also omitted in the Völkischer Beobachter.

*

ALTHOUGH BUSINESS INDICES ARE ONLY slightly higher than last year, the first quarter of 1940 was unusually profitable for American industry. The first 250 corporations to report for the quarter had combined earnings 50 per cent above those of the same period of 1939. Excluding the American Telephone and Telegraph—which is little affected by short-term fluctuations—the gain was 60 per cent. In part, this showing is due to direct and indirect effects of the war. Airplane manufactures are not included in the summary, but it is known that the export of planes showed a 225 per cent increase over the corresponding period of 1939. Exports as a whole were up 50 per cent, and were the largest for any quarter since 1930. But the profit gains were not confined to the war industries. General Motors Corporation had the second-best first quarter in its history. The railroads showed a 124 per cent increase in earnings, and the oil companies—despite reduced exports—quadrupled their profits of a year ago. In contrast to this sharp rise in industrial earnings, total wages and salaries for the period rose only 4½ per cent. Such a lag in wages, which is typical of boom periods, invariably lays the basis for future difficulties.

*

THE DECLINE IN STEEL OUTPUT WHICH SET in at the beginning of the year seems to have been halted, and the industry is now maintaining an operations rate of around 60 per cent of capacity. This compares unfavorably with the near 100 per cent figure of late 1939, but nevertheless steel companies have experienced quite a profitable first quarter. Stockholders of Bethlehem Steel, which on an average production equal to 87.4 per cent from January to March earned profits of over $3 per share, certainly have every reason for feeling confident. But although its prospects are far brighter than a year ago, the steel industry has recently experienced a short though sharp attack of price-cutting jitters. On April 12 United States Steel announced a reduction in flat rolled-steel quotations of $4 a ton in order to meet competition by independents who had offered price concessions in hope of obtaining a large order from an automobile manufacturer. Steel price wars in recent years have all started in sheets, for which the motor industry is the chief outlet, and in steel circles there is sometimes dark talk of the big automobile companies misusing their strong bargaining positions. A better explanation may be that competition in this line has been fostered by the reduction in sheet costs following the widespread installation of continuous rolling mills. If, as a result, profit margins on this product are unduly high, some mills are naturally tempted to cut prices in order to maintain volume. On any theory of private enterprise, however, this is the correct consequence of technological progress. We regret, therefore, that in this instance the industry's united front has been restored and the cuts rescinded.

*

BRITAIN'S WAR BUDGET FOR THE PRESENT fiscal year is well calculated to intensify the isolationist sentiments which, pace the Daily Worker, are rampant in Wall Street. But in London the criticism made by members of all parties is that it provides for too little expenditure and not sufficiently severe taxation. Germany, it is being said, is spending at least a third more than Britain, and if the Nazis are to be defeated, the government must be ready to implement the national effort with at least as great a proportion of the country's resources. In some quarters disappointment was expressed at Chancellor of the Exchequer Simon's refusal to adopt J. M. Keynes's scheme for compulsory savings, which is discussed in a review on page 571. The budget, however, is designed to reduce general consumption and promote savings which are needed to finance the huge war loans which it foreshadowed. Taxes on liquor, beer, tobacco, and matches, already steep, are hoisted still farther. Postage, telephone, and telegraph charges are sharply increased. Further, an entirely new tax on wholesale transactions, except in food and certain other articles already subject to heavy imposts, is to come into effect shortly. All these indirect levies will fall with particular severity on people with small incomes. Direct taxes were jumped last September, and income-tax rates have not been raised farther. But the level at which surtax becomes payable has been lowered from $8,000 to $6,000. The chief innovation affecting the higher brackets, however, is a prohibition of corporation melon-cutting and a ban on dividend increases. This provision is calculated to add to the liquid resources of firms profiting from war contracts, and their enforced savings are intended to flow into war loans.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

* * *

FORTUNATELY THE SENATE HAS RESTORED the funds, lopped off by the House, for continuance of the Division of Economic Research of the National Labor Relations Board, but the vicious drive against David Saposs, who directs the division, is still going on. Mr. Saposs is charged with being a Communist. The irony is that he is so far from having any sympathy with the Communist Party that he has long been anathema to that group; so much so that the party and its fellow-travelers have done their worst to discredit and get rid of a man whose scholarship and integrity and competence are beyond question. Mr. Saposs therefore has the distinction of being hated by both the N. A. M. and the Communist Party. He also has the distinction of having contributed enormously to the usefulness of the board; the careful work done in his division has undoubtedly played a large part in bringing about that long line of victories the board has won in the Supreme Court. Neither his colleagues nor the public can afford to lose his expert services.

* * *

WHILE THE ATTACK ON BERTRAND RUSSELL has revealed very little about his real views, it has been illuminating in other ways. Take the performance of the press. The record, we are glad to report, is not all black. The tory Herald Tribune, which takes civil liberty seriously, sharply criticized the McGeehan verdict. So did the liberal Post and the unpredictable Daily News, which commented late but vigorously. There, however, the good news ends. The Hearst papers—the Journal-American and the Mirror—formed the journalistic spearhead of the attack on Russell, using more than their customary quota of large caps. The more dignified Sun echoed the same view in better-modulated sentences. And the once-liberal Scripps-Howard World-Telegram could only see "a lack of higher educational tact" in the whole affair. It remained for the Times, however, to provide the element of suspense. The attack on Russell began early in March; the McGeehan decision came on March 30. The Times talked of many things, editorially, but not of Bertrand Russell. The first reference to the case occurred in an editorial on another subject, and it was non-committal. Finally, on April 20, when most people had abandoned all hope, the Times broke its silence by publishing an editorial called The Russell Case. It was a caricature even of a Times editorial. The McGeehan verdict, said the Times, was "dangerously broad"; but (on the other hand) "Mr. Russell himself should have had the wisdom to withdraw from the appointment as soon as its harmful results were apparent." To which Mr. Russell has now replied, in words equally calm but pointed, that "however wise such an action might have been from a personal point of view, it would also, in my judgment, have been cowardly and selfish." The sentence, inadvertently, reads like a description of the Times's policy in the Russell case.

* * *

THE AMERICAN NEWSPAPER GUILD HAS WON its most significant victory in the settlement of the seventeen-months-old strike against Hearst in Chicago. No strike in the history of white-collar labor approaches this one in duration or bitterness. Starting late in 1938 as a protest against the discharge of several Guild members, it soon became symbolic of labor's struggle against Hearst's feudal policies. The Guild's fight was made incomparably more difficult when Hearst consolidated his two Chicago papers last August. It was also hampered by a virtual boycott of news regarding the strike by the remaining Chicago newspapers. In view of the handicaps under which the Guild labored, the settlement is an amazingly good one. The Chicago Evening American has agreed to reinstate 115 of the 167 remaining active strikers, including eight Guild members whose dismissal prior to the strike was a factor in bringing about the struggle. Included also are some of the employees of the defunct Herald-Examiner. The 52 strikers who have not been reinstated are to receive a total of $24,000 in severance pay. The new contract provides some salary increases and recognition of the Guild as partial bargaining agent pending an election to determine the sole agent.

* * *

SINCE MR. SHRIDHARANI SUBMITTED THE article on India which appears elsewhere in this issue Gandhi is reported to have decided that the time is not ripe for a civil-disobedience campaign, that he will do nothing to embarrass the British "at a time when it is a question of life and death for them." It is possible that Gandhi has suddenly been reconverted to a policy of inaction, despite the steps just taken, with his approval, by the Working Committee of the Congress to prepare the people of India for non-violent direct action, or satyagraha. But we are skeptical. We recall the role of the British censors in India a year or so ago when Gandhi was quoted as saying, in effect: "If ever there was a righteous war, it would be a war against Hitler." All that the censors omitted was Gandhi's conclusion: "But there never was a righteous war." There may well be, as Mr. Shridharani suggests, a delay of some months in launching satyagraha, but unless all signs are strangely misleading he would appear to be right in reporting that the die is cast and that civil disobedience is on the way.

Mussolini's Margin

MUSSOLINI'S campaign to sell participation in the war to the Italian people is now in full blast. Day after day speeches and editorials harp on the inevitability of Italy's taking part in the battle. Continued neutrality, declared the newspaper Stampa on April 28, would mean renunciation "of the role of a great imperial power"; Italy, said Count Grandi last week, "cannot be on the margin of this conflict between peoples."

The well-known distaste of multitudes of Italians for fighting German battles is being countered by emphasis on the point that the war is bound to result in a wide redistribution of territory and influence, and should Italy stay too long on the fence, it might fail to collect. As Blackshirt in the Resto del Carlino puts it: "If we enter the conflict, we shall not fight for Germany but at the side of Germany, just as Germany is not fighting for Italy but for its own sacred national interests." There is no mention of entering the war on the Allied side except for scornful repudiation of supposed French hopes of another 1915. Nor is this suprising, for the spoils Il Duce has in view are, to a considerable extent, segments of the British and French empires. Moreover, Mussolini is no doubt anxious about the effect of a Nazi overthrow on the fortunes of his own regime. Dictators hang together, and it would be unwise for one to assist at the execution of another.

This does not mean, of course, that the Italian government would run to the rescue of a Germany that looked like being defeated. Its increasing bellicosity suggests a conviction that the odds on a Nazi victory have risen sharply. Perhaps if the invasion of Norway had proceeded as smoothly as did the occupation of Denmark, and if Germany were now safely intrenched in the Scandinavian Peninsula ready to loose its aerial armada against Britain, Mussolini would have burned his bridges already. But he must be sure not merely of an Allied defeat but of a quick decision, for Italy is ill-placed to carry the burden of a prolonged war.

In view of this time element, Italy's emergence as a full-fledged belligerent may be postponed. But complete inaction is eroding to prestige, particularly after recent Roman bravura, and the possibility of an Italian attempt to stake out a new claim by undertaking a war within a war must be considered. Stalin's success in just such an adventure in Finland is an encouraging example. If Mussolini should follow suit, the likeliest victim is Yugoslavia, whose Dalmatian coast has long been coveted in Rome. Yugoslavia has no guaranty from the Allied powers, and in any case is geographically cut off from effective military assistance. Italy could pick a quarrel with this weaker neighbor with a fair prospect of not becoming involved in the larger and more dangerous conflict. It is an adventure which Hitler might well bless, while officially adopting a disinterested attitude. Germany has been getting a large volume of goods from Yugoslavia, but Allied economic influence is sufficiently strong there to prevent complete Nazi domination. The seizure of the country by its axis partner would be a useful service, and one calculated to insure the subservience of the other Balkan countries.

News from Belgrade suggests that Yugoslavia fears a coup of some kind. It has recently taken strong measures against its fifth columnists, who have connections in Rome as well as in Berlin, and it has protested against violations of its territory by German and Italian aircraft. The most sinister development, however, is the alleged distribution by Slovenian Nationalists of a manifesto attacking Germany and Italy and demanding the "restitution" to Yugoslavia of Trieste, Istria, and Carinthia. The world first received news of this document when it was made the subject of an indignant article in the Giornale d'Italia. Almost immediately an anti-Yugoslav demonstration was staged in Florence with the open approval of the authorities, while the Italian press broke out in a rash of warnings against Allied "intriguers" in the Balkans. The Slovenian manifesto may or may not be authentic and in either case may seem too insignificant to cause a serious rupture between two countries. But if Mussolini hesitates to settle accounts with Yugoslavia, it will not be for want of a strong pretext—that did not deter him in the case of Albania. It will be rather because he knows such a war would be more than a walkover and considers that the risk of starting a general conflagration in the Balkans is too great. We may not have to wait long for his decision, which will be made with one eye on Norway, the other on Moscow.

The "Front" on Trial

THE Christian Front trial opened four weeks ago with spectacular advance notices. It is proceeding like a slow-motion drama with the principal characters unaccountably missing. In some ways the script seems to have been edited by the Legion of Decency; only twice has the name of Charles E. Coughlin evaded the censors. If the story unfolded thus far seems fragmentary and anti-climactic, it nevertheless contains some lurid episodes and some memorable lines. The real question is what the story will ultimately reveal about anti-democratic legions in America. That has not been answered.

The bulk of the prosecution's case, as presented to date, rests on the testimony of informers employed by the FBI and a confession by one of the defendants. While details may be apocryphal, the prosecution's case is a plausible one. The defendants, it is asserted, were the fighting corps of the Christian Front. Their ranks included skilled revolutionists, fascist model, and small-time imitators. They boasted of valuable links in high places generally and in the National Guard particularly. They stole ammunition from armories. They manufactured bombs in secret hideaways. And they talked incessantly of "Der Tag." It was wild and grandiose talk, but it had some immediate relevance. Among other things, it is charged, they planned to bomb the offices of Communist and so-called Communist organizations. They anticipated that the Communists would fight back. In either case the Christian Front was prepared to save the republic from "communism."

The plot is a replica of events that have happened elsewhere in our time. Only the naive will be astonished that men talked this way and planned these acts. But assuming that the burden of the testimony thus far is valid, what is its large significance? A small group of men were conspiring to commit acts of violence and to initiate a reign of disorder. They were also dreaming of wholesale insurrection. But did they represent a "clear and present danger" to democratic survival? As sixteen men they did not. Even as sixteen well-armed, audacious men they did not. As such they were political gangsters, and we have adequate laws for dealing with gangsterism. What remains to be shown is that the government was justified in holding a treason trial, as well as in prosecuting them on specific counts. The most important clue is the belated testimony that Coughlin himself appointed John F. Cassidy, one of the principal defendants, to his Christian Front posts. This fact is not news; its introduction at the trial is. Will the clue be followed? Were there other higher-ups involved? To what degree has the Front penetrated the National Guard? One National Guard officer is among the defendants; what about the others who, one witness has said, were covertly aiding? Without knowing the answer to these questions we cannot answer the basic one: How dangerous is the Christian Front? And without the answer to that question we cannot determine what counter-measures are necessary.

In this connection the role of the FBI itself deserves exploration. Obviously this plot did not originate in a G-man's mind, as the defense has hinted. But it also seems clear that the FBI agents did a good deal to encourage the plotters; one admittedly bought them ammunition with FBI funds. The line between espionage and provocation is always obscure. Provocation is plainly intolerable. Do we want espionage of that sort at all, with G-men filtering into the ranks of every organization suspected by the FBI? The "Trojan horse" is a powerful weapon, and the fascists know how to use it. But there is a parallel danger, as Mrs. Roosevelt warned last week, that "in our anxiety we may do away with some of our basic liberties." Large-scale infiltration of FBI men into private organizations may be one of the methods of self-destruction.

Democracy is walking a tight rope. In dealing with its enemies it must truly appraise their strength; exposure is a form of defense. The value of the Christian Front trial lies in the picture it offers of democracy's foes. The greatest danger is that it will intensify hysteria and thereby conceal the truth we need to know. The government has made broad and sweeping charges, but the case is being prosecuted along narrow lines. And its net result may be to make martyrs of a band of terrorists while their more dangerous leaders remain hidden.

The Ford Reich

Labor-union organizations are the worst thing that ever struck the earth because they take away a man's independence.—From "Ford Gives Viewpoint on Labor," a booklet distributed in Ford plants.

IN JUNE, 1937, "Fats" Perry, then a trusted employee of the Ford plant at Dallas, was assigned to special work of a confidential, and strenuous, nature. On the twenty-third he informed his superiors that two C. I. O. organizers were on their way from Kansas City. A few hours later two representatives of the United Automobile Workers of America arrived in town and went to a drugstore near the plant frequented by Ford workers. Several Ford workers introduced themselves. Three of them were stool pigeons, and one hurried across to the plant to report the presence of the organizers. Another sought out "Fats" Perry. "I walked over there," Perry later testified at the Labor Board hearing, "and one of the boys says, 'There they stand back there' . . . I heard them say something about Kansas City. I walked up and listened a few minutes . . . and I said, 'Who was talking so much about Kansas City?' He says, 'I was talking to some of my friends.' I said, 'You are a union organizer, aren't you?' He said, 'If you call it that.' He says, 'I am trying to line some of the boys up.' I said, 'You line up out of that door before I throw you out.' "

One of the organizers, after being knocked down by the 226-pound "Fats" Perry, managed to escape. The other, a small man, was knocked down and carried out to a waiting car. "An unidentified man in a Ford Motor Company official car," according to the NLRB trial examiner's report, "drove up and told the group who had Guempelein [the organizer] to take him down by the schoolhouse and 'beat hell out of him.' " They did.

Perry had a squad of beefy fellows, most of whom had been members of the Ford plant's champion tug-of-war team. They were paid regular wages but assigned special work. They kept their ears open. They "made the rounds of cafes, domino parlors, barber shops, and similar places in the outlying districts of Dallas." They were equipped with "persuaders"—blackjacks, pistols, whips, lengths of hose. When not in use these "persuaders," according to the trial examiner, were kept in the desk of the man who was head of the Ford service department in Dallas. The word "service" has interesting connotations in a Ford plant.

On July 3 Baron De Louis, the U. A. W. A. organizer from Kansas City who had managed to escape from Perry and his helpers in the encounter of June 23, returned to Dallas. Through a friend in Dallas, De Louis arranged an appointment with a Ford employee. The employee at once notified the Ford office of the meeting. Perry's service squad was on hand and administered another beating. The squad was kept very busy that July. "On one occasion in mid-July," according to the trial examiner's findings, "Rutland [general body foreman at the Dallas plant] received word that two of the company employees had made some pro-union remarks while on a fishing trip. . . . He arranged to have them kidnapped by the strong-arm squad, taken into the country, questioned, and dealt with by that group." On another occasion in July several men suspected of union sympathies were ambushed at the home of a stool pigeon and beaten. On July 10 every member of the "service" squad was given a picture of W. J. Houston, Dallas attorney, who had acted for the U. A. W. A. An organized search for him was begun. He was located in a drugstore, where he was having a cup of coffee with a friend. One member of the group engaged him in conversation while the others assembled at the soda fountain. As Houston started to leave, he was attacked, knocked down, and severely beaten before police arrived. "Fats" Perry testified that Rutland was pleased. "He [Rutland] said, 'I heard you picked up Mr. Houston down there.' I said, 'Yes, they picked him up and like to beat him to death.' He said, 'That is a good job then. Maybe that will learn him to listen.' "

The service squad was thorough. On August 2 an assistant foreman from the Kansas City plant was in Dallas on a vacation trip. He visited the Dallas office. When he came out, he found Perry and his subordinates waiting for him. They took him for a ride. He succeeded in proving that he was a foreman and anti-union. Perry then drove him back to town, "shook hands . . . and wished him well." A traveling salesman who had expressed sympathy for the union had a brother, an identical twin. He was beaten so badly on August 4, 1937, that he never recovered his health. He died of pneumonia a few months later. The squad did not confine its activities to the automobile industry. On August 6 or 7, according to the findings of the trial examiner, the general body foreman at Dallas called Perry in and told him "he had received a call from the City Hall police station, telling him that there was a union organizer in town who had been giving them trouble. . . ." The organizer was George Baer, an official of the United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers. Some of the boys picked Baer up outside a millinery house, knocked him unconscious, took him to the outskirts of town, and beat him up. When Perry arrived, "they greeted Perry with the statement that Baer was . . . 'in pretty bad shape. You better come look at him.' . . . They found Earl Johnson [one of the "service" men] sitting on Baer on the floor of the car, with one knee in his stomach and the other on his head. Baer's eye had been knocked out of its socket. Blood covered his face, his nose was smashed, his head was bleeding, and his teeth had been knocked out." Perry testified, "I said, 'Well, you better get rid of him. You better put him somewhere.' And Buster Bevill suggested, 'Let's take the son of a bitch down and throw him in the river.' I said, 'No, we couldn't do that.' So we drove down the highway a ways and drove up in a field and throwed him out."

These were some of the methods used by the Ford Motor Company to encourage workers in Dallas to do their bargaining individually. The facts set down here are taken from the record of hearings before the National Labor Relations Board of the Sixteenth Region.

"American White Paper"

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE other night at a dinner in New York the chairman, Jay Allen, was admiringly described by a speaker as "the foreign correspondents' foreign correspondent." None of their fellow-journalists, I am afraid, will call Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner "the Washington correspondents' Washington correspondents." On the contrary, the authors of "American White Paper" (Simon and Schuster, $1) have been solemnly rebuked by at least one of their colleagues for telling tales out of the White House, a misdemeanor which is peculiarly annoying because so few are able to get away with it. One can understand his feelings. It is as clear as light that Messrs. Alsop and Kintner have obtained a surprising amount of information in the highest quarters; their story of American foreign policy in the making combines the flavor of breezy personal narrative with the solid substance of authenticated fact and documentation. They may not have been under the President's bed when he talked to Bill Bullitt in Paris on the dark morning of September 1, 1939, but it is at least possible that they had the words of the quoted conversation from one of the two men on the wire. Even if they used their imagination in framing those particular sentences, other "inside" facts bear sure marks of authority. Someone in the State Department—and internal evidence suggests that A. A. Berle, Jr., may be the man—must have constituted himself a research assistant to these two talented and prying reporters. In addition, they apparently talked to everyone else worth pumping, read public records and private correspondence, listened to first-hand reports of conferences and Cabinet meetings, and even examined the personal habits and accustomed haunts of the principal actors. The result is a brilliantly convincing narrative, and no matter how much official tutoring they received, the authors of "American White Paper" must be credited with a remarkable scoop. It takes journalistic virtuosity to become the chosen recipients of important exclusive material.

The authors call their book "an experiment in contemporary history." I should prefer to describe it as an example of delayed journalism. As history it is fresh and stimulating and useful. But the material should not have been allowed to become history; most of it should have been told day by day in the press and on the air. If members of the government had given out the news as it happened, they would have spoiled a good book; but they would have created an informed public. The narrative of Mr. Alsop and Mr. Kintner makes this point amply plain.

Time after time, as the record reveals, an important line of policy was suggested or inadvertently revealed and then left to the mercy of public speculation and political attack. This happened when the President made his "quarantine" speech at Chicago, when a plane crash disclosed the presence of a French air mission negotiating for American bombers, when the President framed his various peace messages to the dictators. On none of these occasions was the American people—or even the Congress—told by those who knew the full details just what was going on in Europe and just what course the Administration planned to take. The people and their representatives were left in a state of uneasy ignorance that led directly to the defeat of important policies, including, particularly, the effort to lift the arms embargo last spring. People didn't believe war would really come; Europe had cried "Wolf" plenty of times, and America was skeptical. Embargo repeal was defeated in committee by one vote, and the President's subsequent White House meeting of Senate leaders offered final evidence of the failure of the Administration's policy. Borah, announcing his belief, based on his "own sources of information," that there would be no war, ended the hope of Congressional action. The Administration went on preparing for the war it knew was imminent. But it prepared in a political vacuum of its own making.

This gap between the people and their rulers is the less excusable because the Administration has had little to conceal. Its policy since Munich has been honest, fairly consistent, and in general accord with popular sentiment. It has made mistakes—though none since Munich can equal the tragic and unforgettable blunder of its policy in Spain—but it has not made the mistakes attributed to it by isolationist critics. No one reading the record in "American White Paper" can seriously believe that the President and his advisers harbor sinister intentions of "putting the United States into the war." Privately as publicly, Mr. Roosevelt has insisted that under no circumstances would an American army be sent abroad. The authors believe that if the alternative were a Nazi victory, the President might favor limited military aid—ships and planes, perhaps, to supplement arms and money. This is their guess, based on a knowledge of his mind rather than on the record. But at the same time they convincingly show that his steady desire and effort are to avoid the final desperate choice. In "American White Paper" we see the members of the Administration going about this task seriously and intelligently. The record of their effort is reassuring rather than sensational. But the reassurance comes late; much fear and suspicion and bad blood would have been spared if the heads of the government had more fully informed the public to which they must look for support and the Congress which must translate policy into law.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 553

EDITORIALS:

MUSSOLINI'S MARGIN 556
THE "FRONT" ON TRIAL 556
THE FORD REICH 557
"AMERICAN WHITE PAPER" by Freda Kirchwey 558
BIG NAVY FOR WHAT? by George T. Davis 560
SUDDEN DEATH UNDERGROUND by Rose M. Stein 562
GANDHI HAS DECIDED by Krishnalal Shridharani 564
THE BRITISH FASCIST CASE by Robert Dell 566
IN THE WIND 568
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 569

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 570
THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES . . . by Keith Hutchison 571
"AH, LANGUAGE LIKE A LANDSLIDE" by Morton Dauwen Zabel 572
BLACK CHRONICLE by Avrahm Yarmolinsky 573
LINCOLN'S PROSE by Louis Kronenberger 574
NAZISM, INC. by William Gilmore 574
MR. ADLER'S TEXTBOOK by James Orrick 575
IN BRIEF 577
DRAMA by Joseph Wood Krutch 577
ART: PERSIA'S 6,000 YEARS by Jerome Mellquist 577
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 578

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Big Navy for What?

BY GEORGE T. DAVIS

ON APRIL 18 the Senate passed a bill appropriating $963,797,478 for the Navy Department in the fiscal year 1941. This is the largest outlay since the World War program was suspended. It provides funds for starting two 45,000-ton battleships, one aircraft carrier, two cruisers, eight destroyers, and six submarines, for the completion of eighteen ships now building, and for the purchase of 471 fighting airplanes. The new ships are part of the naval program inaugurated by the Naval Expansion Acts of 1934 and 1938, the first authorizing the construction of a navy at treaty parity with Great Britain, and the second an increase of 25 per cent in treaty tonnage. The fever chart of a world progressing from one crisis to another has aroused both popular and Congressional support for President Roosevelt's dynamic naval policy.

Simultaneously with the passage of the 1941 appropriation bill, the Senate Naval Affairs Committee began hearings upon an additional expansion program calling for an 11 per cent increase in tonnage which will cost about $655,000,000. The overture for the hearings was the alarmist account in the New York Times on April 14 of a mighty armada of 45,000-ton super-dreadnaughts which Japan was secretly building. The appearance of such a news item could have been forecast, for such reports traditionally precede the introduction of naval bills.

In the past half-century the American navy has been transformed from a collection of antiquated ships to a fleet on a par with that of the mistress of the seas. After the Spanish War a navy second only to the British became our objective. During the World War the concept of equality with the British began to take form. At the Washington conference in 1921 the United States obtained parity in fighting power of capital ships, though actual equality in battleship tonnage was not to be reached until 1942. At the London conference of 1930 Great Britain conceded parity in all classes. The treaties governing naval limitation are dead, but the principle of parity remains alive, and in recent years British statesmen have even looked with favor upon America's determination to maintain its equal rank. Such approval, from an empire which has considered control of the seas its most cherished tradition, must be recognized as of profound importance. And in the light of our own traditions, the decision to maintain a navy of first rank is no less significant. As yet Americans have not adequately appraised the meaning of our changed naval ranking or considered the consequences that are likely to follow.

It has been no easy matter to persuade a people conditioned by ample Lebensraum and isolation to accept the cost of great sea power. But twenty-two of the forty-eight states, many of our great cities, and a considerable percentage of our population are located along the seacoast, and to them in particular big-navy advocates can make a powerful appeal. Before the turn of the century only Europe had to be watched, and in spite of a good deal of talk in Congress and the press about invasion, our statesmen knew that only Great Britain could seriously threaten us; they also knew that the exposed Canadian flank provided an adequate means of countering that threat. The Spanish War changed the whole picture. We extended our frontier to Asia. Our colonial acquisitions liberated the American people from isolationist views which had confined naval policy to the domination of our coastal waters. Even the man on the street could understand that only sea power can guard colonies. In the name of the "white man's burden" and the new imperialism, it became possible to obtain popular sanction for the building of a deep-sea navy.

Our own entrance upon the world's stage was paralleled by the appearance of Japan and Germany, each also aspiring to naval power, world trade, and colonies. When Japan registered a strong remonstrance over the annexation of Hawaii, our naval experts marked it as the country whose naval strength would have to be the measure of our own sea power in the Pacific. The golden age of Japanese-American relations began to decline. In 1900 Germany announced that by 1916 it planned to have the second ranking fleet, one "so strong that even for the adversary with the greatest sea power a war would involve such dangers as to imperil its position in the world." We had set our mind upon the same rank. The world marked well the Anglo-German naval race in the pre-war years. Less conspicuous, less intense, but no less significant for America's foreign relations, was the parallel German-American naval competition for second place. Neither Germany nor Japan had a weak flank, like Canada, affording us the opportunity to exert counterpressure in a diplomatic crisis. It became the policy of the United States therefore "not to allow itself to be surpassed in naval power by any nation maintaining a great standing army." Our people might still talk isolation, but in naval affairs isolation was ended.

Some American naval advocates urged that America's place in the world could be secured only by a two-ocean navy, the equal of the German and Japanese fleets. Less impetuous individuals refused to countenance this proposal. They found the Anglo-Japanese alliance an effective barrier to the establishment of a German-Japanese entente capable of applying simultaneous pressure on both our oceanic fronts. In spite of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, there was never serious fear that England would join Japan in such a maneuver. Our experts, particularly Mahan, found comfort in British sea power and wanted Britain's supremacy over Germany maintained at all costs; in their opinion the British fleet had become America's first line of defense against unfavorable developments in both oceans. During the World War there were fears that this line would not hold and that a German victory might bring Germany and Japan into collaboration on a grand scale and perhaps even win Russia to an agreement with them. These calculations resulted in the naval acts of 1916 and 1918, which would have provided the United States with the largest fleet in the world.

Burlingame, Cal.

At the Washington conference this objective was laid aside in return for diplomatic concessions—the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance and a Japanese retreat in Asia. The United States discarded the hulls and blueprints of a powerful armada, but it affirmed policies which have since become permanent: that the political and naval agreements at Washington should remain bound together, and that only a navy at parity with Great Britain in all categories and superior to that of Japan in the ratio of five to three would provide security for its homeland, outlying possessions, and world trade. These ratios, however, the United States did not maintain, and today it is building at a furious pace to achieve them.

For the possibility of a German-Russian-Japanese collaboration has reappeared. If Stalin and Hitler could join hands, a Russo-Japanese rapprochement does not seem impossible. Remembering the surrender of the German fleet at Scapa Flow, navy men are fearful that an Allied defeat might result in the transfer of British and French sea power to the victors. They believe that only the victory of the Allies can prevent the appearance of two powerful hostile fleets simultaneously in the Atlantic and Pacific. This may be Allied propaganda, but so long as such a perspective exists, it is not likely that naval expansion to the full limit of the building capacity of the nation will be halted.

These real or imaginary dangers looming on the horizon have not induced our government to retreat to a storm cellar. Rather it has assumed new obligations. Its expressed policy has been not to permit the transfer by purchase, cession, conquest, or annexation of any territory in the Western Hemisphere to any non-American power. Concerning Dutch Guiana or Curaçao our position is clear; we would not permit their transfer to Germany in the event of a Nazi conquest of the Netherlands. In addition President Roosevelt has been studying the status of Greenland since the Nazi invasion of Denmark, and it seems safe to predict that Americans would be willing to bring that island under the aegis of the Monroe Doctrine. If we cannot allow the establishment of air bases or naval stations in this hemisphere, does not the same logic apply to the strategic Portuguese and Spanish islands in the Atlantic, which in the hands of a strong power would flank the lines of communications with South America? And does not the same reasoning hold good for the African possessions of European powers when such areas provide points closer to South America than we possess? The recent dramatic extension of American policy to include the maintenance of the status quo of the Netherlands Indies has been accepted by the public with amazing indifference. From Greenland to Singapore, from the Aleutians to the South Atlantic—these are heavy responsibilities for an isolationist nation.

Foreseeing a long period of world anarchy, big-navy men maintain that only naval superiority over any opponent or combination of opponents will provide security. This reasoning ignores the losses of present combatants, the war exhaustion even of the victor, and geographic factors, and assumes that the "aggressor" states would combine as readily for an adventure against us as they might against their neighbors. It ignores the obvious fact that naval supremacy is not a matter of tonnage alone, but is dependent upon many other factors—distances from home naval stations, zones of operation, and available advance bases. If this country must have a fleet at least twice as large as the Japanese fleet to cope with Japan in its adjacent seas, then by the same logic any invasion into our waters would have to be by a fleet twice as large as ours to have any hope of success. The total tonnage of Germany, Japan, Russia, and Italy does not reach such a figure. Moreover, the naval developments of the past twenty-five years have increased a country's ability to defend its coastal waters. If we were willing to let the Philippines go and to defend only the continental United States, we could assure our security at less expense by means of land fortifications and undersea and air armadas supplementing our existing fleet. Obviously we intend to practice no such self-limitation, for our leaders wish American policies to prevail not only in this hemisphere but in Asia and Europe as well. Our navy is built and trained to carry the fight across the sea, if that is necessary.

The American people can build, if they so desire, the biggest fleet in the world, but it is doubtful whether such a fleet would enable us to attain the maritime supremacy that England possessed at the height of its power. During the greater part of England's golden age it was able to check its rivals among the European states by grand alliances in which it assigned to itself the function of blockade and control of communications and depended principally upon its allies to deliver blows on land. It was able to search out the enemy fleets in the narrow seas surrounding Europe and to utilize its far-flung naval stations to crush their commerce. In the probable distribution of sea power in the future, powerful fleets will be based upon the continents of Asia and Europe; this will allow us to maintain our supremacy only in adjacent waters rather than throughout the world. The United States has no far-flung naval stations and is unwilling to enter agreements with other powers which would make it possible to correlate their power on land with its power on the seas. If it is our intention to influence the balance of power in Asia and Europe, let us realize that naval strength alone will not do it. A system of alliances will have to be superimposed upon Pan-Americanism; strong military ties will have to be fashioned with the Pacific possessions of the European states for the control of the South Pacific; and as Admiral J. K. Taussig declared at the Senate hearings, we shall have to provide China with all the assistance at our command. Our people are torn between a heritage of isolation and the responsibilities of a world power. Contemporary events permit the conclusion that the days of "splendid isolation" are over, but the still-powerful tradition of no entangling alliances hinders political or military agreements and compels the United States to expand its naval power as the most effective way to implement its world policies. The day is not far distant when Wilson's program for "the greatest navy in the world" will become a reality.

Sudden Death Underground

BY ROSE M. STEIN

YEAR after year the coal-mining industry of the United States exacts a toll of many lives and many more injuries. It is estimated that one out of every five coal miners is killed or receives some injury each year. The ratio of deaths and injuries to tonnage has shown a sharp decrease in recent years, but this is accounted for not by a reduction of the number of accidents but by the increased rate of production resulting from mechanization. The production rate per man-hour has almost doubled in the last thirty years. The casualty rate per man-hour has scarcely changed. For the years 1911-15 the fatality rate per million man-hours worked was 1.8; for 1939 it was 1.7, and because of recent disasters it is bound to be higher in 1940.

Accidents are due to a variety of causes, one of which is explosion. Explosions are dramatic events. When they occur, the press allots them generous space; pictures are taken, widows are interviewed, the story is featured. But the public is interested only for a fleeting moment. Then it forgets all about miners until the next explosion is reported.

Two major mine disasters occurred in 1940 within a little over two months. On January 10, in Bartley, West Virginia, an explosion took ninety-one lives; on March 16, at the Willow Grove mine, Neffs, Ohio, reputed to be one of the safest mines in the country, seventy-two men were killed. These gruesome tragedies would soon have been forgotten, like the scores which had preceded them, if the United States Bureau of Mines, which investigated the explosions, had not made public its findings. Reversing previous procedure, which for thirty years had made such reports available only to the company whose mine was the scene of the accident, Secretary of the Interior Ickes ruled that the facts were of public interest.

Unfortunately, when the reports appeared, the public was no longer particularly interested, and the scant notice given them by the press attracted little attention. In the communities where the explosions had occurred this apathy was keenly resented. Mrs. C——, who lost a brother and brother-in-law in the Ohio blast, spoke out about it: "This here highway," said Mrs. C——, "had cars parked for a stretch of three miles. People came from all over to nosey around and ask questions. Where are they now, after the state has whitewashed the company and our men have to go back into the mine with little or no assurance there won't be another explosion in a week or a month or a year? Where were they when our men had to go into the mine to clean up the mess and come home sick because there was hardly a day but they came across an arm or a leg or some other part of their buddies before they got blown to bits, like as if they were animals? How do you think my husband feels, with his own brother smashed so bad he looked like a mass of black jelly when he was brought out?" She wiped a tear with the corner of her apron and continued with mounting anger. "I don't think anybody cares what happens to the miners. They think our men are just so much dirt. Maybe they think it's the God-given lot of a miner to die the way they did at Willow Grove, to be thrown under a sixteen-ton whaley like my brother was, and him only thirty-two years old. It ain't right," she added despairingly.

It is easy to agree with Mrs. C—— that this wholesale snuffing out of life coupled with the failure to take proper precautions against its recurrence "ain't right," but what can be done about it? Is it possible to eliminate or materially reduce explosion hazards? Are their causes known and can they be controlled? The engineers of the Bureau of Mines answer that "essentially all the explosions which occurred during the last five years could have been prevented by the observance of ordinary precautions." And they produce facts, figures, and actual demonstrations in their own model mine to prove it.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Most coal-mine explosions are caused by gas or coal dust, or both. Practically all mines contain at some time or other sufficient gas or coal dust to start a good-sized blast. The various state mining departments frequently rate mines as non-gaseous; the Willow Grove mine was so rated. The federal Bureau of Mines, however, argues that the no-gas rating creates false security. Any mine which goes deep in under the hills encounters gas. The Bartley mine was known to have it, and it has been established that at Willow Grove also there was a good deal of gas, and that this was known to all concerned as far back as five years ago. The presence of gas does not make explosions inevitable. It does make proper ventilation imperative. Gas is easily dissipated by air; ventilation is all that is necessary. It is as simple as that. Coal dust too can be entirely controlled. The first need is to keep it swept up so that at all times there will be only the barest minimum of it. But even where it has accumulated it can still be controlled by the simple process of wetting and spreading rock dust. The effectiveness of rock dust to prevent or limit explosions has been amply demonstrated not only by extensive research here and abroad but by actual experience—its use has saved hundreds of lives in coal-mine explosions. The Willow Grove mine itself proved the value of rock dust: 130 men were saved, all but 22 of them absolutely unharmed, by the fact that the "rooms" they worked in were separated from the scene of the explosion by the haulage way, which was properly rock-dusted. It was also gunited, that is, the walls had been spread with a mixture of sand and cement which reduces the danger of falling rock. The management places greater emphasis upon the gunite, but Bureau of Mines engineers believe the rock dust was more important.

Why is rock dust not used more extensively? Why was it used in the haulage way of Willow Grove but not in the rooms where the men worked? The answer is that it costs money. It is estimated that the use of rock dust in sufficient quantities to prevent dust explosions would add about one cent per ton to the cost of production. Moreover, the Willow Grove mine was inspected by the state two weeks before the explosion, and rock dust was ordered for the haulage way but not for the rooms.

Even with a dangerous amount of both gas and dust present, the likelihood of explosions can be minimized if means of ignition are properly safeguarded. The powder used for blasting is a principal source of danger. The Bureau of Mines recommends an explosive which while equally effective in loosening the coal is much safer than the powder now in general use. The height and duration of its flame has been so drastically reduced that it can be practically ruled out as a source of ignition. But United States engineers have no power to enforce their recommendations, and the various state mining departments have declared the higher explosive permissible. It is a good deal cheaper than the "safe" powder, and consequently most mining companies continue to use it.

Electric sparks are another frequent cause of ignition. Here too government engineers have set up safety standards, but very few of the mines heed them, and for the same reason. Electric sparks from machinery that should not have been permitted, according to the Bureau of Mines, provided the ignition element which in the presence of gas and dust caused the explosion at Bartley.

The complete report of the bureau's findings on Bartley was released on March 6, ten days before the Willow Grove explosion. Had the latter company or the Ohio inspection service read the report carefully and taken to heart its recommendations concerning proper ventilation, gas testing, rock dusting, and the like, the Willow Grove disaster could have been avoided. For it has been established by the Bureau of Mines, as it was by the miners of Willow Grove long before the bureau's report was released, that the immediate cause of the blast was in all probability what is known as a "windy shot." To a miner a "windy shot" means that the thickness of the coal vein has been overestimated and too much explosive used, so that part of the shot comes back in smoke and flame. Windy shots are frequent occurrences, but the miners know how to dodge them and usually they cause little or no damage. However, when there is an excess of gas undiluted by air, the flames of a windy shot are very likely to spread. And when spreading flame encounters thick dry coal dust, a major explosion results.

With a few commendable exceptions most American coal mines in operation today are potential death traps. They use explosives and machinery which the United States Bureau of Mines rates as non-permissible; they are insufficiently ventilated; and they are either not rock-dusted at all or only inadequately. The elements of disaster are all present; the only wonder is that they are not set off more frequently. Of course when an explosion occurs, the loss sustained by the operator is infinitely greater than the cost of all prescribed safety devices. But most operators seem to be willing to take a chance on playing with fire without getting burned. And the various state mining departments acquiesce.

The miners, too, are a party to this game of chance, principally through participation in a vicious speed-up system promoted by means of bonuses for increased production. At Willow Grove and at other mechanized mines the coal diggers work in crews, and all, including the foreman, receive a progressive bonus based upon the amount of coal loaded in excess of a given quota. Under this system the company does not need to drive the men; they drive one another. In order to dig more coal and thereby earn more money they are willing to take desperate risks.

The Bureau of Mines has observed these conditions for many years, unable to do a thing about them. It has done a splendid job of fact-finding, but its facts are between book covers gathering dust. It has made vital recommendations, but so far they have been addressed to deaf ears. It has the knowledge and means for saving thousands of lives, but it cannot even enter a mine save at the invitation of employers or state inspectors. And if the state departments invite bureau specialists once in a while, the employers never do. When a disaster occurs, however, the bureau stands upon no formalities and moves in upon the scene. It helps with the rescue work, studies the causes of the explosion, compiles more facts, presents more recommendations to the industry, knowing full well that little note will be taken of them. It has no authority to inspect a mine or to pass on it before it resumes operation.

An effort to remedy this situation is represented by the Neely bill, now before Congress. Regulation of the coal-mining industry is left by the bill in the hands of the various states, but federal agents are authorized to inspect mines periodically and to publish their findings. Mild as this legislation is, its passage is being fought vigorously by the industry. The higher capital charges on new, safe equipment, plus increased expenditures for rock dust and recommended explosives, would add an estimated 20 cents a ton to the cost of production, and the operators are not sure they could pass this on to the consumer. They are also disinclined to let a federal agency get a foothold in their establishments. The United Mine Workers is fighting hard for the enactment of the Neely bill, which passed the Senate last January. It has since been bottled up in the House, and not even the last two mine blasts have been able to shake it loose.

Gandhi Has Decided

BY KRISHNALAL SHRIDHARANI

THE long-feared storm over India is about to break. For Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi, "the terrible meek" who is followed by India's multitudes, has at last decided to strike. The Mahatma's decision comes as an answer to the British government, which two weeks ago announced in the House of Commons that India's demand for independence could not be granted.

The Working Committee of India's Congress Party, meeting at Wardha, where Gandhi resides, after four days of deliberation decided on "the necessity of preparing the Congress organization for satyagraha [non-violent direct action]." It also planned the immediate steps to be taken by the leaders as well as the masses, and issued the following call to the people: "The committee welcomes the steps taken by the provincial Congress committees in pursuance of the directions issued by Gandhi to function as satyagraha committees and to enrol active and passive satyagrahis. The committee trusts that all Congress committees throughout the country will pursue this program with all earnestness and thoroughness and will put their affairs in order for such action as may be required of them." Two months previous to the Wardha meeting, the plenary session of the Congress at Ramgarh had appointed Gandhi the "dictator" of the nation in the event of civil disobedience. Gandhi's men must already be on farms and in factories enlisting peasants and workers for the no-tax campaign and general strike.

If Gandhi decides to make a tour through India to sound out sentiment before launching the campaign, as a dispatch from Bombay indicates he may, it will be a month or two before the fireworks really begin. But this tour will be a part of the program and not a postponement of it. All past civil-disobedience campaigns were preceded by such an all-India tour on the part of Gandhi. Whether it starts tomorrow or a month from now, action is sure to come.

Gandhi's decision is a victory for the Congress Party's left wing, which has all along been trying to force the right into action. Ever since the failure of negotiations between Gandhi and the Viceroy last November, "to strike or not to strike" has been the question in India. And over this issue the rival Indian groups of right and left have divided. The Mahatma, until his final decision was made known, was the leader of the so-called right. Behind him were Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, the Moslem president of the Congress, Sardar Patel, India's Jim Farley, and most of the members of the Congress high command. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, if somewhat disgruntled, was also in this camp.

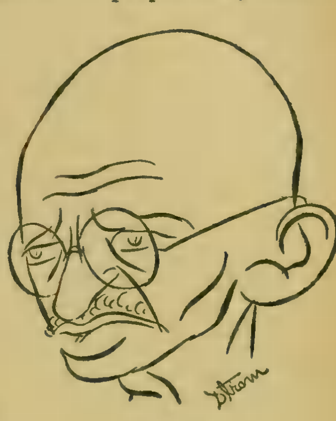
The so-called left is headed by the fiery Subhas Chandra Bose, the youthful leader of Bengal. Close behind him stands M. N. Roy, also born in Bengal but long a resident of Russia, who once was an internationally known Communist and an executive in the Comintern.

Recently Roy opposed Gandhi's man, Azad, in the race for the Congress presidency. Azad polled 1,840 votes to Roy's 181. However, the election figures show that what is known as the "Forward bloc" in the Congress, created by Bose and Roy, can claim many followers among the young people of Bengal, Maharashtra, and the United Provinces.

In spite of Roy's connection with the Forward bloc, the right and the left within the Congress have not differed primarily on economic issues. Nothing can be farther from the truth than the impression in this country that the present split in the Congress is along Marxist and non-Marxist lines. There have been, of course, charges and counter-charges. Some members of the Forward bloc have alleged that Gandhi's "weak-kneed policy against the British" has been partly inspired by his desire to protect the vested interests of the Ahmedabad mill-owners, with whom he is on friendly terms, and partly by his fear of a social revolution in the wake of the national struggle. Even Bose has voiced his suspicion that something very reactionary has been going on "behind this smoke screen of hot phrases." On the other hand, some members of the right have suggested that Communist influences were at work behind the Forward bloc. That, too, is a misapprehension, for Bose's hero appears to be Mussolini, whom he calls "the essence of leadership."

The chief cause of the cleavage was Bose's restless eagerness to have the struggle begin. Gandhi's delay in giving a signal for direct action against the British government, now with its back turned on India, was generally resented by the radical youth of the country. The right, however, believed there were positive gains from Gandhi's prolonged inaction. In the first place, the Mahatma's repeated offers of negotiation drove home the fact that India was not seeking to make political capital out of England's predicament in Europe. This proof of good-will and understanding at the outset of the struggle is held to be of utmost importance to the success of satyagraha. Secondly, Gandhi's tireless efforts at a compromise with the British made the issues clearer to the world at large. The neutral countries now know that India was ready to throw its full weight on the side of democracy if democracy was not denied to India. In the third place, this period of action held in abeyance provided the Nationalists with the much-needed opportunity to organize and discipline the Indian masses before the inevitable showdown.

This explanation of the right wing's policy has not been acceptable to the leaders of the Forward bloc. They have lost, it appears from their utterances, much of their faith in Gandhi's fighting spirit. That seems to have been the main difference between Nehru and Bose. Both were smarting for action. But Nehru had an abiding faith in Gandhi's power and willingness to act whenever the time was ripe, while Bose had no such confidence. Consequently Nehru stuck it out with Gandhi, sure that he would again hear his master's commanding voice rousing India to strike. Nehru's loyalty to the author of the technique of "non-violent direct action" is shared by an overwhelming majority of the Indian people. They seem to realize that if Gandhi is to be the general, he must choose the time to act. They understand Gandhi's challenge: "If you don't like me, remove me, but while I am leader, you must obey me."



Gandhi

There has been a great deal of speculation as to the real reason why Gandhi so long maintained that there was nothing "to warrant a belief that the atmosphere is suitable for declaring civil disobedience." So far as can be learned, the main deterrent seems to have been the communal problem. Ever since the Congress ministries in eight British India provinces resigned, the Hindu-Moslem conflict has assumed an increasingly menacing form. The Moslem League, a communal organization representing a minority of the Moslem minority in India, has declared open war against the National Congress. Its president, Mohammed Ali Jinnah, has so far resisted all the efforts of the Congress to reach a settlement. Although the Congress has shown its intention to grant all the legitimate demands of the Moslem minority short of jeopardizing the evolving democracy in India, Mr. Jinnah seems to be pursuing a policy of raising his demands as soon as an agreement is in sight. He has finally gone so far as to demand the partition of India into a Hindu state and a Mohammedan state.

When the Moslem League, meeting last month at Delhi, indorsed Mr. Jinnah's partition plan, it simply gave form to the older dream of a Mohammedan empire in northern India. What has come to be known as the "Pakistan" movement had hitherto found expression only in poetry and the philosophical musings of writers in Urdu and Persian. Sir Muhammed Iqbal, the greatest Moslem poet of his day, had linked the "Pakistan" idea with the larger Mohammedan aspiration of establishing the rule of Pan-Islam over Asia and southern Europe. The Moslem federation proposed by Mr. Jinnah goes farther than the early Pakistan idea and would include not only the contiguous areas of the Northwest Frontier Province, the Hindu state of Kashmir, and the Punjab but also the eastern provinces of Bengal and Assam. "Pakistan," if accepted, would necessitate the reshuffling and resettlement of tens of millions of men, women, and children.

The very impracticability of the idea reveals the desperation of a leader who wants to make political capital out of religious differences. Nevertheless, as long as the idea is discussed in the press and on the public platform, it is bound to have its nuisance value. Since it heightens the existing communal conflict, Gandhi had to appraise its possible effects on the national struggle before sounding the bugle. The possibility of a civil-disobedience movement turning into a civil war could not be dismissed lightly. Hence Gandhi's repeated insistence on communal unity. A desperate British government, short of soldiers in India because of the European war, can naturally be expected to see to it that Hindu-Moslem clashes overshadow Nationalist-British clashes.

Gandhi's recent decision shows that he could not allow the fear of a possible civil war indefinitely to obstruct India's fight for freedom. The underlying contention of the Bose group that if India must have a civil war "let's have it now" gained ground steadily until Gandhi himself became convinced that further postponement of civil disobedience might not be in the interest of the people. For one thing he saw that it might lead the so-called terrorist groups to take the matter into their own hands and revert to violence and bloodshed. The assassination of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, of Amritsar massacre fame, at a meeting in London strengthened this view. A few weeks later a parade of Gandhi men was booed in Calcutta by a group that clamored for action. If for no other reason than to save India and Great Britain from the baptism of blood, Gandhi deemed the time was ripe to launch a civil-disobedience campaign.

One other good reason may have led Gandhi to act. It is quite possible that the Moslems' communal aims may disappear in the immediacies of a national struggle. That happened in 1930, when a considerable part of the Mohammedan community joined hands with the Congress in the civil-disobedience campaign. A majority of Mohammedans are pro-Congress even now, and as the suffering at the hands of the British increases, more and more Moslem League members are likely to be affected by the social contagion of a mass movement. Perhaps it was this fear of losing his following which led Mr. Jinnah to make his latest overture to Gandhi.

At the last the unyielding attitude of the British government left Gandhi no option. In the week before he made public his decision Sir Hugh O'Neill, Under Secretary of State for India, announced in the House of Commons that "in the circumstances it does not seem there is anything further the government can do." Sir Hugh not only banged the door shut on negotiation but went farther and challenged the Congress. "If civil disobedience, unfortunately, is adopted," he added, "His Majesty's government will be bound to take full measures to counteract it. Ordered government must be carried on, especially in time of war, and I cannot but believe the Congress leaders themselves recognize that to the full." Perhaps the phrase "full measures" was intended to sober the hot heads of Congress by its implication of wholesale arrests and imprisonment, of charges by mounted police, of floggings, of scattered shootings, in short, of everything that marked the year 1930 as a reign of terror.

But instead of cowing the people into submission, the British threat of strong reprisals is bound to solidify opinion in India. As soon as action starts, the present controversy between the right and the left will be settled. For in reality the left has merely been pushing the right into bolder direct action, not challenging it. When Gandhi gives the signal, all will fall in line—Nehru, Bose, and even M. N. Roy.

The British Fascist Case

BY ROBERT DELL

SOMEBODY, I forget who, once said: "Save me from my friends: I can take care of my enemies." This came to my mind when I read Lord Lloyd's manifesto on the war entitled "The British Case," which has just been published in America by the Macmillan Company. If it had only Lord Lloyd's name on the title page, it would not matter so much. Everybody in England at any rate knows that gentleman to be an imperialist and reactionary diehard. But another name appears on the title page, that of "The Right Honorable Viscount Halifax, K. G., Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs," who has written an introduction approving Lord Lloyd's essay without qualification and recommending that it "be read as a supplement to purely diplomatic history." It is impossible to believe that Lord Halifax could have done this without the consent and approval of the British Cabinet, or at least the Prime Minister. Thus, unless and until Lord Halifax and Lord Lloyd are repudiated by the British government, this British Case must be accepted as official. It is likely to do more harm to the Allied cause in America than the propaganda of all the Communists, Nazis, and other enemies of that cause put together. Lord Lloyd's position does not differ substantially from that of Father Coughlin and the Christian Front.

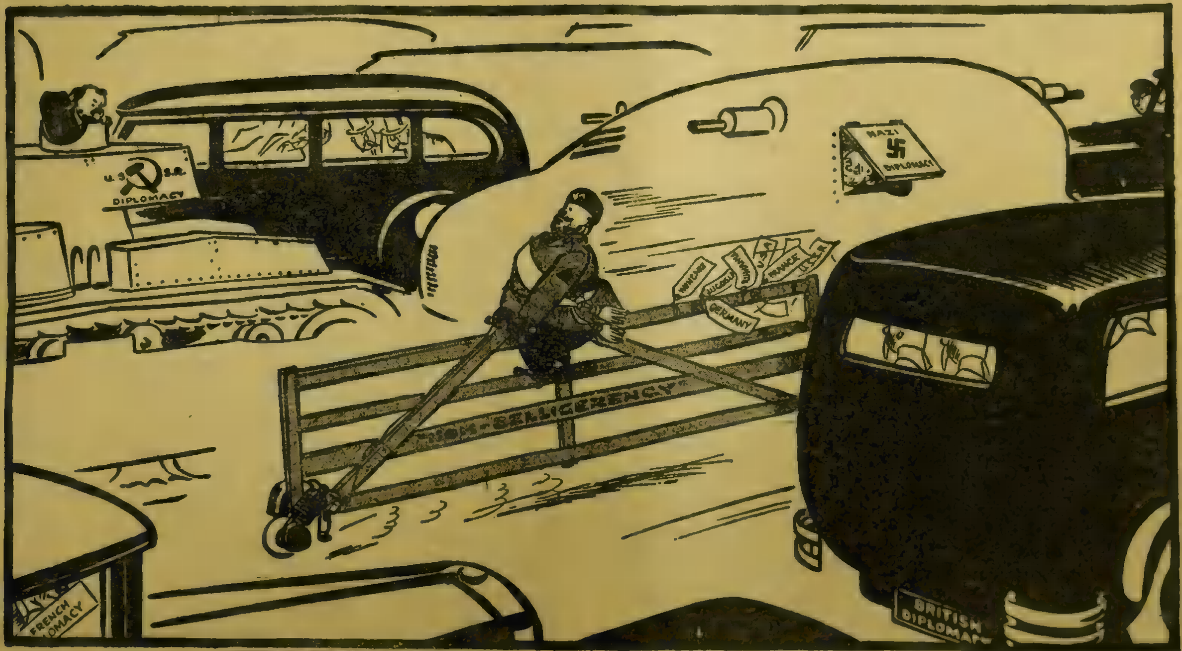
His Lordship is in the same dilemma as the Stalinists. He has to justify a policy which is exactly the opposite of the policy that he himself advocated until recently. Like the Stalinists, he can do this only by mental gymnastics and by juggling with facts. For example, Lord Lloyd declares it to be universally admitted that England and France had no "shred of responsibility" for the last war, whereas innumerable American, English, and French authors, after an exhaustive study of all the diplomatic documents, have come to the conclusion that the British and French governments, and in particular Edward Grey and Raymond Poincaré, had a very great responsibility for it.

He repeats the absurd fiction that Europe was saved by Poland in 1920, but omits to say that the Russians, who were then much too weak to attack anybody, were defending themselves against an unprovoked Polish aggression backed and financed by the British government. Lord Lloyd attributes the Spanish revolution to Russian agents and Russian money and says that the disappearance of Alfonso XIII caused Spain to dissolve into anarchy. On the other hand, the Franco rebellion was a "national uprising" with which apparently Italy and Germany had nothing to do. These are some examples of Lord Lloyd's regard for historical facts.

Lord Lloyd admirably exposes the real motives of Hitler's successive aggressions, but he still thinks that Hitler had "adequate excuses" for everything that he did before March, 1939, and that it was quite reasonable to trust him up to that date. Inasmuch as Hitler had violated every undertaking that he had entered upon after becoming dictator of Germany, those who believed in September, 1938, that he would keep his word were either willing dupes or congenital idiots. Ten months before Hitler sent his troops into the demilitarized zone and violated the Treaty of Locarno, he solemnly declared in a speech to the Reichstag his intention scrupulously to maintain that treaty. The invasion of Austria was a violation of Hitler's agreement with Austria of July 11, 1936, and the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia in 1938, with the connivance of the British and French governments, was a violation of an assurance given by Göring on his word of honor to the Czechoslovak minister in Berlin on March 12, 1938, and confirmed by Hitler himself.

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Hitler's real crime in Lord Lloyd's eyes was his pact with Stalin and that, but for this, Lord Lloyd would have forgiven him everything. Many of Lord Lloyd's remarks justify the suspicion that he wants a religious crusade undertaken against the Soviet Union on the ground that it is anti-Christian.

Lord Lloyd talks a great deal about freedom, but his conception of it is peculiar. The Allies, in his opinion, are fighting for "the principle of nationality," which "is not one among many forms of political organization but a unique experiment necessitated by the requirements of Christian freedom." Christian freedom is clearly not at all the same thing as the freedom which we miscreants



FOR A FENCE-SITTER, OLD MUSSO CERTAINLY DOES GET ABOUT understand by that term, for, according to Lord Lloyd, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Greece, and apparently all other countries in Europe except Germany and Russia are free countries. Lord Lloyd brushes aside as dreams any sort of federal system and any alternative to nationalism, including an effective League of Nations. He wants Christian hearts and more and more nationalism.

The most sinister pages in the book are those singing the praises of the Italian Fascist system, which is clearly Lord Lloyd's ideal and which he declares to be fundamentally different from the German and Russian regimes. It is, he says, "founded on two rocks: first, the separation of church and state and the supremacy of the church in matters not only of faith but of morals; secondly, the rights of labor." The Italian state, according to Lord Lloyd, like that of Spain and Portugal, is "neither socialist nor capitalist, but syndicalist"! No doubt the British workers will appreciate the blessings of the system that Lord Halifax and Lord Lloyd evidently hope to impose on them.

The influence of that Anglo-Catholic fanatic Lord Halifax is discernible in Lord Lloyd's ultra-clericalism. The separation of church and state, according to him, means that the church is to impose its own ideas about faith and morals not merely on its adherents but on all citizens, no matter what their opinions, as in fact the Roman Catholic church does in Italy by the terms of the Concordat.

Lord Lloyd's remarks suggest unpleasant suspicions as to the relations between the British government and Mussolini. As most people know, the French General Staff wished to send Mussolini an ultimatum at the beginning of the war to the effect that unless he broke the alliance with Germany, France would declare war on Italy. General Gamelin and his colleagues were overruled, and one had hoped that the sole reason for what now looks like a blunder on the part of the British and French governments was a belief that it would be to the interest of the Allied cause. The Halifax-Lloyd thesis makes one suspect that, like the conduct of the British and French governments in the Abyssinian affair, it was due to a desire to save Mussolini and his Catholic Fascist regime at all costs. It is difficult on any other hypothesis to understand the economic and other favors that have been showered upon Mussolini and the way in which he has been allowed a free hand to carry on intrigue in Europe. Incidentally Lord Lloyd says that the Italian Fascist regime does not threaten the security of other European nations; yet Albania was once a European nation, to say nothing of Spain. In any case it is clear that the war aim of Lord Halifax and Lord Lloyd is to make Europe safe for clericalist fascism. Is this also the war aim of the British government? If it is, how much longer are the English people going to tolerate the "men of Munich" in office?

In the Wind

IN MAYOR HAGUE'S Jersey City bailiwick it is virtually compulsory for city employees to attend the opening baseball game; that's why the team annually breaks attendance records. The story is told that just before this season's opening one employee went to his superior and said timidly: "My grandmother died yesterday—do you mind if I stay away from the ball game to go to her funeral?"

TESTIFYING BEFORE the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, Rear Admiral Taussig declared that war with Japan was "inevitable" and urged an expanded naval program. Senator Hiram Johnson interrupted to suggest that the program seemed ambitious. "I'm just trying to keep us out of peace, Senator," Taussig answered—then hastily corrected himself.

TOTAL WAR: A new pamphlet has just been issued by the Women's Voluntary Service for Civil Defense in England. It is called "Information on Bed-wetting for Householders Taking Unaccompanied Children."

RADIO NEWS: The New York World-Telegram radio program recently carried this announcement: "10:45—WEAF, WOR, WABC, WNEW, President Roosevelt, addressing Young Republican clubs."

THE WASHINGTON Kiwanis Club recently held a meeting at which the theme was safety. Lincoln H. Lippincott, nationally known safety advocate, cited the dangers of reckless driving. "Death," he said, "can and must be eliminated from our national roads." At that juncture, reported the Washington Star, two men rose and left. They were undertakers.

ROUND-UP: George Seldes is launching a news-letter called "In Fact." . . . Diego Rivera has been assigned by the Mexican government to direct a film dramatizing Mexico's side of the oil dispute. . . . The Civil Liberties Union trial of Elizabeth Gurley Flynn seems indefinitely delayed.

BISHOP MANNING, first to protest against Bertrand Russell's appointment to City College, went into a barber shop on Morningside Heights recently. As he was leaving, the barber who had served him stuck out his tongue derisively. A patron asked him why. "If Will Russell wants to go to City College, why can't he?" asked the barber plaintively. "Will" Russell is dean of Teachers College.

ALLEN ZOLL, a leading figure in Christian Front circles, was indicted last summer on a charge of extorting $7,500 from the officials of radio station WMCA, which the Christian Front was picketing. It is nearly a year since he was indicted, but he has not been brought to trial. What has happened to the indictment?

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind. The prize of $5 for the best item submitted during April goes to H. B. Clemenko for the story about the Police Gazette published two weeks ago.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

DURING my recent automobile trip across the continent I often wished that some of my smart friends who are so sure the United States can never do anything well were with me. For at the Grand Canyon, the Petrified Forest, Boulder Dam, and elsewhere I observed once more the efficiency of the National Park Service, the Reclamation Service, and other branches of the government's activities in the Southwest. I have long been a "fan" for the National Park Service, but on this trip I was more than ever impressed with the appearance, the character, and the ability of the rangers and the way in which the tourist public is treated. No officials could be more polite or more capable, and no soldiers ever made a better appearance in uniform than these gentlemen who have charge of the nation's parks. With a few exceptions, men admitted because of special qualifications, they are college graduates, and they must have had two years' experience in handling men before being appointed. That they are not drawn to this work by any large rewards is clear from the fact that they start at a salary of only a trifle more than $1,800 and have to pay some rent for the cottages that the government at some places puts at their disposal. Even the higher positions are anything but well paid.

As one of the men said to me, it is not the pay which attracts them but love of the work and of nature. Many of them are experts in some field. Since they are often called on to lecture to tourists, they must have a very clear understanding of the marvels of nature in their region and also of the geological history of the earth. But that is only the beginning. They must have the ability to command other men; they must be woodsmen and devoted conservers of the heritage of our people; and many must be good executives and business men. In return for $1,860 a year the government gets all these things and in addition a loyalty and devotion which money cannot buy. I have tried in vain to recall any public servants in other parts of the world who have impressed me more. Germans would be overbearing, puffed up by authority, stiffly military, forever saluting, and treating the visitors as so many subjects to be herded from one place to another. Nor can I visualize Englishmen in authority able to be so friendly and polite and yet so dignified. In short, the rangers take exactly the attitude that the public servant dealing with the American people should take.

The virtues of the men in charge are reflected in the scientific work of the service. The museums at the various points are models of clear, simple exposition; they illustrate and explain the phenomena of nature so that the simplest intelligence in the great army of visitors can understand. And the custodians are always eager to answer any questions. It did me good to see many CCC boys serving under rangers at the places I visited and getting from them lessons in dignity, courtesy, and the proper attitude toward others. These government employees show what American public servants can be when they are properly picked, justly treated, and kept out of politics. I had heard rumors that politics had begun to creep into the Park Service, and was therefore relieved to hear from some of the men that they had seen no evidence of it. It would be a crime to tamper with such a service.

When I reached Boulder Dam for my first view of that tremendous undertaking I recalled with pride that this great engineering feat was all worked out by the engineers of the Reclamation Service and not by highly paid experts of private industry. The whole work is a monument to the men in our government who conceived it, induced Congress to authorize it, and then carried it through without a breath of scandal, without any charge of graft or corruption or waste, so far as I have ever heard. No enterprise or initiative in our government bureaus? All tied tight with red tape? Let Boulder Dam be the reply—and Norris too, and many, many other successful enterprises, never forgetting the army's great work in constructing the Panama Canal. As I stood looking down upon that enormous structure at Boulder, I could not but recall that this inestimably beneficent enterprise cost only $127,000,000, or just about $37,000,000 more than our newest battleship, which will disappear with nothing to show for it in twenty years, if it is not rendered utterly useless before then by what the Germans are doing in the air.

Before leaving the subject of Boulder Dam, I must recall my satisfaction and happiness that the beautiful lake created by the dam, Lake Mead, was named in honor of Ellwood Mead, who was head of the Reclamation Service when the project was conceived and built. I knew and honored him, and I rejoice in this recognition, for his was long a voice raised in the wilderness. I know that if he were here he would feel that the honor was a recognition not merely of his own services but of those of the thousands of devoted public servants in inconspicuous positions throughout the country who are serving the government as well and as ably as are the rangers and the Reclamation engineers. The profit motive? Where does it come in with men like these?

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

I THINK there would be little dissent from the opinion that Raymond Gram Swing and Elmer Davis are our two best radio news commentators; and I for one am impressed by the fact that the radio is currently starring two commentators who are much superior to the general run of newspaper columnists. I speak from the experience of one who is not exactly a columnist fancier but who spent several months following them around two years ago. The newspaper columnist, as I said then, was born partly of the demand for personality which disappeared from the press when it became a venture in big business. But the difference between Davis and Pegler, between Swing and Thompson, is wide and deep The "personality" of the average newspaper columnist, as revealed day by day, is a blend of partisanship and exhibitionism. Davis and Swing have achieved an objectivity that is truly remarkable—yet to think of the two men or even the two voices is to recognize two personalities quite as distinct as those of Pegler and Johnson, and far more appealing. When I say objectivity I mean just that. I have listened pretty carefully to both men over a period of months. One knows of course that they are opposed to Hitler, yet it seems to me that they have both mastered the difficult art of presenting facts extraordinarily free of the overtones of personal opinion.

It is ironical, perhaps, that Davis and Swing should speak out of the welter of partisanship in toothpaste and tires that is commercial radio; but that perhaps is one element in the happy result. Another is a healthy fear of government interference on the part of the industry and the general resistance to foreign propaganda. It is no accident, of course, that our two best radio commentators are concerned with foreign affairs; there are no "big-time" commentators on domestic subjects of the caliber of Swing and Davis. Like the average newspaper editor, radio is more likely to suffer and promote objectivity about issues in another county. But at least we have Swing and Davis; and their popularity may help to create a demand for similar objectivity in other fields.

You may be interested, by the way, in knowing what a foreign commentator thinks about besides Hitler. Mr. Swing recently made his debut as a composer, when his Fantasia quasi una Sonata for violin and piano was performed under the auspices of the Composers' Laboratory Forum.

Elmer Davis has issued a book of essays with a title which sounds like a sigh of relief, "Not to Mention the War" (Bobbs-Merrill, $2.50). He says in a foreword that he had meant to call it "Not to Mention Hitler" but discovered that he had been unable not to speak of the principal fact of our era even in discussion of quite different matters. These "quite different matters" range from Being Kept by a Cat through The Imperfect Wagnerite to The "Logic" of History, and Mr. Davis has fortunately managed to keep out of none of them that direct and skeptical and humorous tone that makes his radio voice so refreshing among the mouthings of the tribe of talkers who discuss the merits of toothpaste with exactly the same synthetic passion they display in reporting the bombing of open towns.

I hope Mr. Davis will not mind if I say that from his first name to the inflections of his voice, he bespeaks "common sense" and "the plain American." He has taken Oxford and a long career in metropolitan journalism in his stride; the Greeks and Romans are not for him aliens from Southeastern Europe; yet his voice and his salty comments would not be out of place beside the stove in the country store. The terms common sense and plain American have fallen on evil days. They were once identified with such cosmopolitan figures as Tom Paine and Benjamin Franklin; they have latterly been used to glorify that bigoted provincial Calvin Coolidge and other assorted Republicans. But they are still good terms for useful qualities, which should be rescued and restored.

THE GERMAN Shakespeare Society, I read recently, was planning to hold its usual annual meeting in Weimar despite the war. The president explained that in more than a hundred years the German people have made the works of Shakespeare their own. The plays continue to be produced, and one exuberant Nazi said that Britain stands to lose not only the war but Shakespeare to boot. I wonder. Isn't it just possible that Shakespeare may turn out in the end to be a Trojan horse? I suppose the Nazis are capable of a new bowdlerization of Shakespeare designed to remove subversive phrases, but if the German people have made Shakespeare their own, if they are, that is, as full of quotations from his plays as Englishmen and Americans, the bowdlerization may not take. I wonder how many German lovers of Shakespeare these days are restraining themselves from thinking, for instance, that "something is rotten in the state of Denmark"—and points north.

THE LAUNCHING of a new weekly arouses excitement even in a world overwhelmed with print. We may imagine how in 1865 the rumor of Godkin's forthcoming new journal must have fluttered the journalistic and intellectual dovecotes. A reader has been kind enough to copy out and send me the passage in "Notes of a Son and Brother" in which Henry James speaks of the founding of The Nation and the beginning of his long friendship with its editor. I think that even those who know the passage will not mind rereading it.

> I recall how, having commenced critic under Charles Norton's weighty protection, I was to find myself, on all but the very morrow, invited to the higher glory, as I felt it, of aiding to launch, though on the obscure side of the enterprise, a weekly journal which, putting forth its first leaves in the summer of '65 and under the highest auspices, was soon to enjoy a fortune and achieve an authority and a dignity of which neither newspaper nor critical review among us had hitherto so much as hinted the possibility. The New York Nation had from the first, to the enlivening of several persons consciously and ruefully astray in our desert, made no secret of a literary leaning; and indeed its few foremost months shine most for me in the light of their bestowal of one of the longest and happiest friendships of my life, a relation with Edwin Lawrence Godkin, The Nation incarnate as he was to become, which bore fruit of affection for years after it had ceased to involve the comparatively poorer exercise. Godkin's paper, Godkin's occasional presence and interesting history and vivid ability and, above all, admirably aggressive and ironic editorial humor, of a quality and authority new in the air of a journalism that had meant for the most part the heavy hand alone, these things, with the sudden sweet discovery that I might for my own part acceptedly stammer a style, are so many shades and shifting tints in the positive historic iridescence that flings itself for my memory, as I have noted, over the "period" of Ashburton Place.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Economic Consequences . . .

HOW TO PAY FOR THE WAR. By John Maynard Keynes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.

THE British budget for the current fiscal year, outlined last week to the House of Commons, estimates war costs at £2,000,000,000 and total government expenditure at £2,667,000,000. This represents, according to the calculations of Mr. Keynes in his new book, almost 50 per cent of the national income for the same period, assuming that most of the remaining unemployed are put to work, that output is further raised by increasing working hours, and that employment is given to large numbers of women and other persons normally outside industry. Consequently half the goods and services produced in Britain will be utilized by the government, leaving half for general consumption.

The problem which Mr. Keynes has sought to solve in this brief book is: What is the most just and socially least disruptive way of extracting from the pockets of British citizens a full half of their incomes? By hook or crook it will be done, for governments at war can always manage to find the money, but Mr. Keynes is especially anxious to avoid the crooked way of inflation, believing that it inevitably leads to the enrichment of the few at the expense of the many.

In summarizing the thesis of this book it is simpler to use index numbers so long as it is understood that these represent very rough approximations of the author's statistics, which, themselves, do not pretend to more than broad accuracy. Let us then assign the figure 100 to the probable national British income for the current year. Government expenditure will therefore be 50, toward which taxation on the increased scale provided in the new budget will contribute 25. The balance must be made up by loans, and according to Mr. Keynes's calculations, normal pre-war savings plus a proportion of normal depreciation funds can only be expected to contribute 8.5.

Now let us approach the question from the angle of the receivers and consumers of income. To arrive at the amount of spending money available to them we must deduct from gross income paid out, that is 100, both taxes and estimated savings, which together come to 33.5. This leaves 66.5 as the sum which can be devoted to general consumption, but as we have already seen, government expenditure will absorb goods and services equivalent to 50. If, then, consumers attempt to spend the whole of their 66.5, there will not be a sufficient supply of goods to satisfy all of them and prices will rise. Or, if prices are artificially curbed, shortages will follow. The first alternative involves inflation, with wages vainly chasing prices, with fixed incomes automatically shrinking, and with the comparative few who own goods and equities reaping an unearned increment. The second alternative would lead to a wide extension of rationing, to time-consuming and irritating queues, to bootlegged buying privileges for the rich and influential, in short, to the system now prevalent in Nazi Germany.

But how can the government curtail spending power to bring it into balance with the current supply of goods? Can it rely on a voluntary increase in savings or can it screw up taxation still farther? Mr. Keynes thinks there may be some scope for both methods, but he does not believe that together they would reduce purchasing power to the required extent. So far as taxation is concerned, he points out that if everyone with more than £250 a year had the whole of his income in excess of that sum extracted by taxation, the government's requirements would only just be met. So drastic a measure seems practical neither as economics nor politics. Mr. Keynes, therefore, advocates a system of compulsory savings, or, as he prefers to call it, deferred earnings, applied to all incomes above the subsistence level. In the case of wage and salary workers he proposes that these earnings should be deducted at the source and credited to each individual's account with the Post Office Savings Bank, or some other approved institution. Except in certain emergencies, these accounts and the accumulated interest on them would be blocked until after the war when, if released as the inevitable post-war deflation began, they would provide the economy with a sustaining flow of purchasing power. An integral part of the plan is a firm pledge of a capital levy after the war from the proceeds of which these forced loans would be repaid. The loans, themselves, would not be included in computation of capital.

But there is still another facet to Mr. Keynes's program, for he wishes "to snatch from the exigencies of war positive social improvements," and to this end he suggests a system of family allowances from public funds which would tend to equalize the position of people with children with that of those without such responsibilities.

Despite this proposal, the Keynes plan has been received with considerable suspicion by British trade unionists. They fear that it may be an attempt to put an undue part of the war burden on the shoulders of those whose standard of living is already low, and to allow the rich to evade their full share. In some quarters it has been argued that the workers would do better to chance inflation, trusting to their organized strength to keep wages in line with prices. But while the better-placed workers might achieve this result, it would be partly at the expense of those whose bargaining position was weak. Moreover, as Mr. Keynes makes clear, each wage increase would add to the disequilibrium between purchasing power and available goods and thus provide the stimulus for a further inflationary rise in the price level.

For the time being discussions of the merits and demerits of the program, persuasively outlined in this book, are rather academic, since the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while accepting much of Mr. Keynes's diagnosis, has turned down his prescription. Instead, the new budget aims at encouraging savings by taxes on consumption goods, which always put a disproportionate burden on small incomes, and by dividend restrictions, which amount to compulsory savings for stockholders. It remains to be seen whether these measures will prove adequate or whether once again events will justify Mr. Keynes as a prophet. Meanwhile, American readers, even though their own pocket-books are not involved, will be well advised to study this statement of the principles and practice of modern war finance. No layman need fear the difficulties of the subject, for as usual Mr. Keynes writes with a clarity and force which ought to be both a challenge and an example to his fellow-economists.

KEITH HUTCHISON

"Ah, Language Like a Landslide"

THE MAN COMING TOWARD YOU. By Oscar Williams. Oxford University Press. $2.

MUCH has been made by Mr. Williams and his publishers of the fact that, after producing a book of youthful verse at the age of twenty-two, he "dropped" poetry "from a sense of futility at the gulf between poet and public," "bluffed his way into the advertising business, where he forgot all about poetry and held important and lucrative positions for sixteen years," and "neither wrote nor read" until he gave way to "an inner necessity to turn again to the writing of poetry." He then announced his ambition to "write a poem that would act—that would walk off the table and perform." This statement did not sound too happy at the time. It suggested too vividly what happens to an overexposed piece of cheese. But it turns out that Mr. Williams has a better gift for phrases than we supposed. He now offers the heated harvest of his three-year reunion with the muse, and the antics of his art provide one of the most spectacular performances ever witnessed outside the three-ring arena of Mrs. Anita Browne's National Poetry Week at the National Poetry Center in Radio City. This, as Mr. Fitts once remarked in another connection, "is Helicon cockeyed, an individual mob scene on Parnassus." Or as someone else said on a more dignified occasion, "There is a serious difference between poetry and a panic."

One hesitates to apply such verdicts to anything written with honest intentions, but Mr. Williams hardly puts one's scruples to much of a strain. For one thing, good poetry, like good piano-playing or good weight-lifting, is seldom produced by sheer compulsion after a protracted recess from every discipline or ordeal it imposes. For another, neither language nor sensibility can stand up long under the systematic bludgeoning here employed to rouse them to activity. Mr. Auden says on the jacket that Oscar Williams is "concerned largely with the spiritual breakdown of the times. He feels that the mechanized life is the Devil, and the subject of many of his poems is just this theme; while their form and imagery [I omit the comparison with Wallace Stevens] are romantic, violent, and exciting." These remarks are relevant but wholly avoid the point. Breakdown and mechanization are indeed the devils of the age, but Mr. Williams doesn't think so. Or if he does, he doesn't write as if he did. He battens on them. He virtually harmonizes them. "Unlike many romantics," continues Mr. Auden, "Mr. Williams has lived successfully in the world that he attacks and in whose values he once believed." But if his book is legitimate evidence, his success in that world was irremediable. Its standards possess him still. He shows no serious intention of discarding its billboard eloquence, its frenzied jargon, its sensory barbarism, its confusion of mass and value, its torrential brutality of emotion. Genuine poetry has never for a moment tolerated these properties. And the poetry of disorder, being particularly vulnerable to their seductions, is under the special necessity of guarding the authority of feeling and expression that Mr. Williams seems quite willing to club into insensibility.

What he has let loose instead is an eruption of words and portents that one hesitates to dignify as volcanic. It is a discharge of mixed and muddled metaphors, a ranting vulgarity of rhythms, a racket of the massed clichés of tragic prophecy and moral decay that mainly succeeds in making Frederic Prokosch or Paul Engle seem a model of restraint. Like most followers of the Auden school or the Rimbaud vogue, Williams lets his "language like a landslide" crash with an uproar of versified noises designed to deafen every known principle of poetic insight, subtlety, and control. Symbols stifle every page. Even comparatively conscientious poems like "Seraphs" and "Jeremiad" are lost in the toneless hysteria of their companions. This is no "attack" on the "mechanized life." It is not a resistance to violence but a surrender to it. It is a mass explosion of sensations grown rabid and frantic, a voluntary nightmare wherein "hair explodes," "lightning stabs," "the atom creaks," "curtains" are "lustful," "distant guns" have "orgasms," "numerals wriggle," "the swine bulge in the snake bellies of the telegraph wires," "man peers into the gulf of his large hand And sees a storm of statues there," civilization roars "into the darkness of the nervous system," and the reader's mind, dazed in "the wet marble of my reverie," ceases to clutch at occasional felicities of metaphor which are quickly canceled out by the pouring bewilderment or to grapple with wholesale atrocity deftly touched off by the best tricks of mail-order surréalisme, and soon stops caring whether trumpets have shins or miles are saliva, loins are a gulf or song is a toehold, whether it is minnows or golden lepers that possess tightened thighs of thought, whether bugles blow like mushrooms or music explodes like brimstone, whether the train zooms like a zipper closing up swiftly the seam of time or the ankle of Mrs. Nobody is going nowhere for a nickel.

It is hardly to be expected that qualities of integrity or judgment should survive a frenzy that never allows a clean breath to be drawn or a momentary focus to declare itself in the mind. So it comes as no surprise that Mr. Williams, whatever his sensory energy and his considerable gift for rapid-fire metaphorical invention, has ended in a chaotic topsy-turvydom of meanings, that his humanitarian sense is as crude as his ear, that his powers of discrimination are as nonexistent as his taste, and that he reminds us on every page that energy, like the cipher in arithmetic, depends for its value on the number to which it is attached. In this he is not alone. He has simply capitalized to the limit the welter of standards, the intoxication of the chaotic, and the excitement of the brutal which are freely indicted today as the sources of moral debauchery, but which many of his fellow-poets are serving up in gluttonous orders that make most of the poetry of disorder produced in the much-maligned twenties appear by comparison severe and ascetic. Editors seem to like the stuff, however, and much of it will make excellent material for military pep-fests when the encroaching horror at length reaches our shores. Then what, we may ask with Mr. Williams—

> Then what of the past, the present, the future,
> Locked in a coma behind the shutters,
> The tons of myth in the nerve stream of nature,
> The face that is hidden in quicksilver anguish,
> That bleeds at the fingertip touch of language,
> The enormous seraph writhing in the gutter?

"Let him writhe!" is Mr. Williams's verdict. He is much too regaled by the spectacle to pick the seraph up, wipe off his wings, and give him a lift to the lucid and perilous heavens where he rightly belongs. MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Black Chronicle

SUFFERANCE IS THE BADGE; THE JEW IN THE CONTEMPORARY WORLD. By Abram Leon Sachar. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

A BOOK on a ubiquitous group like the Jews must cover a good deal of ground. Indeed, Mr. Sachar's survey of Jewish history since Versailles practically circles this unhappy globe. The black chronicle of oppression and destruction starts appropriately enough with Germany and winds its roundabout way through three continents, until it reaches the democratic countries, "freedom's Maginot Line." Up to this point Russia is the only part of the picture that shows a few lights shimmering among the shadows. The rest of the book treats the Latin American countries, allows a substantial section for Palestine, and has a concluding chapter which presents a not unhopeful view of the situation in the United States. Not the least remnant of Israel goes unnoticed: China's "Jews with queues," the tiny community in the jungle of Dutch Guiana, the mountain Jews of the Caucasus, and "the wandering Jews," among them the Lithuanian peddler who had found a refuge in Zululand and who was there greeted by a fellow-Jew with the pun: "Gam Zulu tovo!"

As the various local backgrounds with which the life of the Jew is integrated are invariably sketched in, the book takes on the character of a general history of the past twenty years. In so encyclopedic a work by a single hand some errors of fact are to be expected—there are not a few in the Russian chapter. A more obtrusive fault is a certain unctuousness and sentimentality in dealing with some aspects of Palestine and with life in the United States. These, however, are not serious flaws in a book which is uniformly interesting, occasionally entertaining—the author has a store of good anecdotes on which he draws judiciously—and extremely informative.

Mr. Sachar's narrative brings out clearly the recent uses of anti-Semitism as a political weapon. The most important point that the story carries, however, is that the evil has economic roots. The author is at pains to show that it flourishes in periods of unemployment, sharp competition, shrinking markets, drastic occupational realignment. He concludes that the eradication of anti-Semitism depends primarily upon the establishment of healthy economic conditions. Mr. Sachar is all too vague about how this consummation is to be effected. He definitely rejects the Communist method of obtaining economic security as destructive of the humane values. He puts his hope in political democracy, supplemented by economic democracy, that is, a system which allows equality of opportunity to all and in which "abundance is shared." He leaves the reader wondering how this is to be achieved. He is, however, admirably clear on one point. He sees that the salvation of the Jewish people, properly enough, is bound up with that of the rest of mankind: "There can be no emancipation for one group except as part of a general human deliverance."

While working toward this remote goal, the author would have the group look to its defenses, both inner and outer. It must combat anti-Semitism in immediate and practical ways and seek to overcome the prejudices of the unenlightened through public education. The Jews must also build up their morale by steeping themselves in their own tradition, by strengthening the ties with a past in which the author, for one, takes pride. He is careful to disclaim any addiction to the Chosen People complex, but he seems to make a little too much of the Spinozas and the Einsteins that Israel has produced.

Obviously, the author is not concerned merely with the threat to the physical preservation of the group to which he belongs. He would keep both the Jews and Jewishness alive. The latter has for him a unique cultural and ethical significance. He opens the Credo for Survival with which the volume is brought to a close by retelling the following Haggadic legend. Caught between the pursuing Egyptians and the Red Sea, the Hebrews took counsel among themselves. Some advised surrender. Others bade their fellows trust in the Lord. A third faction would have flung themselves in desperation on the spears of the Egyptians. A fourth group declared for marching forward toward the Promised Land, though it were into the Red Sea itself, and perishing, if they must, with banners flying. This, Mr. Sachar holds, is the counsel to be followed even now, and he feels that the outcome is apt to be as fortunate. Like Irwin Edman, though concerned with a special province of the night, he holds a candle in the dark. He has confidence in mankind and in the civilization that it has built. He believes that the forces of evil cannot long endure, and that though some branches of Jewry may be lopped off in the hurricane, the tree that has withstood so many fierce storms will not be uprooted. Here is an expression of the life-instinct of a threatened minority stubbornly clinging to its identity, an urge with which, I imagine, even the outsider must sympathize. Mr. Sachar also cherishes the belief, which, though comforting, is rather doubtful, that the Jewish people by its very martyrdom is performing the signal service of rousing the conscience of mankind and thus upholding the cause of civilization.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY

Lincoln's Prose

THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Edited by Philip Van Doren Stern. Random House. $3.75.

THERE must be a good many people who, like myself, have known from childhood the famous passages in Lincoln's prose, but have read almost nothing of the prose itself. We have been, of course, almost criminally remiss—not simply for neglecting the work of an acknowledged master of words, but much more vitally for not seeking, at the source, insight into the greatest character in our history. But what we have perhaps needed is just such a book as this: a well-chosen, well-edited, well-printed selection from Lincoln's speeches and letters, with a modern-minded biography of Lincoln thrown in for guidance and good measure.

I don't propose (since I could only pretend) to review this book in terms of Lincoln the statesman. I hardly propose to review it in terms of Lincoln the man, since—for all the light cast upon Lincoln the man by Lincoln the writer—he too often remains, even to specialists like Mr. Stern, ambiguous and impenetrable. What I can best do, since this is a selection from Lincoln's writings, is to say something about how he wrote.

The overwhelming part of this book cannot, of course, be treated as literature, since it was never intended to be literature. Except for his private letters, virtually everything that Lincoln wrote had a political purpose, much of it an immediate political purpose, so that its literary side is exhausted once one states whether its language served that purpose well or badly. It is only here and there—except in the last few years—that one finds Lincoln writing with personal emotion or prophetic vision, or that one finds him bringing to the harassed business of living a sense of the mystery of life.

Nevertheless, in this procession of words which reveals the development of Lincoln's mind and character one also finds an orderly development in the power to use language. Lincoln began to write haltingly and clumsily, though not confusedly; his early prose has no distinction and only the simplest merits. From the start, however, he seems to have had little taste for those flights of rhetoric which debase, even when they seem to adorn, public speaking. He was at first a dry speaker—the local issues he was concerned with hardly lent themselves to an eloquent approach—but he was never a tumid one. Perhaps naively, I was disappointed to find in Lincoln's speeches very little of that raciness which is part of the Lincoln legend; instead of a cidery backwoods tang there was only too often a dull provincial awkwardness. Even his more mature work lacks salt: the force of Lincoln's habitual writing is force of mind rather than force of personality, as its wit is wit of reasoning rather than of imagination. But these qualities were enough, once Lincoln came to feel at home on a platform, to make him a really cogent speaker—easy to follow, hard to rebut. (His letters, barring the few that everyone knows—and are even they as felicitous as they are famous?—seem to me undistinguished.)

Since Lincoln's habitual writing is one in which legalism figures and logic predominates, it is largely lacking in fervor and warmth. It is only when Lincoln allows emotion the upper hand that the inspiring change from "prose" to "poetry" is felt: then the rhythm intensifies, and it is not Blackstone but the Bible that shapes the language. Still, there are times when Lincoln has a different kind of power: the famous last sentence of the Cooper Union speech, for instance, is pure platform eloquence, and entirely Lincoln's own.

All Lincoln's finest utterances, beginning with the touching farewell speech at Springfield, belong to the period of the Presidency. As Lincoln became a man of destiny, the iron entered his soul; but it was a deeper sense of the tears of things that stole into his prose. It may well be that sentiment leads us to overrate even the best passages, though no one who reads them in their context can question how moving or how thrilling they are. One may pick flaws in the second-to-last paragraph of the Second Inaugural (the rhythms are a touch mawkish, and there is one appalling rhyme); but in the last paragraph there are no flaws—it is great hortatory prose, born of a great emotion. Not only did Lincoln act under the stress of events; under that stress, he wrote; and the best of what he wrote belongs as certainly to American literature as it does to American history.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Nazism, Inc.

THE LIGHTS GO DOWN. By Erika Mann. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THE ten "typical" cases of Nazi oppression which make up Miss Mann's latest book are related in the form of short stories. Miss Mann knows that most men have a natural tendency to immunize themselves from the suffering of others. Hence the problem is to implicate the reader's emotions in spite of himself. Although her literary devices are naive and the propaganda framework at all times visible beneath the cloth, the present technique is effective. Truth is made as real as fiction.

Admiring the humanity of Miss Mann's convictions one yet wonders if her oversimplified approach to the problem of Nazism is not ultimately dangerous to the very cause she serves. The final statement of this book would seem to be that Germany is dominated by a group of very evil men, a sort of nationalized Murder, Inc., who are picking on a lot of nice people like you and me. If the author is aware that the Weimar Republic failed for definite reasons or that the Allies had considerable responsibility for that failure we get no hint of it here. Instead we have a kind of idyl of babes in the woods beset by marauding wolves. Such a presentation fails in responsibility because it arouses our emotions without in any way increasing our understanding of the situation. It encourages that unreasoning simplicity of feeling which is precisely one of the basic evils of Nazism. Miss Mann should take a hint from Duff Cooper's recent speech, as brutally irrational as though it came from Goebbels's own mill, in which he declared that the Allies are fighting the German people. The tendency of all war-time propaganda is to simplify and dramatize issues so that there shall be no division in the emotional response. It would certainly seem to be the part of refugee propagandists like Miss Mann, who have a sincere love of Germany, to struggle to prevent this simplification.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

The fight against Nazism requires a double focus. Being united in hatred of Hitler is not enough; there must also be a constant effort at enlightenment and self-criticism. Apparently Mr. Duff Cooper's war is not quite the same as Miss Mann's. Nor is our idea of democracy quite the same as Mr. Chamberlain's or Mr. Churchill's. Nor can we or Miss Mann approach the basic evils of fascism with quite such easy casuistry as Nevile Henderson displays in his recently published memoirs. It should certainly be apparent now that men like these had no very definite convictions about what constitutes either fascism or democracy.

O'Leary is reported to have said that there never was a cause so bad "that good men did not fight for it, and for good reasons." In the present crisis it is up to us to keep our wits and resist the luxury of blind feeling in order that the "good reasons" of both sides don't cancel themselves in universal failure.

WILLIAM GILMORE

Mr. Adler's Textbook

HOW TO READ A BOOK: THE ART OF GETTING A LIBERAL EDUCATION. By Mortimer J. Adler. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THE author of this guidebook is kind enough to exemplify his own theory by frequent outlines and cumulative summaries. He pauses somewhere in chapter nine to state the subject matter of the first six chapters:

> This book is about the nature of reading in general, the various kinds of reading, and the relation of the art of reading to the art of being taught in school and out. It considers, therefore, the serious consequences of the neglect of reading in contemporary education, suggesting as a solution that books can be substituted for living teachers if individuals can help themselves learn how to read.

That is on page 166. On page 64 he has already made the point:

> . . . we have now pretty well defined the purpose of this book. It has taken many pages to do that, but I think you can see why it would have been unintelligible if I had stated it in the first paragraph. I could have said: "This book is intended to help you develop the art of reading for understanding, not information; therefore it aims to encourage and assist you in reading the great books." But I do not think you would have known what I meant.

If this really is unintelligible without the pages of painstaking dilution of the obvious with which Mr. Adler seeks to cushion the shock of revelation for what he imagines to be "the average reader," then (in his words) "the proliferation of textbooks and lecture courses in our educational system today" has a rival as "the surest sign of our declining literacy." Mr. Adler writes as if he were addressing a particularly naive class in Freshman English, and one which meets so often that he is obliged to stretch the material for one good lecture over a far larger number of teaching hours.

Part I consists of the six chapters described above. Part II deals with "The Rules." Here are the directions for not reading fiction as if it were fact which he considers not only

AMERICAN PREMIERE

Frederick Stock and the Chicago Symphony Now Record Schubert's Seventh

Listen to this new recording of Schubert's Seventh. Then you will understand why Dr. Stock, and the Chicago Symphony, have joined the great musicians who choose Columbia* Records to mirror their music for you.

When you hear this tone-perfect recording you will want to hear other favorites on Columbia Masterworks Records. And when you invest in Columbia Masterworks Albums you always know that you will get perfect performances through many playings . . . because Columbia Records are made better, play better than ever.

FREE: Write to Columbia Masterworks, Bridgeport, Conn., for your free May listing of latest Masterworks releases.

SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 7 in C Major
Frederick Stock conducting the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Six 12-inch records in Album. Set M and AM-403 . . . . $11.00

LISZT—arr. BUSONI: Spanish Rhapsody
Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Two 12-inch records in Album. Set X-163 . . . . $4.50

DEBUSSY: Pagodes (From "Estampes") L'Ile Joyeuse
Walter Gieseking, pianist. 12-inch record. 69841-D $1.50

STRAVINSKY: Baiser de la Fee — Pas de Deux (Two Parts)
London Philharmonic Orchestra, Antal Dorati, conducting. 12-inch record. 69840-D, $1.50

Trade Mark

*Trade marks "Columbia", the symbol, and "Masterworks" Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. by Columbia Phonograph Company, Inc.

COLUMBIA RECORDS

COLUMBIA RECORDING CORPORATION
Subsidiary of the Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.
Bridgeport New York Hollywood

"We cannot be neutral, whatever we want and say, because what is happening tonight in London, Berlin, Moscow, in the fields and seas of battle, in the diplomatic and economic warfare the world over, exists in us as a virulent potential. I propose to prove this. . . ."

THUS does Waldo Frank challenge our American complacency in his vigorous, incisive and prophetic new book, CHART FOR ROUGH WATER. Here is no mere journalistic or political writing, but a brilliant analysis of the fundamental causes of the world crisis, of our position in the catastrophe facing all nations, and of what we must do about it.

No matter what your personal feelings, you cannot afford to ignore what the author of Our America and The Rediscovery of America says in one of the most challenging books of our day.

CHART FOR ROUGH WATER

by WALDO FRANK

Just published, $1.75 DOUBLEDAY, DORAN

MEXICO

— SUMMER 1940 —

3 trips for college students—3 trips for their elders—and a trip for prep school boys and girls. More than mere sightseeing—Programs and contacts arranged by a distinguished committee, headed by the Minister of Education—Definite rates and reservations (important in view of the unprecedented trek to Mexico).

For circulars and all particulars address

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York

IT IS YOUR LIFE

Keep Healthy • Stay Young • Live Long
By M. M. ROSENBERG, M.D.

A book readable as a novel, giving exhaustive information on personal hygiene, drugs, alcohol, tobacco, the common cold, constipation, diet, weight reduction, underweight, internal secretions, vitamins, allergy, alkalizing, sex, venereal diseases, love, marriage, motherhood, parent-child relationship, psychology of childhood and adolescence, the heart and how to prevent sudden death in the prime of life from heart attacks, the mind and the neuroses, LONGEVITY, and hundreds of other subjects.—28 chapters, 475 pages—price $2.50.

At Department Stores, Booksellers and
THE SCHOLASTIC BOOK PRESS, 158 E. 22nd St., New York

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Reader's Service Division
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

important enough to italicize, but abstruse enough to require further elucidation:

> (1) Don't try to find a "message" in a novel, play, or poem; (2) Don't look for terms, propositions, and arguments in imaginative literature; (3) Don't criticize fiction by the standards of truth and consistency which properly apply to communications of knowledge; (4) Don't read all imaginative books as if they were the same.

"All the obligations of a reader" finally boil down to four questions (with directions from Mr. Adler for answering them):

I. What in general is being said?
II. How in particular is it being said?
III. Is it true?
IV. What of it?

Singularly enough, at this point the author fails to show how the technique can be applied to his own book. The answers in this instance seem to be: I. This has been explained above. II. Something fairly simple is analyzed and reanalyzed until it looks, at any rate to the author, very complicated. As a matter of detail, it might be remarked that his style is not distinguished by unusual precision in the use of words or care in construction. Nevertheless, he is by no means dull. III. The rules for understanding a book seem almost self-evident; the need for their formulation at such length less so. IV. This can best be answered by those who need a textbook for use in teaching would-be teachers. There are acute remarks, especially in Chapter 5 on The Defeat of the Schools, and salutary reminders; but on the whole the book's interest for adult readers is confined to this class.

According to the book news this is not true. The wider appeal which Mr. Adler's textbook makes is doubtless due to Part III, where he considers "the great books," which is actually another subject. It is a pity that the interesting experiment at St. John's College, Annapolis, should come before the general reading public in this accidental tie-up. It deserves discussion on its own merits, and Mr. Adler, who has so little sense of proportion as to include Jacques Maritain in a list of great teachers in association with St. Augustine and William James, and Stuart Chase with Hobbes and Locke (or even with Ogden and Richards), is not a safe guide for the discussion. For Mr. Adler is a highbrow; that is, he underestimates the intelligence of other people as compared with his own.

JAMES ORRICK

In Early Issues of The Nation

Charles A. Beard's
"A Foreign Policy for America"
Reviewed by Reinhold Niebuhr

Alfred M. Bingham's
"The United States of Europe"
Reviewed by Stuart Chase

Jonathan Daniels's
"A Southerner Discovers New England"
Reviewed by Margaret Marshall

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Ca

IN BRIEF

THE WINDS OF SPRING. By Walter Havighurst. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Jan Sorenson, Swedish student of natural history, brings a young bride to Wisconsin in the 1840's, makes a home and wins the respect of his neighbors, but always prefers the study of the country's rapidly vanishing wild life to the winning of lands or money. The whirr of birds' wings in fresh, clean air gives zest to pages pleasantly unburdened with historical trappings.

OH, PROMISED LAND. By James Street. The Dial Press. $3.

This started out to be a biography of Big Sam Dale, the first Georgia "Cracker," but turned into a large-scale, thoroughly documented novel whose hero, Big Sam Dabney, fights and loves and carves out a fortune in Georgia and the Mississippi Territory between 1794 and 1817. Plenty of full-blooded action silhouetted against a background of the Creek War, the War of 1812, the slave trade, the Natchez Trace, the forging of a Southern esprit de corps as opposed to the state consciousness of Virginia and the Carolinas.

FANDANGO. By Robert Briffault. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

This is hardly more than a hastily written footnote to "Europa" and "Europa in Limbo," indicating that life in Spain and Austria during the last few years has been no picnic either. Quite sketchy in its account of the tribulations of Carlotta von Görlitz, and unconscionably melodramatic.

THIS LAND IS OURS. By Louis Zara. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

Here is another epic of wagon wheel, squirrel rifle, buckskin shirt, Indian fighting, and the westward urge, covering the eighty years from 1755 to 1835 and the country from Philadelphia to Chicago. This one is as ambitious as any, and better than most; 775 pages of epic, if that's what you like.

JONATHAN EDWARDS: 1703-1758. By Ola Elizabeth Winslow. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

Miss Winslow's biography is notable, among other things, for its detailed treatment of a sensational episode in Edwards's life—the story of the "bad book." It seems that some youngsters of Edwards's Northampton congregation had been reading, privately and with a good deal of relish, a book of instructions to midwives. Somehow Edwards got wind of the thing and demanded an investigation; but instead of assisting him, the parents of his congregation resented this pastoral interference in the private life of the community, and they expelled him. And Edwards went to Stockbridge to nurse his bitterness and preach to the Indians. Thus, as Miss Winslow shows, Edwards was addicted to lost causes in deed even as in word. For just as his theology was an attempt to check the tide of evangelism by refurbishing Calvin, so in his pulpit practice he tried to maintain the theocratic principle against the democratic one. Miss Winslow's study of this fascinating reactionary is well written and soundly documented. She has ransacked the Edwards manuscripts in the Yale Library; and besides adding to our knowledge of Edwards, she gives a good sketch of life in the old colonial parishes.

GUATEMALA, PAST AND PRESENT. By Chester Lloyd Jones. University of Minnesota Press. $5.

An encyclopedic survey, as the book jacket asserts, of "the political, economic, and social history and organization of the Central American country with the largest investment of American capital and the greatest economic development and foreign trade." Full notes, an extensive bibliography, and sixty-two photographs, maps, tables, and charts add to its value. The final chapter, If I Were Dictator, offers no solution to the problem of transition from dictatorship to popular control.

POSITIVE DEMOCRACY. By James Feibleman. University of North Carolina Press. $2.50.

Democracy, historically associated with the nominalism of the commercial middle class, is not logically bound up with it. Finding the philosophical basis of democracy in realistic epistemology, the author shows its affinity with the scientific stage of culture and deduces that it can transcend the class struggle—provided it substitutes the conception of property as function for the conception of property as substance; and for irrational individualistic liberalism, the identification of the individual's freest development with the furtherance of the social welfare of Peirce's unlimited community. A stimulating thesis is here very clearly set forth.

DRAMA

ALBERT BEIN, one of the younger "proletarian" playwrights, deserts realism in "Heavenly Express" (National Theater) and concerns himself with a hobo myth about a celestial train which carries dying tramps to their own special paradise. We never see the actual train, but we hear a good deal about it from a mysterious stranger who talks about "the eternal vagabond," and we also see the consternation caused among trainmen on the Sante Fé when reports of the unscheduled express come pouring in. The play got a mixed reception in the press, but there are several reasons why it seemed to me rather trivial despite the obvious earnestness of the author and the almost heroic efforts of a good cast to make it exciting. For one thing hobos are hard to idealize and their mythology seems neither very original nor very imaginative. For another it still remains true that on the stage the impossible is accepted much more easily than the improbable. I am not unwilling to believe that a heavenly express picks up hobos. But there are other things which seem just plain unlikely.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

Persia's 6,000 Years

PERSIA is a rediscovery of this generation. We already know something of its sumptuousness, but it will take a visit to the great show, "6,000 Years of Persian Art" (1 East Fifty-first Street, New York, throughout the summer), to acquaint us with this inexhaustible land. On the top floor, for example, one may visit the very cradle of civilization. Here, arranged on shelves, as if to demonstrate the varying layers of the excavations, stand pottery and utensils from Tepe Gawra, the world's oldest civilized site, dating from 4000 B. C. Again, on the first floor one whole room contains Luristan bronzes. Previously little known, these refer almost invariably to a pastoral stage in Persian development. They combine a refreshing strength with a curious friendliness toward all forms of animal life.

More sensational is the room devoted to the Achaemenid Empire and the Sasanian period. A huge black lion's paw comes from the wasted city of Persepolis; also parading warriors. Even earlier is a superb bearded king in bronze. He is accompanied by a meditative counselor, likewise in bronze. All are friendly. Even though showing traces of Assyrian and Egyptian influence, the barbarism of the one and the inhumanity of the other are absent. The Persian was always preeminently humane. His was a civilized art. Indeed, few animal sculptures have ever surpassed the so-called Laughing Horse which joyfully prances at one end of the room. Even in the later Sasanian period, particularly in the silver-relief plates, this sensitive relationship between man and beast prevails.

The Sasanian period ended with the Moslem conquest of 650 A. D. Then the Persian, always rising in defeat, assimilated the calligraphy of the conquerors and in time began to develop an art of the book. The room devoted to this development is one of the joys of the show. Early script is like bars of music. Then color ripens and the Shahnama, or Book of Kings, is produced. Finally Tamerlane is celebrated in illuminated manuscripts. Still later appears the master, Bihzad, picturing scenes of tumult, the military, or the court. His color has the richness of banners and the delicacy of bouquets. No less fastidious is the later Joseph Herding Goats.

By now the full emotion of the Persian registers itself in color. Moreover, the typical theme for poet or painter is the garden. It is his veritable Garden of Paradise. There he finds refuge from desert sun, or in imagination from the conqueror's heel. Indeed, it seems that the greater his oppression, the more sensitive and touching becomes his color, whether in manuscript paintings, in the famous sixteenth- and seventeenth-century rugs, or in the celebrated pottery.

But always the Persian returned to the garden. Even the mosque seems less typical—the prayer altar, by the way, is not to be missed. This was the pattern of his life, this the peculiar joy of his hours, and the solace of his need. A gentle source indeed. Nevertheless, the Persian impressed himself on all his conquerors from Alexander to the Arab and the destructive Genghis Khan. Is there not a meaning in this for our own time? This is not the least of the reasons for the triumph of the exhibition now presented by Dr. Arthur Upham Pope and his devoted colleagues of the Iranian Institute of America.

JEROME MELLQUIST

for the June graduate
. . . the perfect gift

Carl Sandburg's
ABRAHAM LINCOLN
The War Years

4 volumes, boxed, $20
With "The Prairie Years,"
6 volumes in all, boxed, $28

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

RECORDS

IT IS a mystery how a man who used his extraordinary command of the resources of his medium to produce those long-winded and absurd musical embodiments of infantile and muddled philosophic pretentiousness that one hears in the "Ring" tetralogy—to say nothing of such horrors as the Ride of the Valkyries—could have been the man who used it to produce things as miraculous as the Good Friday music of "Parsifal" or the Prelude to Act 3 of "Tristan und Isolde." Columbia's delayed February record of the "Tristan" music (69805-D, $1.50) is at hand, with a performance by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra under Weingartner that I would like even more than I do if it were a little slower and in this way gave the music more emotional weight. To the last notes of the English horn solo Weingartner tacks on a concert ending made up of the opening measures of the piece and a concluding minor chord; and the effect is one that I do not like.

Also at hand are a few delayed March records of Columbia's. First the little set of Haydn's delightful Sonata in D (X-158, $2.50), which Ernst Victor Wolff plays on the piano with suitable sharpness and lightness in the fast movements and suitable breadth in the slow movement. Then the set of charming music by Boccherini which Françaix orchestrated colorfully, but with taste and a light hand, for the ballet "Scuola di Ballo," and which is well recorded by the London Philharmonic under Dorati (X-157, $3.50). I doubt that anyone would object to Vaughan Williams's treatment of the fine songs in his Suite, "English Folk Songs" (X-159, $2.50); but I, for one, dislike the pretentious variations which Weinberger has loaded on the song "Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree" (X-161, $4.50), brilliantly played and recorded by the Cleveland Orchestra under Rodzinski. Gordon Jacob's orchestration of Vaughan Williams's suite might be considered a little over-rich (the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony's performance under Barlow is good, but a little coarse in recorded sound); but the music from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" in the new Victor set (M-647, $4.50) staggers under the flood of orchestral sonorities contrived for it by Cailliet, and the mountainous crescendos of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy.

The first of Schumann's Three Romances for oboe and piano, Opus 94 (Columbia: X-160, $3.50), superbly played by Leon Goossens, I find very beautiful; the others have, for me, the feebleness of Schumann's late works. And I don't care much more for the Fantasiestücke, Opus 73 (69836-D, $1.50), well recorded by Piatigorsky.

Victor has issued the first of the three sets in which all the chorale preludes of Bach's "Orgelbüchlein" are to be recorded by E. Power Biggs on the Baroque Organ of the Germanic Museum, Harvard University. This set (M-652, $6.50) gives us Nos. 17 to 32, of which several of the finest—"Mit Fried' und Freud' ich fahr' dahin"; "Christus, der uns selig macht"; "Da Jesus an dem Kreuze stand"; "O Mensch, bewein' dein' Sünde gross"; "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; "Erscheinen ist der herrlich' Tag"—are included in the Columbia set of chorale preludes recorded by Schweitzer. The sound of the organ is clearer and more brilliant on the Biggs records; but Schweitzer allows the chorale to stand out clearly from the surrounding figuration, and takes the work at a pace suitable to its emotional content; whereas all that Biggs seems able to do is to rattle off the notes—sometimes the figuration louder than the chorale, sometimes a jumble of sounds in which nothing is clearly distinguished from anything else. It is, then, to Schweitzer's performances that a person unfamiliar with the works must turn to learn not only what they mean but what they are.

Broadcasting note: Throughout Toscanini's Debussy program and the Mozart symphony a week later one heard, together with Debussy and Mozart, the faint and inescapable tweet-tweet of a jazz band on an adjacent wave-length.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Corey Reconsidered

Dear Sirs: In his attacks on Marxism in recent issues of The Nation Lewis Corey succeeded in setting up quite a few strawmen, which thereupon he bravely laid by the heel. Space limitations obviously make it impossible to deal adequately here with his misrepresentations of Marxian principles. Pending a fuller treatment of the subject elsewhere at a later time, I desire to offer these comments, which represent the view of the Marxian Socialist Labor Party of America:

1. By Marxism we must understand the principles logically deduced from the scientific discoveries of Karl Marx. However Marxism may be enlarged or applied, the enlargement must be a logical and harmonious extension of the fundamental principle, and the application of it may not run counter to that fundamental principle. To the extent that there are failure and deviation in these respects, we no longer deal in Marxian principles. This is elementary. Hence, if what Mr. Corey calls "degeneration" of Marxism cannot be blamed on Marx, it follows that it is not Marxism that has degenerated, but the would-be Marxists.

2. Mr. Corey's fantastic "new middle class" is an old favorite of his. Historically, by "middle class" we understand the bourgeoisie, or the capitalist class before attaining complete supremacy in society. The group loosely referred to in the more recent past as the "middle class" is simply the middle and lower layers of the capitalist class. Mr. Corey's "new middle class" is discovered to be the middle and higher layers of the working class. Being paid a wage constitutes the mark of identification of a member of the working class. Whatever appearances to the contrary may seem to indicate, this "new middle class" has no separate class existence—no interests that are fundamentally different from, or opposed to, the general interests of the working class. On this simple fact Mr. Corey's carefully constructed "people's socialism" suffers shipwreck.

3. Mr. Corey insists that the state must be made to serve the "people" as a whole, and inferentially repudiates the Marxist concept of the state as a class organ. If the state is not essentially an organ of class oppression, then what is it? The modern state rests on force as undeniably as did the state in the past. What are the army, the navy, the police, and the other agencies of "law enforcement" but so many expressions of the state's function as an instrument of coercion, of force—and for what purpose? To plant trees, to build dams, to preserve wild life, to regulate Sunday schools? Rubbish. The force is there to protect national and sectional class interests—propertied class interests.

Mr. Corey's contrasting of his "people's socialism" with what he calls "traditional socialism" (reform socialism, or the Social Democracy) is illogical. They are substantially identical. Mr. Corey's "people's socialism" is, indeed, the very essence of utopianism, and there is nothing original about it. (Vide Proudhon and Lassalle's "The People's State.") Mr. Corey says that we cannot go "back to Marx." From his premises he is right. He is going farther back than Marx—back to the old utopian socialism of Fourier and the utopian anarchism of Proudhon.

4. When Mr. Corey assumes that the Marxian concept of "the proletariat as the final ruling class" necessarily implies the continuation of a "ruling class" in the sense of one class suppressing a lower class, he is ignoring the fact that in becoming the "ruling class" the proletariat thereby abolishes itself as a "class." ("If the proletariat triumphs, it does not thereby become the absolute side of society, for it triumphs only by abolishing itself and its opposite. In this way both the proletariat and its conditioned opposite, private property, are done away with."—Marx.) Socialism is the classless society—it is that, or it is nothing. Where all rule, none rules. The industrial administration of socialism can no more become a bureaucratic ruling caste than the director of an orchestra can arbitrarily impose his will upon the orchestra he directs. Marxian socialism demands, and inevitably implies, the discarding of the political state. ("Where its organizing activity begins, where its proper aim, its soul, emerges, there socialism casts away the political hull."—Marx.) The technological executive committee of the Socialist Industrial Union Government plays the role in the orchestra of production that the director plays in the orchestra producing musical harmonies. Soviet Russia, incidentally, furnishes no proof of the failure of Marxism. It furnishes proof of treason against Marxism.

Back to Marx? Serious and understanding Marxists need not go back to him, for they have never left him. On the contrary, every important event demonstrates the genius, the scientific soundness of Marx and Marxism. It is the playboys, the dealers in "radical" literary groceries, and the charlatans generally who need to be "reconsidered," and to be relegated to the roles commensurate with their understanding of social and economic science.

They have too long been traveling on false passports.

ARNOLD PETERSEN,
National Secretary, Socialist Labor Party
New York, April 20

Memo to Justice McGeehan

Dear Sirs: In a recent case decided January 17, 1940, and appearing in a legal publication (18 New York Supplement, 2d Series, page 335), Justice John E. McGeehan said:

> . . . To proceed ex parte in this matter and in utter disregard of well-established principles of law would be the result of the "hydraulic pressure" referred to by the late Mr. Justice Holmes in writing his opinion in the case of Northern Securities vs. United States . . . in which he states that "great cases are called great, not by reason of their real importance in shaping the law of the future, but because of some accident of immediate overwhelming interest which appeals to the feelings and distorts the judgment. These immediate interests exercise a kind of hydraulic pressure which makes what previously was clear seem doubtful, and before which even well-settled principles of law will bend."
>
> This court must refrain from riding roughshod over American rules, precedents, and traditions, even where such practice under the prevailing circumstances might meet with popular approval, since the advantage would be illusory and ephemeral and lend weight to the suspicion that hysteria has been permitted to find refuge in an American courtroom. The court recalls and reiterates in part the forceful and pertinent language of the late Mr. Chief Justice Cardozo . . . to the effect that "a community whose judges would be willing to give it whatever law might gratify the impulse of the moment would find in the end that it had paid too high a price."

Within a few short weeks this same learned Justice was the author of the

Gandhi

and

LEWIS MUMFORD

praise

Jewish FRONTIER

●

"Are you sending copies of the JEWISH FRONTIER to Mahatma Gandhi? Gandhi himself asked me for them."

Letter from BOMBAY, INDIA

"I have often meant to congratulate you on the intellectual keenness and the moral probity of the Jewish Frontier; it is the one magazine of its kind that I can bear to read in these times: that I can open without the probability of being confronted with sophistry, confusion, timidity, defeatism, and moral indifference. But since reading your article on Psychoanalysis and Moral Pessimism, I should like in addition to single out that truly perspicuous essay, and to tell you how grateful I am for that understanding analysis. I only wish that a paper of the calibre of the Jewish Frontier, had a more general circulation—or that something of your spirit would by some miracle take possession of the liberal weeklies."

LEWIS MUMFORD
in a letter to Hayim Greenberg, Editor JEWISH FRONTIER

INTRODUCTORY OFFER — FOR $1.00 —

JEWISH FRONTIER
275 Seventh Ave., New York City

I enclose $1 for your trial offer of 8 months to NATION readers.

Name..

Address..

City........................ State........................

N 4-40

opinion in the Bertrand Russell case. What caused Justice McGeehan to ride roughshod over American rules, precedents, and traditions in depriving Professor Russell of his right to teach? Was he prompted by some hysteria engendered by forces behind the scenes? What was the source of the hydraulic pressure that caused this erudite jurist to abandon his previously dispassionate attitude?

The public is entitled to an answer to these questions. A. F. G.

New York, April 22

Frank Navarro's Story

Dear Sirs: Frank Navarro came to the United States legally in 1925. In 1929 he married an American citizen born in Puerto Rico. The couple have four children, all American-born citizens. In 1932 the Navarro family went to Spain in search of employment. After they arrived there the Franco revolt broke out and Navarro joined the government army. In 1937 the American consul in Spain had Navarro's wife and children transported back to the United States. Navarro could not return because he is not an American citizen.

Recently Navarro's wife tied to bring him back, but he was denied admission because she was on relief. A month ago Navarro secured a job as a member of the crew of the steamship Indaucho. In Port Richmond he left the ship and tried to get to New York to see his family. He was arrested in Philadelphia and was to have been sent back to Spain on March 31, but a petition for a writ of habeas corpus obtained by the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born prevented his return.

Navarro, released on his own recognizance, is now in New York with his family. The Department of Labor has granted him three weeks' time in which to arrange for his departure from this country so that he can reenter legally on the basis of his wife's citizenship. This is the only way in which Navarro's deportation can be prevented and he can remain in this country.

The expenses involved come to about $200. We appeal to the readers of The Nation to send a contribution immediately to the Navarro Defense Fund, Room 1505, 79 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Their immediate financial support will help save this American family. CAREY MC WILLIAMS,

Chairman, American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born

New York, April 24

Books for Southern Workers

Dear Sirs: The Southern Summer School for Workers needs more books for its library. The Southern workers who apply to the school for reading matter are eager for knowledge. Many of them live in small communities where library facilities are notoriously inadequate. We ask readers of The Nation to help keep the minds of these Southern workers alive and stimulated.

The chief need is for books in the field of the social sciences and for fiction, drama, and poetry with social import. Please send books to the winter office of the Southern Summer School for Workers, 437 West Fifty-ninth Street, New York City, or if you live in the city send a card asking that the books be called for. RITA S. HILBORN,

Chairman, Library Committee

New York, April 16

CONTRIBUTORS

GEORGE DAVIS is a member of the Institute of International Studies at Yale University. He has recently published "A Navy Second to None."

ROSE M. STEIN is a Pittsburgh journalist covering chiefly labor news.

KRISHNALAL SHRIDHARANI is the author of "War Without Violence." He was Gandhi's companion on the famous "march to the sea."

ROBERT DELL, Geneva correspondent of The Nation and the Manchester Guardian, is now lecturing in this country.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, a former editor of Poetry, is the author of "Literary Opinion in America."

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY, chief of the Slavonic Division of the New York Public Library, is the author of "The Jews and Other Minor Nationalities Under the Soviets."

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is a regular reviewer for The Nation and dramatic editor of Time.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is idexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MAY 11, 1940 NUMBER 19

The Shape of Things

ACCORDING TO OUR PRIVATE TICKER THE week's Presidential market closed with sharp gains for Hull and Willkie, with Dewey strong and holding his own, Taft and Vandenberg down a few points, Wheeler still in the running, Jackson and McNutt feeble, faint signs of life in Roberts, and Garner about to flicker off the curb. Still topping the list is Roosevelt Preferred. The Hull boom gets its strength from the increasingly wide belief that if the President rejects the nomination and attempts to throw his mantle over the shoulders of another, they will be the shoulders of his Secretary of State. Despite his age and political reticence, Hull is considered a good vote-catcher. A recent Gallup poll, in fact, credits him with more strength than Roosevelt in a hypothetical contest against Taft. The theory is that Roosevelt's blessing would give him as many Democratic votes as the President himself would draw, and that his cautious, mildly conservative nature would satisfy twice as many disgruntled Republicans. The Wendell Willkie talk has lost its virgin archness and become hopefully serious. Rank-and-file Republican sentiment for Dewey has jolted the G. O. P. bosses into the conviction that if the rambunctious gang-buster is to be stopped, the job had better be intrusted to someone more appealing than Taft or Vandenberg. Willkie is the beau ideal of the "enlightened" business community and is said to have made deep inroads from Wall to La Salle Street. In an almost Munich-like pact with the White House, Vice-President Garner has agreed to call off his "Stop Roosevelt" campaign. The Roosevelt lieutenants, in return, will permit him to enjoy the status of Texas's favorite son on the first ballot—provided Roosevelt is not being nominated by acclamation before "T" is reached on the roll call.

*

AN UNNECESSARY AMOUNT OF EXCITEMENT appears to have been created by the President's proposal to merge the Air Safety Board with the Civil Aeronautics Authority and to make the reconstituted agency a bureau of the Department of Commerce. Objections were first voiced by various bodies connected with civil aviation. Their arguments boiled down to a contention that the CAA had done a supremely good job—which is not disputed—and that it was advisable to let well enough alone. Congressional critics of the Administration then jumped in and sought to raise a political issue by linking the controversy with the air-mail scandals of 1934, which occurred while the Department of Commerce still controlled civil aviation. Faced by this attack the President has struck back, charging his opponents with misrepresentation. A memorandum drawn up by the Bureau of the Budget recommending the reorganization of the CAA shows plainly that Mr. Roosevelt is not being capricious. It points out that the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 provided for the CAA, the Air Safety Board, and an administrator. The first body was intended to exercise only quasi-legislative and judicial functions, including the prescription of safety rules; the second was charged solely with the investigation of accidents; and the administrator's office was to be purely executive. However, the act was not very clearly drafted and, in fact, assigned a number of executive duties to the CAA, which was further diverted from its proper province by the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939. In proposing the absorption of the Air Safety Board by the CAA, the memorandum argues that the authority charged with investigating accidents should also have power to promulgate rules to prevent them. So far as its regulatory functions are concerned, the CAA will remain independent of the Department of Commerce. On the other hand, it will receive representation in the Cabinet, and in view of the growing importance of civil aviation this seems entirely desirable.

*

THE FIASCO OF THE NORWEGIAN CAMPAIGN has brought upon the British government the sharpest attack it has encountered since the war. But Mr. Chamberlain has a catlike capacity for survival, and at the time of going to press—which is necessarily just before the House of Commons opens its debate on Norway—London dispatches suggest that he will remain in control a while longer. Over the week-end there have been many speeches from Labor and Liberal leaders calling for resignation of the government. Some newspapers which normally support Mr. Chamberlain have also been strongly critical. But there are few signs of revolt among the rank-and-file Tories, who, however much they grumble off the record, still seem unwilling to turn on their Birmingham shepherd. Rumors abound that Mr. Chamberlain may seek to appease dissatisfied public opinion by yet another reshuffle of the Cabinet. But as Al Smith once remarked, "However thin you slice it. . . ." There can be little hope of a genuine reconstruction without recognition of the small group of independent Tories who have hitherto been passed over because they refused to toe the party line. The London Times is urging the Labor Party to permit its leaders to join the government, but it is difficult to see how they could reconcile their attacks on Chamberlain with acceptance of office under his leadership.

---

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

A DISPATCH FROM MADRID TELLS US THAT Franco expects to get a credit of $86,000,000 from the United States, presumably from the Export-Import Bank. No details of the negotiations are cited, but the Franco press is loud in praise of Ambassador Weddell, who sailed last week for a "vacation" in this country. Last year, it will be recalled, Franco received a $13,500,000 cotton credit out of the money which had been appropriated for use in checking fascist influence in South America. It would be ironical indeed if the lion's share of this year's Export-Import Bank appropriation, which was designed to aid the protection of democracy in Scandinavia, should find its way to fascist Spain.

*

MEXICO SCORED AN IMPRESSIVE VICTORY in the long-drawn-out oil controversy last week when, on the eve of the publication of its reply to Secretary Hull's request for arbitration, it reached a settlement with the Sinclair interests. The agreement assures Mexico of an outlet for some $55,000,000 worth of oil over a five-year period, and thus breaks the concerted boycott through which the American oil companies have been seeking to force the Mexican government to its knees. It also gives point to the contention of Foreign Secretary Hay in his note to Secretary Hull that the issue is a domestic one capable of settlement by direct negotiation with the claimants. Secretary Hay's basic argument seems unassailable. While not denying the usefulness of arbitration as a means of settling disputes of this general character, he declares that it should not be resorted to until full use has been made of the normal domestic channels and "the existence of a denial of justice can be proved." In this case the oil companies themselves are chiefly responsible for the court's delay in appraising the value of the expropriated oil properties. The appraisal is now expected before the end of this month, and there is every reason to believe that a settlement can be reached by the end of the year, provided the remaining American companies honestly desire it.

*

A TURNING POINT IN JAPANESE-AMERICAN relations is confidently predicted in Tokyo as a result of a resumption of discussions between Foreign Minister Arita and Ambassador Grew. While the details of the preliminary conversations have not been revealed, it can be safely assumed that whatever concessions have been made have not been made by Japan. With the establishment of the Wang Ching-wei puppet regime at Nanking a month ago, Japan rejected in theory as well as in fact the basic treaty rights held by Americans in China. There is not the slightest indication that it is prepared to retreat from this position. Nor has there been any let-down in the struggle against China. Major Japanese offensive operations are reported in at least three sectors. More than a thousand Chinese civilians were killed or injured in air raids on Chungking and Kweiyang on successive days last week—the most serious raids of recent months. A year or two ago the United States was accustomed to enter vigorous protests against such raids. Today we hear no protests, and nothing is being done in Congress about the various embargo resolutions which have been up for consideration since the expiration of the trade treaty. This does not mean that the Administration has given way entirely to Japan, but it suggests that the clique in the State Department favoring appeasement has gained the upper hand. An additional factor is that some of the organizations formerly most active in urging economic sanctions against Japan are now wholly preoccupied with "keep out of war" propaganda. Doubtless this is intended to apply only to the European situation, but its net effect is to damp down sentiment for positive action in the East as well as in the West.

*

THERE IS NO SUCH THING AS A "RIGHT" to obtain a government contract, and common sense will approve Justice Black's decision for the Supreme Court upholding the Walsh-Healey Act. This act permits the Secretary of Labor to fix minimum wages for companies which fill government contracts. The wage rates apply only to government work. No company is compelled to bid for these contracts. The act, Justice Black said, "was not intended to be a bestowal of litigable rights upon those desirous of selling to the government; it is a self-imposed restraint. . . ." The government confines its dealings to those companies which pay decent wages. It feels that government money should not go to those who are depressing wages. The policy is for Congress, not the courts, to decide. Private businesses buy where they please. The government may now do likewise.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

IS IT LACK OF COURAGE OR OF SINCERITY that prevents Democratic leadership in the Senate from bringing up the anti-lynching bill for a vote? No bill is more certain of passage if voted upon; none is in greater danger of being buried. The Gavagan anti-lynching bill passed the House on January 10 by a vote of 252 to 131. Its companion measure, the Wagner-Capper-Van Nuys bill, was favorably reported to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee on March 25. The vote was 12 to 4. Seventy-two Senators have pledged themselves to vote for the bill if it comes up. Only forty-nine need keep their word to insure passage. Majority Leader Barkley is still hesitating in the face of a threat of filibuster. Is Democratic leadership afraid of antagonizing the Bilbos and the Connallys, even though majority opinion in the South as well as the North is in favor of the bill?

*

THE FAILURE OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE as now constituted to provide protection against need is graphically set forth in figures just compiled by the American Association for Social Security. During 1939 the average amount paid to unemployed workers in benefits under the Social Security Act was only $84.24, whereas an average of $633 was paid to WPA workers and of $297 to recipients of home relief. Unemployment benefits were so small that they had practically no effect in reducing the burden of relief. Although an increased number of states provided unemployment benefits last year, expenditures for general relief were actually higher than in 1938. Unemployment payments were, with a few exceptions, both too small in size and too restricted in duration to be of much aid to the real victims of unemployment. The average weekly insurance check for the country as a whole was $10.85, but this average is inflated by the inclusion of $15 and $18 payments to the few well-paid skilled workers in comparatively stable trades, who qualify for maximum benefits. Forty-four per cent of the payments for part-time unemployment were for less than $5. The meager aid given to jobless workers under the various state unemployment-compensation laws is particularly indefensible in the light of the fact that only 54 cents of every dollar collected in payroll taxes were paid out in benefits. This situation has serious economic as well as humanitarian implications, since it means that close to a half-billion dollars is being subtracted from purchasing power, over and above the amount distributed to aid the jobless.

*

IT IS WORTH RECORDING WHEN ONE HAS A good time at one's own party. The dinner last week in New York, at which The Nation gave its first annual award to Eleanor Roosevelt, seemed even to its sponsors a delightful and stirring celebration. The award was offered for "distinguished service in the cause of American social progress," and Mrs. Roosevelt was chosen by vote from a most appealing group of candidates. Public dinners can be dull; anniversary parties are likely to be lugubrious. This particular anniversary dinner was neither. Guests and speakers alike seemed to enjoy it, and we only regret that all The Nation's readers were not able to be present. We have been urged to publish the speeches, and we wish we could do so. Unhappily several of them were extemporaneous and cannot be reconstructed. Excerpts from several, however, will appear next week; so readers who missed the dinner will have a chance to share at least part of its excellent fare.

Too Little, Too Late

WHATEVER else may be said about the disastrous British defeat in Norway, it has greatly clarified the military situation and opened the way for the rapid development of the main German campaign by air and sea against the British Empire. The Germans have achieved their major aims in capturing the entire South of Norway, even if the Allies retain their hold upon Narvik. That, as Mr. Sternberg shows on page 590 of this issue, would involve a loss in iron ore which can only be partially compensated by shipments from Sweden's Baltic ports. But though this will prove a serious handicap if the war is prolonged, it may seem a small price for possession of the Norwegian airplane bases, only 330 miles from Britain, and of innumerable fjords in which submarines can hide between their raids on British shipping.

From the beginning, as Mr. Villard reported from Berlin last fall, the Germans have envisaged the conquest of England by midsummer by means of airplanes and submarines. Submarine warfare has not as yet developed as successfully as they had expected. But their confidence in their superiority in the air and in their grasp of the new technique of war has never waned. With the distance their planes have to cover cut in half, and their newly won ability to fly down both coasts of Britain, they are doubtless convinced today that, despite the difficulty they will have in transporting adequate supplies of high-grade gasoline to Norway for the use of their bombers, they will soon be in readiness to launch the great air attacks upon England which they believe will prove the final phase of the war. July 15 has been the date that German military men have mentioned as marking the completion of this enterprise.

More than that, their often-expressed belief that the day of naval power is over is bound to be tremendously reinforced by the result of the Norway adventure. One does not need to accept their statements of great losses inflicted on the British fleet to know that the Royal Navy has failed in the task that the German advance into Norway set it. Whether that failure was due to Britain's unwillingness to risk its capital ships, or whether divided counsels resulted in slowness in getting into action, the inescapable fact is that the navy has not made good Churchill's promise of four weeks ago that "all German ships in the Skagerrak and Kattegat will be sunk," and that "we are not going to allow the enemy to supply their armies across these waters with impunity." Undoubtedly the navy has inflicted great losses upon the German navy and sunk many German transports with horrifying loss of life. None the less, the German land forces in Norway have been supplied in one way or another sufficiently to carry on a successful campaign. That it was not all through the air is apparent from the fact that tanks and motor vehicles of various kinds were used in the Norwegian operations.

The Germans may also take satisfaction in the fact that Secretary Edison in Washington has now officially admitted that "for the moment" the airplane is ahead in its war with the battleship, and that therefore the entire vast battleship-building program of the American navy will have to be stopped and the plans for ships redrawn to provide better deck protection against airplane attacks. This is an amazing confession by our naval authorities, who have persistently, from the days of General Mitchell and Admiral Sims, refused to believe that the days of the battleship might be numbered.

The Germans, on the other hand, led by Göring himself, have believed for years that domination of the air is the new road to military success, an opinion in which they were fortified by their actual war experiences in aiding Franco to achieve victory in Spain. Their next move, there is some reason to believe, will be to use the Norwegian bases for extended raids on British coasts. It is the west coast which attracts them most, because they are determined to cut England off from the Atlantic trade routes. They can concentrate upon these now because English trade with Scandinavia is finished. Moreover, their objectives are also the great shipbuilding plants and merchant harbors. When they begin bombing England it will be with the particular aim of destroying the private and naval shipyards in which repairs are now being made upon damaged warships and in which the five great new battleships upon which Churchill has counted so much are being completed.

It by no means follows that this ambitious program can be carried out or that the British, fighting in their own territory in a campaign which has been clearly foreseen from the beginning, may not be able to repel the German assaults, to say nothing of counter-attacks by British and French aviators upon Germany. But to be safe and win, the British must display better brain work, greater speed, and far greater efficiency than they have demonstrated in the Norwegian episode. From the beginning they have underestimated the skill and power of their opponents, their strength in the air and their ruthlessness. The British, moreover, have failed to realize the truth of what the Germans have been saying—that the tactics and strategy of this war bear little or no relation to those of the last. It is a dangerous sign, too, that they have lately been boasting in the most un-British way of what they were going to achieve. Less than two weeks ago a semi-official British statement given to the American press men in London said that the Germans had better begin to "run for home from all their posts in Norway" because they were going to be destroyed.

Every move of the Chamberlain administration in relation to Nazi aggression has been characterized by procrastination, lack of imagination, and a preference for half-measures. Too little, and too late, will be the verdict of history on this government, and unless a stronger and abler substitute is found quickly, these words may form the epitaph of the British Empire as well.

Sequel to a Melodrama

THE Schweinhaut report to Attorney General Jackson on the FBI raids in Detroit seems an odd document. Its tone absolves and approves. Its findings—and its omissions—condemn. It shows that the FBI agents did, indeed, make these raids under terrifying circumstances, in two cases breaking down doors at 5 a. m. to effect entry. It admits that the agents acted without search warrants. It admits that in all but one case those arrested were denied the right to notify counsel. It indicates that they were held incomunicado. Though the Schweinhaut report does not say so, it is clear that basic constitutional rights were violated. Attorney General Jackson forwards the report to Senator Norris, whose protest led to the investigation. He clears the agents who took part. He says that they acted "within their instructions." Does the Attorney General approve of those instructions? We have too high an opinion of the Attorney General to believe that he does.

"The bureau's . . . work for law enforcement," the Jackson letter to Senator Norris says, "is conducted with the fundamental purpose of observing the rights of defendants." This was hardly so in Detroit. When some of the defendants objected to the lack of search warrants, agents informed them that none were needed. "It is apparent," Schweinhaut reports, with characteristic understatement, "that some of the material taken would not come within the catalogue of seizable material as outlined by the Supreme Court."

When the charges made in Detroit are compared with the findings reported to Washington, gaps appear, and the gaps are also significant. It was charged that the agents failed to tell the defendants why they were being arrested. Schweinhaut reports that the FBI agents were instructed not to discuss the facts of the case. It was charged that the FBI did not permit the accused to notify counsel. The report says the agents were instructed not to permit the defendants to make any telephone calls when arrested. In one case, the report declares, a defendant was permitted to call his lawyer. The defendants charged that they were held incomunicado. The report discloses that only two of the prisoners were allowed to make telephone calls from the FBI office from the time of their arrest at 5 a. m. until their arraignment at 3 p. m. None of them were permitted to telephone counsel. An attorney for several of the defendants called on the United States attorney in the morning but was refused permission to see them. He made the same request at the FBI office, and after a heated exchange, permission was again refused. The lawyer, according to the Schweinhaut report, was only permitted to see the defendants for about fifteen minutes, and then only in the presence of FBI agents. Yet the right to consult counsel privately has been recognized as fundamental by the Supreme Court. The report blames the chaining of the prisoners on the federal marshal who took them into custody after they were arraigned. Detroit newspapers published pictures showing the prisoners in chains before arraignment while they were in the custody of the FBI.

We hope that neither the Attorney General nor Senator Norris will be satisfied with this report. Enough has been uncovered to show that the rights of the accused were violated by the methods and manner of the raids. Whoever was responsible for the instructions in the case should not escape condemnation. The Detroit report indicates the need for the broader inquiry Senator Norris demanded and for an explanation of what reforms are expected from the newly established Neutrality Unit. In sedition and neutrality-law cases it will apparently provide some check on the activities of J. Edgar Hoover. But will it stop there?

Will the new unit have any authority to end the compilation of a Dilling-style card index of persons whose economic and political views Hoover considers dangerous? This is the kind of work done by all efficient, totalitarian secret-police departments. Will the new unit serve as a check on the recently reestablished General Intelligence Division, source of the worst abuses during the post-war hysteria of the early twenties? Will the new unit provide a check on the FBI's "plant-protection" activities? Will it give assurance that these activities are protection against espionage, not against trade unionism? Will it end the practices revealed by the Christian Front trial and the raids on Loyalist sympathizers in Detroit and New York? Can it guarantee that the FBI will not continue to tap wires, in plain violation of the Communications Act of 1934?

What the new unit will accomplish will depend largely on its personnel and the determination of the Administration. The task is a difficult one. The FBI and its director have survived one Administration after another. They are well intrenched both in Washington and in their fifty branches throughout the country. Mr. Jackson is to be commended for this new curb on G-man Hoover, but we still believe that the best way to end illegal and extralegal activities by the FBI is first to find out exactly what it has been doing. Only a Congressional investigation can do the job.

Mussolini's Timing

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

ITALY can gain from going into the war only if Germany wins and wins quickly. Even then it will gain much or little depending on its own power and strategic position when victory comes. Hitler is not going to give Mussolini as free gifts pieces of territory that he can use himself. Italy will get what it can take and no more, and will keep only what it holds when the loot is divided. So Mussolini has been stepping precariously along a narrow fence. Today he acts as if he were about to jump off and join his Teutonic comrades in the great crusade against pluto-democratic tyranny. The British defeat in Norway has encouraged his belief that Germany is bound to win, and he seems inclined to assume that victory will come soon. At least his press and his spokesmen shout that belief on order. Their shouts may be only sound effect, but they may be a part of the process of preparing an unwilling people to take part in an unpopular war alongside a detested ally.

At any rate, the world is taking Fascist truculence at its own value. It would be dangerous to do otherwise. The President of the United States last week initiated a series of moves designed to buy off Italy from its apparent war-like purposes. Mr. Roosevelt consulted with the Italian Ambassador at Washington, and the American Ambassador at Rome conferred with both Mussolini and Ciano and then went to see Myron Taylor at the Vatican. Naturally no report of the talks was published, but it was hinted that the United States held out the promise of more trade and a new trade treaty if Italy would keep the peace. Mussolini is supposed to have inquired whether the United States "understood Italy's position." Ciano indicated that Italy would not go into the war immediately; some reports said not for "ten days."

The fact is, the United States, with all its power to grant or withhold economic favors, cannot offer enough to keep Italy out of the war if Hitler seems to be winning; Mussolini must be in at the kill. On the other hand he will require no bribes to stay out—however readily he may accept them—if he feels the Allies are winning or if a long war seems in prospect. For, as everyone knows, Italy cannot last out a long war without access to great quantities of oil and iron. Its stored supply of oil is supposed to be barely sufficient for a six months' struggle. And where is more to come from? Certainly not from Russia or Rumania, which cannot supply Germany with more than a fraction of its needs. Certainly not from the Americas or the Near East as long as the British fleet is intact.

It is improbable that the United States will press its case too far. For this country also has a difficult problem to face in its dealings with Italy. American interests naturally support a limitation of the area of warfare; the United States would lose its considerable Mediterranean market the day Italy declared war. On the other hand it would be short-sighted to grab at commercial advantages which might be turned into aid for Hitler; a great increase in trade with Italy would certainly augment the flood that flows through the Brenner to supply the German army. The most the President can safely offer Mussolini for continued neutrality is probably too little to affect his course decisively.

What Mussolini wants is to choose his own time to act. His press is loud with innocent astonishment at Britain's warlike moves in the Mediterranean: moving the fleet to Alexandria is a provocation; the Near Eastern army of Britain and France is a direct threat. And in a sense the Fascists are right, however insincere their surprise, for the Allies seem to have accepted at its face value Il Duce's promise of ultimate action on Hitler's side and to have made a series of anticipatory moves. Whether these moves are again "too late and too little" only time will show. But they are the only signs on the widening horizon of war that the Allied governments have anticipated any single act of any potential enemy. That they will go farther and act first themselves seems unlikely; but it is something to know—from Italian as well as Allied sources—that they are not likely to be caught off guard in the east as they have been in Norway.

In the Balkans and all around the shores of the Mediterranean the tension is acute, and every country is going through the motions of readying itself for war. Whether they would all fight in case of a German or Italian invasion is questionable. The failure of Britain and France to get sufficient help to Norway in time to save it from conquest—added to their original failure in Poland—is being studied in all the East European states. (A special dispatch to the New York Times from Bucharest reports that at a reception for officials, diplomats, prominent citizens, and the press at the German legation, a film showing the Nazi occupation of Copenhagen and Oslo was shown. The report concludes, "Its showing did not leave the audience unmoved." Those present must have been even more deeply stirred if they happened to recall that the famous Nazi film picturing the destruction of Poland was shown at a similar gathering in Oslo shortly before the invasion of Norway.) Fear of Germany is Hitler's best ally and may save him the trouble of fighting. Germany is draining the Southeastern states now with some success, and war might lessen rather than increase its share of their resources. But if the Germans do move south and east, Italy will move too. Italy cannot allow its ally to take control of Yugoslavia—particularly the Dalmatian coast. In this region Italy's relation to Germany is similar to Russia's in Poland; Mussolini must act, if only to get there before Hitler does.

Little is said these days about Spain. But if war moves through the Mediterranean, the importance of Spain will suddenly revive. France and Britain will realize at last that when they sold out the Loyalist government to its fascist enemies they lost an ally. Spain could have been a strong friend; it may soon become a weak but dangerous enemy. If Italy goes in, Franco will probably try to remain non-belligerent, serving his Italian boss in the same way Mussolini has served Hitler. Spain is politically and economically a dead country. Strategically it is as important as ever.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 581

EDITORIALS:

TOO LITTLE, TOO LATE 583
SEQUEL TO A MELODRAMA 584
MUSSOLINI'S TIMING by Freda Kirchwey 585
MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT. VI. TRY TO FIND VANDENBERG by Milton S. Mayer 587
WHY NARVIK IS VITAL by Fritz Sternberg 590
LET'S JOIN THE UNITED STATES by Maury Maverick 592
LOOKING TOWARD THE PEACE by Maxwell S. Stewart 594
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 597
IN THE WIND 598
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 599

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

WALDO FRANK, PILOT by Reinhold Niebuhr 600
WHERE MARX WAS RIGHT by Lewis Corey 601
THE HAMLET OF L. MACNEICE by John Peale Bishop 602
REVOLT OF HARU MATSUI by Elizabeth McCausland 604
IN BRIEF 605
DRAMA: THE RIDDLE OF THE SPHINX by Joseph Wood Krutch 605
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 606

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

◆

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Men Who Would Be President

VI. TRY TO FIND VANDENBERG

BY MILTON S. MAYER

SENATOR VANDENBERG is something like an onion. You peel off layer after layer, looking for the core. And when you've peeled him all away—by golly, there isn't any core.

Don't misunderstand me. Vandenberg is liberal (for a Republican), enlightened (for a politician), and industrious (for a Senator). But you can't find out what makes him go. Dewey and Taft have cores; you may not like them, but they're there. Vandenberg doesn't add up to anything. He cancels out.

It wouldn't matter much in ordinary times. Harding was coreless, and a little brown at the edges besides, and the country survived. Alexander Hamilton thought there would be "a constant probability of seeing the station filled by characters preeminent for ability and virtue," but this preeminence turned out to be unnecessary. Almost every President looks too small for the job beforehand, and almost all of them, inducted into a great tradition, somehow rise to the office. Few Presidents, as candidates, looked as good as Vandenberg. Most of them looked a lot worse.

But these are not ordinary times. As Senator Vandenberg, the distinguished phrase-maker, has said so often, America is at the crossroads. The world is fighting for its life. The United States, in or out of the war, is going to have to act, and act heroically. Domestically, it might as well be Arthur Vandenberg as anyone else. But foreign policy, the field in which the Executive has disproportionate power in the structure of our government, is going to demand a strong Executive. Maybe Roosevelt, with his impulse to walk upon the waters, is wrong; but Vandenberg isn't anywhere.

Just try to find him. Our great isolationist used to be a fire-eater. Away back in peaceful 1912, as editor of the Grand Rapids Herald he was warning everybody that "the time will never come, so long as the Republic lives, when the honor of the nation will not call for whole-hearted defense at the hands of every one of the nation's sons." By the time of Wilson's second inauguration Editor Vandenberg was all the way in: "One right yielded up only invites the loss of a second—then a third. The endless chain! Soon infringements pyramid, and assailants, encouraged by ease of unchallenged conquest, commence to plot against the life of the nation itself. Somewhere the stand must be made."

Suddenly, after the war, the editor remembered his Midwestern Republicanism and fell under the spell of Borah. He discovered that the war was not fought for "the life of the nation" but for Wall Street. He sponsored the munitions investigation with Nye and went so far out on the limb that he couldn't get back even when Detroit, the motor interests, and the Booth papers in Michigan, all favored the lifting of the arms embargo last fall. The fighting editor had become the isolationist Senator.

Last winter, when the renewal of the Japanese trade treaty of 1911 came up, Vandenberg, still talking isolation, turned interventionist. His successful resolution to abrogate the treaty was, according to Walter Lippmann, "the longest step on the road to war that the United States has taken since President Wilson announced in 1915 that the United States would hold the German government strictly accountable for its acts." Then Russia invaded Finland, and Vandenberg, following the interesting behavior of that other distinguished ex-isolationist, Herbert Hoover, demanded withdrawal of our recognition of the Soviet Union. (Of course he was strictly isolationist, as was Hoover, when Germany invaded Austria, Czechoslovakia, Spain, Danzig, and Poland.)

What, then, does Vandenberg's foreign policy add up to? Either opportunism—if he had won the arms-embargo fight he'd have clinched the Republican nomination—or nothing.

He is and always has been a strict eighteenth-century protectionist. Even Landon and Knox have caught up with Adam Smith, but Vandenberg stands pat. Or does he? "I could make a hell of a good speech on either side of the reciprocal-trade treaties," he told me in the midst of his glorious struggle against them, "but you can't say anything for them to a farmer west of the Mississippi." It sounds like opportunism, and the man who fights free trade and at the same time squawks about the mounting pile of gold at Fort Knox is certainly either opportunistic or stupid.

Yet it is on international affairs that Vandenberg is at his most consistent. On domestic problems you can't locate him at all. He has stood squarely on both sides of every issue of the past ten years. He has been against subsidies to the farmer and for the payment of equalization fees; for the RFC and against pump-priming; for economy and against reorganization; for devaluation and against "repudiation"; for housing and against the spend-lend theory (and for and against housing); for the SEC and against marginal-trading and holding-company regulation; for tariff and loan benefits to the suffering rich and against relief benefits to the suffering poor (and for and against relief); for and against federal control of relief; for budget-balancing and at the same time for a general pension; for and against income-tax publicity; for higher surtaxes and against taxation of tax-exempt securities.

If you're groggy, think of Vandenberg. It must be terrible to get to your feet to speak against a measure and then find yourself speaking for it. But there is method in at least some of his ambivalence. Take this spinner: "I heartily believe that human rights far outweigh property rights in their value and their challenge, tempered always with the reservation that property rights are among the greatest of human rights and that you can't have the latter without the former." The average civil libertarian who has left his syntax separator at home never discovers that Vandenberg is saying that property rights outweigh human rights.

The man is canny. He gets himself the reputation of a great compromiser, a reasonable sort of fellow, and the compromise always winds up with his side taking the pot. "My ideas of 1940," he tells me, "are as different from my ideas of 1928 as black from white. In those days we were all under the inertia of the twelve fat years. The Democrats were the same as the Republicans. What the hell was the difference between John W. Davis and Calvin Coolidge?" What worries me is: what the hell is the difference between John W. Davis, Calvin Coolidge, and Arthur H. Vandenberg? His ideas change not only once every twelve years; they change once every twenty-four hours. If I knew it was unadulterated opportunism, I wouldn't be worried. I'd say that here is a tory playing the smartest politics in the country. The "we-agree-with-your-objectives-but-not-with-your-methods" gag is still the only way to beat the New Deal, and Vandenberg is the only Republican candidate who knows it.

From 1934 to 1938 the Senator from Michigan was the Republican Party. The only Republican from a populous state to survive the second Roosevelt landslide in 1934, he rose to the top of the party by the simple expedient of being the only man in it. And he alone among the Republicans—though he had the Old Deal Democrats with him—had the political wisdom to recognize that the best way for a little fellow to lick a big fellow is to climb on his shoulders. So Vandenberg went along with measure after measure, went along far enough to disarm the country. Then—he turned and struck. He is the "fifth column" of American politics.

It was beautiful to behold. Here was no partisan, no diehard; here was a genuine statesman who, devoted though he was to the noble objectives of the New Deal, felt himself compelled, regretfully, almost tearfully, to knife nine out of every ten New Deal measures. He had the Republican press all to himself—although papers like the Chicago Tribune watched him warily until they got his pitching—and he knew how to news-angle his publicity releases and to jolly the boys in the press gallery—"I'm just a newspaperman myself."

But his liberalism, like his personality and his learning, is synthetic. He sprinkles his "Ave Roosevelts" with frolicsome references to "bankruptcy" and "socialism." And sooner or later he gets around to discovering that the really meritorious moves of the New Deal are of Republican origin. When he couldn't attribute the 1936 boom to the Republicans, he ascribed it to "the inevitable cycle of resurgent trade."

The man can't be damned out of hand. He has done great permanent good in the Senate as a serious, hard-working legislator. He proposed bank-deposit insurance—over Roosevelt's objection, he says. He did an excellent subcommittee job on profit-sharing. He pushed automatic reapportionment through an unwilling Congress. He produced a compromise child-labor amendment which retains the spirit of the original and has a chance of ratification. He voted for the Norris-LaGuardia Act but against the Wagner Act, which, typically, he now calls "labor's bill of rights," and which, he now says, is, and should be, here to stay. Of course he wants to amend it to death because "society sees just as much need for protection against union dictators as against employer dictators." Back in 1915 Vandenberg, as an editor, campaigned for an almost Wagnerian "right of industrial petition." The right he asked for then was exclusively for labor. But that was 1915.

I'm afraid that if Vandenberg could be found anywhere, it would be somewhere between gray and black reaction. He obviously believes devoutly in the trickle theory of prosperity: pour it in at the top. He wants to save, or restore, or introduce something which—the old phrase-maker—he calls "the American way." Though Vandenberg the scholar sang the praises of Alexander Hamilton's fight for liberal construction, Vandenberg the statesman says the court has been packed. Though he has no open truck with Michigan politics, the evidence is abundant that he has no quarrel with the quiet, efficient, and rotten McKay machine in Grand Rapids. And—if you're still doubtful—the Chicago Tribune calls him "the most useful member of the United States Senate."

The reason Vandenberg seems to be a cut or two above the average statesman is that he tries so hard to be. He works slavishly as a Senator, attends Senate sessions and committee meetings conscientiously, and comes up with solid, specific proposals based on extended research. He is the most studious man in Congress, reads widely (the occupational disease of all editorial writers), and has written three little-known books on Hamilton.

He tries so awfully hard, and he just can't make it. He lacks both mental discipline and the insight indispensable to a theoretical basis for a political philosophy. Take his stand—subject, of course, to change without notice—on America's place in the world. He simply pretends that the rest of the world isn't there. As a boy he went wild over the American variation of European constitutional government, and never having heard of Aristotle, Locke, Montesquieu, Voltaire, or Rousseau, decided it was something uniquely American which had to be preserved from the contamination of Europe.

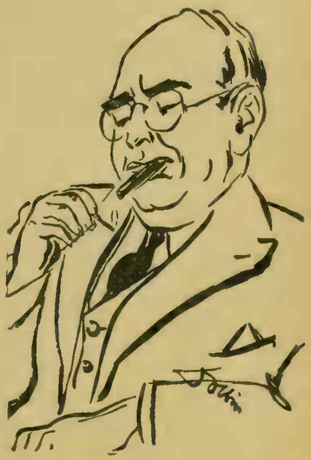
He is just as infantile on domestic policy. "Eight years of the New Deal," he tells us, "have launched certain social concepts which, in their objectives, cannot and should not be reversed." Then he discovers that the New Deal is "the most prodigal omnibus that ever rolled down the highway of American experience." And he winds up on the "we'll-do-it-better" note, because "Republicans notoriously are more practical and more efficient administrators." He just doesn't see that in a society based on piracy the men with social concepts are always the prodigals and the practical men never have social concepts.

Arthur Hendrick Vandenberg was born that way—fifty-six years ago in Grand Rapids. His father, a prosperous harness-maker, was ruined by the "Democratic" depression of 1893, and Arthur grew up to understand that the nation was saved from a fate worse than death by William McKinley and Mark Hanna. The Vandenbergs are a race of men who, though they may not have had a nickel, were brought up to revere finance capitalism and reached for their shotguns whenever James J. Hill shouted, "Inflation!"

Little Arthur had to leave the University of Michigan after he had been there a year because his health cracked under the double load of study and work. He got a job on the Grand Rapids Herald. The paper was bought by William Alden Smith, buccaneer and spellbinder, whose statesmanship reached its peak when, as chairman of the Senate committee investigating the Titanic disaster, he asked why the passengers didn't get into the watertight compartments. Arthur's finger-pointing, desk-thumping, pointing-with-pride, and viewing-with-alarm are all inherited from his distinguished mentor.

Smith made Arthur editor of the paper at twenty-two or twenty-three, and there he remained for twenty-five years. The state reeked with deals, particularly in utilities, and unless Arthur was a pretty poor newspaperman, and he wasn't, he knew what was going on. He became an influential Republican and a powerful campaign speaker, though he never bothered to truck with the boys in the back room. Grand Rapids and Michigan didn't interest him; the Herald was as pompous in its nationalism and internationalism as the New York Times. Michigan, for the editor, was just a springboard to Washington. When Senator Vandenberg, single-handed, kills Passamaquoddy, the Florida ship canal, and the Social Security "full reserve," the people of Michigan feel that at last they have produced a great national leader. His determination to be President is as longstanding as it is unoriginal.

Appointed to the Senate in 1928, he was returned in the election of 1934. He is and always has been dull, oratorical, and partisan, and he always conveys the impression of being interesting, profound, and patriotic. Though the smarties in Washington write him off as a bass drum, he is quick on the draw, affable, wholesomely cynical in private about his own publicity, and as attractive among men as Tom Dewey is not. Roosevelt told an audience in 1936 that if Vandenberg had been nominated that year by the Republicans, the two of them could have stumped the country together; and Roosevelt's friendship with him is matched by that of most of the men he works with, or against, in Washington. Nevertheless, he remains an uninteresting personality. In Michigan it is his prestige alone that elects him. I find people who admire him, people who trust him, people who would vote for him, but never any who feel enthusiasm for him. What he is, is an American business man, not a small one, not a big one. He booms when he talks, and he likes to sound off among fellow-business men who are impressed by his stock, not of wisdom, but of information.



Senator Vandenberg

He is beyond any doubt the best of the front runners, His fellow-Senators and the Washington press corps in informal polls agree with Farley: Vandenberg is the man to beat. Victories in Nebraska and Wisconsin would have given him the Middle West and Northwest; in view of Dewey's build-up and activity Vandenberg showed amazingly well in both primaries. He has always played the waiting game. He is waiting now, and when Dewey and Taft have burned themselves out, Vandenberg will come loping down the stretch. He profits immensely from the immaturity of Taft and Dewey. Just as Hull would pull elderly Republican votes from Dewey, so Vandenberg would pull elderly Democratic votes from, say, Jackson.

The wire-pullers in the state committees and the up-and-comers like Governor Stassen of Minnesota—and they are the boys who ought to be listened to—regard Vandenberg as far and away the strongest man for the long pull. Eastern money, which is usually listened to in Republican conventions, regards Taft as safe but unable to win, Dewey as a risk because he can be led, and Vandenberg as positively dangerous because he will lead himself no one knows where. There are Bourbons in Detroit and Grand Rapids, as well as in the East, who would take a conservative Democrat in preference to Vandenberg. They don't make the mistake of thinking he is liberal, but they don't like his straddling. They wanted him to go out and die for Old Guardism in 1934, but Vandenberg, who wanted to be reelected, talked New Dealism and squeezed through by 43,000 Detroit votes. He wants to be President, but not as badly as he wants to hold on at least to what he's got.

He is an opportunist, of course, and that is all right with the Joe Pews, but he has no positive principles to assure them that sometime, somewhere, he will take a last-ditch stand on something. He is no Hamiltonian. "Nothing appears more plausible at first sight," wrote Vandenberg's hero in the Federalist, "or more ill-founded upon close inspection, than a scheme of continuing the chief magistrate in office for a certain time, and then excluding him from it, either for a limited period or forever after." The patriot who now howls that a third term would be "contrary to every tradition America holds dear" said in 1910 that "if he [Theodore Roosevelt] be President again, it will be no confession of our constitutional weakness. It will be but a tribute to Roosevelt, the man, the individual, the idol. It will be no confession of the failure of our governmental methods, but . . . new evidence of the affection of a people for one who has served them honestly and well."

The Bourbons mistrust Vandenberg rightly. He will never adhere to the party for its principles, or desert it for his own. The Old Guard dies but never surrenders. Vandenberg surrenders but never dies.

Why Narvik Is Vital

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

THE smashing drive of the German expeditionary force in Norway and the precipitate retreat of the Allies to the northern tip of the country tend to overshadow one of the most important developments of the war—the grave threat to Germany's supply of iron ore. Whatever the fate of central and southern Norway, that threat exists as long as the British maintain their blockade of Narvik, the ice-free port through which in the past the bulk of Swedish iron ore has been shipped to Germany. A report that Allied planes had penetrated deep into Germany and destroyed half the Reich's armament and munition plants would arouse the public to a high pitch of excitement. Certain repercussions of the Scandinavian war, albeit invisible and unspectacular, may be tantamount to just such a raid.

Since the raw material of all armament and munitions is iron, a country's ability to manufacture necessary war supplies must suffer greatly if the domestic production of iron ore or the importation of it is hindered or stopped by the enemy. This is just what has happened to Germany as a result of the Scandinavian adventure. The Third Reich is almost entirely dependent on foreign ore. In the present war Swedish iron ore is much more important for German armament production than it was in the first World War. Even prior to 1914 Germany was not entirely self-supporting with respect to iron, but at least it had the mines of Alsace-Lorraine, and in the early days of the war it occupied the French district of Longwy-Briey with its rich iron-ore deposits. Its imports of iron ore, chiefly from Sweden, were therefore only supplementary, amounting to but one-fifth of its total requirements. By the Versailles Treaty, however, Germany was deprived of the greater part of its domestic deposits. Whereas in 1913 it mined 28,608,000 tons, its present production amounts to only 11,120,000 tons.

The actual situation is even worse than these figures indicate, for the Reich's ore is vastly inferior in iron content to the imported. Although lack of foreign exchange has led Germany to exploit even these low-grade ores, it has been compelled to import about 75 per cent of its total iron-ore requirements; in 1938 imports amounted to 21,900,000 tons. About half came from France, French colonial possessions, and Spain. The war, of course, closed all French sources to the Reich, and no iron ore reaches Germany direct from Spain. The amount shipped from Spain by way of Italy, evading the strict Allied contraband control, is negligible. Even before Scandinavia became a theater of war, Germany had forfeited about 50 per cent of its iron-ore imports, which is the equivalent of one-third of its total requirements. Normally Germany obtained from Sweden a quantity almost equal to its own production, and after the war began it strove to increase the amount. However, even while imports from Sweden were continuing undisturbed, German iron-ore production, domestic and imported, dropped about 40 per cent.

Whatever the future has in store for Scandinavia, Germany will be unable to obtain Swedish ore in quantities equaling its pre-war purchases. In 1938, the last pre-war year, 6,500,000 tons, representing more than half of Sweden's total iron-ore export, reached the Reich by way of the Norwegian port of Narvik. The remainder was shipped from Lulea and other ports on the Gulf of Bothnia without passing through British-controlled sea lanes. Now Narvik is lost to the Reich. There is a tendency in the German press to minimize the importance of the Norwegian outlet, but certain recent events contradict such assertions. Hitler valued Narvik high enough to devote almost half of his destroyer fleet to its capture, and even the battleship Scharnhorst was assigned to assist the German naval forces operating above the Arctic Circle. The British navy, in two violent encounters, wiped out the destroyers and crippled the Scharnhorst. Actual possession of the city of Narvik is not important. Whatever its future status may be, no iron ore for Germany will be loaded at its docks, for units of the British fleet blockade the West Fjord, the entrance to the port, and the harbor itself has been made dangerous by the wrecks of ships sunk in battle.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

It may be asked why Germany cannot compensate for the loss of Narvik by increasing shipments of ore from the unblockaded ports of the Gulf of Bothnia. The difficulty is that Lulea, the harbor nearest to the northern mines, is closed by ice for six or seven months of the year. Gavle, a little to the north of Stockholm, is a shipping point for the iron mines of central Sweden, but these are far less productive than the deposits north of the Arctic Circle and also their ore has a low phosphoric content which makes it unsuitable for most German furnaces. Transportation of iron ore from the north by rail to ice-free ports involves a haul of 700 miles or more and many additional freight cars, which neither Sweden nor Germany is in a position to supply at short notice. Finally Narvik has been developed over a long period of years as the main outlet for Swedish iron. The Bothnian ports have been supplementary and simply do not have the facilities for handling a great increase in traffic. It seems certain, therefore, that the amount of Swedish ore going to Germany, which even prior to the Norwegian adventure had been halved owing to war conditions, will now be still further reduced, bringing total shipments to only about a quarter of the normal figure. Moreover, the distance between Narvik and Kiruna, the center of Swedish iron-ore production, is only about seventy miles. If the British remain in possession of Narvik, controlling a region close to the main Swedish mines, they will be in a position to exercise a dominant influence on Swedish production and perhaps even to oust the Germans entirely as buyers.

National Socialist propaganda makes frequent use of the assertion that in this war a "hole in the east" strips the Allied blockade of its effectiveness. This may be true with respect to certain kinds of goods but not for iron ore. If Germany's next advance is into the Balkan region, it will find there only one country, Yugoslavia, which possesses substantial quantities of iron. Even German experts commissioned to explore the economic possibilities of Yugoslavia have declared that exploitation of the iron deposits would require several years of preliminary work. At present Yugoslavia's total annual production amounts to less than Sweden's monthly exports to Germany prior to the war.

The Soviet Union offers no better prospects. Though Russia produces annually more than 30,000,000 tons of iron ore, three times as much as Germany, it needs practically the whole amount itself; only 300,000 tons, or 1 per cent of its production, was released for export before the outbreak of the present war. With the Red Army fully mobilized, Russia will find it difficult to maintain its production at the peace-time level, and at the same time intensification of armament manufacture will require increased quantities of ore. None of the recent Russo-German trade treaties mentioned the possible exportation of Russian ore to the Reich.

The weakening of Germany's war potential through loss of iron ore is subject, however, to one condition which should not be underemphasized. Germany embarked upon its war preparations many years before the outbreak of hostilities. During those years it imported sufficient quantities of iron ore to produce arms and munitions in huge quantities and even to store millions of tons not immediately needed. Its arsenals are well supplied for many months to come. In a protracted war this early advantage would gradually fade out and give place to the material superiority of the Allies. Therefore the primary condition of making the Reich feel the loss of iron ore is large-scale military action on the western front, which remains, now as before, the main theater of war. If the war drags on in the manner in which it is now conducted, the loss of iron ore will not affect Germany's war strength.

The Polish campaign was too short to cause any considerable consumption of war material. The iron requirements of aircraft production are insignificant. A small expeditionary force such as is now fighting in Norway requires comparatively small quantities of equipment. Even if a German army were sent against the Balkan countries, it would be about the size of the force employed against Poland and would thus hardly weaken the defense of the Siegfried Line. An army of one million men could be assured of an uninterrupted supply of arms and munitions from Germany's domestic production. Moreover, Germany is still able to depend on considerable reserves of scrap iron; one of the Hitler Youth's primary peace-time duties was to collect it. If absolutely necessary, the German High Command could prohibit the exportation of machines and all products made of steel and utilize all domestic iron ore for the manufacture of war supplies.

Large-scale action in the main theater of war, however, would use up a vast amount of material, much more than the total reserves now available. Experience gained during the first World War demonstrates this fact. Even then almost the entire German export trade was throttled, and all iron reserves were mobilized. And although Hohenzollern Germany, with Alsace-Lorraine and Longwy-Briey, was in a distinctly more advantageous position than Hitler's Germany, the Allies' production of war materials became visibly superior toward the end of the war. Germany's loss of 75 per cent of its iron-ore imports will enable the Allies once again to achieve superiority, but only if they force Germany to fight on the western front, employing all the forces at its disposal.

Let's Join the United States

BY MAURY MAVERICK

San Antonio, Texas, May 2

WHEN I try to talk about poll taxes north of the Mason and Dixon Line, people begin to look and talk like Fijis listening to Einstein lecture on the fifth or possibly the sixth dimension. They want to know why I was indicted; I struggle to tell them. Then they ask another irrelevant question, and I try again to explain the poll-tax laws of the Southern states. When it is all over, I have a distinct feeling that nobody quite understood what I was talking about.

Yes, I was indicted for violating the "poll-tax law." I'll tell you all about it a little later in this story; just now it is enough to say that the jury found me not guilty. But right at the start I want to say positively that I don't like to be considered a persecuted "liberal." I am a politician, and hate to lose a fight. And I have been opposed to poll taxes ever since as tax collector ten years ago I found out how rotten they were.

As for the poll-tax law, I'll unfold it as soon as I can, but for those ignorant, uncultured persons known as Yankees, and for all other non-Southerners who do not understand our peculiar, and therefore sacred, institutions, I will start by explaining what a poll tax—not a pole cat—is. Irvin Cobb came through our town during my trial and refused to acknowledge there was any difference, odor or otherwise. But Irvin was unable to give a philosophic interpretation of the black and white stripes on the pole cat.

Now to the elementary lesson for uncultured Yankees. A poll tax is a per capita levy of $1.50 to $2 on persons who possess certain alleged qualifications for the right to vote. If you don't or can't pay, you can't vote, even if you have the other qualifications. In some states the charge is cumulative: you must pay all your delinquent poll taxes before you can "qualify." They may amount to $40—more than you own, or can ever raise. If you pay, you get a "poll-tax receipt"—generally on canary-yellow or baby-pink paper. On it are a lot of facts—race, color, age, sex, residence, and so on. The original idea of the poll-tax law was to eliminate the black stripe in its entirety. In most states the law was passed within ten or twenty years after the Civil War, after the carpetbaggers had been happily run out.

Now I'm not out on a reforming tour to help the poor, persecuted black man. The truth is, I am worried about the white stripe more than the black. I say this because millions of white men have been disfranchised by the poll tax which was supposed to protect them.

Poll taxes have made it easy to steal an election. How? A political machine pays a "batch" (in Texas) or a "block" (in Virginia) of poll taxes and puts the receipts in the safe. Pays the poll taxes for whom? Sometimes for nobody; in one town in Texas some four or five thousand wholly fictitious names were added to the roll of poll-tax payers. The custom is to hold the receipts until Election Day, then give them to people meeting fairly well the description. These henchmen are thus illegally converted into "qualified voters" and are sent around to vote first in one precinct, then in another. Many a dead man, or one who never lived at all, comes to life on Election Day, voting again and again.

The political machines also pay the poll taxes of actual persons—persons who are poor and under the heel of the machine. These include the dames de plaisir from the red-light districts, the gentlemen who live by the ladies' occupation, dope fiends, thieves, bums, drunkards, and political hangers-on. Many racketeers also pay for batches with their own money in order to show the politician they can bring home the bacon on Election Day if the politico does right—I mean wrong.

Now in the South only from 10 to 20-odd per cent of the qualified voters vote, whereas in registration states, without a poll tax, from 60 to 70-odd per cent of the qualified voters vote. And so, by means of the middle-class vote, aided by contributions from Northern interests, with hill-billies and poor people generally excluded, the machines stay in power. "White supremacy" is the cry, and with a fear complex of black domination ruling the white voters, the results generally go the way the bosses want.

Texas, the wealthiest Southern state, has the largest proportion of its people voting of any poll-tax state—26 per cent. South Carolina has the smallest—10 per cent; in North Carolina, just across the line, where the tax has been abolished, the vote has risen to almost 70 per cent. In West Virginia, where the poll tax has been out of fashion for some time, the vote is 79.3 per cent, as shown in the 1928 and 1932 elections.

Why doesn't a Southerner pay this tax of $1.50 or $2? The answer is simple. He hasn't got it. I can show you why. The National Resources Committee recently made a study of consumer incomes in the United States. That study showed that one-third of the nation receives less than $780 a year and is unable to save anything. In fact, in the aggregate, this bottom third has an annual deficit that amounts to more than 20 per cent of the total income of the group. We also know from the Report to the President on Economic Conditions in the South that the South has more than its share of poor people. According to this report, even in the so-called prosperous year of 1929 Southern farm people received an average annual gross income of only $186. Earnings of share-croppers ranged from $38 to $87 per person—from 10 to 20 cents a day. If you must pay a poll tax of from $1.50 to $1.75, as we do in Texas, and are earning 10 cents a day, you have to work from fifteen to seventeen days to pay it.

If a mayor of a big city, a governor, corporation lawyer, or Congressman had to pay a poll tax equal to his income for half a month, it would run from $250 to $500. At that, I suppose he could pay it a lot more easily than a share-cropper can pay $1.75. More, it is against the law to borrow the money for the tax. And on top of that, the poll tax must be paid from six months to a year before the time of voting. It takes no great mathematician to figure out the results of the poll tax in the South.

Now about my being indicted. The law in Texas says that paying—that is, going to the tax-collector and paying—the poll tax of another person is a felony. Lending, giving, or advancing the money is a misdemeanor. You can buy a gun, knife, or pistol for purposes of murdering or maiming; you can also lend, give, or advance money for these purposes. But you can't give or lend any person $1.50 so that he can have his rights of citizenship.

Here is where some of the corruption enters the picture. The machine pays or "buys" poll taxes in block as I said in the beginning. But if anybody opposed to the political machine uses money even for legal purposes the poll-tax laws are used to persecute and intimidate this opposition.

I didn't "buy" any poll taxes. This is what I did do. I made a contribution of $250 to a local union with a supposed membership of 2,000 out of $1,000 contributed to me by the national union. I told the local union to use it for a poll-tax campaign, for advertising, for taking members to the tax-collector, and for other legal purposes—but not for the actual payment of poll taxes. A whole pack of indictments were returned against me, some of them for the felony of paying the poll tax of another person, some for the misdemeanor of advancing or lending the money. Since obviously I could not be guilty of both, they tried me on the felony charge.

All my enemies are not wicked people. Many are highly virtuous, conservative citizens who fear the black menace or the Pope's navy or "radicalism," or who are employed by the economic groups that exploit the South. In general they are a group out to get a Roosevelt, a Maverick, or anybody else who won't do his bit to keep the colored people, the white share-croppers, the whole lowest third down in the dirt. They are not necessarily my personal enemies. They may merely want to maintain the economic status quo; or they may be swayed by race prejudice; or they may be afraid to let the people have the right of suffrage. A lot of good citizens of course are for poll taxes because there have been poll taxes since they were born.

Those who know anything of the economic history of the South know that ever since the Civil War the South has been in debt to the North—that is, to the financial interests of the North. Southern resources and Southern purchasing power are being suctioned out of the South. Over 90 per cent of the country's corporate wealth is owned in the North. Financially, politically, economically, and psychologically the South is a colony of the North. Those who want to preserve the poll-tax laws want to preserve this absentee ownership.

I want to abolish the poll tax because (1) people must have the right to vote if they are ever to get their right to a decent living; (2) nobody ought to have to pay for the right to vote in a democracy; (3) a poll tax permits only a small percentage of the people to vote, and that is undemocratic; (4) it makes possible minority control by corrupt means; (5) it is troublesome, antiquated, clumsy, and unreasonable.

Now what ought to be done? Remembering the Civil War, let us Southerners be smart and abolish the poll tax ourselves before the abolitionists get us. Let's free ourselves; let's join the United States. It seems a sure shot since other areas of the country which have unrestricted suffrage are better off than the South.

Let the poll-tax requirement in national elections be abolished by federal law. I think Congress has the right to abolish it in all elections, but it is obvious that it can do it in national elections. And the abolition of a poll tax in federal elections would enfranchise millions of Southerners. Some ask what good this would do in the South, where all is settled by the democratic primary.

Well, it would establish the principle that the federal government won't make or permit undemocratic restrictions in its own elections at least—and that would be an example.

Let everybody, North, South, East, and West, join in the fight to abolish the poll tax in federal elections; let all of us Southern Americans fight to abolish it in our own states. Let us take our place in the United States as an equal among equals, with all the people partaking of democracy.

Looking Toward the Peace

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

ONE of the few really gratifying developments in recent months has been the increasing attention which is being given to the next peace. In England several important groups, political and non-political, have been at work almost since the outbreak of war on the problem of peace terms. As early as December, Planning, a broadsheet issued by P. E. P. (Political and Economic Planning), outlined the basis for post-war reconstruction. In this country a group of experts under the leadership of Professor Shotwell has been examining the same problem with not dissimilar results, and a special study is being undertaken by the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research. At The Hague, early in February, under the auspices of the League of Nations, a new economic body was set up which is to serve as guide in the reconstruction period.

To the average man all these activities seem utopian. The Englishman complains that they interfere with the main task of winning the war. The American is as suspicious as ever of anything that implies involvement in Europe's affairs. Yet without widespread discussion of the problems of reconstruction, a repetition of the blunders of the last peace seems inevitable. The fact that a few experts are aware of the dangers of a peace dictated by nationalistic considerations is very little protection. There were experts, too, in 1919, such as John Maynard Keynes, who accurately foresaw the dangers in the Treaty of Versailles. But their warnings were scarcely heard amid the cries for revenge of the statesmen and people of the Allied countries. Yet in the last analysis it was economic illiteracy rather than political vengeance which made the Versailles pact the war-breeding document that it was. It is true that passionate hatred for Germany led the Allied statesmen to go farther than was prudent in seeking to saddle the entire cost of the war on Germany. But this hatred could have led to even harsher political terms, such as the seizure of even more German territory, without causing as complete a breakdown as resulted from the treaty's economic errors.

These economic blunders were not one but many. Overshadowing all else was the immense burden of reparations placed upon Germany. Originally fixed at the astronomical figure of $31,400,000,000, the reparations burden was gradually reduced until it was about $8,200,000,000 under the Young plan. These demands might not have proved so impossible to fulfil if the peace treaty had not contained several other provisions designed to weaken Germany, which greatly impaired its capacity to pay. Although most of these penalties, such as restrictions on imports and the seizure of the German merchant marine, were temporary, they left permanent scars on the German economic structure. Other measures, such as the occupation of the Saar and the forced cession of Alsace-Lorraine and the colonies, also weakened the Reich economically. Similarly, the break-up of the Austro-Hungarian Empire is now generally recognized to have been an economic blunder of the first order. Equally basic was the failure of the statesmen attending the peace conferences to take some action to stem the rising tide of tariffs and other trade restrictions which the war had brought into existence. America's failure to make satisfactory adjustments on its war debts might be added as a factor contributing substantially to the lack of economic balance in the twenties.

Largely as a result of these blunders, the economic problems which will have to be faced at the end of this war are even more difficult than those which the statesmen confronted in 1919. Economic nationalism has matured into totalitarianism. Even the so-called democracies have instituted elaborate systems of restrictive controls. In quotas and in the manipulation of currencies nations have perfected instruments of economic warfare far more destructive than anything known twenty years ago. But at the same time there is general agreement among experts about the dangers of economic warfare and the way to avoid the errors of 1919. These areas of agreement are well worth detailed consideration.

There is sound reason to believe, for example, that the greatest blunder of Versailles will not be repeated. The experience with reparations was such that huge financial penalties are hardly likely to be again imposed on the vanquished. But this is not the whole story. The world may again emerge from the struggle with huge war obligations contracted under abnormal conditions.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Should this be the case, we can only hope that the creditors will have the judgment to recall that half a loaf is better than none. The first economic principle of the peace should be that the settlement must levy no financial penalties and leave no impossible burden of international indebtedness, public or private.

Avoidance of the type of error committed in breaking up the Austro-Hungarian Empire may be still more difficult. If the Allies win a decisive victory, there will undoubtedly be pressure to divide Germany into several parts on the theory that this is the only way to protect Europe against a repetition of 1914 and 1939. Regardless of what might be said for or against such a plan politically, there can be little doubt that it would be disastrous economically. Since this fact is rather generally recognized, the chances are that the economic unity of the Reich will not be tampered with, whatever is done politically. And there are real grounds to hope that some sort of Danubian Union will be formed in Central Europe which will undo, in part at least, the damage done at St. Germain.

Even this limited advance is not likely to be achieved, however, without pressure from the United States. Yet we should not fool ourselves into thinking that the world is anxious for our advice. As a neutral, it is evident that we can obtain a voice in the councils of peace only if we are prepared to offer something of advantage. Even as a belligerent, we should have only a limited influence unless we could show that, in contrast to 1919, we were prepared to share the responsibilities of the peace. This cannot be done without a fundamental and long overdue change in popular thinking.

An offer of a general reduction in the American tariff would give us an entering wedge, though such action could hardly in itself give this country a hand in shaping the peace. The United States has, however, one thing which all countries desire—gold. It possesses nearly two-thirds of the world's supply of monetary gold. This gold is doing us no good. On the contrary, its presence here constitutes a serious economic threat: it could serve as the base for one of the most destructive inflations in America's history. And there is a danger, though probably a remote one, that if we hold on to the world's supply, gold will gradually lose its value as it ceases to be used as the medium of international exchange.

Good sense, then, would suggest that at least part of this gold be utilized for reviving international trade. As a step in this direction, the United States might offer to furnish a substantial part of the capital of a World Bank which would have as its primary function the insuring and financing of trade on more reasonable terms than could be obtained elsewhere. Such a bank might issue an international currency, backed by its gold reserves, which would greatly facilitate trade. It might also aid in the financing of post-war reconstruction.

This would be of greater value to the United States than is commonly recognized. For it might prevent a repetition of the tragic aftermath of the reconstruction period following the last war. It will be recalled that to a considerable extent the United States provided the capital and the physical material for the rehabilitation of Europe in 1919 and 1922. We have never been fully repaid for our contribution. Much of the money we advanced is frozen in uncollectible war debts. Some of the remainder is in defaulted German bonds. But though never repaid, the United States profited from the arrangement. Factories were kept busy turning out machinery and equipment for sale abroad. There were jobs enough to go around. It was only when we ceased lending abroad that our domestic problems began.

Should this war also lead to wholesale destruction—a possibility that can by no means be ruled out—the United States would again hold the key to reconstruction. Europe will again be too weakened and its economy too dislocated to provide the needed materials. Its finances will be too strained to provide all the necessary capital. The United States will presumably have a large plant capacity geared to supplying war materials to Europe. We shall once more have a choice between closing down our factories and throwing millions out of employment, or adapting our industrial plant to Europe's peace-time needs. Private capital would probably shy off from repeating the experiences of the last post-war decade. International financing might neatly avoid these difficulties and at the same time provide the foundations for a sound post-war economy. The cost of this to the United States would be: (1) the cost of overcoming the anachronistic prejudices that have shaped our commercial policy since 1919; and (2) the cost of shipping some unwanted gold from Fort Knox to, say, Basle. The advantages of the plan would be: (1) a condition of relative prosperity in this country in the post-war years; and (2) the elimination of a post-war slump arising from a top-heavy structure of international indebtedness.

As a price for this assistance in post-war rehabilitation the United States might demand that certain steps be taken toward world economic security. Many of these steps have long been recognized as being desirable in principle but have been blocked by narrow nationalistic considerations. Quotas and exchange controls, for instance, have been regularly denounced at every international conference for more than a decade. It has also been universally agreed that there should be equal access to raw materials. But the stubborn fact has remained that most trade barriers are defensive and can only be removed in a general understanding in which positive steps are taken to aid the debtor countries.

Twenty years of nationalistic legislation have greatly strengthened the drift toward economic anarchy. The Hull trade policy stands as the only important attempt on the part of a great power to stem this tide. And even in this country the efforts of Mr. Hull have been overshadowed by nationalistic developments such as the Smoot-Hawley tariff, ship subsidies, devaluation of the dollar, and President Roosevelt's sabotage of the London economic conference.

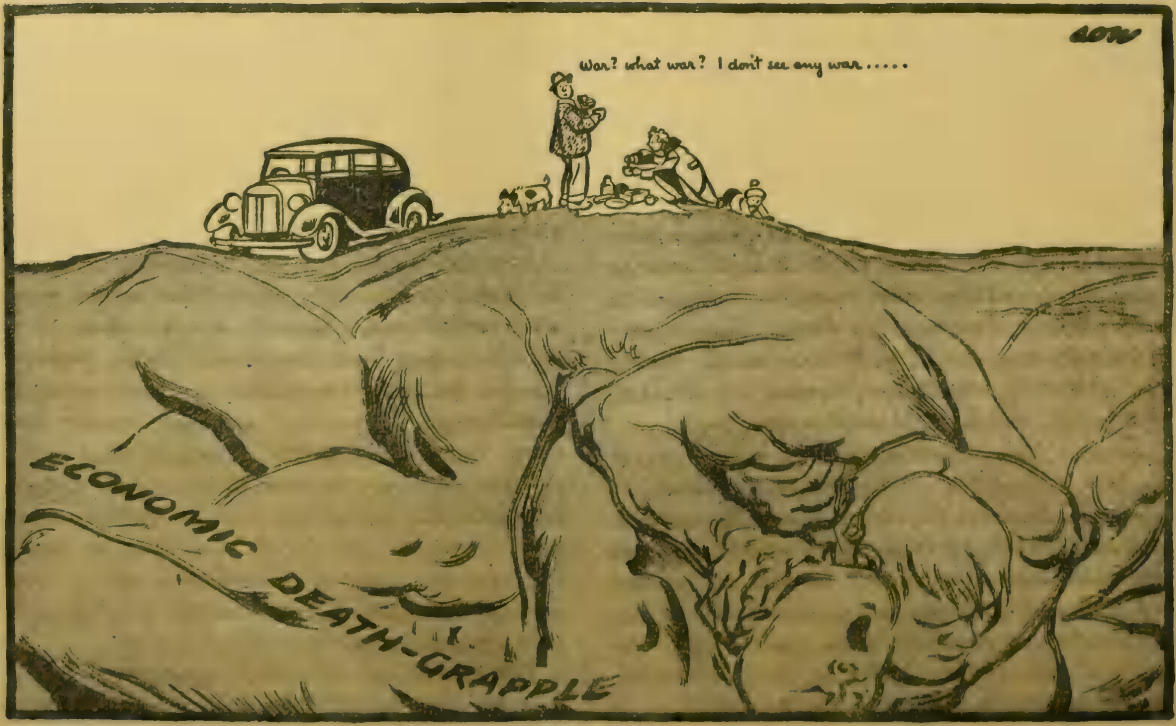
More than reciprocal trade pacts are necessary if the trend toward economic disruption is to be stopped. General agreement for the elimination of trade barriers must be obtained. But this obviously cannot be done unless the leading commercial powers, particularly the United States, take the lead. As a creditor, the United States cannot collect the obligations owed it unless it undertakes a fundamental revision of its commercial policy so as to permit a passive balance of trade. Practically speaking, this means that we, in common with Great Britain, must make trade concessions over and above those demanded of other countries.

The colonial question should be met in the same spirit. A redivision of the colonial areas of the world so that each power has a proportionate share of the world's resources is fantastic as a practical proposal. It is also cruelly contemptuous of the rights and aspirations of the peoples in the so-called backward areas. The idea that the world should be permanently divided into a few well-to-do industrial nations on one side and a much larger number of colonial and semi-colonial raw-material-producing countries on the other is dangerous and should be abandoned. Despite statements to the contrary, experience has not shown industrialization of the backward countries to be detrimental to the advanced countries. On the contrary, it has stimulated trade and raised living standards the world over.

Many of the colonial areas, such as India, the Philippines, and Korea, are presumably fully capable of self-rule. For the others, the obvious solution is an extension and perfection of the mandate system. This should be accompanied, as at present in the mandates, by guaranties of equal access to their markets and raw materials.

These steps toward a pooling and denationalization of the world's resources would work only if the economic agencies dealing in these resources were themselves subject to increased international pressures. Rapid progress was made in this direction in the years immediately preceding this war. The majority of the world's raw materials and foodstuffs have been regulated on either a European or a world basis. Control schemes or cartels have covered the production of wheat, sugar, tea, beef, timber, rubber, dyestuffs, steel, tin, zinc, oil, coke, and aluminum. While many of the schemes have had as their objective the limitation of production rather than the supplying of the world's needs, they have come to stay and might easily be diverted into more constructive channels. Creation of an international supervisory organ, possibly the new economic body set up at The Hague, would help achieve this purpose.

As a further step toward undercutting the nationalistic economic forces which make for division and conflict, the next peace conference might well arrange for international supervision of such activities as are clearly of



LOW
War? what war? I don't see any war.....
ECONOMIC DEATH-GRAPPLE

HOLIDAY

general concern. These would include transport and communications across national boundaries, postal facilities, and health work. A beginning has been made in each of these fields, but much more extensive international control would be to the advantage of all. The brilliant work done by the League of Nations Health Service in China a few years ago illustrates the very great possibilities of such a development.

None of the foregoing proposals are new. Nearly all have been accepted in principle for years. All are within the realm of practicability provided any real attempt is made to put the world's economic house in order. There remains the problem of organization, and of method. Here we have a fairly clear precedent. In contrast to the failure of the political arm of the League of Nations, the Financial Section, the Economic Intelligence Service, and the International Labor Organization, agencies established at the end of the last war to deal with economic problems, have enjoyed a conspicuous measure of success within their restricted spheres. It would seem only reasonable, then, that these agencies be expanded to take over the new activities arising from the next peace. These agencies might be supplemented by regional corporations, along the lines of our TVA, to take charge of the development of backward areas.

The technique for handling these broadened international activities has already been worked out in existing agencies. Our primary concern in the months preparatory to the peace conference should be to find the means of arousing public opinion to the necessity for American leadership and American sacrifices if the next peace is not to repeat the basic errors of the last. The time to prevent the next war is now.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Economic Defeatism

AMONG the many crimes charged daily against the New Deal by a large section of the press, that of "economic defeatism" has lately been given an especially prominent place. According to the prosecution, the Administration has been guilty of the capital offense of disturbing the American dream and of substituting for it the nightmare of a "mature economy." It has allowed its economists to broadcast a belief that our economic system has lost its dynamism, that profitable opportunities for investment have shrunk, and that, consequently, either the proportion of the national income devoted to savings must be diminished or new and unorthodox channels for capital must be developed.

Indignant editors, bankers, and Presidential hopefuls protest that such views are nonsense. How is it possible to talk of a saturation point for productive investment, they say, while at the same time you call attention to the one-third of the nation that is ill-housed, ill-clothed, and ill-fed? Thus a recent report to the American Bankers' Association by its Economic Policy Committee, headed by Colonel Leonard P. Ayres, declared: "More than half of American family incomes are still below $1,000 a year, and as long as any such condition exists we have an almost unlimited potential demand for better homes, better food, more clothing, improved housing, furnishings, and greater amounts of the services that are rendered by public utilities. We sorely need great expansion of industrial output, whether we have new expanding industries or not." Quite so, reply the New Dealers, there is an enormous market to be created by raising the standard of living of the masses, but what proposals have you for turning the potential consuming power of these millions into effective purchasing power?

Confronted by this question, the spokesmen of business retort: Give us back our lost confidence. Let Washington abandon its close regulation of industry and adopt a friendly attitude. Above all, get back to a balanced budget and cut the taxes which are breaking the backs and hearts of the wealthy and inhibiting them from investing their capital and creating new jobs. Do these things, and jobs and a rising standard of living will follow automatically.

Admittedly, the advent of an Administration in Washington prepared to adopt such a program might lead to a temporary investment boom, but unless accompanied by positive measures designed to keep purchasing power advancing step by step with productive capacity, it would quickly peter out. For, it is to be feared, business men as a whole have yet to grasp that the nature of the market to which they cater has totally changed since the nineteenth century, when capitalism, with all its sins, was certainly dynamic. If this were better understood, there would be less resentment of the description of our economy as "mature." This adjective does not imply that stagnation is inevitable, but it does indicate that the conditions of growth have altered, that instead of relying on an extensive market we must now depend on an intensive market to keep our economy progressive. The nineteenth century in America was a period of constant expansion in Lebensraum accompanied by inordinately rapid growth in population. Under these conditions the call for new capital investment was insistent, and, in fact, it continuously outstripped the volume of savings generated by the domestic economy. Rates of interest were high, with the result that additional capital was steadily attracted from the Old World, and particularly from Britain, whose economy had already matured in the sense that savings were in excess of profitable opportunities for investment at home. Right up to 1914 this country was still, on balance, an importer of capital, but the profits earned during World War I reversed the situation and started America off on its brief but hectic career as an international banker.

The part played in the American prosperity of the twenties by the rapid growth in foreign investments is a subject waiting to be fully explored. But there can be little doubt that had there been no such outlet for excess savings, the situation we face today would have arisen much sooner. For these foreign loans left this country in the form of goods and thus created a market for the surplus production which domestic purchasing power was unable to absorb. Thus our economy remained in balance, albeit precariously, until the 1929 crisis led to our precipitate abdication of the role of world's banker.

The best indication that, throughout the thirties, our capacity to save was outstripping the capacity of private enterprise to find new investment objectives is the steady fall in the rate of interest, indicating an excess in capital supply over demand. In 1936 and 1937 there was a brief period of investment expansion, marked by a slight rise in money rates, but it ended in a heavy accumulation of inventories—a sure sign that consumer purchasing power was unequal to the task of absorbing an increased industrial output.

It is easy to agree with Wendell Willkie that the age of invention is not past. We are not likely to suffer from a lack of new products and new and better ways of making old products. But as Dr. T. J. Kreps, economic adviser to the TNEC, pointed out recently: "If we vigorously push advances in technology and refuse to make the requisite economic adjustment we will set up grave tensions in our society." One adjustment necessary, he indicated, was a willingness on the part of industry to pass on the fruits of technological improvements. For where costs saved by the installation of a new process are wholly added to profits, there is normally a substraction of purchasing power from the pockets of displaced workers accompanied by an accretion in saving power, since profits are the main source of savings. But if purchasing power lags, there can be no profitable opportunity for the investment of these savings, and a new economic disequilibrium is created. To quote Dr. Kreps again: "No industry should even pretend to boast that it has made technical progress except as it measures progress in terms of lower prices." Only by so doing will it make a positive contribution to increased demand for goods and so open the door to new investment. No doubt this seems like economic defeatism to many business men because the implication of the argument is that capital must be content with a lower rate of return. But to me it seems that the real defeatists are those capitalists who insist they cannot function without a reward as great as in the days when savings could not keep pace with investment, and thrift was an economic as well as a moral virtue.

In the Wind

IN THE CURRENT issue of Foreign Affairs Dorothy Thompson writes: "The French had Jeanne D'Arc, but they burned her, and only canonized her when she had been dead a long time." On this the London Spectator comments: "We English have been accustomed to treat the murder as a stain on our own escutcheon, but we shall certainly be quite ready to share the discredit with our French allies."

CONSTANTINE BROWN'S story in the Washington Star suggesting that a British invasion of Holland was imminent aroused a good deal of criticism in the capital along the lines indicated in The Nation a fortnight ago. Many observers contended that the story was a Nazi plant, with Brown the innocent victim. Last week there was a sequel: Constantine Brown, Jr., a University of North Dakota freshman, went to Canada to enlist in the Canadian army.

WHEN JOHN STEINBECK'S "Grapes of Wrath" appeared, the Associated Farmers of California denounced the book and publicly tried to have it banned. Now Robert Franklin, public-relations chief of the association, is explaining that the opposition was all designed to get people to read the book and to focus attention on the migrant problem.

A LONDON business concern—run, incidentally, by a woman—bears in the corner of its stationery the legend: "Our telegraphic address is: Chastity, London." Across the first of the two words is now stamped the phrase: "Canceled for the duration."

HEADLINE IN the Boston Evening Globe: "Bremen Sinks Again." . . . One feature of PM, New York's new newspaper scheduled for June appearance, will be its lavish treatment of radio news. In general the press has minimized radio coverage, fearing that radio would ultimately injure the newspaper business. PM will devote several pages a day to it. . . . There has been a shake-up at the New York Post, with a new executive editor installed.

OSCAR AMERINGER, veteran grass-roots radical, is in New York visiting the publishers of his forthcoming biography. To intimates Ameringer confided his major grievance: luncheon engagements. Out West, he says, he never eats lunch because it makes him sleepy; here he is forced to. "If I want to see someone, he takes his notebook out right away and says—lunch tomorrow? People like to get their teeth into things here."

CAMPAIGN NEWS: Three years ago a private appeal was made to Postmaster General Farley for the issuance of a Booker T. Washington stamp. Mr. Farley wrote back that "the time was not propitious." A fortnight ago a ten-cent stamp bearing Booker T. Washington's picture was issued.

NEWEST NAZI propaganda device is the circulation of faked editions of British papers in neutral countries. A replica of the London Standard showed Hore-Belisha on the Bal Tabarin stage in Paris, London butcher shops without meat, a massacre of the R. A. F., and anti-Semitic mobs rioting in Britain. The photographs were almost uniformly faked or "edited." . . . Amid all the talk about war propaganda here, observers have completely overlooked what is probably the most primitive and effective type; it is appearing in pulp magazines, where all villains now are Huns.

THE HARVARD Progressive's current issue contains a survey of virginity at Radcliffe. Figures are furnished. . . . Senator Charles O. Andrews of Florida recently told St. Petersburg legionnaires: "I wouldn't mind seeing every Communist branded with a 'C' on his forehead."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

MORE than three years ago I received a letter from an officer in the Army War College in Berlin in which he discussed the international situation. He declared among other things that German military opinion held that Germany would win the next war easily because the British had lost their virility and force; all signs of vigorous leadership by young and able Englishmen, he said, were lacking. I think this belief has been very potent in German circles. Indeed, it has been generally accepted that when Ribbentrop was ambassador in London he constantly stressed this to Hitler, reporting most unfavorably upon the brain power, energy, and ability of the men in English public life.

The events of the past few weeks have gone far to bear Ribbentrop out. From the beginning of the war there was grave doubt in England as to whether the government would be able to carry on the war effectively without being made over completely. I reported from London at the outbreak that no one gave Chamberlain more than three months. When I returned from Germany in November, however, I found that Chamberlain was actually stronger than he had been at the beginning of hostilities. None the less, having been profoundly impressed while in Germany with the strength and ability of the Nazi machine and army and their absolute determination to win the war, I felt much uneasiness at the lack of corresponding strength and fighting determination in English governmental circles. That the Norwegian fiasco will now compel a reorganization of the Cabinet appears certain. The only question is, can it be efficiently done?

There is no doubt that the only man in the Cabinet who seems to have a fighting edge comparable to the German leaders is Winston Churchill. But even he does not appear to have come out of the Norwegian mess without damage. It is true that at this distance we are perhaps judging without adequate knowledge. Superficially it looks as if the British fleet had been too slow in getting into action and, though parts of it fought magnificently, did not do harm enough to prevent the Germans from following up their surprise landings not only with reinforcements by air and sea but actually with tanks and great supplies of ammunition and equipment of all kinds. It is rumored in London that Churchill is not to blame; that he was overruled in the Cabinet and that the British fleet was held back because of the tremendous British fear of losing more capital ships.

Churchill's own utterances have not helped him. He declared, it will be remembered, when the Germans landed, that Adolf Hitler's invasion of Norway was going to prove as disastrous to him as Napoleon's invasion of Spain was to that corporal. Later on he gave assurances that the British were doing extremely well and were going to strike a terrific blow; then nothing followed but defeats. He will therefore have to do a good deal of explaining and be able to prove conclusively that he was prevented by others from smashing the German attack on Norway if he is to retain his prestige. Meanwhile uneasiness at the failure of the British to report naval losses in Norway increases. While German statements cannot be accepted at their face value, they have none the less often proved to be correct; and Norwegian and American reporters are now cabling about the destruction of British warships which they have witnessed though those losses have not been acknowledged by the British government. Still another straw is the recent announcement that the British will furnish no names of merchant ships sunk.

The alarming thing is that while it is plain that Englishmen should try to reconstitute the War Cabinet with only vigorous, able men in it, no one knows where these men are to be found. Certainly Anthony Eden is no great shakes, and the Labor Party has no outstanding leader. If it were called upon to take over the government tomorrow, it could hardly do so with any assurance that it could provide the men and the brains to take big chances and smash through to a great victory. There is also no one in the Liberal Party; Lloyd George is too old to come back, and Sir Archibald Sinclair is of medium quality.

I know it is customary for commentators like myself to say that England's lack of vigorous leaders of middle age is due to the frightful losses of the last war. But the Germans had frightful losses, too, and yet they have men of the right age who are fighting this war with dash, lightning-like strategy, and tremendous organizational ability. I do not think the fact that Britain was so slow in introducing universal military service that its most virile youths volunteered and were killed is an adequate explanation. Moreover, we are twenty-five years from the last war, long enough for many who were not old enough to fight in the last war, like Malcolm MacDonald now in the Cabinet, to grow up and reach front rank.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Waldo Frank, Pilot

CHART FOR ROUGH WATERS: OUR ROLE IN A NEW WORLD. By Waldo Frank. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.75.

DESPITE its comparative brevity Waldo Frank's book contains several theses and moves on more than one level. On the level of political analysis the book is a vigorous attack upon isolationism. On the level of cultural and religious analysis it is a carefully reasoned polemic against the whole religion of "liberalism" which arose in the eighteenth century and which, in the opinion of the author, cannot help us to understand the tragedy of our era or to find a way out of its confusion.

The political thesis can be briefly stated. Mr. Frank does not believe that we ought to become involved in the war. But he is profoundly disturbed by the efforts of isolationists to prove that Europe can go to hell without any concern of ours. Perhaps it is best to state his thesis in his own words:

> We must try . . . by every means to avoid physical involvement in war. Not because we are not in this world war; we are in it: but because we can best consolidate our values as an immediate norm of action by keeping our powder dry. This being our strategy, we should do all we can to keep the war from spreading. And that means we should take definite sides and openly and authoritatively state the hope of 90 per cent of us, from President downward, in the present conflict. The new Communist "line" of making no distinction between imperialist Britain and Nazi Germany is disgusting. You might as well say that anemia is no worse than bubonic plague because both are diseases. . . . To destroy fascism by a frontal war alone is hopeless, for the seeds of fascism are within us. Nevertheless, when fascism externalizes itself in the body of a great power, which we have allowed to fatten on our cowardice and crimes, we must actively hate it, better late than never; and help its enemies, whatever their limitations.

This seems to me sound doctrine; and it is refreshing to find it vigorously elaborated against the horde of modern idealists who seek to prove the sensitivity of their moral and political judgments by the discovery that no one comes to this struggle with "clean hands." As if anyone, individual, nation, or class, ever came to any struggle, no matter how decisive for world history, with clean hands!

Mr. Frank does not answer those who maintain that it is impossible to favor the capitalist democracies in this conflict without finally becoming ourselves involved. I do not criticize him for this omission, for the answer would have carried him beyond the purposes of his book. It is nevertheless important to meet this major argument of our isolationists. He does point out that Britain became involved in this Continental war by its vigorous efforts to stay out of it, a policy which involved British acquiescence in Nazi aggrandizement. We are still trying to prove that we are not a part of Europe, just as Britain tried to prove that it did not belong to the Continent. This policy will have the same fatal results for us as it had for Britain unless an Allied victory, to which we do not want to make any contribution, saves us. We criticize in advance the peace which the Allies will make, in the event of their victory, in order to quiet our conscience. But we haven't begun to face the question of what will become of our "democratic ideals," not to speak of our vital interests, in the event of a Nazi victory. Mr. Frank sees all this very clearly, but he has not fully developed that side of his thesis.

The analysis of modern culture is integrally related to the political analysis in Mr. Frank's book by reason of his conviction that the "cowardice" of what is still left of a democratic world is only partly prompted by the dishonest class interests of the Chamberlains and Bonnets. It is partly prompted by the rationalistic illusions of our modern liberal culture. This culture, for which the foundations were laid in the eighteenth-century Enlightenment, is, according to the author, deficient in the "tragic sense of life." It substituted "well-being" as the goal of human effort for the too otherworldly "salvation" of classical religion. But it evidently didn't measure the human problem in sufficient depth or it would not have missed "well-being" so completely. It believed in "the efficacy and autonomy of reason and the goodness of the individual will."

In its optimism and rationalism it failed to gauge the irrational vitalities which lie below the level of reason but frequently make reason their tool and slave. Mr. Frank, though a Marxist in politics, rightly places orthodox Marxism in the category of this bourgeois liberalism. It has only a provisional understanding for the subrational dynamics of life. It believes that reason is corrupted only by class interest and will function purely on the other side of the revolution.

In its individualism, modern culture begins by making the individual an end in himself and ends by losing the individual. It creates "individuals" but not "persons," according to Frank. Here he concurs in an idea developed by the great Catholic philosopher, Jacques Maritain. The individual who feels himself organically related to the whole and achieves dignity only as he becomes the bearer of values greater than himself is a "person." In other words, modern culture does not truly measure either the depths or the heights of human personality. It cannot therefore accurately gauge or anticipate the malevolence to which human conduct may sink or fully understand the mystery of human freedom.

Mr. Frank believes, in short, that modern culture has sadly strayed since it departed from the "Great Tradition." By the Great Tradition he means the prophetic elements in Hebraic and Christian faith. The optimism which was to guide it to Utopia has brought it to an abyss of evil which is beyond its comprehension. The individualism which it asserted against medieval authoritarianism has decayed into capitalistic exploitation or into Marxist collectivism, in which respect for personality can become so debased that Stalinists universally speak of their erstwhile comrades and present foes as "vermin." In expressing a very great appreciation of this frontal attack on modern culture, it may be wise to introduce a personal note and admit the appreciation comes from a theologian who is also an amateur social philosopher and is extended to a social philosopher who is also an amateur theologian. The "worldlings" may thus properly discount the appreciation. Yet they might profit by reading the book. It might shake the orthodoxy of their "liberalism." For liberalism has hardened into an orthodoxy and seeks desperately to maintain itself in defiance of all the tragic events of contemporary history, which make nonsense of its certainties.

By way of criticism it ought to be mentioned that in Mr. Frank's program of action he works out the program of a new political party which would contain all his cultural as well as political planks. This is not realistic. Despite his justified assertion that a political program which is only political is poor politics, there is no reality in the multi-planked platform of his party. Political parties express themselves against the background of a total culture, but the shift in cultural emphasis is not properly a matter for political parties. No political campaign will ever persuade modern civilization that it has strayed too far from the "Great Tradition." Something more tragic and ineluctable than political contests is necessary, though of course a new cultural orientation would ultimately express itself in the temper and the objectives of political life. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Where Marx Was Right

MARXISM: AN AUTOPSY. By Henry Bamford Parkes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THIS is another contribution to the growing critical American literature on Marxism, and one of the most interesting. Dr. Parkes's criticisms of Marxism, especially in its Communist application, are often just, shrewd, and suggestive. Yet the total effect is unsatisfactory. There is no historical approach to Marx: Dr. Parkes himself commits the orthodox Marxist error of considering Marx's ideas as if they were absolute, which in one case leads to Marxology and in the other to misunderstanding and injustice. Nor is there enough separation of Marx from Marxism. Finally, a constructive critic of Marx should remember and specify where Marx was right. While Dr. Parkes occasionally admits that Marx was right, the admission is always qualified—Marx was right but for the wrong reasons, or he made wrong deductions. Scarcely anything is left of the gigantic contribution that Marx made to the social sciences. Yet Dr. Parkes repeatedly performs a curious intellectual sleight-of-hand by accepting ideas that come from Marx and using them to criticize Marx! This book should be read; but it should be read together with Karl Korsch's recently published book, "Karl Marx," an original and brilliant restatement of the ideas of Marx that, despite its limitations, is a major effort to revaluate Marx and to decide where he was right.

Where was Marx right? The writing of history bears eloquent testimony to the influence of his ideas. Dr. Parkes admits that "the Marxist interpretation of history is, in its broad outlines, true." But he destroys the admission with carping reservations, with criticism by means of ideas that Marx himself developed, and with gibes at an economic determinism that was alien to Marx. After denying that ideas are socially conditioned, Dr. Parkes admits the truth of Marx's conclusion when he says it is necessary to "make men conscious of the social biases and prejudices" that shape their ideas. It is simply not true that "Marx interprets all human activity in terms of a single basic physical urge—economic needs." Indeed, so true is the opposite that Thorstein Veblen criticized Marx for his "sublimated materialism," a materialism which does not make social progress move "on the material plane of mechanical and physiological stress" but is "sublimated by the dominating presence of the human spirit." Nor was Marx wrong, as Dr. Parkes declares he was, in emphasizing, now material economic factors, and now man's own conscious activity, for that alternating emphasis is revealed by history itself. The historical crisis of our generation arose out of the movement of capitalist production, out of the series of economic changes which now press for a fundamental readjustment of institutions and ideas; but from now on man's own conscious activity must decide whether we move toward a desirable social order, with underlying economic conditions and possibilities acting simply as a limiting factor. Man makes his own history, which is nothing else than the activity of man pursuing his own ends, said Marx: but he makes it out of already existing conditions, not out of conditions chosen by himself.

Where was Marx right? The economists have resisted his influence much more than the historians. Yet Dr. Wesley C. Mitchell, after a bow to orthodox prejudice, says: "Marx saw the central problem of economics in the cumulative change of economic institutions . . . and he showed how vital economic theory becomes when it is attacked from this side, especially if current processes of change are projected into the future." But nothing is granted to Marx the economist by Dr. Parkes, who apparently is not much of an economist. Thus he uncritically accepts Gardiner Means's conclusion that in the depression of the 1930's the fall in the output of goods was determined by whether or not their prices fell, although the determining factor was the cyclical behavior of goods: regardless of price, of monopoly or competition, the output of some goods necessarily falls more than that of others in a depression. On the basis of his misunderstanding of economics and of Marx, Dr. Parkes concludes: "Marx's sketch of capitalist development is, in general, valid up to the time he wrote. Unfortunately, capitalist society began to move in new directions shortly after Marx had published the first volume of 'Das Kapital.' " But those "new directions" confirm, by and large, the theoretical and institutional analyses of Marx, who emphasized the drive of capitalist production toward large-scale industry, decline of the free market and competition, monopoly and finance capital, separation of ownership from management, and economic breakdown.

Marx's labor theory of value is rejected by Dr. Parkes as a factor in price formation. But, for one thing, how can we explain the long-range downward movement of real prices except as a result of lower labor costs brought about by greater productive efficiency? The implications of surplus value and the changing composition of capital are rejected, yet Dr. Parkes writes that "the decreasing importance of labor as compared with machinery [capital] . . . decreases the proportion of the gross income of industry which is paid back to labor, and hence it tends to upset the balance between savings for capital investment and spendings on consumption goods"—Marx's own analysis and conclusion used against Marx! Dr. Parkes rejects the theory of the falling rate of profit, yet he accepts the fall in the rate of interest without realizing that the rate of interest is a function of the rate of profit: for if industry finds the interest rate too high it is because the profit rate is too low. And in general Dr. Parkes makes the besetting mistake of considering each theory by itself instead of as a link in the chain of economic causation.

The most amazing criticism of Dr. Parkes is this: "If one studies capitalism in Marxist terms, it is impossible to explain why the system functions or why crises should occur." But that is exactly what Marx does explain. For Marx starts with the accumulation of capital, the making of profits and their transformation into capital, as the dynamic "law of motion" of capitalist production. As profits are transformed into new capital investment, the economic system expands, strategic new consumer purchasing power is created, and production, consumption, and profits all move upward. It is, however, the tendency of capital accumulation to outstrip itself: investment and production increase faster than consumer purchasing power. That ill-balance eventually brings a cyclical crisis, which is overcome by renewed capital investment and expansion. Thus capitalism functions through the increasing accumulation of capital; crises are a relative interruption and limitation of accumulation. The interruption and limitation become absolute when the productive system reaches a high stage of development, when old industries are fully mechanized and new industries are slow to develop; which means that industry is now unable to absorb increasing amounts of new capital and investment demand begins to decline. The deficiency in purchasing power—which Dr. Parkes asserts was neglected by Marx but which is one of the links in Marx's chain of economic causation—can now be overcome only if the fall in the rate of profit is accepted, only if industry lowers investment income in favor of consuming income. Out of this situation arises the permanent crisis of capitalism. Some different emphases are now necessary; there are theories that must be reformulated and new angles to be explored, but that is wholly compatible with acceptance of Marx's basic contribution to the understanding of capitalist production. Dr. Parkes rejects that contribution, yet he accepts its major conclusions in their distorted Keynsian forms: capitalist production depends upon investment (accumulation), capital tends to yield decreasing returns (fall in the rate of profit, although Keynes limits the fall to interest), investment income must diminish and consuming income grow if industry is to operate 100 per cent.

Where was Marx right? Reject his identification of socialism with the proletariat; it still remains true that fundamental social change involves a change in class relations and class power. While he rightly rejects the absolute collectivism of orthodox Marxism, Dr. Parkes's "free market" is almost as absolute; he rejects all planning—although he insists on state action to regulate monopoly prices and the interest rate and on recognition of the worker's "property-right" right in his job—and offers a determinist faith in the economic "automatism" of the market to solve the problems of an increasingly complex economic world. A fetishism of the market is no answer to the fetishism of all-inclusive collectivism. It seems to me that a more fruitful approach is this: what measures of collectivism and planning, what element of the market, and what institutional arrangements are necessary to build a more desirable economic order that will promote greater freedom?

LEWIS COREY

The Hamlet of L. MacNeice

AUTUMN JOURNAL. By Louis MacNeice. Random House. $1.50.

AUTUMN is the time when trees cast their leaves; "Autumn Journal" is the record of a man trying to cast his past from him. But it is not so easy for a man as a tree to shed the summer, and though at the end the season has changed and in Spain he sees the white plane trees bone-naked and thinks he sees the issues plain, he is still encumbered by the past. He has made an honest and determined effort to stand forth as bare as he can in the wintry weather. He is disillusioned, but he cannot entirely discard heredity and upbringing. He is still a British oak, not a Spanish plane tree. And the oak is a tree that holds its leaves long after they are sere, discolored, dead.

The autumn which his journal covers is that of 1938. It was a time for examining everything that had brought the English to that pass where, in September of that year, there was nothing for them to do but "To squander principle in panic and self-deception," and let the Czechs go down without fighting. MacNeice feels that his having been born in Ireland gives him an edge on the sentimental English. And perhaps that is why he can put down these reactions after Mr. Chamberlain had appeased Herr Hitler:

> But once again
>   The crisis is put off and things look better
> And we feel negotiation is not vain—
>   Save my skin and damn my conscience.
> And negotiation wins,
>   If you can call it winning,
> And here we are—just as before—safe in our skins;
>   Glory to God for Munich.

But by the time he reaches Spain he wants to have done with his complacent and "cynical admission of frustration." In Spain he sees what may be the future of England. But that is a perception that cuts two ways.

> The cocks crow in Barcelona
>   Where clocks are few to strike the hour;
> Is it the heart's reveille or the sour
>   Reproach of Simon Peter?

He does not know. In the midst of remorse he has still that sense which continually afflicts him, of spiritual sloth, of desire for defeat. Spain that was once a great empire, powerful in its possessions, is now a small poor country, at the mercy of greater powers. And to be no more than Spain may be the fate of Britain. But whatever their losses, the Spanish have not lost the essential desire for life that is so much more than the mere keeping alive. And the England that passes before us in these pages is an England whose possessions are still many, but whose people give hardly a sign of life.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

For those who have inherited a dead culture, with all its burden of living without love an existence that no one loves, to die and lie under a respectable inscription might be a solution. It is not the solution MacNeice is after, though he considers it with sympathy. When a man has repudiated his inheritance, to be or not to be is more than ever the question. The properties of "Autumn Journal" are as up to date as can be; there is not much in the poem that is not contemporary and that little is given a contemporary setting. The mood, too, may be of our time. But it has, for all that it changes, always a counterpart in one or another of Hamlet's soliloquies.

MacNeice's Hamlet is as given to self-accusation as the original. He is all hesitation and doubt; he has come, not from Wittenberg, but from Oxford, and the one advantage, as he explains, of having been to the University of Oxford is that you can never afterward "believe anything that anyone says." He wants to commit some action that will redeem his will, and yet is unable to arrive at anything in which he can whole-heartedly believe. He is as irresolute as Shakespeare's prince, but it is impossible to imagine him, even in the rashness of a moment, stabbing Mr. Chamberlain, who for him plays the part of Polonius. He can wake up knowing that "The bloody frontier converges on our beds," yet do no more about it than Hamlet did after seeing the soldiers of Fortinbras. The one act recorded of him, outside of those strictly necessary for his existence, is going down to Oxford to help win an election, which is promptly lost. He does get rid of his Ophelia, but simply by the process of letting time erase her from his mind. There is a Ghost in his cast. To be accurate, there are many ghosts in the Journal; the soldiers of the last war are brought on, hordes of ghastly apparitions; and they have their effect, which is to increase his ineffectualness. But there is one ghost who pervades the whole poem and prompts its action, and that is the buried majesty of England.

But MacNeice as Hamlet is definitely post-Prufrock and besides is a contemporary of Auden's. He has been influenced by Auden as, I have no doubt, Auden has been influenced by him. But in "Autumn Journal" MacNeice shows that he is not the same sort of poet as Auden. Auden is the poet of the tortured sensibility and at his best has an intensity that MacNeice cannot attain. MacNeice is the ordinary sensual man with an extraordinary endowment for poetic speech. When Auden falls off, he can fall very far indeed; when MacNeice fails to write poetry, he still commands a wholesome racy English. Nobody expects a poem as long as "Autumn Journal" to be all poetry; the alloy that MacNeice uses is solid, even when it seems to have been insufficiently worked. For if the speech in MacNeice is strong, the verse is frequently very weak. He pretends, whenever he has occasion to mention them, to depreciate the wisdom of the classical writers, whose works he must teach for a living. But it is probably because he has them to fall back on that, when he ceases to be a poet, he is still as sound as he is. In his approach to his material and in the shape he has given it he may have found an example in the Horace of the Satires. But it is a Horace whom he has first taken care

A Business Man's Vision of Justice

The Life of Joseph Fels

By MARY FELS

This book tells how a successful business man diagnosed the problem of modern civilization on the basis of laboratory experience providing farm colonies for unemployed workers in England. He found the path of charity beset by two obstacles: The "increment" value of land rose in the vicinity of his colonies, and the resulting high prices prevented the acquisition of adjoining areas; while at the same time, public authorities heavily taxed the farm equipment, housing, etc. And thus, through actual experience, without studying books on economics, Mr. Fels became convinced that both agriculture and business would greatly gain by the transfer of taxation from improvements, machinery, merchandise, etc., to the community-made value of both vacant and occupied ground in country and city alike. This vivid story gives a picture of the economic problem in a wholly new way.

$1.50, booksellers, or

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN & CO.
14 West 49th Street New York, N. Y.

VITAL NEWS CENSORED!

As the struggle proceeds in America between the Jesuit-directed campaign for a "Corporate State" and the Protestant democratic Middle Way, the press is beclouding the issue.

If the "Corporate State" is not "sold" to the American people, it will be due in no small degree to action stimulated by PROTESTANT DIGEST and its affiliated organization, The Religious Union for Democracy.

PROTESTANT DIGEST

May Issue Includes:

"Liberalism" Fosters Illiberalism
New York Times and Jesuit Editors
Catholic Action in America
Blockade, USSR and Peace
Purge in the Spanish Church

Send $1.00 for 5-month Subscription

PROTESTANT DIGEST, N
521 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Enclosed is $1. Please enter my subscription for 5 months.

Name..

Address..

STUDY THE SOUTH
with Charles C. Webber by joining the FIFTH TRAVELING ECONOMIC SEMINAR
of the
National Religion and Labor Foundation
JULY 2—31

A stirring 30-day itinerary, including Washington, Greenbelt, Arthurdale, Harlan County, the entire TVA, Highlander Folk School, Commonwealth College, Delta Cooperative Farm, southern industrial centers and the sharecropper country.

For details write
WILLARD UPHAUS
106 Carmel Street New Haven, Conn.

OPENING MAY 29

Special Program of festivities for Decoration Day Weekend.

Newly completed theatre, social hall, lounge, cocktail bar, sundecks. Log Cabin Clubhouse, each room with private bath. Private Golf Course on Premises. All Sports facilities.

Attractive June rates include free use of golf course.

●

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N·Y·
A Modern Camp for Adults

LENA BARISH : SAM GARLEN
Directors
New York City Office: 11 W. 42 St.
Telephone: BRyant 9-1738
Write or phone for booklet

OPENING MAY 20th

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
HONEYMOON PARADISE
9 CLAY TENNIS COURTS
8 HANDBALL COURTS
NO GREEN FEES IN JUNE
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
HALF MILE OF SAND BEACH
Write for Booklet "UM"

SCAROON MANOR HOTEL SCHROON LAKE N.Y.
NEW YORK OFFICES: MU. 2-4083, CO. 7-2471

IT IS YOUR LIFE
Keep Healthy ■ Stay Young ■ Live Long
By M. M. ROSENBERG, M.D.
THE HEALTH BOOK OF TOMORROW FOR AMERICANS OF TODAY.

"It is the only book by [illegible] doctor," said [illegible] famous author and book reviewer, "that I can read with the [illegible] interest that I read [illegible] novel or biography." Put aside all other reading for a while and inform yourself on the subjects of greatest interest to your own health and life. 23 chapters, 475 pages, price $2.50. At booksellers or send $2.50 (no postage) to THE SCHOLASTIC PRESS, 158 East 22nd St., New York, and the book will be delivered to you.

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Reader's Service Division
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

to bring down to his own level. He despises pumice. For MacNeice has too much of that special post-war conception of honesty to believe it desirable to revise. That would be to return to the past.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP

Revolt of Haru Matsui

RESTLESS WAVE: MY LIFE IN TWO WORLDS. By Haru Matsui. Modern Age Books. $2.50.

DRESSED in kimonos of the same color, Haru Matsui and her Elder Sister lived in the dream world of the old Japan. White petals fell from the cherry tree in the garden in spring. In winter goldfish slept at the bottom of the small pool, covered over with bamboo sticks and thick mats of dry pine needles. Daughters of a professor, they lived the life of secluded Japanese women. Elder Sister conformed and became the kind of woman she was expected to be, polite, courteous, and docile Haru Matsui rebelled.

At first her rebellion was inner. She did not understand why she should not "imitate street performers and sing undignified songs." Finaly her rebellion became active. She visited slums in Kobe. She got a job, but not without difficulty; she learned that women workers may always expect to receive lower wages than men, or none at all.

Finally she went to work for an educational magazine. Here she came in contact with the "new women," whom conventional Japanese feared and abhorred. At last her activities, innocent enough in seeming, such as attending youth meetings, brought her a visit from an intelligence officer. His threat is a mirror of the standards which ruled that first world of Haru Matsui. He said: "If you frequent such meetings, no one will want you for a bride."

In the detention cell of a police station she learned that the safe shell about her dream world was in reality fragile. With thieves and other victims of the social order she spent the night in unheated quarters, under filthy blankets. Her crime was being the acquaintance of a Japanese charged with harboring dangerous thoughts.

Here the crystal dream broke. Though Haru Matsui went back to her accustomed life, it was as a stranger. Later she would come to the United States, break with her father and relatives, live the free life of a woman in America, find love and find work to do. This work has been to lecture in behalf of China.

Such a history is as delicate as the restless wave which gives it a title. It is compounded of the elusive memories of emotion recollected, not in tranquillity, but in crisis. That old world Haru Matsui left was a world of exquisite and balanced forms—at least outwardly. But underneath the formal beauty misery seethed. To the human being not destroyed by formalism, intimations of misery were bound to come; and the human being had to act on her realization of the truth beneath ostensible beauty.

Such is the subject matter of "Restless Wave." It does not purport to be a sociological treatise or an exhaustive history of the feminist movement in Japan. In lyrical, poetic terms it tells the story of a single individual who lived at a turning-point of history and of her response to new social forces.

ELIZABETH MC CAUSLAND

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

IN BRIEF

THE PLANS OF MEN. By Leonard W. Doob. Yale University Press. $3.

After a consideration of the nature of planning, the author, a member of the Yale Institute of Human Relations, analyzes the main phases of human behavior and their contributions to planning; applies his deductions to existing attempts at planning in the United States and to fascism, communism, and war; and adds a section on the problems involved in planning. The obvious jostles the tentative and controversial, but this is unavoidable in an effort to achieve a comprehensive survey.

THE BLOODY MOHAWK. By T. Wood Clarke. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

This is a well-written, popular history of the Mohawk Valley during the two centuries in which it was the scene of fierce struggles among the Indians, the Dutch, the English, the French, and finally Tories and Patriots. The author, a resident of the valley, uses his local knowledge to vivify rather than to limit his narrative and produces a book of general interest. The pleasant and largely unfamiliar illustrations deserve a word.

PEOPLE: THE QUANTITY AND QUALITY OF POPULATION. By Henry Pratt Fairchild. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

The former president of the Population Association of America has written a popular and witty volume concerning the lack of balance between births and deaths. Beginning with a brief biological exposition, Fairchild discusses the unparalleled growth of world population since the Industrial Revolution, defends the scientific honor of the Reverend Malthus, explains the significance of some modern techniques of population forecasting, and presents a plea for eugenics. Provisionally, Fairchild advocates a stationary world population. He agrees that overpopulation is a chief cause of war and asserts that it is easier "to hold a population in check than it is to reduce it." He is one of the few writers on demography who stress the deterrent effect of modern capitalism on population growth. It is to his great credit that he utters no warnings concerning the ultimate extinction of the white race. Fairchild is at his best in his lucid exposition of the factors influencing the future of the population of the United States. He is unsatisfactory when he enters such rarified zones as the theory of optimum population and eugenics. "People" will serve as a pleasant, but not very comprehensive, introduction to an absorbing department of the social sciences.

DRAMA

The Riddle of the Sphinx

IN THE plays of Robert Sherwood sincerity and showmanship have often engaged in an uneasy collaboration. Few if any contemporary dramatists are more persistently or more somberly aware of the maladies which afflict us, few if any more skilful in handling the tricks of the trade. It was not, therefore, unreasonable to expect that "There Shall Be No Night," his new play about the war in Finland, would turn out to be an exciting thesis melodrama more or less in the manner of "The Petrified Forest" or "Idiot's Delight." But war is no longer merely a horrible possibility in which it was difficult to believe; it has become a reality in many ways more dreadful than had been imagined; and actuality has sobered a playwright plainly too deeply concerned to contrive merely theatrical effects. The result is that the piece, as currently performed at the Alvin Theater, is palpably sincere, frequently touching, and occasionally exciting. Perhaps no other recent play dealing with any aspect of the world situation has been less blatant, less melodramatic, less prone to rise into falsetto. And yet the impact of the whole is not actually overwhelming, and one leaves the theater with the sense that the play has not really risen to the subject.

This fact is certainly not chargeable to a production characterized everywhere by the same quiet and careful sincerity which marks the writing itself. Neither is it chargeable to admirably restrained and yet vivid performances by a company which includes such fine actors as Richard Whorf and Sidney Greenstreet in secondary roles and which is headed by Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne. Neither of the latter has ever given a more quietly effective performance than that which Mr. Lunt gives as the Nobel prize winner who cannot believe that war will come, despite his conviction that the human race is steadily losing its sanity, and that of Miss Fontanne as his gay American wife, whose heroism rises with circumstances which call it forth. Both bring to their roles an intimate human quality, with overtones of comedy which add enormously to the touching effect of the whole.

If it is not merely that we expect too much, what, then, is responsible for the fact that "There Shall Be No Night" is in some ways disappointing? One may certainly point out that its action is diffuse, that it nowhere gathers itself together in a climax, and that one is perpetually waiting for a scene which never comes, for a scene in which all latent implications will be made manifest and some new clarity given to that complex of thoughts and fears which the action has been recalling to our minds. But probably all this is the result, not of any failure of technical skill on the part of the author, but of two facts: first, that he—like all the rest of us—has nothing to say that seems adequate or has not been said before; second, that so far as the mere presentation of the situation is concerned, a playwright cannot hope to compete directly and successfully with the radio, the newspaper, and the magazine. Everyone capable of comprehending even dimly what is going on in the world has been for two years at least listening with agonized intensity to the dreadful news which has been supplied more quickly, more vividly, and more completely than news of a cumulative calamity has ever been supplied before, and no play can make the news, merely as news, more real or more vivid than it already is. Mr. Sherwood certainly fails less conspicuously than most—perhaps than any—who have tried, but even his play is less dramatic than a year of radio and newspaper.

If he fails also as a philosopher, if he fails, that is, in his attempt to make any newly revealing commentary on the situation or to draw any moral which does not seem as inadequate now as it

War and Peace in Finland

A DOCUMENTED SURVEY

AT LAST, all the facts about the Soviet-Finnish conflict in a vivid, authoritative, documented book. Gives the whole record, the historical backgrounds of the conflict, its hidden participants, its relationship to an older and larger war, and to the war now going on. 128 pages. Only 25c. By mail, postpaid, from the publishers.

Dept. N. SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY
114 E. 32nd St. New York, N. Y.

did when made before, his failure is part of the general failure of civilized and reflective mankind. Near the end his scientist proclaims an optimistic faith: the noise of battle is not, as some believe, the death rattle of civilization; it is only the death rattle of the beast in man. But there is little in the course of the play to make that faith seem more convincing, and if this same scientist does carry conviction when he comments earlier on the monstrous paradox presented by a civilization which has fought death and disease with astounding and ingenious success only to blow to pieces the bodies it has preserved in life and health, he is only reiterating a conviction which few in the audience can fail to have accepted before in almost precisely the same formulation. That paradox quite possibly leads to the reductio ad absurdum of our entire civilization. It is the riddle of our sphinx, which perhaps we must solve or die. But no one has ever yet hinted a solution, and, indeed, the one most frequently urged in recent years has only represented the paradox in even more fantastic terms. If Mr. Sherwood could throw any really new light upon it he would be more than a playwright; he would be wiser than any other man living and possibly the saviour of the human race. But he knows only what we all know, and like the rest of us he is baffled.

For the sake of the record I might add that the play has already been the subject of excited newspaper comment, in which it is attacked as propaganda for American participation in the war. Certain incidental remarks made by the characters do seem to suggest pretty clearly that Mr. Sherwood is on that side.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

for the June graduate
. . . the perfect gift

Carl Sandburg's
ABRAHAM LINCOLN
The War Years
4 volumes, boxed, $20
With "The Prairie Years,"
6 volumes in all, boxed, $28

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

RECORDS

IN HANDEL'S "Israel in Egypt," given by the Dessoff Choirs at the concluding concert of the New Friends of Music, there are magnificent pages of music, which most of us heard for the first time and may never hear again unless the Dessoff Choirs can be induced to repeat the performance, or one of the record companies, by some miracle, decides to record it. And this performance—unlike the performance of Mozart's Requiem that Victor saw fit to hand down to posterity—is one that merits recording. For what made the occasion outstanding was not only the superb music but the artistic conscience that was evident in every detail of the presentation: the warmth, spirit, sensitiveness in the singing of Mr. Boepple's chorus; the technical competence and excellent musicianship of the soloists; and for once the sound of an orchestra—the little orchestra of the New Friends—playing with interest in the occasion and willingness to contribute all it had, instead of the usual sound of eighty New York Philharmonic men condescending to the occasion and putting a choral conductor in his place. I would add that the inferior portions of the work which are mere adaptations of music by other composers might well be omitted from a recorded performance—or even, for that matter, from a concert performance.

Victor's set of Roy Harris's Symphony No. 3 (M-651, $4.50) recalled to my mind a shrewd observation by Ernest Newman: "The histories and biographies ring with denunciation of an Artusi or a Hanslick for his depreciation of a Monteverdi or a Wagner; but we hear nothing of the critics who blundered even more grievously . . . but blundered in the other direction. For one first-rate work that has been underpraised, a hundred second-rate works have been overpraised; particularly is this true of today." Some of us, then, may be making fools of ourselves by thinking as little as we do of the talents and achievements of Roy Harris and his group; but so may the others who hear in this symphony "music of the bleak and barren expanses of western Kansas, of the brooding prairie night, and of the fast darknesses of the American soul. . . ." And listening to the symphony I am not afraid to take my chances. I'll take them even in the face of the fact that it has been played by Toscanini, and that Koussevitzky is said to have called it the first truly great orchestral work to be produced in America. It is the Harrisites who have talked loudest about the taste that led Toscanini to play Chasins ten years ago and Martucci and Catalani and Bach-Respighi constantly. And I have confidence in my own ability to hear greatness in music and the lack of greatness—to hear also the lack of inner musical impulse, and of any more musical ability than sheer determination needs to contrive a windy incoherence that will stand both for Roy Harris and for the bleak and barren expanses of western Kansas. In the present work, after an opening section in this synthetically unconventional and individual and inaccessible idiom that Harris has adhered to, it is interesting to hear indulgences in types of normal effectiveness—that is, in the prettiness of an idiom no less synthetically contrived out of the conventional pastoral style, and in the sure-fire impressiveness of an ostinato figure. The Boston Symphony plays superbly under Koussevitzky; the recording is a little too brilliant, and at one point shortly after the beginning of the second side overcut recording produces a bad rattle.

The Coolidge Quartet's performance of Beethoven's Opus 18, No. 3 (M-650, $3.50) is wholly admirable in musical feeling, phrasing, and technical finish, and is excellently recorded, but it does not attain the sheer incandescence of the two or three years older Budapest Quartet version, and the superiority of the more recent recording is inconsiderable. Tibbett, in the quieter passages of Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Der Wanderer," which he has recorded in English (15891, $2), sings with beauty of voice and phrasing, but in the forceful portions he is a bawling operatic baritone, and one with a worn voice. And finally Webster Booth uses his agreeable voice with good musical taste in "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous shine forth" from Mendelssohn's "Elijah" (12609, $1.50).

In jazz two noteworthy Commodore records are at hand—one (529) offering Jess Stacy's solo improvisations on "You're Driving Me Crazy" and "She's Funny That Way," with Bud Freeman joining in for the middle chorus of the second tune and playing quite well; the other (531) offering an excellent performance of "I Ain't Gonna Give Nobody None of My Jelly Roll" and even better solo work in "Ballin' the Jack" by a small band that includes Joe Bushkin at the piano and, regrettably, George Wettling at the drums.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Pacifists in War Time

Dear Sirs: Parliament has met the problem of the conscientious objector in this war by setting up fifteen tribunals where the objector is "scrupulously tried." The New York Times correspondent recently reported from London that in these courts England's pacifists are permitted "to preach their gospel, to expound their theories, and to argue their freedom."

While this procedure is a great advance over the methods used in the first World War in both Great Britain and the United States, it is far from satisfactory. The National Council for Civil Liberties in London points this out in a report just received, which states that while some of the tribunals are fair-minded in their endeavor to determine whether the applicant's objections are sincere or insincere, others show a serious lack of impartiality, using trick questions and lecturing the men on the unpatriotic nature of the pacifist position.

This brings to mind the machinery set up by President Wilson in 1918 to solve the problem of what to do with our total objectors, the "absolutists" who refused to have anything to do with the military establishment. In June of that year the President issued an order offering "farm furlough" to these men and created a Board of Inquiry which traveled from cantonment to cantonment and questioned every man who professed conscientious scruples against war. Men adjudged sincere were given an opportunity to serve in the non-combatant branches—Medical Corps, Quartermaster Corps, and the Engineering Service—or to accept the farm furlough. Those who refused both were deemed law-breakers and were tried by court martial. Political objectors, men who objected to participation in the current war but who were willing to participate in a class war or revolution, were not given the opportunity to choose. They, the board ruled, were not entitled to any consideration.

The board examined nearly 3,000 men, all but 500 of whom accepted some form of non-combatant service. In these hearings, too, "trick" questions were resorted to. A stock question was: "What would you do if a burglar entered your home and attacked your wife or sister?" If the objector would resist the burglar and try to save his family he admittedly sanctioned force and was not a genuine objector. Other questions were: "What specific passage in the Bible has influenced you?" and "What church do you belong to?" An admission that he belonged to no church or recognized non-resistant sect was sufficient to cause the objector to be adjudged insincere.

It is to be hoped that the British conscientious objectors' tribunals may point the way to a real solution of the problem of the war-time pacifist. The facts that the hearings are open to the public, that the conscientious objector is entitled to counsel and may appeal to a higher tribunal, and that the judges are all civilians are worthy of special note. LUCILLE B. MILNER

New York, April 30

Secular Education in Danger

Dear Sirs: In the April 6 issue of your magazine, you commented on the McLaughlin bill, recently passed by the New York legislature. I think in all fairness to the Catholics, it should be known that they did not stand alone in their sponsorship of the bill. Many persons of the Protestant faith, of whom Dr. Robert Searle of the New York Federation of Churches was one, fought staunchly for its enactment, as did a small number of Jews.

As for the implications of the bill, it seems highly important that the people of New York City become immediately acquainted with them. It is in direct violation of the age-old American tradition of the separation of church and state. Though innocuous in appearance it paves the way for further and dangerous inroads by the church upon the public-school system. It brings into the school system a sense not of brotherly solidarity but of difference. It will fasten painful attention on any minority group—the small Catholic group in a Protestant neighborhood, the small Jewish group in a Christian neighborhood, the Negro group, and perhaps worst of all, that section of the school population whose parents prefer that they receive no sectarian education.

Aside from all these objections there is the practical administrative difficulty, which all those employed in the school system recognize and fear. A system as large as that of New York City will be completely disrupted by the attempt to regulate curriculums and hours for release, and the added clerical expense will be staggering. SARA BLOCK,

Chairman Religious Committee,
Teachers' Guild Associates

New York, May 2

Labor Service for Refugees

Dear Sirs: We wish to call the attention of your readers to the plight of German and Austrian refugees who have been given the "opportunity" of joining the French labor battalions to prove their loyalty to France. Here is a letter received by the International Relief Association (2 West 43d St., New York):

> March 29. I am one of a group of sixty refugees who were interned in the camp of — last September. Early in February we received orders to leave the following day to work in S—. Before our departure we were given official assurance that we were finally being enlisted in the Prestation (Labor Service) and that in accordance with the decree of January 13, 1940, we were to enjoy all the rights of mobilized French soldiers.
>
> For over a month now we have been working in the forest cutting down trees, at road construction, or in supply houses in the town. Despite the fact that we are working for the "national defense," we are not treated any differently than we were in the concentration camp. Indeed, we have not benefited in the least by the Prestation legislation, which called for military franchise, soldiers' wages, periodic leaves, tobacco, and compensation and reduction of rents for our families.
>
> Also, we suffer all the consequences of being "interned enemy aliens" especially as regards the sequestering of the meager savings that some of us had before we were interned. No doubt all personal possessions will finally be released, but our families should be able now to make use of these infinitesimal amounts. All belongings deposited in vaults, such as papers, legal documents, etc., have also been seized.
>
> Help us! Demand the application of the Prestation laws. The spirit of many of our comrades is breaking.

SHEBA STRUNSKY,
Executive Secretary, I. R. A.

New York, May 3

Victor's Leaflets

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of March 23 B. H. Haggin had some rather sharp things to say about the leaflets that accompany the albums of recorded music by Victor. In his opinion the leaflets are pretentious because they deal with the technical aspects of music and contain such erudite things as musical notation.

Mr. Haggin has overlooked the fact that the leaflets also contain a good deal of significant non-technical information. I have purchased a number of these Victor sets and have found the leaflets very helpful. They give me a good deal of information that interests me, and I therefore do not object to the author's going beyond this to deal with more technical points.

Finally, it seems to me that the tone of Mr. Haggin's review was totally unjustified. His last remark, though supposedly witty, had, in my opinion, no place in The Nation.

LAWRENCE K. ROSINGER

New York, April 28

Bow to Mr. Haggin

Dear Sirs: Too often, as I know, readers enjoy without acknowledging. For years I have been reading B. H. Haggin's column on music in your periodical. It has been an invariable pleasure to note the incorruptibility and courage of his opinions, and the intelligence and sensitiveness with which they are expressed.

In the midst of a devastatingly low standard of musical criticism in this country his articles have always stood out for me by reason of their magnificent honesty and their evidence of fine musical sensitiveness and understanding. More power to his pen!

JAMES G. HELLER

Cincinnati, May 1

Indispensable Service

Dear Sirs: The picture service of the New York Public Library is unlike any other in this country. The undersigned have found it indispensable in their profession. Over one million illustrations, photographs, and prints, filed in alphabetical order and by subject matter, have been available to us for research and reference free of charge. The material includes not only reproductions of works of art but photographs of every field of human activity. These documentary pictures are as essential to the creative artist as his colors and his clay.

Since March 1, 1940, lack of funds has made it necessary to close this collection to the public on two days of the week. In addition it has been necessary to shut down two sections of the files, the moving-picture stills and the painting files.

This picture collection has been supported by city funds since it was started. Not only should it be allowed to continue to function, but it should be aided to develop in response to the needs of the largest community of creative artists in the world. We, the undersigned, have therefore appealed to the Mayor of the City of New York and the Board of Estimate to take the necessary steps to insure the normal, full-time functioning of this very important branch of the New York Public Library.

GEORGES SCHREIBER, ADOLF DEHN, WILLIAM ZORACH, REGINALD MARSH, HUGO GELLERT, EDWARD LANING

New York, April 25

CONTRIBUTORS

MILTON S. MAYER is a free-lance writer who has contributed articles on social problems to Harper's, the Atlantic Monthly, The Nation, and other periodicals.

FRITZ STERNBERG is the author of "From Nazi Sources: Why Hitler Can't Win." He is a frequent contributor to the Army Journal in England and the Infantry Journal in this country.

MAURY MAVERICK, former Congressmen from Texas, is now Mayor of San Antonio.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, delivered the Hibbert Lectures at Edinburgh last year.

LEWIS COREY is the author of the widely discussed series of articles called Marxism Reconsidered, which recently appeared in The Nation.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP is the author of two volumes of verse and a novel.

ELIZABETH McCAUSLAND was for many years on the staff of the Springfield Republican.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is idexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

SUMMER RENTALS

Westport, Conn. — Stonybrook Colony — charming house and bungalow. Swimming, tennis, children's play groups, easy commutation, ideal vacation spot. Also acreage for sale. TRafalgar 7-4679, mornings.

Waiting in Maine

in secluded little colony—perhaps just your style—semi-rustic cottage built by an artistic-minded guy, partly for the fun of making something attractively different, partly for some financial return, possibly to house new-found congenial spirits. On far side of island near Portland, with ferry for autos; near enough civilization for comforts and conveniences, secluded enough for peace, quiet and beauty. Unusually handsome stone fireplace, bath, electricity, etc.; 4 bedrooms, 2 sleeping porches; community club half mile away; ideal base for auto and boat trips in New England. This season, to reasonably careful persons, $300—about half of fair price. Full details and photos if desired. F. T. Whitney, 39 Trinity Place, Boston, Mass.

Charming Farm House—7 rooms, 2 baths; 20 acres. 20 minutes from Compo Beach, Westport, Conn. $550. Long season. Phone MEdallion 3-2380, Dr. Robert L. Leslie.

FOR SALE

Berkshires. Farm Bargains

New roads opening hitherto inaccessible spot between Austerlitz and New Lebanon (near Stockbridge, Mass.). Colonial houses $2,000 up; land $15 acre. Terms. Scenery unexcelled in all New England. Scofield Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

Country Home — Modern 11-room, 12 acres, partly woodland; artesian well, tennis court, Preakness Hills, N. J. One hour from New York City. Owner Miss Haenichen, SHerwood 2-2184.

MAHOPAC FALLS PARK

A Summer Retreat for Discriminating People

One Hour from Bronx

Picturesque Half-acre Plots

— $625.00 —

Lake—Tennis—Social Hall. Illus. Booklet on Request

MAHOPAC FALLS PARK, Inc.

110 W. 40th St., N. Y. LOngacre 5-3916

ROOM WANTED

Refined woman (Jewish) wishes furnished room, kitchen privileges, cultured atmosphere, country, high elevation, summer. Reasonable. Box 1238, c/o The Nation.

LAND FOR SALE

OXFORD, CONN. Four charming wooded acres, accessible clear lake, swimming, 73 miles via parkways. $500. Box 1237, c/o The Nation.

Croton-on-Hudson. Natural unspoiled field, woodland; home site. Acre or more; excellent commuting; modestly priced. Room 1104, 285 Madison Ave., N. Y. CA 5-2133.

FOR RENT

W 95th St. Attractively furnished private room, bath, young lady. Call RIverside 9-4343, evenings.

Scarborough, N. Y. 4-room apartment suitable for two. Enclosed porch commanding beautiful view of Hudson. 45 minutes to N. Y. King, UN 4-5783.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Tree-ripened, sweet, juicy non-sprayed $3.50 per bushel; Mixed Fruit, $3.50; Grapefruit, $3.25. All delivered express prepaid. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62 cents a line (6 words)
Minimum 3 lines

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MAY 18, 1940 NUMBER 20

The Shape of Things

THE NEW BRITISH GOVERNMENT FORMED BY Winston Churchill is not without weak points, but it is an immense improvement on its predecessor. The War Cabinet is reduced to five men, all relieved of detailed departmental duties. Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Halifax remain, but they are offset by Clement Attlee and Arthur Greenwood representing the Labor Party, who can be counted on to support a vigorous policy. Neither Attlee nor Greenwood pretends to genius, but they command the confidence of their party, and their appointment gives Labor a real voice in the conduct of the war. A. V. Alexander, outstanding member of the Consumers' Cooperative wing of the Labor Party, goes to the Admiralty, where he served with distinction during the second Labor government. Sir Archibald Sinclair, who has led the small Liberal opposition with energy and ability, becomes Air Minister. The appointment to the War Office of Anthony Eden seems to have excited the Italians, but it fails to stir us. Far more encouraging is the naming of Herbert Morrison as Minister of Supply. He is by far the ablest administrator in the British Labor Party, and he goes to a department badly in need of an efficiency expert.

*

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN RUSSIA, WHILE clearly of great importance, are difficult to interpret owing to the severe restrictions under which Moscow correspondents still labor. The release of Marshal Voroshilov from the duties of Commissar of Defense and his appointment as chairman of the Defense Committee of the Council of People's Commissars are said to represent promotion. But on previous occasions the road of advancement has proved, very literally, a dead end for Soviet notables. In this connection it is worth remembering that Voroshilov is the last of the old-line Bolsheviks, a man of independent views with a strong personal following, and about the only remaining Kremlin leader who is not completely a Stalinist yes-man. His successor as head of the Red Army is Marshal Timoshenko, about whom not a great deal is known but who, it now appears, led the Polish and Finnish campaigns. Almost simultaneously with these changes in the high command came news that the system of army political commissars was being abolished. This plan for keeping the Red Army red and discouraging Bonapartism dates back to 1917. Later it was abolished, but after the purge of the generals these "eyes and ears of the Communist Party in the army" reappeared. Now once again the system is discarded as "ossified dogma." Says the Red Star, "War does not tolerate dilettantism." In similar vein, the organ of the Red Navy urges stronger discipline and condemns "familiarity and false democratization" between officers and men.

*

ON THE DIPLOMATIC FRONT THE U. S. S. R. IS engaged in some devious and obscure movements. The Russian press and its obedient echoes throughout the world continue to give strong support to Goebbels. But Moscow's current negotiations with Sweden and Yugoslavia seem to aim at results which, under certain circumstances, might prove positively harmful to Germany. Russia is now largely cut off from the outside world and, it is reported, unable to obtain satisfactory deliveries from the Reich. It may hope to buy from Sweden urgently needed machinery, but it will have to pay with the same kind of raw materials that Germany requires, and almost certainly its exportable surplus is insufficient to supply both. Nor is the newly signed commercial treaty with Yugoslavia likely to be popular in Berlin, for it provides for the purchase by Russia of copper, zinc, lead, and lard—all commodities desperately needed in Germany. However, these trade negotiations seem primarily a cover for political talks. There have been a number of indications recently that an attempt was being made to form a neutral bloc in the Balkans under Soviet auspices. The intention, of course, would be to warn off both belligerents, but it is plain that the most immediate threat, particularly to Yugoslavia, comes from the axis powers. The official Russian news agency has denied reports along these lines and bitterly denounced the allegation that the U. S. S. R. was pursuing a pan-Slavic policy. But, it is worth noting, the reports have been based largely on statements in the Week, whose editor, Claude Cockburn, is associated under another name with the London Daily Worker, and is known to have an inside track to the Russian embassy in London.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE SPLIT IN THE AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES Union resulted from anti-Communist feeling raised to the boiling-point by the Nazi-Soviet pact. This feeling expressed itself in a resolution, adopted by the National Committee last February, declaring it "inappropriate" for supporters of totalitarian forms of government to be members of the staff or directing bodies of the Civil Liberties Union and specifically including Communists in that category. In accordance with the resolution the one Communist on the Board of Directors, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, was asked to resign. She refused and attacked the Union in the Communist press. Thereupon proceedings were instituted to remove her from the board on grounds of her membership in the Communist Party and her public attacks on the Union. At a hearing held by the board last week the charges against Miss Flynn were sustained against strong minority protests, and her removal was recommended to the National Committee. The intense feeling generated by the controversy has helped to obscure certain important facts. The A. C. L. U. has a perfect right to exclude Communists from its governing bodies; it has, in fact, made a practice of doing so. It was both inconsistent with this practice and unwise to reelect Miss Flynn after she became a member of the Communist Party. But she was reelected, and she has not since been even charged with behavior violating the basic principles of the Union. Since no overt act was involved it should have been possible to delay or avoid the issue rather than precipitate it at a time when popular feeling against all extreme elements is running as high as it is today. The A. C. L. U. will ride out the storm no matter what action the National Committee takes on Miss Flynn's expulsion. But the cause of civil liberties would have been better served if the storm had never been allowed to blow up.

*

THE CONSERVATIVE PRESS IS DISMAYED BY the Supreme Court's decision in the Madison Oil Trust case, and its dismay is revealing. For the effect of the decision is to restore vigor to the anti-trust laws and to make it possible for the government to enforce the free competition which the New York Times and Herald Tribune and papers of similar economic philosophy affect to revere. We say "affect to revere" because their comment—and the reaction in big-business circles generally—discloses the basic insincerity of their everlasting paeans to the competitive system. They have demonstrated again that they do not really want free competition. What they want is the right to stifle competition—without government interference. The oil-trust decision reverses the famous "rule of reason" by which a conservative Supreme Court in 1911 left the Sherman Anti-Trust Act a dead letter, still handy for use against labor unions but impotent to deal with big business combinations. The Supreme Court in 1911 declared that the Sherman Act merely "outlawed" unreasonable restraint of trade, and judges fresh from the practice of corporation law proceeded to decide that a great deal of restraint could still be reasonable. The court now restores the original meaning—the plain meaning—of the Sherman Act's ban on restraint of trade.

*

IF WENDELL WILLKIE IS WISE HE WILL MAKE no more speeches defending the holding company. For a striking answer to them will be provided by the trial of Howard C. Hopson and three of his closest associates in the management of the bankrupt Associated Gas and Electric system. The true bill returned by a federal jury in New York alleges that Hopson, Frederick S. Burroughs, his vice-president in charge of finance, and his attorneys conspired to defraud investors of more than $20,000,000. The attorneys are Charles M. Travis and Garrett A. Brownback of Travis, Brownback, and Paxson. Attorneys frequently supply the legal ingenuity that makes holding-company manipulations possible, but it is not often that they are indicted along with the alleged manipulators. These four men, of course, may or may not be guilty. It is sometimes difficult to draw the line in holding-company sleight-of-hand between a profitable cleverness and a clever criminality. Whatever the verdict, the trial will leave the holding company and the devices associated with it discredited in the eyes of the public. It was by means of these devices that Hopson was able to get control of $1,000,000,000 in other people's money with an infinitesimal investment of his own. It was by means of these devices that he made enormous profits from the companies he ran into bankruptcy. For several hundred thousand investors who lost their savings in the course of his manipulations the question whether Hopson and his aides are guilty or innocent in the eyes of the law is interesting but academic.

*

"WHITEWASH" WAS THE TERM APPLIED BY Senator Norris, in a four-hour speech in the Senate on May 7, to the Schweinhaut report on the FBI raids in Detroit. "It is well known," Senator Norris said, "that I am one Senator who has great confidence in the ability and courage of our Attorney General. I disagree with his whitewashing of what happened in Detroit. It is painful for me to discuss it and to disagree with one in whom I have such great confidence." The report itself was the subject of an editorial, Sequel to a Melodrama, in last week's issue of The Nation. Senator Norris, in one of the longest and gravest speeches of his career, declared that he felt "the methods being pursued by the Federal Bureau of Investigation are wrong and, if continued, mean the destruction of human liberty in the United States."

*

THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD completed its case against the Ford Motor Company by ordering the reinstatement of thirty-eight men discharged from the company's Buffalo plant in 1937 for union activity. Testimony before the board indicated that the type of pressure which was used in the Ford plant at Dallas—described in a recent issue of The Nation—was also applied at Buffalo. The company distributed to its employees a statement by Henry Ford himself urging the workers to avoid the unions. It brought in outside thugs in an effort to rid its plants of union men and by terroristic methods effectively prevented unionization. In the face of these facts, the company's protest that the board has infringed its right of free speech loses all meaning. The Labor Board's action represents a last-ditch defense of the minimum rights of collective bargaining, which cannot exist where there is intimidation. Company pressure backed by the use of violence in an open shop is a most obvious form of intimidation.

*

THE PRESIDENT IS PREPARING A SPECIAL message to Congress on national defense, which may have been delivered before this issue appears. It is expected that he will call for an immediate additional outlay of about $500,000,000, bringing the 1941 budget for the armed forces above $2,500,000,000. We have no doubt that increased defense preparations are necessary; although our total needs will depend greatly on the outcome of the war and can only be guessed at now. But at this moment we need more than new appropriations. We need non-partisan study of our requirements, our productive capacity, the best organization of our military forces, the use made of money already spent. Hitler is not yet headed for these shores; we have a little time to plan as well as to act. And we shall gain more time for both jobs if meanwhile we send all possible aid to the Allies.

*

IN GENERAL THE PULITZER PRIZE AWARDS this year tower over those of previous years. Compare "Grapes of Wrath" with Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings's "The Yearling." Steinbeck's novel is of giant stature beside last year's choice, or the choices for several years back. William Saroyan's play, "The Time of Your Life," may appear less soberly important than Robert E. Sherwood's "Abe Lincoln in Illinois," but it is a work of far greater originality. The history award was uninteresting last year; this year it went to Carl Sandburg's great biography "Abraham Lincoln: The War Years." Nobody will quarrel with the technicality that transferred this work to a category in which it became eligible for a prize; biographies of Lincoln and Washington are specifically excluded from consideration, and Sandburg's volumes imperatively demanded recognition. The biography prize was a disappointment among the other excellent selections. It went to Ray Stannard Baker for the last two volumes of his eight-volume work on Woodrow Wilson. Important as this is as a documentary record, it lacks the qualities of personal interpretation and insight that are usually accepted as marks of biographical excellence. The choice of Mark Van Doren for the poetry award is especially gratifying to The Nation, which Mr. Van Doren served for some years as literary editor. Not since Robert Frost won the prize in 1937—as he did also in 1931 and 1924—has so sound a choice been made. In the field of journalism, the selection of Otto D. Tolischus of the New York Times is particularly well deserved. His dispatches have been as boldly informative as any from inside the Nazi ramparts.

*

IF ARCHIBALD MACLEISH IS RIGHT, THE scholars and writers of our day will answer to some grave indictments when future historians tell the story of the past two decades. Elsewhere in this issue Mr. MacLeish prepares the case for the prosecution: the paralysis of our men of vision in the presence of forces that must spell death to vision; their failure to cure that "condition of men's minds" which induces whole nations "to give up the long labor of liberty and to surrender their wills and their bodies and even their minds to the will of a leader"; their willingness to divide themselves into water-tight compartments of specialization the better to shirk the responsibility of defending the whole of truth and the whole of culture against the enemy. Mr. MacLeish's essay is a challenging, if bitter, document. We hope other scholars and poets will send us their comments.

*

JAMES WECHSLER, FOR TWO YEARS A VALUED member of The Nation's staff, has accepted a position as assistant labor editor of PM, New York's long-heralded, eagerly awaited afternoon newspaper. We are sorry to lose Mr. Wechsler, who in addition to his editorial activities has contributed several of the most striking articles printed in The Nation in the last two years, but we cannot repress a certain vicarious satisfaction in his new work. The launching of a newspaper is always an exciting project, but PM promises adventures of a wholly unprecedented sort. We intend, in an early issue, to publish a preview of the coming journal.

Two Worlds at Grips

AMONG the diked fields of Holland and Belgium and in the air above, two worlds are at grips in a struggle more momentous than any of those great battles of the past which earned for the region its description as "the cockpit of Europe." The fight now raging from the Zuyder Zee to the Ardennes will be one of the decisive battles of history. For there is far more at stake than the question whether Germany or Britain shall be top-dog in Europe. Many times in the last thousand years the balance of power on the Continent has shifted, but the foundations of European civilization have been left undisturbed.

Today that civilization is challenged as it has not been challenged since 732 A.D. when the Moslem hordes which had swept through North Africa and Spain were turned back at Tours after they had reached the heart of France. Had this invasion succeeded, the development of Europe would have run a totally different course, but the change would not have been more profound than that which will take place if Hitler is victorious. For the Nazis no longer bother to conceal the fact that they aim to impose their ideology on Europe and make over the Continent on a revolutionary plan. They have ceased to pretend that their only objective is the overthrow of the Versailles system or the reunion of the German people. Now they are talking of a new European union under German leadership which will obliterate "pigmy states" and put an end to "plutocracy," individualism, and democracy.

"The European center of gravity," writes the Börsenzeitung, "is returning to its natural center in the median axis of the Continent. Such fundamental reorganization, however, can be effected only if the present order collapses and must be coincident with a landslide that will carry with it middle-sized and small states, assign them to new places, and force them to reorientation or bury them beneath it." In the new Europe, according to Nazi political philosophers, the German master race will reign supreme, assigning to other peoples their rights and duties. A new collective supernational economy, based on an iron discipline and an authoritarian regime, will harness the labor power of inferior races for the benefit of German industry. Naturally, the colonies of Britain and France are to be keyed into this system, and beyond that, as Otto Tolischus points out in an illuminating dispatch to the New York Times, the exponents of the German revolution "are convinced that the economic weight of a consolidated Europe alone is too great for the rest of the world to ignore. . . . And since such a Europe would dictate its own terms of economic intercourse, the rest of the world would have to conform by adopting the same methods."

There is no longer room for doubt that the Nazis, if victorious, will pursue their totalitarian vision with the same ruthless efficiency that they are showing on the field of battle. And with the knowledge that defeat means the loss of all national independence and a future of helotry the Western states are now fighting with their backs to the wall. Il faut en finir.

The invasion of the Low Countries was clearly a long-planned move, and the excuse that it merely forestalled Allied aggression is hardly worth mention. Holland and Belgium had guarded their neutrality with complete sincerity, and the Dutch under German pressure had even fortified their coast against the possibility of a British attack. In any case, so long as they remained inferior in the air and on land, the Allies had every reason to respect the neutrality of the Low Countries, and that inferiority is an admitted fact. Germany, on the other hand, is now probably at its maximum relative strength. Another year of blockade would have undermined its reserves; another winter of privation would have weakened morale at home. Clearly Hitler has chosen his moment to stake all on one gigantic blow, hoping that the end of summer will see his enemies beaten to their knees. By his dual thrust into Holland and Belgium he seeks to outflank Britain and France simultaneously. Command of the Dutch coast would enable him to undertake smashing aerial attacks on Britain, perhaps paving the way for actual invasion. Control of Belgium would put him in a position to turn the Maginot Line, for the French fortifications which stretch from the Moselle to the sea are weaker than the main sector and lie in flatter and less defensible country.

No one can say what will be the outcome of this battle. The German drive carries immense weight, and the huge Nazi air force, organized with a meticulous attention to detail and utilized with pitiless ingenuity, is a deadly weapon. Against these factors must be set the addition to the Allied ranks of more than a million fresh troops, many of them well trained, and the fact that for the first time German planes are opposed to an enemy in a position to hit back and hit hard. Still more important is the stiffening effect of a sense of imminent peril on British and French morale. In Britain Parliament has spoken with its ancient authority, and Chamberlain has obeyed its voice. He has gone, not so much because the Norwegian expedition was fumbled, as because his lack of drive and real leadership threatened to lose the war as it had lost the peace. Winston Churchill is a man of entirely different caliber, who from the first has understood the nature of the Nazi revolution. He is not likely to underestimate the task before him or to allow a tenderness for vested interests to hinder the full mobilization of British resources. Time no longer permits either half-measures or facile optimism. "We have before us," said Winston Churchill in his first statement to the Commons, "many long months of struggle and suffering. I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears, and sweat."

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The "Daily Worker" Case

THE Daily Worker, organ of the Communist Party, and its editor, Clarence Hathaway, have been found guilty of criminal libel by a so-called "blue ribbon" jury. We believe the case merits national attention both because of the circumstances under which it was brought to trial and because of the charge involved. Ever since the Alien and Sedition laws, when Federalist judges brought charges of criminal libel against Jeffersonian editors, the dangers implicit in the practice have been recognized. The charge of criminal libel has a place in our legal system, but its use may easily be abused and the abuses endanger freedom of the press. The general recognition of these dangers explains why there have been so few convictions for criminal libel in the past. The last great case in New York City was when Theodore Roosevelt brought about the indictment of Joseph Pulitzer for criminal libel because of revelations made by the New York World in connection with a Panama Canal scandal. But that indictment was quashed by a federal judge—an action sustained by the Supreme Court.

The Daily Worker case grew out of an article it published on February 24, 1936, headed "Liggett Murdered by the Underworld for His Scavenging." William C. Dodge, Dewey's predecessor as District Attorney of Manhattan, obtained an indictment for criminal libel against the paper and its editor on December 30, 1936, but news of the indictment brought widespread protest in the press, conservative as well as liberal, and it was pigeonholed. The indictment was recently revived by District Attorney Dewey. It accused the Daily Worker and Hathaway of libel on two counts—one libel against the late Walter W. Liggett, the other against his widow. The paper was charged with having published a report that after Liggett's murder in Minneapolis in December, 1935, two Minnesota gangsters testified under oath that he had tried to "shake them down." The second charge against the newspaper alleged that it had said that Liggett's widow had sold her husband's body to the Republican Party. Similar criminal-libel charges were brought by Mrs. Liggett against the Minnesota Leader, organ of the Farmer-Labor Party, and its editor at the time, former Congressman Teigan. She demanded retractions. "Mrs. Liggett Demands Retraction. Teigan Stands Pat," was the headline on a Minnesota Leader story introduced in evidence at the Daily Worker trial. The charges against the Leader were never pressed. Later Mrs. Liggett sued the Daily Worker for libel and was awarded $2,500.

The Nation is not concerned with the verdict in the civil suit, but the criminal-libel conviction is an entirely different matter. A jury decided not merely whether the matter printed was true but also whether it was "fair comment," a concept open to various interpretations.

It is a pleasure to report that Judge John J. Freschi of the New York Supreme Court handled the case with admirable impartiality and care. But it is hard to understand the verdict in the light of the evidence and of his charge to the jury. "If the jury decides," he said, "that the words contained in the [Daily Worker] article did not mean that Mrs. Liggett was literally dismembering the corpse of her husband and selling it limb by limb to the Republican Party, but meant that she was making political capital of her husband's views, then you cannot find any libel of Mrs. Liggett." But the jury did find libel of Mrs. Liggett. Its verdict on that count does not make sense. Nor is the verdict much more impressive on the other. The Daily Worker, on appeal, will challenge the class composition of the "blue ribbon" jury panel. Twenty-two per cent of the panel came from New York's famous "silk stocking" Assembly district, none from Harlem or the East Side. The Worker will argue that this is of particular importance in a criminal-libel case, since New York in 1805 made the jury the judge of law as well as fact in such actions as a safeguard against the abuses of reactionary judges here and in England. The Scottsboro case was reversed on appeal because no Negroes were on the panel from which the jury was picked. Reversal will be sought on a similar plea—that working-class persons were excluded from the jury. Perhaps the most interesting aspect of the case, from the national standpoint, is that it represents another instance—in a growing list—of old charges and indictments being revived for use against Communists. As such it smacks of political persecution and sets a most dangerous precedent.

America Is Not Neutral

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE horror and anger that swept through the United States when the first human bombs dropped into Holland were not born of surprise. They sprang from the realization that here at last was the start of the central conflict which would determine the fate of Europe for at least another generation, if not for Hitler's millennium. Americans felt this. And in addition they felt the uncomfortable weight of their own geographical security and their insecurity of mind. Americans are not neutral. They are passionately partisan. They want Hitler defeated. They want Britain and France to survive; the Low Countries to be saved from conquest; the conquered nations to be freed from Nazi tyranny. They want the whole system of fascist regimentation demolished. But so far they have not been willing to assume either risks or responsibilities in order to get what they want. They watch the death grapple in Europe as an audience watches a melodrama, demanding with deep emotion that the villain get his just desserts but comfortably detached from the job of seeing that he gets them. This shrinking from any active part in the drama now reaching a climax in Europe is unhealthy, a mood that in the end must create disintegration and division in minds that harbor it; because the detachment is not genuine, corresponding to inner emotions. It fights constantly against conflicting fears and scruples. Americans only pretend to be neutral. The time has come to quit pretense and say clearly just where our hopes lie and what we propose to do to make them real.

Consciously, as a matter of deliberate policy, we should do our best to save France and Britain and their invaded allies from defeat. And the only chance of doing it without ourselves going to war is through providing equipment in unstinted amounts at rates and on terms that will enable the Allies to hold out and to win. In this stage of the war by far the greatest threat to the Allied position is their inferiority in certain crucial weapons—most particularly in planes. It is reported from reliable quarters in Washington that only five out of thirty-odd plants capable of turning out fighting planes are working to fill war orders. If this is true, production should be increased as rapidly as possible.

Nor should we make our terms so onerous that they either hesitate to buy materials of war or deprive themselves of other needed goods—including food for their populations. They still have ample gold and securities—the sequestered funds of the Low Countries increase their available assets—but, as Barnet Nover points out on a later page, they have bought with deliberate restraint in order to stretch their funds as far as they can. If we really believe in the necessity of defeating Hitler and are willing to facilitate his defeat by all possible non-belligerent means, we will give credits as soon as they are required. In the meantime substitute plans, such as Mr. Nover describes, for heavy purchases of needed raw materials from the Allies will tend to lessen the financial drain on their resources by providing additional dollar exchange with which they can buy the supplies they need.

Isolationists argue that increased economic aid, far from insuring us against war, will create an enormous stake in an Allied victory; let it seem in danger of being lost, and we will plunge in to rescue it. The reverse of this argument is closer to the truth; our stake in an Allied victory comes first. It would be foolish to make commitments even in the form of goods and money if we had not already decided that victorious fascism was worse than war. Once that decision is made, the material aid we send serves the opposite purpose; it offers the one chance of saving our stake without fighting for it.

Interventionists support a different contention. If we really feel that the war against fascism in Europe is our war, they say, we have no right to buy our immunity. We should fight side by side with the armies of the Western powers and take the full consequences of our partisanship. This view seems to me unduly romantic. Our troops are not now either wanted or needed on the anti-Nazi fronts. The raising and equipping of an expeditionary force would deflect the stream of military supplies into American arsenals, crippling the Allied armies for months or even years. The very rush of events, paradoxically, makes our participation less likely and less desirable. And even if the argument for military intervention were not fantastic from a practical point of view, it is morally ineffective. The consequences of war are so devastating that no nation has a right to plunge in unless all other means of resistance have failed. It is the tragedy of Europe that peaceful means of resistance were never applied; instead, surrender was tried as a weapon. That is why Europe is at war.

The United States should learn from Europe's failure. We are strong and can choose our own course, neither allowing ourselves to be frightened into retreat nor rushing to arms. The important thing, both for our safety and our integrity, is to acknowledge just where we stand and act accordingly.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 609
EDITORIALS:
TWO WORLDS AT GRIPS 612
THE "DAILY WORKER" CASE 613
AMERICA IS NOT NEUTRAL by Freda Kirchwey 613
WASHINGTON HEARS THE GUNS by Barnet Nover 615
HOW TO INVADE ENGLAND by Ewald Banse 616
THE IRRESPONSIBLES by Archibald MacLeish 618
FROM THE BILL OF FARE: Speeches by Stuart Chase, John Gunther, Melvyn Douglas, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Ferdinand Pecora, Frank Kingdon 623
IN THE WIND 627
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 628
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 629
THE AVIATION INDUSTRY by Oswald Garrison Villard 629
GUIDEBOOK TO LITERATURE by Louise Bogan 631
ON THE HEALTH OF AN OLD LADY by Karl Loewenstein 632
INSIDE THE ALCAZAR by Louis B. Salomon 633
IN BRIEF 634
DRAMA: MR. SAROYAN AGAIN by Joseph Wood Krutch 634
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 635

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Washington Hears the Guns

BY BARNET NOVER

Washington, May 13

HITLER'S invasion of the Low Countries last week did more than prove that the capacity of Americans to be "shocked and angered," to quote President Roosevelt's words, had not been wholly dulled by the events of the past few years. It brought about an increased measure of support both in and out of Congress for the Administration's foreign policy, a result that may have a real bearing on the election campaign. It dumped a whole series of new problems and new anxieties into the lap of the government. It undermined the opposition to a further large increase in our defense establishment. It narrowed the gap between those who might be called limited isolationists—since their isolationism is limited to Europe and does not apply to Latin America and Asia—and those who favor still greater aid to the Allies, though by measures short of war. And it brought home to a large number of Americans, as not even the invasion of Denmark and Norway had done, the disturbing if elementary fact that opposition to arson does not insure one's house against fire.

Some of these effects will undoubtedly wear off as the surprise and shock of Hitler's latest coup wear off, particularly since it seems unlikely that the German successes in Poland and Norway will be immediately duplicated in Belgium and the Netherlands. Those ardent isolationists whose first reaction to the spread of the war was to give vent to hysterical shouts of "Let's be calm" are already beginning to emerge from the storm cellars in which they took temporary refuge when bombs began dropping on Amsterdam and Brussels. Last week's clamor for a vast increase in the army and navy will probably not subside, for the war in Europe has only just begun, and the impact of that war on the United States is only now really beginning to be felt. But the subject will be given a more realistic examination than was possible in the emotional stress of the past week.

None the less, the secular trend, to borrow a term from the economists, is definitely in the direction of a neutrality that is increasingly benevolent toward the Allies, both as a means of showing disapproval of Hitler's gangster tactics and as a direct safeguard for the United States. The implementation of this attitude, however, will not be easy. For instance, take the problem of credits. Even before the Dutch and Belgian holdings in this country were added to their resources the Allies were in a position to finance all necessary purchases in this country for many months. In line with the late Chamberlain government's fiscal policy of waging the war as economically as possible, purchases have been held down. British and French purchasing agents here have been forced to operate on the assumption that the war would be long and that the Allies could take no chances of having to cut off or drastically to curtail purchases in the United States because of lack of funds. Had the available dollar holdings of the Allies been greater or had Great Britain and France been in a position to get large-scale credits in this country, such parsimony could have been avoided. But both the Johnson Act and the neutrality law stood in the way of credits.

At this late stage in the session, with Congress trying to adjourn in no more than three weeks or a month, it is very unlikely that the question of repealing the Johnson Act or modifying the neutrality law will even be brought up, although Senators King of Utah and Thomas of Oklahoma have come out in favor of immediate extension of credits to the Allies. Action which would have the same effect as lifting the ban on credits but which might not meet so much political opposition is more likely. One plan which has a considerable measure of support in the Department of State and is about to be presented to the President for his approval calls for large-scale purchases from the Allies of a great variety of raw materials, including tin, rubber, tungsten, chromium, and nickel—materials which the Allies, including the Netherlands, are in a position to supply and which, for reasons of national defense as well as for other considerations, it would be wise for the United States to store as emergency reserves. Such a move would avoid the implication inherent in any credit transaction—after what happened to the war debts—that credits are actually subsidies in disguise. With the dollars thus obtained the Allies could make additional purchases of needed supplies, including agricultural products, our surpluses of which are likely to increase as more of this country's European customers are overrun by Hitler and cut off as markets for American products. Indirectly, large-scale purchases by the United States of strategic raw materials, by reducing the available supplies of such commodities, would diminish the chances of their reaching Germany. In other words, such a plan would at one and the same time bolster the Allies' financial structure and therefore their fighting strength, provide the United States with the reserve of strategic raw materials that the army has long insisted should be built up here, reinforce the British blockade, and make possible the continued export of American manufactured products and American agricultural surpluses.

The invasion of Holland was immediately followed, somewhat to the embarrassment of the Administration, by the landing of Allied troops in the Netherlands West Indies islands of Curaçao and Aruba, 40 miles from the coast of Venezuela and 750 miles from the Panama Canal. The embarrassment did not arise out of any fear that the occupation would be construed as an infringement of the Monroe Doctrine—it was quickly pointed out that no question of any change in the sovereignty of the islands was involved or could arise—but out of fear that the example set by the Allies might be followed by the Japanese in the Dutch East Indies. To be sure, the French and British governments in announcing their action informed the Department of State that they had done so at the request of the Netherlands government and only as a temporary measure. But account is taken of the possibility that Japan might parallel this action in Southeastern Asia without seeking prior permission.

It is felt here that the danger of such an act of aggression against the Dutch colonies in the Pacific is not imminent. But the government is taking no chances. The Pacific battle fleet is being kept in the Pacific, its actual whereabouts a dark secret, and Secretary Hull has felt called upon twice in one week, the first time before the invasion of the Netherlands and the second time immediately after that event, to emphasize America's interest in the maintenance of the status quo of the Netherlands Indies.

It is feared, however, that the intensification of the fighting in Europe and its possible spread to the Mediterranean might lead Japan into temptation. The invasion of the Netherlands has thus brought the war home to the Americas and created a dangerous situation in Asia. Whatever complacency may have existed in this country about the war in Europe as not "our war" is rapidly disappearing. Nor is any compensatory relief to be had from contemplation of the prospects in this hemisphere should Hitler be victorious. The Latin American nations have taken kindly to President Roosevelt's Good Neighbor policy, but it is problematical whether their desire to continue the reasonably happy relations with Uncle Sam would long survive the urge to get on the bandwagon of a victorious Hitler. And the numerous and never disbanded Nazi fifth columns in Mexico and in Central and South America can always be expected to do the job required of them.

How to Invade England

BY EWALD BANSE

[When Hitler came to power, Ewald Banse was appointed professor of military science at Brunswick Technical College. At the same time, but less openly, he became the prime mover in an organization called the German Society for Military Policy and Military Sciences. He was regarded as the leading exponent of Nazi military aims and technique, and his books "Wehrwissenschaft" and "Raum und Volk im Weltkriege" to an astonishing degree charted the course which Germany's war strategy has taken. The English translation of "Raum und Volk im Weltkriege," from which the following excerpts are taken, was published in this country in 1934 by Harcourt, Brace and Company under the title "Germany Prepares for War."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

THE German plan of campaign [in 1914] . . . took no, or too little, account of England. It reckoned with the French army and even with England's little expeditionary force, but not with England as the mainstay of a protracted war, the organizer of the blockade which starved us out, the fountain-head of supplies. . . . Our right flank ought not only to have besieged Antwerp—we had plenty of men in Alsace-Lorraine, where they were falling over each other, in fact—but also have made straight for the coast and occupied the Belgian and still more the French Channel ports, the bases of the British expeditionary force, as far as Boulogne or better still Abbéville, which would have been quite easy to do.

Nobody thought of this, because the purely land-minded Germans took no account of the sea and sea power. Indeed, it is a question whether it was not a bad mistake in military geography to content ourselves with marching through Belgium instead of occupying Holland also, equally a neutral and our kinsman to boot. The disadvantage of this proceeding—namely, the fact that it involved a second violation of neutrality—was as nothing compared with the first violation; but the advantage was incalculable, for it would have put the whole opposite coast of England within our range, given our fleet a much longer and stronger base, which would certainly have preserved it from inactivity, and finally made the possibility of an invasion of the southeastern coast of England so immediate that the English, with practically no army, would probably have concluded a reasonable peace with all speed rather than have the country overrun by German soldiers. The military occupation of Holland, the home of a race of German traders and peasants, . . . would have presented no difficulties.

It is not too much to say that the World War became an economic war, a war of starvation, and lost the heroic character of earlier wars because the Germans failed to grasp the strategic significance of the coast of Holland, Belgium, and northern France, and made a mess of the Schlieffen plan. We can only hope that more comprehensive thought will some day lead to wiser decisions.

Even from this short survey certain important facts emerge regarding England's position from the point of view of defense. Her situation as an island just off the Atlantic coast of Europe enables her to keep an eye on it and in particular to watch over the Channel and the North Sea; it gives her, in addition, a military security enjoyed by no other country of Europe. Her economic dependence on her own, but distant, empire, which proceeds from this sense of security, is only made feasible by her possession of a big merchant fleet and a navy superior to all others. This fact alone makes England the sworn foe of any power which aims at possessing an equally large fleet. In her case, therefore, the security of the state is bound up with undisturbed maritime trade and a strong navy; none of these things is possible without the others; if but one drops out, the whole structure falls to pieces. Its two main pillars are the navy and, of course, the unswerving determination of the English people. The military upshot of this is that for England the navy is much more important than the army.

The north and west of the interior of Great Britain consist of rough, humpy mountain country of middling height, poor in soil and woods, rich in rain and moorland, and fairly easily passable owing to its many valleys; these two areas, in Scotland and in Wales, are the most thinly populated in the country. The east and south, on the other hand, as also the deepset central depression of Scotland, consists of low-lying country, partly flat and partly undulating, and only intersected by a few modest ranges of hills. This country is the scene of a surviving agricultural and grazing industry, whose products, both animal and vegetable, are few but choice. . . .

Great Britain is easily approached from the sea owing to its many bays and short but deep rivers . . . nor does its interior, apart from Scotland and Wales, present many obstacles to communication. Even the Pennine Chain in the north of England forms no barrier, being merely a sort of raised plateau covered with sheep runs. In general there are three main densely populated industrial (and shipping) areas: (1) the main axle-tree running right across the south of England from London to Cardiff, with its center of gravity in the vast London area; (2) the Midlands, an area bounded roughly by a line joining Liverpool, Birmingham, Hull, and Leeds, and containing rich deposits of coal and iron—the Midlands are the seat of the principal heavy smelting and textile industries of the country, contain a considerable proportion of its population, and are responsible for most of its foreign trade; (3) the small Lowland area in the center of Scotland, with its coal and iron deposits, its shipbuilding and other industries, which contains Glasgow and Edinburgh and almost the whole population of Scotland. . . . Any hostile threat or actual invasion must be aimed at one of these three areas and if possible against the most important one, the Midlands, which are also the principal center for the manufacture of arms.

The southeast of England . . . also deserves special attention, since it is most easily reached from the Continent and as the seat of the capital is of paramount importance politically. Southeastern England forms the northern extremity of the Paris basin, though, of course, now separated from it by the curving-in of the Channel. Consequently, its outer edge from Portsmouth to the neighborhood of the Wash is composed of Jurassic rock which forms either gently undulating depressions or grass-clad downs, toward the west with steep slopes, and is traversed by numerous rivers running lengthwise through it. It is easy to see that this Jurassic belt possesses certain physical features of which an invading army might make good use—with its front facing northwest, that is. The area behind the Jurassic belt is chalk, hard writing chalk in the higher parts, soft green sandstone in the depressions; in the middle of the chalk, however, there is superimposed—just as in the actual Paris basin—a flat tertiary layer, into which the Thames has cut its channel and in the center of which stands London. The chalk country is thus divided into two branches which fork northeast and southeast somewhere between Oxford and Salisbury; their narrow lines of hills, running in these same directions, form a second rampart facing northwest, of practical military importance and further strengthened by various rivers.

In addition to the Thames valley, southeastern England contains one other low-lying area, namely, the broad blunt peninsula formed by Norfolk and Suffolk, a relatively sparsely populated agricultural district. This region is so noticeably cut off from the rest of England, including even the southeast, by the Wash and its inland extension, the Fens (once a swamp, now converted into marshland), by the lower Thames, and by various other rivers, that it is necessarily of the greatest interest to any invading army. In fact, the Great Ouse, which flows into the Wash, and a number of streams flowing into the Blackwater estuary which are only separated from its source by a few miles make the peninsula into a regular island, which provides an invading army with safe and roomy quarters from which it can threaten London—which is quite close and without natural defenses on that side—and also the industrial Midlands.

It is very important to form some idea of how the English character may be expected to react to a hostile invasion. The nation will certainly rush to arms as one man and with heroic obstinacy let itself be mown down in front of the line of the Ouse or the chalk and Jurassic hills, before it is forced back step by step. But it is questionable whether the English could face starvation. Physically they have been extremely pampered for centuries and would find it very hard to adjust themselves to real privation such as they never experienced during the war in spite of food cards. Some of them would no doubt patriotically endure even that, but others might throw up the game. . . . We confess that it gives us pleasure to meditate on the destruction that must sooner or later overtake this proud and seemingly invincible nation, and to think that this country, which was last conquered in 1066, will once more obey a foreign master or at any rate have to resign its rich colonial empire. The above sentences would appear monstrous, nay rank blasphemy, to every Englishman and Englishwoman in the world—if they ever saw them.

The Irresponsibles

BY ARCHIBALD MacLEISH

HISTORY, if honest history continues to be written, will have one question to ask of our generation—people like ourselves. It will be asked of the books we have written, the carbon copies of our correspondence, the photographs of our faces, the minutes of our meetings in the famous rooms before the portraits of our spiritual begetters. The question will be this: Why did the scholars and the writers of our generation in this country, witnesses as they were to the destruction of writing and of scholarship in great areas of Europe and to the exile and the imprisonment and murder of men whose crime was scholarship and writing—witnesses also to the rise in their own country of the same destructive forces with the same impulses, the same motives, the same means—why did the scholars and the writers of our generation in America fail to oppose those forces while they could—while there was still time and still place to oppose them with the arms of scholarship and writing?

It is a question the historians will ask with interest—the gentle, detached, not altogether loving interest with which historians have always questioned the impotent spirits of the dead. Young men working in the paper rubbish of our lives, the old journals, the marginal notations, the printed works, will discover—or so they will think—that the scholars and the writers of our generation in this country had been warned of danger as men were rarely warned before. They will discover—or so they will think—that the common inherited culture of the West, by which alone our scholars and our writers lived, had been attacked in other countries with a stated and explicit purpose to destroy. They will discover that the purpose had been realized. They will discover that a similar purpose, backed by similar forces, created by similar conditions, was forming here. And it will seem to them strange—ironical and strange—that the great mass of American scholars and American writers made no effort to defend either themselves or the world by which they lived.

They will make of course the necessary reservations. They will note that societies of scholars and associations of writers adopted resolutions declaring their devotion to civilization. They will note that certain young novelists and poets, the most generous and gallant of their time, unable to endure the outrage and injustice, gave up their lives as writers and enlisted in the hopeless armies to fight brutality with force. But of those who truly faced this danger not with their bodies but with their minds, of those who fought the enemies of the intellect with the weapons of the intellect, of those who fought this danger with the weapons by which this danger could be overcome, they will record the names of very few. And they will ask their question: Why did we, scholars and writers in America in this time, we who had been warned of our danger not only by explicit threats but by explicit action, why did we not fight this danger while the weapons we used best—the weapons of ideas and words—could still be used against it?

It is not a question for which we are altogether unprepared. We have been writing out our answer for many years now in action and inaction, in words and in silence—in learned articles in the scientific journals and in controversial articles in the general magazines, in books, in blank faces after the passionate words, in bored eyes refusing to believe. The answer we have prepared, the answer we have written out for history to find, is the answer Leonardo is said to have given Michelangelo when Michelangelo blamed him for his indifference to the misfortunes of the Florentines. It is the answer of our kind at many other times and places. "Indeed," said

Leonardo, "indeed, the study of beauty has occupied my whole heart." The study of beauty, of history, of science, has occupied our whole hearts, and the misfortunes of our generation are none of our concern. They are the practical and political concern of practical and political men, but the concern of the scholar, the concern of the artist, is with other, purer, more enduring things.

This is the answer we have written down for history to find. I doubt whether it will satisfy the ironic men who come to plague us on that waterfront where Teresias was made to drink the blood and answer. I think, indeed, it will not satisfy them. For it has not satisfied ourselves. We say with great firmness and authority, speaking by our words and by our silence, that the misfortunes of our generation are economic and political misfortunes from which the scholar can safely hold himself apart. We say this with all the authority of the political scientists of the past, to whom the misfortunes of the people were always political and economic and of no concern to the poet, the pure scholar, the artist intent upon his art. We say it also with the authority of the political scientists of the present, to whom all phenomena of whatever kind are, by hypothesis, economic and political. But though we say it we do not believe it. For we have observed these misfortunes. They have been acted out for us to see. And what we have seen is this: that the misfortunes of our time are not the misfortunes the philosophers, the theorists, the political scientists have described to us. They are not the practical concern of the practical man and therefore matters of indifference to the scholar. On the contrary, it is the practical man and the practical man alone—the man whose only care is for his belly and his roof—who can safely be indifferent to these troubles. The things he lives by are not menaced. And it is precisely the scholar, the poet—the man whose care is for the structures of the intellect, the houses of the mind—whose heart is caught. For it is the scholar's goods which are in danger.

It is perhaps because we have seen this and yet refuse to see it that our minds are so confused and our counsels so bewildered. Nothing is more characteristic of the intellectuals of our generation than their failure to understand what it is that is happening to their world. And nothing explains that failure so precisely as their unwillingness to see what they have seen and to know what they do truly know. They continue to speak of the crisis of their time as though the war in Europe were that crisis—and the war, they say, is no concern of theirs. They continue to speak of the crisis as though the imperialistic maneuvers, the struggles for markets, the propaganda in the newspapers and the radio were the crisis—and the maneuvers of imperialism, the propaganda of the press, and the struggles for trade, they say, are no concern of theirs. And yet they know—they know very well because they have seen—that these things are not the crisis but merely its reflections in the mirrors of action. They know that behind the war, behind the diplomatic gestures, behind the black print on the page and the hysterical voices on the air there is something deeper and more dangerous—more dangerous to them. They know that it is a condition of men's minds which has produced these things—a condition which existed and exists not only in Europe but in other parts of the world as well and not least in our own country. And they know that this condition of men's minds is not a practical, a political, phenomenon of no concern to the scholar and the man of thought, but something very different.

It is not, for example, a matter of purely practical and political interest that great numbers of men in various parts of the world wish passionately and even violently to give up the long labor of liberty and to surrender their wills and their bodies and even their minds to the will of a leader, so that they may achieve at least the dignity of order, at least the dignity of obedience. It is not a matter of purely practical and political significance that whole nations of men have gladly and willingly released themselves not only from their rights as individuals but from their duties as individuals; so that they are no longer compelled to feel or to respect the individual humanity of others—or to feel or to respect the things that individual humanity has, over many centuries, created. It is not a matter of purely practical and political importance that governments which once, whatever they may have practiced, protested a respect for learning and the arts, should now permit themselves to show not only the power but, worse, far worse, the willingness, the purpose, to enslave both learning and the arts. It is not a matter of purely practical and political importance that societies which once made part of the community of Western culture should now attempt by murder and outrage and exile to root out that culture and to replace it with private and parochial sciences and private and parochial arts; so that frontiers are armed, for the first time in the history of the West, not only along the rivers and the mountains and the boundaries of nations, but across the common earth of culture, the free land that was never fenced before.

I think no honest man will say that these are matters of practical and political significance alone. I think any man who considers with coolness and without the preconceptions of the dogmas the character of the crisis of his time will admit that this crisis is in essence a cultural crisis—a revolt of certain classes, certain conditions of men against the inherited culture of the West and against all common culture—a revolt by no means limited to those nations where it has been successful. Wars we have had before—many wars; murder also: inquisition of scholars: torture of askers: suppression and mutilation of truth. But in the past these things have been done, however hypocritically, in the name of truth, in the name of humanity—even in the name of God. The forms of culture were preserved—and in the preservation of a civilization as in the preservation of an art the forms are everything. What is new and unexampled in the times we live in is the repudiation of the forms. What is new is a cynical brutality which considers moral self-justification unnecessary and therefore—and this is perhaps its worst indecency—dispenses even with the filthy garment of the hypocrite. To use brutality and force, not in the name of right nor in the name of God, but in the name of force alone, is to destroy the self-respect and therefore the dignity of the individual life, without which the existence of art or learning is inconceivable. To lie, not in the name of truth, but in the name of lies, is to destroy the common basis of communication without which a common culture cannot exist and a work of learning or of art becomes unintelligible.

The truth is that the disorder of our time is in its essentials a revolt against the common culture of the West. For against what but the common culture did this disorder continue to struggle in Germany long after it had overthrown the former state? There was no domestic danger for it to fear. Against what but the Western respect for the dignity of the individual was aimed the long series of outrages against the Jews? The Jews were impotent when they were subjected to the worst abuses. Against what but the Western respect for the common, the nationless, creation of the artist was aimed the destruction of the work of men like Thomas Mann? Thomas Mann had already been repudiated by his people when they accepted the government of his enemies. Against what but the Western belief in the wholeness of Western civilization was aimed the assault upon a church which was no longer a danger to any ruler and the fabrication of a paganism which needed only the blond sopranos on the ends of wires to be Wagner at his worst?

Intellectuals in America and elsewhere—writers, scientists, the men of learning—have attempted to ignore these questions. They have pretended to themselves that the burning of books, the exiling of artists, the invention of mythologies were merely incidents, after-thoughts, decorations; that the true crisis was the crisis of food, the crisis of arms, the crisis created by political forces, by economic collapse; that they had, and needed have, no truck with it. They have been wrong. These things are not incidents. They are not after-thoughts. They are the essential nature of the revolution of our age. For without this attack upon the habits of the mind, the reliances of the spirit, the revolution could not, by any possibility, have succeeded.

The revolution of our age—the revolution which has finally emerged and declared itself in action—is not the great Revolution of the Masses of which generous men once dreamed, and which other and less generous men have now so meanly and so bloodily betrayed. The Revolution of the Masses was a revolution which proposed to set up one faith against another faith, one culture against another culture: a faith in man, a faith in the power of the patterns of men's lives, against a faith in institutions and in money; a culture of the people against a culture of the exploiters of the people. The revolution which has finally and successfully emerged in action has no such faith and no such culture.

It is a revolution of negatives, a revolution of despair. It is a revolution created out of misery by dread of yet more misery, a revolution created out of disorder by terror of disorder. It is a revolution of gangs, a revolution against. And the enemy it must destroy is the enemy which, in all times and in all civilizations, has stood against the revolutions of the gangs—the rule of moral law, the rule of spiritual authority, the rule of intellectual truth. To establish the negative revolutions, the revolutions of which the only aim is power, the revolutions which have no means but force, it is necessary first to destroy the authority of the unseen sayings of the mind. It is necessary to destroy the things the mind has made. Caliban in the miserable and besotted swamp is the symbol of this revolution. As long as the unseen beauty in the air retains its voices and its seductive music and its stinging whips, the revolutions of the gangs are clumsy, blundering, grotesque, and foolish. They have one hope of success and only one—the destruction of the whole system of ideas, the whole respect for truth, the whole authority of excellence which places law above force, beauty above cruelty, singleness above numbers.

It is the distinction of our time—perhaps unhappily its most memorable distinction—that it and it alone has provided the formula by which this overthrow could be achieved. Only in our time has the revolution of the gangs discovered a strategy and a leadership brutal enough, cynical enough, cunning enough to destroy the entire authority of the inherited culture and thereafter to seal the doors against the searching and the asking of the scholar's mind, the artist's mind; so that the revolution of force, the revolution of despair, could flower and fulfil its possibilities.

It is to this disorder and not to some political and partisan dissension, not to some accidental economic breakdown—it is to this direct, explicit, and intentional attack upon the scholar's world and the scholar's life and the scholar's work that American scholarship has been indifferent. Or if not indifferent, then inactive; merely watchful—fearful, watchful, and inactive. And it is there that history will place its question: How could we sit back as spectators of a war against ourselves?

I think, speaking only of what I have seen myself and heard, I think it is neither lack of courage nor lack of wisdom but a different reason which has prevented our generation of intellectuals in this country from acting in its own defense. I think it is the organization of the intellectual life of our time. Specifically, I think it is this: that intellectual responsibility has been divided in our time and by division destroyed. The men of intellectual duty, those who should have been responsible for action, have divided themselves into two castes, two cults—the scholars and the writers. Neither of these accepts responsibility for the common culture or for its defense.

There was a time a century ago, two centuries ago, when men who practiced these professions would have accepted such responsibility without an instant's hesitation. A century ago the professions of the writer and the scholar were united in the single profession of the man of letters, and the man of letters was responsible in everything that touched the mind. He was a man of wholeness of purpose, of singleness of intention, a single intellectual champion, admittedly responsible for the defense of the inherited tradition, avowedly partisan of its practice. Where those who practice these several professions today divide the learned world and the creative world between them in irresponsible and neutral states, the man of letters inhabited both learning and the world of letters like an empire.

He was a man of learning whose learning was employed not for its own sake in a kind of academic narcissism but for the sake of decent living in his time. He was a writer whose writing was used not to mirror an abstract and unrelated present but to illuminate that present by placing it in just relation to its past. He was therefore and necessarily a man who admitted a responsibility for the survival and vitality of the common and accumulated experience of the mind, for this experience was to him the air he breathed, the perspective of his thinking. Learning to him was no plump pigeon carcass to be picked at for his private pleasure and his private fame but a profession practiced for the common good. Writing was not an ornament, a jewel, but a means to ends, a weapon, the most powerful of weapons, a weapon to be used. Whatever threatened learning or the ends of learning challenged the man of letters. Whatever struck at truth or closed off question or defiled an art or violated decency of thinking struck at him. And he struck back with every weapon masters of the word could find to strike with. Milton defending freedom of the mind in sentences which outlive every name of those who struck at freedom, Voltaire displaying naked to the grin of history the tyrants who were great until he made them small, Bartholomew de las Casas gentling cruel priests and brutal captains with the dreadful strokes of truth—las Casas, Milton, and Voltaire were men of letters, men who confessed an obligation to defend the disciplines of thought not in their own but in the general interest.

Had men like these been living in our time, had the intellectuals of our time been whole and loyal, it would, I think, have been impossible for the revolution of the gangs to have succeeded where success has been most dangerous—in the perversion of the judgments of the mind. Murder is not absolved of immorality by committing murder. Murder is absolved of immorality by bringing men to think that murder is not evil. This only the perversion of the mind can bring about. And the perversion of the mind is only possible when those who should be heard in its defense are silent.

They are silent in our time because there are no voices which accept responsibility for speaking. Even the unimaginable indecencies of propaganda, even the corruption of the word itself in Germany and Russia and Spain and elsewhere, even the open triumph of the lie produced no answer such as Voltaire in his generation would have given. And for this reason—that the man who could have been Voltaire, who could have been las Casas, does not live: the man of intellectual office, the man of intellectual calling, the man who professes letters—professes an obligation as a servant of the mind to defend the mind's integrity against every physical power—professes an obligation to defend the labors of the mind and the structures it has created and the means by which it lives, not only privately and safely in his study, not only strictly and securely in the controversies of the learned press, but publicly and at the public risk and danger of his life. He does not exist because the man of letters no longer exists. And the man of letters no longer exists because he has been driven from our world and from our time by the division of his kingdom. The single responsibility, the wholeness of function of the man of letters, has been replaced by the divided function, the mutual antagonism, the isolated irresponsibility of two figures—the scholar and the writer.

Why this substitution has come about—whether because the methods of scientific inquiry, carried over into the humanities, destroyed the loyalties and habits of the mind or for some other reason—I leave to wiser men to say. The point is that there has been a substitution. The country of the man of letters has been divided between his heirs. The country that was once the past and present brought together in the mind is now divided into past on one side, present on the other.

Past is the scholar's country; present is the writer's. The writer sees the present on the faces of the world and leaves the past to rot in its own rubbish. The scholar digs his ivory cellar in the ruins of the past and lets the present sicken as it will. A few exceptions noted here and there—men like Thomas Mann—the gulf between these countries is complete. And the historical novels fashionable at the moment, the vulgarizations of science, the digests of philosophy, only define its depth as a plank across a chasm makes the chasm deeper. That it should be necessary to throw such flimsy flights from one side to the other of the learned world shows how deeply and disastrously the split was made.

That scholarship suffers or that writing suffers by the change is not asserted. Scholarship may be more scientific: writing may be purer. Indeed, there are many who believe, and I among them, that the time we live in has produced more first-rate writers than any but the very greatest ages, and there are scholars of a scholarship as hard, as honest, as devoted as any we have known. But excellence of scholarship and writing are not now in question. What matters now is the defense of culture—the defense truly, and in the most literal terms, of civilization as men have known it for the last two thousand years. And there the substitution of the modern scholar-writer, however pure his scholarship, however excellent his writing, is a tragic and immeasurable loss. For neither the modern scholar nor the modern writer admits responsibility for this defense. They assert on the contrary, each in his particular way, an irresponsibility as complete as it is singular.

The irresponsibility of the scholar is the irresponsibility of the scientist upon whose laboratory insulation he has patterned all his work. The scholar in letters has made himself as indifferent to values, as careless of significance, as bored with meanings as the chemist. He is a refugee from consequences, an exile from the responsibilities of moral choice. His words of praise are the laboratory words—objectivity, detachment, dispassion. His pride is to be scientific, neuter, skeptical, detached—superior to final judgment or absolute belief. In his capacity as scholar the modern scholar does not occupy the present. In his capacity as scholar he loves the word—but only the word which entails no judgments, involves no decisions, accomplishes no actions. Where the man of letters of other centuries domesticated the past within the rustling of the present, making it stand among us like the meaning of a statue among trees, the modern scholar in his capacity as scholar leaves the present and returns across the past, where all the men are marble.

It is not for nothing that the modern scholar invented the Ph.D. thesis as his principal contribution to literary form. The Ph.D. thesis is the perfect image of his world. It is work done for the sake of doing work—perfectly conscientious, perfectly laborious, perfectly irresponsible. The modern scholar at his best and worst is both these things—perfectly conscientious, laborious, and competent: perfectly irresponsible for the saving of his world. He remembers how in the Civil Wars in England the scholars, devoted only to their proper tasks, founded the Royal Society. He remembers how through other wars and other dangers the scholars kept the lamp of learning lighted. He does not consider that the scholars then did other things as well as trim the lamp wicks. He does not consider either that the dangers change and can be greater. He has his work to do. He has his book to finish. He hopes the war will not destroy the manuscripts he works with. He is the pure, the perfect type of irresponsibility—the man who acts as though the fire could not burn him because he has no business with the fire. He knows, because he cannot help but know, reading his papers, talking to his friends—he knows this fire has consumed the books, the spirit, everything he lives by, flesh itself, in other countries. He knows this but he will not know. It's not his business. Whose business is it then? He will not answer even that. He has his work to do. He has his book to finish. . . .

The writer's irresponsibility is no less. Where the modern scholar escapes from the adult judgments of the mind by taking the disinterested man of science as his model, the modern writer escapes by imitation of the artist. He practices his writing as a painter does his painting. He thinks as artist, which is to say he thinks without responsibility to anything but truth of feeling. He observes as artist, which is to say that he observes with honesty and truthfulness and without comment. His devotion, as with every honest painter, is devotion to the thing observed, the actual thing, the thing without its consequences or its antecedents, naked of judgment, stripped of causes and effects. The invisible world, the intellectual world, the world of the relation of ideas, the world of judgments, of values, the world in which truth is good and lies are evil—this world has no existence for the honest artist or for the honest writer who takes the artist for his model.

He sees the world as a god sees it—without morality, without care, without judgment. People look like this. People act like that. He shows them looking, acting. It is not his business why they look so, why they act so. It is enough that he should "make them happen." If he concerns himself with motive at all he concerns himself with the "real" motive, meaning the discreditable motive which the actor conceals from himself. His most searching purpose is to find, not the truth of human action, but the low-down, the discreditable explanation which excuses him from care. The suggestion that there are things in the world—ideas, conceptions, ways of thinking—which the writer-artist should defend from attack—the suggestion above all that he was under an obligation to defend the inherited culture—would strike him as ridiculous.

Artists do not save the world. They practice art. They practice it as Goya practiced it among the cannon in Madrid. And if this war is not Napoleon in Spain but something even worse than that? They practice art. Or they put the art aside and take a rifle and go out and fight. But not as artists. The artist does not fight. The artist's obligations are obligations to his art. He has no others. Not even when his art itself, his chance to practice it, his need to live where it is practiced may be in danger. The writer-artist will write a bloody story about the expense of blood. He will present the face of agony as it has rarely been presented. But not even then will he take the weapon of his words and carry it to the barricades of intellectual warfare, to the storming of belief, the fortifying of conviction where alone this fighting can be won.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame

There are examples in history of civilizations made impotent by excess of culture. No one, I think, will say of us that we lost our intellectual liberties on this account. But it may well be said, and said with equally ironic emphasis, that the men of thought, the men of learning, in this country were deceived and rendered impotent by the best they knew. To the scholar impartiality, objectivity, detachment were ideal qualities he taught himself laboriously and painfully to acquire. To the writer objectivity and detachment were his writer's pride. Both subjected themselves to inconceivable restraints, endless disciplines to reach these ends. And both succeeded. Both writers and scholars freed themselves of the subjective passions, the emotional preconceptions which color conviction and judgment. Both writers and scholars freed themselves of the personal responsibility associated with personal choice. They emerged free, pure, and single into the antiseptic air of objectivity. And by that sublimation of the mind they prepared the mind's disaster.

If it is a consolation to the philosophers of earlier civilizations to know that they lost the things they loved because of the purity of their devotion, then perhaps this consolation will be ours as well. I doubt that we will profit by it or receive much praise.

From the Bill of Fare

THE NATION has been called cantankerous, a curmudgeon among journals, quick to blame, niggard of praise. Perhaps the charge is true. But when we find a chance to approve we take it, and when we praise we mean it. In this anniversary year The Nation decided to institute an award to be given annually for "distinguished service in the cause of American social progress." We submitted a list of candidates—all worthy of choice—to a representative group of American liberals. The selection of Eleanor Roosevelt was a natural and a happy one.

On May 1 The Nation awarded a bronze plaque to Mrs. Roosevelt at a dinner in her honor. More than a thousand persons filled the tables and the balcony of the ballroom at the Hotel Astor in New York. Clifton Fadiman served as toastmaster and introduced a list of speakers who managed to combine variety and substance and warmth of feeling in an unusual group of speeches. Mr. Villard reviewed The Nation's record, linking its present with its past, and its long-fought-for ideals with the democratic spirit that animates Mrs. Roosevelt. His remarks, both eloquent and comprehensive, were too long to include in these pages. But much of what he said is happily preserved in his article in The Nation's special anniversary issue, published last February 10. Some of the other speeches were extemporaneous and so cannot be reproduced, including the words of Eleanor Roosevelt in accepting the medal, and those of William Allen White. Fragments of their speeches, carried in the New York Times, are worth quoting:

> In a brief acceptance speech, Mrs. Roosevelt said: "I will do my best to do what is right, not with a sense of my own adequacy but with the feeling that this country must go on, that we must keep democracy and must make it mean a reality to more people." She added that "our democracy is only as good as each individual citizen is good," and that a statesman could lead only as far as each citizen allowed him to go.
>
> "We should constantly be reminded of what we owe in return for what we have," she went on, illustrating this remark with two examples, one of a refugee Austrian and another of a taxi driver who had come here as an immigrant, both of whom had "shocked" her into realizing what a debt we owe to our democratic way of life.
>
> "We must remember," she added, "that it is not for ourselves that we live—it is for an ideal; namely, not to give ourselves a better chance, but to give the people as a whole something in life worth living for, and perhaps, sometime, we may offer hope for the rest of the world."
>
> Mr. White said that it was a myth that we were operating under a two-party system, as the liberal Republicans and the conservative Democrats made our system one of four parties.
>
> "It is the illusion of every President on entering the White House," Mr. White said, "that he has a mandate. He believes he has a united party, but the united party is also a myth. By reason of the four-party system the bellyache is an occupational disease of the White House.
>
> "Let us get a Republican President next fall and, boy, will he get a real headache!"
>
> Turning to Mrs. Roosevelt, Mr. White said: "My dear, I don't care if the President runs for the third or fourth term as long as he lets you run the bases, keep the score, and win the game."

Although the excerpts printed below cannot do full justice to the speeches from which they were taken, we hope they will serve to bring the spirit of the dinner for Eleanor Roosevelt to thousands of Nation readers who could not be present.—EDITORS THE NATION.

STUART CHASE

THE story goes that an American tourist was being shown the new subway in Moscow. His guide pointed out the frescoes on the walls, the ticket-choppers' booths, the turnstiles for passengers. After admiring all these, the tourist inquired: "What about the trains?"

Then the guide showed him the new washrooms, more turnstiles, and more frescoes. "What about the trains?" the tourist asked again.

"What about the trains?" the guide repeated angrily. "What about the trains? What about the share-croppers in Alabama?"

This story may be apocryphal, but it illustrates a familiar type of logic. We might reverse it. Suppose we showed a visiting European the Empire State Building in New York, and he inquired: "What about all the vacant space?" "Vacant space?" we might sternly reply. "Vacant space? What about the invasion of Norway?"

I'm as devoted a radio news hound as the next man. Before I accept an evening invitation I consider whether I shall have to miss Raymond Swing—another former Nation editor. If both Mr. Swing and Mr. Gunther are on the menu, I refuse to go out at all. But I wonder how much of this interest in the foreign news is excitement—like watching a prize fight—and so a kind of escape from pressing problems at home?

That is what I like about Mrs. Roosevelt—her interest in America. I suppose she worries about Europe like the rest of us, but she does not allow this worry to divert her attention from the home front. She goes around America, looking at America, thinking about America, talking to Americans like those same Alabama share-croppers, helping day and night with the problems of America.

Some of the European news is more breath-taking than the fights, at least to me. I try to picture the shape of the world economy after the war is over—whoever wins—and I'm dumfounded by what I see. Here is Switzerland, said to be spending a million dollars a day to defend its passes. On a per capita basis, read thirteen billions a year for the United States. Compare this with our present supposedly staggering defense expenditures of two billions or so.

If this is the case in Switzerland, it is equally bad in Turkey and the Balkans, worse in Sweden, Holland, Belgium, Italy. That is to say, every so-called neutral in Europe is spending for defense probably twice as much relatively as we are spending for all federal purposes.

When we come to belligerents, the figures go right off the map. Recent estimates on the floor of Parliament indicate that Britain is spending more than 50 per cent of its entire national income for war; France and Germany are spending more than 60 per cent. Equivalent expenditures for the United States would be in the neighborhood of thirty-five to forty billions! Even with heavy increases in taxes, this would leave us with an annual deficit of perhaps thirty billions. The present deficits are running around three billions, one-tenth as great. Senator Taft, Mr. Dewey, and the New York Herald Tribune have to be revived with smelling salts whenever they contemplate the present gap between federal outgo and income. If we were operating on the European model, could we bring them to at all?

The New Deal is supposed to be fighting a war, too, a war against depression. To do so it has spent between 5 and 10 per cent of the national income—and this in the teeth of the most dire prophecies of inflation, ruin, and grandchildren bowlegged under burdens of debt. Yet the New Deal expenditures have been primarily in the interest of houses rather than howitzers, investments in life rather than in death. Some idle money has been moved, some idle men put to work. But not enough. Our hearts are not in our war. If we taxed some of the idle funds more heavily, we could put men to work and come closer to a balanced budget. But we don't dare to. Many of us just howl about approaching bankruptcy. Mr. Dewey talks about economy in the cadences of President McKinley. It sounds poignant as one listens, but then one looks east toward Europe, or even north toward Canada, and it all seems pretty timid and childish and irrelevant. It isn't that kind of world any more.

What kind of world it is going to be I don't pretend to know. Perhaps after the shooting stops we shall find that the financial folklore of three centuries has been reversed, and that a new calculus has emerged, where men come first and money comes second. Maybe when a thing is to be done, the question will no longer be: "Where's the money coming from?" but rather: "Have we the men and the raw materials? If we have, we can do it." That at least seems to be the drift in Europe, so far as I can glimpse it through the fog.

I am glad that we have The Nation with us at this time. It has pierced a lot of fog in the last seventy-five years. It is comforting to know it is here to help us pierce this one. We need all the help we can get.

JOHN GUNTHER

I HAVE a rather bad habit of neglecting the newspapers every once in a while, and reading other things. Sometimes I even read the dictionary. And when I was thinking about this dinner a few hours ago, I looked up a word in my dictionary—the word "institution." What is an institution? I wondered. And I found out that an institution was something that had fixity, permanence, and importance. Also it's something that people like to depend on, something benevolent as a rule, something we like. And it occurred to me that tonight we are meeting together to honor two great American institutions: The Nation and Eleanor Roosevelt. Of Mrs. Roosevelt I can say very little, except to mention how deeply we all admire her. But of The Nation I can say a good deal. I observe several Nation editors looking somewhat alarmed.

Ten or eleven years ago, I remember—it must have been 1930 or thereabouts—I started to write European articles for The Nation. I lived in Vienna then. And I've been thinking, tonight, what a formidable, what a spectacular difference there is between the Europe we knew then, in 1930, and the blazing Europe we face today. (I've been looking over some of my old Nation pieces. They were about petty revolutionary movements in Rumania; they dealt with changes in the political picture in Austria which no one but an Austrian metaphysician could understand; they described what was almost a comic-opera world.) We had scarcely ever heard of Hitler in those days; if we had heard of him at all, we thought he was a rather bad Austrian joke. We thought that Mussolini, basically, was of the organ-grinder type, who made trains run on time and chased beggars off the streets. We thought of Stalin as a faithful student—or shall I say disciple—of Lenin, who would no more gobble Finns than we'd gobble grasshoppers.

In those days Mr. Chamberlain was a faintly adequate Birmingham back-bencher. General Franco was an ambitious officer somewhere in Morocco. Daladier and Reynaud were doing what all French politicians do when they're obscure—I'm not sure what that is. In those days we had never heard of the anti-Comintern pact, or the Russo-German pact, or the Siegfried Line, or the Rome-Berlin axis, or who was going to get axed by that axis. In those days we even thought there was a League of Nations. We didn't know nearly so much as we do now of the modern technique of rape and run. And if anybody had bet that ten years later the British and Germans would be fighting in Norway, with the British in the gravest possible danger, we would have called an ambulance.

It's part of the duty of serious journalism to portray changes like this, changes that have shattered the very foundations of our modern world. And it has always seemed to me that The Nation has performed able and very honorable work in doing so. The essence of foreign correspondence, it seems to me, is stability of judgment, plus courage. It isn't easy to work in Europe these days. There are obstacles on every side. I don't mean merely such obstacles as censorship or propaganda, which are more or less external and which can be overcome. I mean such internal obstacles as inadequate education, and prejudice, and above all the great national vice of wishful thinking. Also nowadays good reporters—like the reporters on The Nation—have to face the almost intolerably complex difficulties of the world itself. A good reporter has to be something like Dr. Freud, since he must be a psychologist; he must be something like Gibbon, since he is necessarily a historian; he ought to be like Max Planck, a scientist; he is like Dr. Gallup, a sounder-out of opinion; he certainly must be a politician; he may even have to be a prophet. For it's not merely a war that is going on today; it's a revolution. The world is exploding in an unpredictable series of violent uprisings and outreachings. And at such a period in history it behooves men of good-will to know what is going on. And thus journalism—the kind of journalism represented by The Nation—is so critically important.

MELVYN DOUGLAS

THERE is much rabble-rousing today under the slogans of liberalism and democracy. These slogans are the verbal banners flown by organizations and individuals whose ideologies are as far apart as Herbert Hoover and Earl Browder. The resulting tension is particularly evident in California. The extreme right and the extreme left seem to regard the state as a testing ground. Both sides grapple for control in their efforts to influence the voting public. It requires some measure of insight to gauge these organizations and to determine what purposes lie behind the liberal verbiage. A magazine like The Nation is of extreme value to us in California. It is often difficult to obtain a fair hearing for facts, as, for instance, in the case of California's migrants, and The Nation has been a periodical which could be depended upon to present them from a completely trustworthy and liberal point of view. At the age of seventy-five years its liberality is still sound and militant.

So too is the liberality of Eleanor Roosevelt. Very recently, during a tour of California's migrant camps, I had an excellent opportunity to see Mrs. Roosevelt in action. She knew precisely what questions to ask in order to get the information she wanted. Her eye was quick to catch the fact that the single water faucet serving a county camp was right next to the privy or that the sores covering a child's body were the result of improper food. Much more impressive, however, than her obviously trained aptitude in social research were the simplicity and warmth of her approach. Underneath the scientific observer was the human being who was profoundly vulnerable to the sufferings of thousands of her fellow-citizens.

An incident or two will illustrate. We were in one of the county camps. Mrs. Roosevelt noticed a young woman standing inside a tent pitched on the bare ground, which was still slushy from a heavy rain storm the night before. The young woman was surrounded by several children. Mrs. Roosevelt, without waiting for the formality of a presentation, stepped to the flap of the tent and asked if she might come in to look around. The woman said, "Why certainly, but we haven't had a chance to clean up yet from last night's flood and a mess of measles." Without further ado, Eleanor Roosevelt was inside the tent talking to her about the perennial problems of housekeeping and child-raising. She might for all the world have been an Oklahoma neighbor who had just landed in California, and the young Oklahoma woman must subconsciously have felt this, for not once during the whole encounter did she stop brushing her hair to make any silly obeisance to the wife of the President. There was a quiet dignity about both of them.

The functioning of Mrs. Roosevelt as a citizen sets a vivid example. It points the way for liberals. It provides a basis for hoping that the day may come when national and international legislation will be built upon the human needs of all men, women, and children rather than upon the purposes and ambitions of a few.

DOROTHY CANFIELD FISHER

THERE have been, off and on through the centuries, many attempts to "emancipate" women. These attempts were focused in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries as in a burning glass, till the fire was lighted which finally, some twenty years ago, gave women political equality. But while this struggle was going on, people of wisdom were beginning to see that political freedom is only the most obvious of the freedoms which a human being needs if he is to draw his breath in the calm of real liberty. Exactly as cramping and far harder to see and to break than political slavery is the invisible, intangible slavery of subjection to habit and social standards. Women found themselves with the right to cast a vote, but with hardly more freedom to be themselves than before—unless in the role of rebels against society. In that role freedom can always be secured, but at a price few normal human beings are willing to pay.

At this point, a critical one, Eleanor Roosevelt appeared on the American scene and began being herself, out in the open, where folks could see the process. If there ever was a case of the need producing the person, this was one! Here was a woman-citizen such as myriad American women had longed to be, deeply interested in her home, on excellent terms with her husband, but also burning with pity, with remorse, for the undeserved sufferings of the under-dog in our society. She not only stood staunchly by those members of the younger generation related to her by blood; she offered that innately decent responsibility of the mature for the young to all younger Americans. She extended the feeling of responsibility for the misfortunes of neighbors to others than the ones who happened to live in her geographical neighborhood.

The emancipation of the better qualities of American women accomplished by the example—not the exhortation—of Eleanor Roosevelt is beyond calculation. What she has done is to help American women to see life in its true proportions. She has shown that there is time in a woman's life for her duties to her personal circle as wife, mother, and grandmother, and to her country as citizen, with enough left over for enjoyment. She has proved, as Christian in "Pilgrim's Progress" proved long ago, that the lions in the way of progress are really chained to their places and incapable of harming those with the courage to walk straight forward.

FERDINAND PECORA

WHEN The Nation was founded in 1865, our country was entering upon the unhappy reconstruction era which followed the Civil War. Today America is facing another reconstruction period—one which presents problems far more profound than those of the post-Civil War decade. The correct answers to the questions confronting us cannot be found by recourse solely to the old formulas. Painful experiences of recent years teach us that many of them now fail to work; that they are no longer adapted to the vast changes which modern developments have wrought in industry, agriculture, finance, and commerce, or to the bewildering shifts in international relationships and contentions.

Inevitably, the soundness of decisions that we must make upon these grave issues will depend upon our ability to recognize and understand the complicated forces which swirl around us. This demands imperatively that we have a free, a fearless, and an honest press, a press keen and alert to see the truth and courageous enough to proclaim it, especially when it conflicts with a prevalent public opinion.

Those are the qualities which The Nation has exemplified throughout its notable career. And so, on this felicitous observance of its diamond jubilee, in congratulating The Nation upon its many years of exceptionally useful life, I cordially wish for it a constantly spreading influence upon the mind of America.

As for our beloved guest, her varied and ceaseless labors for the social betterment of our people have constituted her, in fact, our First Lady. Of her it may truly be said that she has always sought, not honors for herself, but to render devoted service to others. No wonder, then, that honors richly earned have been heaped upon her despite the natural modesty of her nature. One of these is that which we delight in conferring on her tonight—as the first recipient of The Nation's award—for her outstanding achievements in the field of social progress and for upholding so tirelessly the precious principles of our democracy.

FRANK KINGDON

FIRST, let me speak a fitting word of gratitude that The Nation has lived for seventy-five years. And second, let me say how greatly I wonder that it has. For one of the paradoxes of our American life is that those who most loudly profess their faith in rugged individualism are the ones who submit most docilely to close-knit organizations, while those who advocate social planning and social control are usually extreme individualists ready at the drop of a hat to tilt their furious pens at each other in orgies of dialectical immolation. Social nonconformity has seldom assumed the dimensions of a mass movement among us, but has made its history in a series of brilliant guerrilla campaigns fired by crusading and highly personal zeal. Yet through these apparently disconnected sorties and affrays a threat of essential congruity has run, and The Nation has been the consistent organ of its expression.

As an advocate of nonconformity The Nation is fittingly paying honor to Mrs. Roosevelt, a woman who in her time plays many parts, not the least striking of which is that of a breaker of precedents. Yet of all innovators she is the most disarming, for she insists on no originality save that of being herself. Among all her remarkable achievements I count as supreme the kind of person she has become. She has lived after her own fashion, and has proved herself so genuine a human being that few will dispute the statement that today she is the most widely beloved person in our whole national life.

In his most recent book, "Freedom and Culture," John Dewey has two sentences that stay by me almost hauntingly: "We have advanced far enough to realize that democracy is a way of life. We have yet to realize that it is a way of personal life, and one which provides a moral standard for personal conduct." What Dewey asserts, Mrs. Roosevelt exemplifies. And the result is more than a general human kindness. It attains the quality of high statesmanship.

For example, we are being confronted by masses of people torn from the soil in which their roots have been deeply driven for centuries and turned out on the highways of an inhospitable world. Some with little understanding turn away from contemplating what is happening, even feel a resentment that anyone should suggest that they have any responsibility in the matter. But to one who sees in every event the actual human beings involved, the bitter toll of chauvinism and aggression becomes something more packed with meaning than any cold statistics can display. The victims are not Finnish refugees or Polish or Czech or Jewish or Christian refugees, they are men and women and children hunted along cruel and bloody roads, going they know not whither, fleeing from terrors they dare not name, homeless, frightened, and without hope. Here is a picture far more disconsolate than our ordinary categories of pity and philanthropy. Seeing it with clear eyes, our honored guest belongs with those who have never let us forget the aching chaos of these hearts for whom the world has been transformed into catastrophe.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Those who answer that this is sentiment and not reality do not know the depths at which it moves. These stricken ones are symptoms of political realities of almost immeasurable magnitude. We are witnessing a kind of selective migration that is arbitrarily upsetting the equilibrium of populations established over centuries. In the presence of such a spectacle only those who feel the human pang are sensitive enough to understand the implications for our whole society. To see the refugees clearly is to recognize that their very helplessness is the indication that they are tossed by forces of revolutionary upheaval that threaten to topple our whole vaunted structure of civilization.

The creed of this contemporary revolution is nihilism. It is the great denial—denial of human rights, denial of human brotherhood, denial of human dignity, denial of the ultimate reality of life itself. It is the passion to crush and to kill. We are met here to acclaim a woman and a journal that have never ceased to proclaim the great affirmation—that life can be good, that every man, woman, and child has worth and dignity, that all human beings are one in ultimate destiny and in striving faith, that out of hope and effort the good society shall yet be born.

In the Wind

PROBABLY NO one knows the real story, but this tale of the President's intended convention strategy comes from a frequent White House visitor: F. D. R. wants Attorney General Jackson to head the ticket and will say so. If that arouses no cheers, he will press for Supreme Court Justice Douglas. Those two, this source insists, are the only men he regards as real successors. If they are rejected, he will run himself.

THE EXPECTED revival of Christian Front activity on New York streets is getting under way slowly. A few meetings are being held, and Joe McWilliams has launched a new "front" called the United Party. But it is said that most of the Front groups are awaiting the outcome of the Brooklyn trial before starting "war in earnest."

THE COMING convention of the Newspaper Guild will witness an organized attack on the present administration. The offensive is being prepared by Ferdinand Lundberg and is apparently deriving support not only in New York but in cities outside as well. The convention will be held in July.

"I AM NAIVE enough to believe," Donald J. Sterling, president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, told that body recently, "that a newspaper must have a soul, a realization that its power and influence come, not from any pressure or dictation exerted by it, but from an everyday practice of fair play." Sterling is managing editor of the Portland (Oregon) Journal. Shortly after this speech Senator Norris sent word to public-power advocates in Portland that he favored a public-ownership proposal on the city's municipal ballot. The Journal's rival, the Oregonian, reported Norris's announcement in a long story. The Journal ignored it—except for an editorial several days later denouncing Norris.

PROPAGANDA DEPARTMENT: "Time should be engaged on the air for martial music and patriotic programs to overcome the apathy that makes Hitler and Stalin—and the people of the United States, too—think Canadians don't care."—Editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail.

WAR NEWS: The Radio Daily recently ran this ad: "War Names. Now available, authentic, phonetic pronunciation list of every important city, railway center, river, and mountain in Norway.—$2. War Name Service, 110 West Forty-second Street. (Orders taken for Sweden, Denmark, and the Balkans)."

WHILE RICHARD WRIGHT'S "Native Son" has been receiving nation-wide acclaim, Communist ranks are sorely divided over the book, and debate is taking place both in private and in public. One group condemns the book on the ground that it will damage both Negroes and the C. P.; another—which seems to be dominant—is vigorously defending it. Wright is a party member—a fact which most reviews did not reveal.

THE SENSATIONAL NLRB hearings in Dallas on Ford terrorism received almost as little publicity in that city as in the rest of the country. . . . Joseph Lash, former Student Union leader, is preparing an authorized compilation of Franklin D. Roosevelt's addresses, designed to show that they reveal a consistent philosophy. . . . Nazi propaganda here is now concentrating on India.

WILLIAM HILLMAN, NBC's London reporter, made a slip over WEAF that is not likely to endear him to Italian audiences. Citing an item in Popolo d'Italia, he identified that journal as "Mussolini's mouth organ" and had to explain a little later that he meant "mouthpiece."

ANDRE MARTY, cabling from Moscow to the New York Sunday Worker, bewails the fact that "the monstrous imperialists are at one another's throats and are preparing to tear one another to pieces." When it comes to specific examples M. Marty says nothing of the Nazi assaults on Denmark, Norway, and the Low Countries, but he sadly points out that "already the Lofoten Islands and Iceland are 'under the protection' of Chamberlain, and tomorrow Greenland will be 'under Roosevelt's protection.' "

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A SAINT on earth died the other day, a man really too good for this kind of world. Of course I refer to George Lansbury, perhaps next to Gandhi the most outstanding pacifist in public life anywhere. I suppose that death was not unwelcome to him. At least he may not have wanted to carry on now in enfeebled health in a world which is so deliberately bent on self-destruction and will not read the simple and plain lesson of its war folly. It is only two years since he personally went on a mission of good-will to Hitler, Mussolini, and the heads of the French and other governments; I do not remember whether he got to Stalin or not. Yes, even Hitler received this benign and kindly old man, though Germans have been condemned to a lifetime of servitude merely for holding to Lansbury's Christian belief that the Commandment "Thou Shalt Not Kill" applies to all times and all conditions. When I was in England last fall he was apart from the great currents of life in his country, all of which, except a small group similarly conscientiously opposed, stood behind the government in its belief that Germany can be purged of Nazism by guns and unlimited bloodshed. But he died as true to his faith as ever did a Christian martyr.

"Member of Church of England; teetotaler; non-smoker; twice in prison"—thus Lansbury described himself in "Who's Who." He went through fire during the last war years, in and out of prison, but he was one of those men whom prison could not mar or break. Once when he was on a hunger strike in jail, he wrote, a prison chaplain rebuked him "for injuring my body by voluntary starvation because it was the temple of the Holy Ghost." At once Lansbury asked him if he were a Protestant. The chaplain said that he was, whereupon Lansbury replied: "If it had not been for Latimer and Ridley allowing their temple of the Holy Ghost to be burned in defense of their faith you could not have been a Protestant at all. You would not have come into my cell to talk this nonsense to me." But not his religion or anything else could dim his sense of humor; he recalled in his Memoirs the joyous interruption "shouted at canvassers for a school-board candidate who was in favor of secular education: 'They want to rob us of our bloody religion.'" This reminds me of what Augustine Birrell once said—that "the trouble with Lansbury is that he will let his bleeding heart run away with his bloody head."

None the less, however much his heart ran away with his head, he was, as was once pointed out in the London New Statesman and Nation, "immensely shrewd in practical affairs, and a most astute political fighter." Yet he would not remain at the head of the British Labor Party when it plumped for the sanctions against Italy in connection with the invasion of Ethiopia because he thought that would be inconsistent with his devotion to the doctrine of non-violence. Nobody hooted or sneered at him when he took this position, not even the most dyed-in-the-wool reactionary Conservative. Everybody respected and honored him, and the New Statesman and Nation spoke the truth when it declared that "George Lansbury is the only name that is known in every town and village of Great Britain." He was so simple, straightforward, and lovable, so completely uninterested in what happened to George Lansbury, so unwilling to conceal his lack of boyhood education, his humble origin, and his years of working as an ordinary laborer that one naturally thought of him as the "purest Christian in all England."

How few examples we have had of men who were willing to sacrifice the prestige of high office and a good salary by putting conscience above preferment! Too many like Ramsay MacDonald have salved their conscience by convincing themselves that they were indispensable, that they must not leave their party in the lurch in time of national crisis. Moreover, in Lansbury's case he knew that he had to turn the party leadership over to a man who was not so able; Clement Attlee is today nothing like the leader His Majesty's Opposition should have when the nation, as Winston Churchill has just admitted, is in greater danger than ever before. But Lansbury's intellectual honesty was crystal clear. So he gave up the leadership at seventy-six, without recrimination, without bitterness, without a sign of self-pity.

Afterward he went on as full of the zest of life and as certain of the correctness of his doctrines as Gandhi himself. How can such men as these be downcast? They have only to look around to see in a crumbling world about them the justification of all they have taught and preached. True, the militarists and believers in force are on top. And more and more people, even in our own country, are ready to put their faith in armaments, believing that if a nation only has enough arms, even if it is driven to the point of bankruptcy, it is safe. The world is giving that theory its final test now. Is it any wonder that an American general said to me that no country is now rich enough or big enough to support the soldier?

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

AT FIRST I felt that it was a little inappropriate for a Westerner to be reviewing a book by a Southerner about New England ("A Southerner Discovers New England." By Jonathan Daniels. The Macmillan Company, $3); but then I reflected that it was New Englander and Southerner who discovered the West, if not the Westerner, and so there was justification after all. Joseph Smith saw his visions and dug up his golden plates in upper New York State; Brigham Young had his hardheadedness from Vermont; many a Southerner fled from the ruins of sixty-one to sixty-five to the wide freedom of the cattle ranges. I know little towns in Utah with red brick houses set back on quiet lawns and bushed by dim purple lilacs which always puzzled me because in the light of the new mountain sun they looked older than they could be. It was not until I had discovered New England and the South, after a fashion, that I realized that they were older than they could, at first thought, be, because they had been made by men and women who remembered New England and the South, often by way of the Middle West and more than one generation.

Regionalism, like nationalism, can be bitter and narrow and fanatical when it gets mixed up with politics and economics; but the regionalism which makes Mr. Daniels publish himself a Southerner is of a quite different stripe, though he too discusses both politics and economics. In "Of Thee I Sing" Victor Moore was made to say, "In Kansas we don't understand New Yorkers, but we don't want to shoot 'em." Jonathan Daniels went to New England not only not to shoot Yankees but to understand them, and add another dimension to his regionalism.

"This journey," he says, "needed to be made." He goes on to say:

> The whole procession of the American years has been illumined—or at least inflamed—with the works of men who hastened from the North to describe the South. Unfortunately there has been scarcely any perceptible movement from the opposite direction. . . . Whatever the cause, New England was denied the corrective influences which she so steadily furnished the South.

But Mr. Daniels, for all his frankness, is an amiable avenger. His regionalism is a flavor and not a frenzy, a unifying, not a separating, element, and the reader gets from his book, not only a more revealing picture of New England than a New Englander might draw, but a conviction that only by a combination of their regional virtues can the North and South—and the West as well—defeat the regional vices that beset them. This is an old thesis, but it can bear reiteration.

Mr. Daniels's book is packed with information—he is an excellent and conscientious reporter—about the land that begins at the Merritt Parkway and ends at the top of that enormous county called Aroostook; but the South is in it, too, for contrast and commentary. Closed mills in New England speak to him of low wages in the South; New England's ubiquitous public education, of Southern illiteracy. He plays upon the irony of New England financiers bemoaning the flight of industry—and financing the flight because money must earn its interest, and then financing relief in the gutted mill towns. He tells the tragic story of the fall of Manchester under the heading of Money or Men. He does not spare the glory of Yale rising out of the New Haven slums in an excellent chapter entitled Shadow Under a Torch.

There is shrewdness in Mr. Daniels's book worthy of a New Englander; there is also gallantry—though he scorns the word—and for good measure a style compounded of intelligence, imagination, and skill. The spirit of the whole is contained in his last sentences, in which he postulates a > destination in decency which will include North and South together. . . . The Yankees once fought a war upon the sensible proposition that this could not be one nation, half slave and half free. They were right, and they proved it. But neither can this nation be half rich and half poor. With a sharp stick behind us, uncertain and undirected in the South, we are fighting about that now. And I count it that the sensible Yankees will be on our side. This time we shall all win or lose together.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Aviation Industry

THE AVIATION BUSINESS: FROM KITTY HAWK TO WALL STREET. By Elsbeth E. Freudenthal. The Vanguard Press. $3.

IT IS a relief to pick up a book which is a relentless critique of an industry and to find that it is without any of the faults of the sensational muckraking job. Miss Freudenthal has given us a careful, accurate, and objective study of the development of the airplane business. Long a security analyst, with Wall Street experience, she devotes little space to the invention and technical progress of the airplane; rather she traces the rise of the business of manufacturing planes for war and peace and of operating them for civilian purposes. For this task her experience has well fitted her. She rehearses, of course, the shameful evils that have marked the development of this new industry by the good old competitive capitalist system, but she has largely controlled her adjectives and emotions in order to let the facts speak for themselves.

They are bad enough. Here is again the record of the wartime scandals with which, it is to be feared, the oncoming generation is unfamiliar: that we spent one billion dollars during the war to end war in our effort to supply the A. E. F. with planes and delivered only 196 "flaming coffins." Naturally Miss Freudenthal has not been able to add anything new to a record which was factually and officially established by Charles E. Hughes, now Chief Justice of the United States. It was he who recommended that the arch-offender, who is still a figure in the aviation business and still a director of the National City Bank of New York, be tried by court

The Quest for Peace

By WILLIAM E. RAPPARD

A BRILLIANT ANALYSIS, by a famous Swiss authority, of world politics and diplomacy during the past twenty years. He shows why the universal desire for peace has not yet been fulfilled, and appraises hopes for permanent peace in the future. Whatever statements of aims may eventually be announced by the warring countries, this book will have lasting significance. In its insistence upon the idea that something constructive and permanent may be rescued from the present chaos, it strikes a note of optimism.

536 pages. $4.00 at all bookstores

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

PARTISAN REVIEW announces

East Coker, a new long poem by

T. S. Eliot

Also in the May-June issue:

SIDNEY HOOK:
Jacques Maritain and "Liberal" Catholicism

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER:
A Goat for Azazel, a story

6 TIMES A YEAR $1.00 A YEAR

PARTISAN REVIEW, Box 84, Station D
New York, N. Y.

Enclosed find $1.00. Please send me one year (six issues) of PARTISAN REVIEW. (Canada: $1.15. Foreign: $1.30. Single copy: 25 cents.)

Name..

Address..

....

martial for conduct which Mr. Hughes and the Attorney General of the United States defined as "inexcusable," "censurable," and "reprehensible"—he was saved by that noble reformer, Newton D. Baker. The truth is that the army turned over the matter of obtaining airplanes to the big men in the aviation business, who found it impossible either to be efficient or to separate wholly their private business from that of the government.

The next phase of aviation development was that of flying high in Wall Street. Never was there a clearer case of private enterprise mulcting the public, which eagerly snapped up the stock because of the fabulous profits made by the insiders—profits wholly unwarranted by the business or its prospects. Thus, the son of the gentleman Mr. Hughes desired to court martial made an investment of $40 which three years later stood him in at a beggarly $5,500,000. Miss Freudenthal's account of the aviation industry's swinish picking of the public's pockets in Wall Street ought to be read once a month by some of our big business men who make the welkin ring with their denunciation of the New Deal. It was unbelievable overcharging and gouging by our aviation patriots which led Mr. Farley and President Roosevelt to cancel the airmail contracts. This Miss Freudenthal entirely upholds.

Several of her chapters are especially timely, notably those dealing with the international aspects of the aviation business—including interlocking directorates and the sale of American rights and inventions abroad—the present greatly expanded set-up of the companies, and our own air imperialism. No one else, I think, has covered as fully the rise of Pan-American Airways to its present monopoly of all our foreign airlines or set forth as clearly how Pan-American has been developed by government subsidies as an instrument of national policy—for extending American influence in South America, for thumbing our nose at the Japanese in the Pacific, for drumming up trade everywhere. Fortunately, since her book went to press, the Civil Aeronautics Authority has given permission to the American Export Airlines to set up a rival air service.

But the menace of interlocking directorates, of the international air-armament business, remains unchecked. We have even granted to German companies the right to manufacture American-invented airplane engines, with which they are now warring on the Allies. Our great Douglas Company and four others have had no hesitation in taking Japanese money and have licensed the Japanese to make certain aircraft or other aeronautical products now used in the destruction of China. Think of a business which actually dreads peace and anything that may lead to the establishment of a sane world order! It is not, however, because of this that Miss Freudenthal favors nationalization of the industry but because she thinks the government and its army and navy should be "masters in their own house." Private management will, she says, "pursue its own ends—profits first," regardless of quality. "The only effective method of controlling this vital arm of defense," she adds, "is through nationalization." The industry should be "developed primarily for the good of the country, not as a financial toy."

Altogether this book is a storehouse of absolutely necessary accurate information. I have but two criticisms to offer. The book could stand stylistic revision, and Miss Freudenthal

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

would have strengthened her case against the business by recording more fully the extraordinary record of efficiency and technical progress of the present operating companies.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Guidebook to Literature

PREFACE TO WORLD LITERATURE. By Albert Guérard. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

THE English would call this "a middle-brow book." Written for the average adult reader, with charm, in an open style, it has a kind of textbook character; but its summaries are pleasantly planned and its appendices informal. The subject of "world literature"—actually the literature of the Western World—is removed from the dryness of the full scholarly approach and served forth with good sense and good nature and without overt or concealed bigotry. Dr. Guérard has profited from the liberal tendencies in modern scholarship. He explains that there are no stiff lines between "literary periods"; and that the forms of literature, "the genres," sometimes merge and coalesce with one another. He avoids simplifying into what Stephen Potter calls "the academic sandwich: classic-romantic-classic"; and has sound and interesting things to say on taste, false and would-be popular art ("kitsch"), the "social approach" to literature, and the problems of criticism. He casts a wide net; from Hesiod through Steinbeck and Ogden Nash; and because he is a civilized and unprejudiced observer, he seldom makes mistakes in emphasis.

No critic, however, who starts from the usual time-revered, time-hardened bases of "the best which has been thought and said in the world" (the Western World) can entirely escape some hair- and category-splitting on the one hand and, on the other, some myopia toward the seemingly lesser influences: those straws which not only show how the wind is to blow but, often enough, miraculously come to direct the wind. Dr. Guérard admits in an appendix, for example, the great and international influence of Baudelaire but does not develop this theme in his book. And those periods which produce nothing more challenging than a handful of lyric poems—such as the Carolinian period in England—are likely to get lost in the forward march of "great, best, decisive, epoch-making literature." Dr. Guérard has nothing to say concerning Carew, Waller, Marvell, or even Donne, although he brings in Burns and Landor. He mentions Henry James, in passing, several times, and Yeats twice, without much show of understanding the influence and importance of either. Steinbeck, who certainly belongs in the Dickens tradition, is put down as a satirist. Belonging, as he does, to the French tradition, Dr. Guérard is sound and just in his estimates of the Greek and Latin "classics" and the Gallic line of writing as a whole.

Apart from aiding the lay reader who wishes a guide to general literary "culture," the value of such a book as this is rather limited. For, although the judgments are catholic and there are no attempts at edification, this volume often slides over ground which should, at this late date, be broken up and plumbed. Nineteenth-century scholars labored in the field of comparative literature with extraordinary thorough-

THE SPANISH CHILDREN have suffered
THREE YEARS OF WAR AND OVER ONE YEAR IN CONCENTRATION CENTERS

Four years of misery in the life of a child leaves little time for childhood.

The following is an extract from a letter received from Eric G. Muggeridge, our executive secretary, now directing the work at the Foster Parents' Colonies in France. The Foster Parents' Plan for War Children maintains ten children's colonies in Biarritz, France.

"We visited the concentration centers yesterday. The children like wizened old men and women glared at us and shrank away. It was horrible to witness. They seemed worn out and lifeless, save for their dark eyes which pierced. Truly they are like little savages. We could only take so many back with us to the colonies. What is to become of the others?"

Will you help one of these unfortunate children by becoming a Foster Parent? Your "adoption" of a Spanish child today, means we can take it out of the concentration center into our colonies, where the child receives all the loving care and attention that so justly belongs to childhood. You will receive a photograph of your Foster Child along with its history, and you may correspond with the child. It is more than just financial aid. It is extending friendship across the sea to an unfortunate youngster.

If you cannot afford to "adopt" a child, your contribution to our work, no matter how small, will be gratefully appreciated. Our funds are cabled through the Chase National Bank direct to our colonies and pass through no other hands. Safe delivery is guaranteed.

EDNA BLUE, Executive Chairman.

PARTIAL LIST OF AMERICAN FOSTER PARENTS

Helen Hayes — Eleanor Roosevelt — Clifton Fadiman
Archibald MacLeish — Efrem Zimbalist — Russell Maguire
Emanuel Fuermann — Freda Kirchwey — Dudley Fitts

FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN, INC.
55 West 42nd Street, New York City. LOngacre 5-2174

A. I wish to become a Foster Parent of a Spanish Child for one year. If possible, sex ...., age .... I will pay $9.00 a month for one year. Payments will be made quarterly .... yearly ...., monthly ....
I enclose herewith my first payment $............
B. I cannot "adopt" a child but I would like to help a child by donating $............

Name..

Address..

City.......................... State.............. Date...........

ness; it is a good thing to have their findings made available to the general reader. But what is needed at present in this field is sensitive, fearless digging into the workings of the spirit behind time, place, and phenomena, analogous to the researches made by Roger Fry in the field of graphic art. The approach should be at once rigorous, courageous, and subtle in order that real discoveries concerning the energy which breaks through "periods," "ages," national tastes, to express now one, now another archetypal pattern of human thought and feeling, may be made. It is the human energy—always unexpected in manifestation and stronger than man's barriers set up to tame it—that is important, no matter what mouthpieces it chooses. We know very little about all this, but we should be willing to learn. LOUISE BOGAN

On the Health of an Old Lady

PARLIAMENT. By W. Ivor Jennings. The Macmillan Company. $6.

FEW man-made institutions have attracted so much admiring attention—and deservedly so—as the British Parliament. It would be a fascinating study to follow its reinterpretation by each succeeding generation, from Grey and Brougham, Bagehot and Gneist, to Dicey, Redlich, and Lowell, and on to Laski and Jennings. Whatever might have been the specific emphasis of the author or of his period, the keynote was positivism, verging almost upon mythology. In our present-day disillusionment we are in a more critical mood toward the perfectibility of the political animal as evidenced by British parliamentary institutions. Dr. Jennings completed his volume before the outbreak of the present war; this writer wants to do him justice now that the war, most directly the supreme test of the British political genius, has been in progress for more than eight months.

Without exaggeration it should be stated that Dr. Jennings's volume is the standard treatise of his generation on the subject. The book should be consulted in conjunction with his previous "Cabinet Government" (1936); to supplement it a third volume, on the party system, is promised by the author. However familiar the reader may be with the subject matter he will not find the treatment dull or academic. And he will be gratified by the extremely fair and judicious disentanglement of controversial topics by the subtle mind of one of England's leading constitutional lawyers.

British parliamentarism is an elaborate and intricate political play, staged by a small élite of political technicians for their own benefit and that of the common man. For the latter it is perhaps as necessary and, in the last analysis, as unsatisfactory as that other play called administration of justice according to law. When we aim at justice we get a dose of consummate law. When we aim at democracy we get it distilled in parliamentary bottles. Observed at closer range and without the magnifying glasses of positivist justification, the British Parliament seems less to reveal political reality than to hide it. The truth is that behind this imposing façade the imponderables of the struggle for economic power are at work, although in a more sophisticated and less brutal manner than we are used to in this country. But in a way it is comforting to American students to read Dr. Jennings's cool unmasking of the pressure groups, lobbies, clubs, and backstairs intrigues in the chapter Who Makes the Law?

And yet, fascinated as the observer is by this spectacle of seemingly effortless machinery, he feels that the positivist approach—and by positivism is meant here as much a value judgment as a method of "descriptive analysis"—is not, cannot be, the last word in appraising a system which carries its fair share of responsibility for bringing the world to the present impasse. This writer, reared in admiration for the English Parliament, has devoted a good deal of his life to gaining a better understanding of the secrets of its success over more than two centuries. Nine years of Tory rule with its incomprehensible failures and shortcomings could not but create in him, and in others for that matter, the impression that political institutions must be judged by their political results. Positivism alone leaves one dissatisfied. James Bryce, in his classic treatise on "Modern Democracies" (1921), deliberately refrained from describing England because he felt that no Englishman was equal to the task of analyzing his own country critically. Perhaps it is presumptuous on the part of a foreigner to demand of an Englishman that he should see the motes in the eyes of his own country, even when they are beams for the eyes of others. But is it really true that the British Parliament is that foremost training ground for political leaders which it is always praised as being? Since 1922 this much-vaunted system of selection has produced four—and only four—Prime Ministers. Are these mediocrities, the Bonar Laws, Baldwins, MacDonalds, and Chamberlains, the best that the machinery could produce in terms of leadership? Our author states: "The result is a system of administration which . . . accords far more closely with public opinion than at any other time in the history of these islands and (it is believed) than in any other country in the world." But we still remember the unequivocal attitude of the public on the Ethiopian affair and the trickery of the 1935 elections, which, flouting public opinion, secured to the Tory rulers a new lease of office—and appeasement.

The reality behind the English pattern of parliamentary government is that a member likes his seat; if he deserts the government, dissolution of Parliament ensues, and he is not sure of reelection. True, this system is compatible with complete freedom of public opinion. But public opinion is filtered through the narrow channels of parliamentary technique, in which the egotism of the members coincides with party interest, party interest coincides with class interest, and class interest is represented as coinciding with public opinion. Thus we are told: "The result is that the British system is very far from the dictatorial system it is sometimes represented to be." Evidently there is more involved than a mere dispute about terminology. Sir Pontius Pilate may well ask, "What is democracy?" Perhaps foreigners do not know much about public opinion in this most enigmatic of peoples.

The "Mother of Parliaments" is an aged lady. This last report of an acknowledged authority testifies to her unabated vigor. The author has not noticed climacteric disturbances and retrogressions. If she survives the present crisis, the dowager may well be in for another long period of health. It would not be the first miracle accomplished by that singular phenomenon called the British Parliament.

KARL LOEWENSTEIN

Inside the Alcazar

THE BRAVE AND THE BLIND. By Michael Blankfort. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

WITH a preface as startlingly abrupt as a roll of drums Michael Blankfort raises a curtain on the siege of the Alcazar. On the night of July 20, 1936, the Civil Guard, friendly to Franco, was called into the fortress together with all the anti-red citizens in the vicinity of Toledo: men, women, children. The Civil Guard corralled a hundred Loyalist sympathizers as hostages. Franco was on his way from Morocco; the government would be overthrown in a few days, two weeks at the most.

The next morning, without electric power for radio, with all communication save incoming telephone calls cut off, approximately sixteen hundred human beings within the walls of the Alcazar inhabited an isolated world, surrounded by overwhelmingly superior forces, hammered at by artillery, bombs, rifle fire, and insistent propaganda. And the siege went on for a week, two weeks, a month—two months. The garrison, only a small portion of them regular soldiers, had ample ammunition for their rifles and their few machine-guns, but food and water dribbled away until the survivors of bombardment and disease faced a slower, more agonizing death by starvation—provided the mines being drilled under them by Loyalist sappers did not blow them sky-high first. Some deserted, some urged surrender, but Colonel Sanchez, the commandant, steeled his ruthless pride all the more firmly as the seventy-fives nibbled away at the fortress walls.

Mr. Blankfort has done a truly remarkable job: basing his main events on the historical facts of the siege, he peoples the Alcazar entirely with characters imagined by himself. Even Colonel Sanchez is a fictitious personage, though his rejection of his son's plea for surrender was suggested partly by a story told about Colonel Moscardó, the actual commandant. Nevertheless, the few dozen men and women who are brought into sharp focus have the tangible, matter-of-fact reality of next-door neighbors: their hunger, their shrinking from the whine and roar of shells, their sick longing for peace are not mere symbols; they are our hunger, our fears, our wishes.

No less remarkable is the author's unbiased portrayal of the besieged soldiers, civilians, and hostages. Though his sympathies undoubtedly lie with the Loyalists, he is not concerned, like Malraux, with whitewashing them and traducing all Insurgents. Many of the besieged sufferers do not even support Franco; they fight because they revere the traditions of the army, or because they fear the reds will destroy the church, or because—well, because they are brave and blind. Mr. Blankfort depicts without rancor even the stubborn pride of Colonel Sanchez, who committed hundreds to an almost hopeless fight without consulting them, or the fanaticism of Lieutenant Cervantes, who would calmly have sacrificed millions in furtherance of his fascist dream.

Acknowledging courage wherever he finds it, the author has splendidly distilled from his material the essence of terrible, tragic beauty, of bitterly grotesque poetry, that flows when the grapes of wrath are trampled by any aggregation of human beings willing to die for what they sincerely believe to be justice and truth. LOUIS B. SALOMON

OPENING MAY 20th
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
HONEYMOON PARADISE
9 CLAY TENNIS COURTS
8 HANDBALL COURTS
NO GREEN FEES IN JUNE
HALF MILE OF SAND BEACH
Write for Booklet "UM"
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
SCAROON MANOR HOTEL SCHROON LAKE N.Y.
NEW YORK OFFICES: MU. 2-4083, CO. 7-2471

QUISISANA CAMPS
On Lake Kezar in Center Lovell, Maine
Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.) in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.
QUAINT ■ RESTFUL ■ ROMANTIC ■ CULTURED COMPANIONSHIP
Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass, Brook Trout. Non-sectarian. Ownership-Management.
RATES FROM $35 A WEEK. AMERICAN PLAN. WRITE FOR BOOKLET
N. Y. Address, 42 West 35th Street. Telephone Wisconsin 7-0200

MEXICO
— SUMMER 1940 —
3 trips for college students—3 trips for their elders—and a trip for prep school boys and girls. More than mere sightseeing—Programs and contacts arranged by a distinguished committee headed by the Minister of Education—Definite rates and reservations (important in view of the unprecedented trek to Mexico).
For circulars and all particulars address
THE OPEN ROAD
12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York

YOUR LIFE IS THEIR TOY
RACKETS, SOCIAL SERVICE AND MEDICAL
By Emanuel M. Josephson, M.D.
Exposes and debunks matters that have been carefully suppressed.
A true history of the American Medical Association and the medical rackets ■ The political uses of medicine and social service and the Fifth Column.
Illustrated Price $3.50 400 pages
CHEDNEY PRESS
108 East 81st Street New York City

Buy Your Books Through The Nation
At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.
Reader's Service Division
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

IN BRIEF

MARIANA. By Sally Salminen. Translated by Barrows Mussey. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

The quiet but extremely lifelike story of a young woman in the Aaland Islands (between Finland and Sweden, in case you haven't been reading the papers): her dreamy years at home, marriage to a farmer, weary struggles with the unaccustomed and back-breaking labors of farm life, and final adjustment. Practically plotless, it is as homespun and convincing as a skillet or a pillowcase.

LOOK BACK ON HAPPINESS. By Knut Hamsun. Translated by Paula Wiking. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

With the curious amalgam of plodding bluntness and dreamy mysticism characteristic of many Scandinavian novels, the dean of Norwegian writers presents a portrait of a lady—a neurotic schoolmistress, twenty-seven years old, entangling herself and several men in the web of her repressions—as seen by an aging author who has not quite achieved such philosophical detachment as would enable him to observe her merely as an interesting case without feeling any of her attraction. While any number of young writers would have run the story up to seven hundred pages with no trouble at all, Mr. Hamsun tells it with compression and vigor; and the writing is permeated with a compound of Norwegian nationalism and Anglophobia that strikes an ironic note in view of the developments of the past few weeks.

CONVERT TO FREEDOM. By Eitel Wolf Dobert. Translated by Heinz and Ruth Norden. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

A post-war German who went abroad as an ardent Nazi to learn how to serve the party in the foreign field and was converted to democratic ideas of freedom writes his autobiography. Read out of the party on his return to Germany, he fled the country and is now in process of becoming an American. The book is a contribution to our understanding of the strength as well as the weakness of Germany.

Island Workshop for ARTISTS-CREATIVE WRITERS
OCRACOKE, North Carolina
July 1—August 31, 1940

Courses in Painting, Sculpture, History of Art, Creative Writing (Plays, Short Stories, Radio Script), History of Literature. Island location, 30 miles off Carolina mainland. Boating, swimming, fishing, dancing, sports. 15 miles of ocean beach. Write for catalog.

COMPLETE COST
$200 season
(inc. board, room, tuition)
VERNON WARD
Ocracoke, N. C.

THE MAD BOOTHS OF MARYLAND. By Stanley Kimmel. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.75.

Anyone interested in the English or American stage, the Confederacy, Lincoln, or Americana in general will be rewarded by reading this story of the family which produced the greatest Shakespearean actor of his day and the assassin of Lincoln. Well written and full of information for the most part documented, it belies its catch-penny title.

YOU MIGHT LIKE SOCIALISM. By Corliss Lamont. Modern Age Books. 95 cents.

As a personal testament of a socially prominent young man who has embraced a radical social philosophy, this book is more than just an ordinary apology for socialism. It is also a confession of faith, an indictment of the type of social organization which has been extraordinarily beneficent to him, a program for a planned society, and a spirited defense of the new society evolved in the Soviet Union. Mr. Lamont is most effective in the first and last of these tasks, but his contribution in all four fields is well worth reading. The book is popularly written and should be particularly useful in jolting the mindsets of middle-class individuals whose reading horizons have been bounded by magazines like Time and newspapers like the Chicago Tribune.

HOUSING IN SCANDINAVIA: URBAN AND RURAL. By John Graham, Jr. University of North Carolina Press. $2.50.

Here is a non-technical account of the solution of the housing problem in Norway, Sweden, Finland, and Denmark, and a discussion of the guidance it offers for the development of public housing and resettlement in the United States. It is written from personal observation by a leading American specialist and is provided with pertinent photographs and some plans, especially of rural units. Mr. Graham gives an excellent exposition of the historical, economic, and sociological aspects of the housing problem, but his book would have had greater interest even for the layman if he had developed more fully the technical features of the Scandinavian solution.

DRAMA

Mr. Saroyan Again

FOR the third time within only a few weeks more than one year William Saroyan has tempted the theatrical fates with a play. The new piece, characteristically entitled "Love's Old Sweet Song," is being offered at the Plymouth by the Theater Guild in conjunction with Eddie Dowling, and it is not, to tell the unfortunate truth, nearly so good as either "My Heart's in the Highlands" or "The Time of Your Life." Quite possibly, however, it may enjoy more financial success than either, and that for the simple reason that audiences now know what to expect from the author. The public, usually rendered restless by what it cannot label, can classify everything in the new piece as "typical Saroyan," and if that is not very illuminating it is soothing to those who find even meaningless labels reassuring. The first-night audience at least seemed amiably disposed to expect the unexpected and to accept it.

The scene of "Love's Old Sweet Song" is Bakersfield, California, but since the plot, unlikely as this may seem, would be more difficult to summarize than that of the author's other plays, I shall indicate only that it involves—conveniently indefinite word—a lonely spinster, an itinerant vendor of a bottled panacea, and a "migratory worker" accompanied by his wife and fourteen children. I shall add that the deus ex machina is a Greek wrestler, comfortingly full of the milk of human kindness, at whose home all the difficulties are resolved and twelve of the fourteen children of the migratory worker organized into a medicine-show choir. Finally, just to make it all perfectly clear, I had better tell you that the other two have been recruited by a bawdy house.

To say that the piece is not nearly so good as the author's other dramatic writings is by no means to deny that it is frequently laughable. Whatever the social-minded may think of the taste involved, the satire on the Okies is funny, and the same may be said of the bits concerned with the lady photographer and the novelist who follow them about. The scene in which a subscription agent for Time turns a recitation of the names of its staff into a kind of rousing oration comes nearer, however, to the spirit of some of the inspired passages of "The Time of Your Life," but only once, I think, does the author write a speech actually as flavorsome as the best in the previous plays, and that is the really glorious soliloquy of the "migratory worker," who has observed for the first time that his eldest daughters have become women and blames this biological phenomenon upon the influence of the movies. As a combination of relevance, irrelevance, and pure poetry that speech is a classic.

The trouble with the piece as a whole is that it lacks the air of spontaneity which characterized the others, that by comparison with them it seems deliberate, mechanical, and trumped up, as though the author were, for the first time, frequently doing only what he thought was expected of him. Many of the incidents are devoid of that air of poetic fantasy that gives its quality to "The Time of Your Life" and suggest merely vaudeville skits or the "blackouts" in a revue. One could hardly claim strict unity of plot as one of the virtues of any of Mr. Saroyan's plays, but the others did exhibit some unity of tone and did move with a recognizable rhythm which gave a continuity to incidents logically unconnected; neither of these qualities is very apparent in "Love's Old Sweet Song," where the movement is irregular and the sequence of events at times seems merely random. Nor does the production, though it includes some admirable performances, escape contributing to the effect of disorganization. Walter Huston as the medicine vendor is ingratiating as he always is; Jessie Royce Landis as the old maid gives a performance which is both one of her best and also one of the most finely tempered that I have ever seen. But there are so many eccentric roles which are perhaps necessarily merely gagged that the whole production takes on an air which sometimes suggests a Gridiron dinner rather more than an honest theatrical performance.

In arguments about Mr. Saroyan's merit or lack of merit as a playwright it has become the custom for his admirers to attribute all the shortcomings of any individual production to the tampering of his producers, while it is equally customary for his detractors to attribute whatever excellences they are compelled to recognize to the same source. "Love's Old Sweet Song" is said to have undergone a good many changes during the staging, and these are said to have included some made at the last minute. Whether the piece is better or worse than it would have been if the author's first version had been followed I cannot pretend to know.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

WHILE records and musical events have claimed all available space in this column books have been stacking up. And readers impatient to know what I think of the book that has been on everyone's tongue will have to bear with me a little longer while I speak first of Tovey's "Essays in Musical Analysis" (Oxford University Press), the concluding volume of which has just appeared. It isn't that I underestimate the occasional shrewd perceptions and amusing performances in the book that is on everyone's tongue, but rather that the qualities of Tovey's writing make his six volumes of program notes for the Reid Orchestra concerts in Edinburgh one of the great classics in music criticism.

"My master, Parry," he writes in this last volume, "taught me to study the classics of music from point to point according to the course of each individual work." Through such examination of the works Tovey has acquired ideas of Haydn's, Mozart's, Beethoven's, Schubert's ways of composing that differ from the generally accepted ideas—those which critics have acquired not from study of the music but from reading each other. He has discovered also that the classical forms as practiced by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert are different from the classical forms as established in general belief by the theoreticians—"the kind of pedants," as Tovey says of the Viennese musicians who criticized the opening chord-progressions of Beethoven's First Symphony, "who are not even classicists, and whose grammatical knowledge is based on no known language." And these results of his study Tovey has embodied in his writing. I mentioned a while ago the monumental essay on Schubert in the first volume of the Oxford Press "Heritage of Music," in which he cites chapter and verse in Schubert's works to disprove the constantly reiterated fallacies about Schubert; and there are countless examples of this process in "Essays in Musical Analysis." If, for example, you read the description of the form of the Mozart concerto in the booklet recently issued by the New Friends of Music to its subscribers, you should read Tovey's introductory essay on the subject and his further discussions of individual works in Volume III, in which, proceeding from point to point in the music, he corrects the ideas which compilers of handbooks of reference have copied from each other and program annotators have copied out of handbooks of reference.

Tovey acquired, in this way, knowledge enough for any manuscript-grubbing Professor Doktor. But operating through his knowledge are the love and enthusiasm and passionate interest and understanding for music that cause him to poke his head in among the notes of a work, that enable him to make musically significant and alive the technical minutiae he discovers, and that give color and warmth to what ordinarily would be cold pedantry. And there are additional significance and color and warmth from his interest and understanding for other things than music; from his personal warmth and high spirits; from his sharp and quick intelligence, which, as it goes along with its chief preoccupation of the moment, darts out in this direction or that at whatever fallacy or stupidity comes within range of its notice; and from the brilliant writing in which these express themselves. I am of course wrong in separating Tovey's understanding of music from his understanding of other things, from his personal warmth, his intelligence; for these are all part of his understanding of music. Cézanne's water color of some tree trunks, Walker Evans's photograph of a Birmingham mill district, the slow movement of Mozart's Concerto K. 467—each represents a sensitiveness to a medium; but involved with this sensitiveness, operating through it, crystallized finally in

BOOK SPECIALS

Buy now while available; mailing free.

Revolution of Nihilism: H. Rauschning $1.49
Mein Kampf: Hitler (Reynal & Hitchcock) 1.49
Madame Curie: Eve Curie 1.49
The Flowering of New England
  by Van Wyck Brooks (Dutton) 1.49
The Long Valley: John Steinbeck
  13 stories including The Red Pony 1.39
America's [illegible] Families: Ferdinand Lundberg 1.39
Roosevelt: Emil Ludwig (Viking) 1.00
Complete Works of Shakespeare
  One vol., 40 illus. by Rockwell Kent, identical text plates of $50 lim. ed. 2.49

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
206 Broadway, corner Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

IT IS YOUR LIFE
Keep Healthy ● Stay Young ● Live Long
By M. M. ROSENBERG, M.D.

"The only book by a doctor," says a famous author and book reviewer, "that I can read with the same interest that I read a novel or biography."

28 chapters, 475 pages, illustrated. Price $2.50.

THE SCHOLASTIC BOOK PRESS
158 E. 22nd St., N. Y. Or Your Bookseller

each work of art is emotional and intellectual power—what the man is in feeling, mind, character, what he has experienced, what understanding his experience has given him. And so with the critic: his understanding of each of these works of art begins with a sensitiveness to the medium; but operating through this sensitiveness as part of his understanding, his judgment, his taste, are the qualities of his own mind, feeling, character, his own experience and understanding; and it is when unusual personal qualities of this sort are involved that we are aware of unusual critical insight and taste. The qualities not only are involved in the critic's understanding but are crystallized in his own written criticism; and as against the notion of criticism as a mere parasite on art—which most of it is—there is the fact that important criticism itself has some of the characteristics of artistic expression. That is, it involves the operation of sensibility and intellect and character on its material, the art it deals with, and on its medium, the words in which it formulates itself; in the end, then, it is a type of literary expression with stylistic and aesthetic characteristics that convey qualities of feeling, mind, character precisely as painting or music does; and the term "great" may be applied to a critic—a Berlioz, a Shaw, a Tovey—in the same sense as to a painter or composer.

Tovey writes about what he finds in musical works when he studies them from point to point; and what he writes can be understood only by a reader who already knows the details that Tovey talks about or is able and willing to look them up as Tovey refers to them. The only way to learn anything about Schubert and his music is to go through the music. If one is as good as Tovey one will learn as much in this way as he did; if one is not as good as Tovey one does well to accept the guidance of what he writes about the symphonies in "Essays in Musical Analysis," and to read that essay in "The Heritage of Music" and turn to each song, each sonata, each quartet as he refers to it. To learn about Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and the rest in this way takes effort, takes time, takes the $4 for each slim volume of the "Essays"; and some may prefer to spend a couple of dollars and a couple of hours on the book that is on everyone's tongue. They won't learn anything about Schubert; but they will be amused by the anecdotal revelations of the unattractiveness of orchestral players, conductors, and American composers, among others. For myself, I'll take the music of Schubert and the wit of Tovey.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

BARNET NOVER conducts a column on world affairs in the Washington Post. From now on he will write regularly for The Nation on American foreign policy.

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH, Librarian of Congress, is well known as a poet. He was for several years an editor of Fortune.

LOUISE BOGAN is the poetry critic of the New Yorker and the author of a book of verse, "The Sleeping Fury." She recently contributed A Defense of Belles-Lettres to The Nation.

KARL LOEWENSTEIN is professor of political science at Amherst College.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the Department of English of Brooklyn College.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

LANGUAGES

NOW LEARN A NEW LANGUAGE
in your own home quickly, easily, correctly by the world-famous LINGUAPHONE Method. Endorsed by thousands of students, schools and colleges.
SEND FOR FREE BOOK
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 R. C. A. BUILDING NEW YORK CITY

PAINTING TRIPS

Enjoy landscape painting in congenial group every Saturday, Sunday, Tuesday. Inexpensive. Silz, 230 East 15th St. GR 5-3339.

POSITION WANTED

College Theater Director desires summer position in summer theater, school or camp. Young woman. M.A. Five years' experience. Box 1239, c/o The Nation.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

Handwriting scientifically analyzed. Detailed, sincere, helpful. $3. Questions answered. Send 15 pen-written lines. State age, sex. Dr. Alfred Reiss, Ph.D. Formerly Heidelberg. 1775 Broadway, N. Y. City.

WEARING APPAREL

Sale at Miss Goodman's. Hats $2 to $5, formerly to $15. DRESSES, COATS, SUITS (all of luxury standard) 33 1/3 to 40% off. 474 7th Ave. (36th St.), 2nd floor. LA 4-4013.

LITERARY ASSISTANCE

Would you like expert and understanding help in writing that book you have always planned doing? Box 1241, c/o The Nation.

SUMMER RENTALS

Delightful modern cottages, fireplaces, all improvements, tennis, bathing, badminton, secluded country, commanding distance. WA 9-7793; Peekskill 3515 M 2.

Bungalow, private Jewish community, 35 miles from city, children's camp; lake, tennis court on premises; frigidaire, piano. $450. NEwtown 9-5006 or LEhigh 4-3216.

Cottages in small congenial colony—Wallkill, N. Y. 160 beautiful acres, river, swimming, fishing, tennis court, sports. Secluded. 70 miles from New York. Phone TR 4-5761 from 9-12 or KI 6-0988 from 5-8.

Cottage. New, log, 5 rooms, well equipped; lake shore, magnificent country, wilds of Ontario. One day from N. Y. Accommodate 6. Season $150, boat included. Phone MU 5-5871 or Box 1240 c/o The Nation.

Attractive bungalow, 4 rooms, completely furnished, on hillside overlooking beautiful countryside; swimming, tennis, near Peekskill. Reasonable. Tel. WO 2-1445.

Rustic cottage in woods within 25 miles. All conveniences. 4 rooms, fireplace. Optional winter occupancy furnished or unfurnished. Reasonable. GR 5-5060.

SUMMER RENTALS—ACREAGE

Rustic retreat on secluded little upland private estate. Views, near Sound. 40 miles out. Owner offers attractive woodland acreage to small group of interesting people. Price nominal, for immediate summer camp. Also rent to adults intriguing 6-room log cabin fully equipped. Nugent, MA 4-4949.

LAND FOR SALE

Croton-on-Hudson. Acre or more, natural field, woodlands; excellent commuting, moderately priced. Croton 3716 or CA 5-2133. Room 1104, 285 Madison Ave.

FURNISHED STUDIO

Exceptionally large; Hudson breezes; artistically furnished; private bath; maid; Steinway; telephone; central location; complete privacy; quiet. SU 7-9880.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

Will share with young business woman my unusually attracive 3½-room furnished apartment in West 70's. Box 1241, c/o The Nation.

APARTMENT TO SUBLET

May-September. Fully furnished and equipped apartment. Living room, bedroom, bath and kitchen. Elm-shaded street with growing flowers. First floor; near post office and library. Some antique mahogany and oriental rugs. Gas, heat, water included. $275 for season. Apt. 2, 136 Mason St. Tel. GR 3846-W, Greenwich, Conn.

Spacious, comfortable, modern three-room furnished apartment, June to September. Moderate rental. Telephone GRamercy 7-6234; evenings TRafalgar 7-9596.

SUBLET OR SHARE

Beautifully furnished 4-room modern apartment, midtown; sublease or share, young gentleman. $35 month. WAtkins 9-1661.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MAY 25, 1940 NUMBER 21

The Shape of Things

TODAY, MAY 21, AN EARLY BERLIN CABLE claims that German mechanized columns swinging sharply west have entered Abbeville at the head of the Somme estuary and hence are practically at the Channel. If this advance is confirmed and the German hold consolidated, the British and Belgian forces in Flanders will be sewed up in a gigantic pocket unable to retreat except by sea. The situation looks extremely dangerous unless the French army, which seems to have checked the drive against Paris, can gather its strength for an immediate counter-blow. The rapidity of the Nazis' drive must have left weak spots in their lines. Can General Weygand find these spots and hurl in sufficient forces with sufficient momentum to endanger the German right and compel it to pull back from the Channel? The bold decision to retire Gamelin, apostle of the defensive, and replace him with the veteran Weygand and the somber defiance of Premier Churchill's speech on Sunday are both signs of the change of mood in Britain and France. New energy and desperate determination have been born of imminent peril; we trust not too late.

*

FOR EVENTS OF THE PAST FEW DAYS HAVE changed the face of Western Europe. In these days Holland's government, its Queen, and the royal family have fled as refugees to England; its army has capitulated. Hitler has appointed Seyss-Inquart, Austria's Nazi traitor, as Reich Commissioner to govern the Netherlands. Belgium is two-thirds conquered: Brussels and Antwerp have fallen, the government has moved to Dunkirk, and the army with its Allied supporters is fighting in the extreme western corner of the country. The small provinces of Malmedy, Eupen, and Moresnet have been incorporated in the Reich. In these few days the German army has stormed and bombed a wedge into French territory through the northern extension of the Maginot line between Montmédy and Mauberge, thrusting forward well beyond St. Quentin. Holland conquered, Belgium two-thirds conquered, France invaded—all this in a week in spite of desperate, courageous resistance. Why did it happen? This can be easily told. The German armies, like the German nation, have been prepared for war, and for nothing but war. The command is unified, single-minded, animated by blazing determination. It applies the latest machinery of killing with brilliant ingenuity, not mechanically. The entire strategy is focused on two things—invasion and conquest. Tactics are geared to two ideas—power and speed.

*

THE ALLIES DID NOT EXPECT TO FACE A mechanized invasion across open country, and there is no doubt that the morale of the troops was at least temporarily shaken by the furious attacks of hundreds of dive bombers dropping their shattering projectiles and then wheeling and returning to machine-gun again and again the helpless foot soldiers. The onslaught of fast tanks breathing fire one hundred yards ahead as they charged added to the terror. All reports insist that Allied morale was wholly restored "after the first few attacks," but it is clear that the Germans gained a great initial advantage. It is reported, too, that the French command is taking strong measures to rid the army of fifth-column elements; this may refer to Nazi sympathizers in the ranks, but it may also refer to Communists, some of whom continue even at the front to regard the war as primarily an imperialist struggle. Presumably Weygand will remove such obstructions with speed and thoroughness rather than mercy. The need of prompt, unfaltering counter-attack is recognized. A war of aggressive thrusts is the only possible rebuttal to Hitler's tactics. For the Germans cannot halt. They must win or collapse.

*

IF CHARLES LINDBERGH WANTS TO PREACH American isolation, that is his privilege. But in giving the nation the benefit of his advice last week the Colonel went beyond the bounds of argument to attribute motives and assign responsibilities. It is his thesis that the danger to America comes from those guilty of "meddling with affairs abroad," and since he brands these persons ("a small minority of the American people but they control much of the machinery of influence and propaganda") as "elements of personal profit and foreign interest," it is not impertinent to consider the interests which the Colonel himself has been serving. For he has not always been opposed to "meddling with affairs abroad." Last fall, when there was still a strong possibility of calling off the war, Colonel Lindbergh pleaded for peace so that the "white race" could rebuild its ramparts against both "the infiltration of inferior blood" and the Asiatic hordes already "pressing toward us on the Russian border." Far from being self-sufficient, Americans were to have a real part in these "affairs abroad"; indeed, civilization itself, said the Colonel, depends "on an English fleet, a German air force, a French army, and an American nation, standing together as guardians of our common heritage, sharing strength, dividing influence." But all that brave dream was predicated on hordes of barbarism "pressing toward us on the Russian border." When hordes not only press on the German border but spill out over Western Europe to the English Channel, the Colonel reproves Americans for "this hysterical chatter of calamity." Nazi hordes, apparently, are not barbaric enough to worry Colonel Lindbergh.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

BLUEPRINTS FOR THE 1940 PRESIDENTIAL campaign have been all but trampled into illegibility by the boots of Hitler's soldiery, and many of them will have to be scrapped. It was assumed all along, of course, that the war would have a profound bearing on the outcome of the elections, but the coming of total war has turned the whole campaign on its head. Three weeks from the date of their convention, the Republicans find themselves confronted not only with the practical certainty that they will have Roosevelt to fight again but also with a swiftly growing split in their ranks over foreign policy. Headed by Colonel Frank Knox, the party's vice-presidential candidate in 1936, great numbers of Republicans are stampeding toward the Roosevelt policy of giving all possible aid to the Allies short of entering the war. Knox himself is believed ready to accept a place in the Roosevelt Cabinet as Secretary of the Navy, succeeding Charles Edison, and there is much talk of a "coalition Cabinet." Such a coalition would be tantamount to a Republican surrender in a year in which the elephant was conceded a fighting chance, and the heads of the party naturally decry ideas of this kind. But the party cannot afford to take in June a strong isolationist stand which it might well feel forced to abandon by November, and even less can it afford to have a free-for-all in Philadelphia. Along with the weird talk of coalition, therefore, looms the possibility that the hard-pressed Republicans may postpone their convention until the fall. Since Roosevelt has already expressed a desire to put off the Democratic convention, we may witness the spectacle of a campaign in which the Republican contender, worn to a frazzle by a summer of dreadful uncertainty, has six weeks to head off a man whom outstanding Republicans are even now prepared to follow.

*

CERTAIN MEMBERS OF CONGRESS APPEAR prepared to burn down the Constitution in order to get rid of Harry Bridges. A bill introduced by Congressman Leland M. Ford of California would make an alien deportable who by word or act showed himself "sympathetic with . . . associated with, or affiliated with . . . communistic individuals or organizations . . . in the interference with the good order and happiness of any local community." This was too silly even for the anti-Bridges faction, and the bill has been mercifully buried in committee. More dangerous to the Constitution is one introduced by Congressman Leonard A. Allen of Louisiana, providing specifically for the deportation of Harry Bridges. Since this is a private bill and therefore requires unanimous consent, we cannot believe that it will pass. But before this sort of thing spreads we should like to point out that there could be nothing more contrary to the Constitution. For Congress to pass a bill condemning a man to deportation is to violate separation of powers and to encroach on the judicial function. This is what is known in English law as a bill of attainder. Bills of this kind, first employed under Tudor despotism in the fifteenth century, are defined by the Encyclopedia Britannica as a "species of extrajudicial procedure, for the direct punishment of political offenses." Trial and evidence were unnecessary. Henry VIII found bills of attainder useful in getting rid of those he could not hope to convict in a court of law. Bridges has been tried and found not deportable. In case some Congressmen would like to use Henry VIII tactics, we call their attention to Subsection 3, Section 9, Article I, of the Constitution. It forbids Congress to pass a bill of attainder. The Allen bill is enough to make the Founding Fathers turn over in their graves.

*

THE BRITISH LABOR PARTY, MEETING IN annual conference immediately after the formation of the new Churchill government, approved by an overwhelming majority the participation of its leaders in the Cabinet. A small section protested that the "working classes were being dragged into a conflict between rival capitalisms"—a view which Clement Attlee, now Lord Privy Seal, rejected as "claptrap" with the evident approval of the conference as a whole. The government has been rounded out with the appointment of a large number of subordinate ministers, and altogether sixteen posts have gone to the Labor Party. Ernest Bevin, able, energetic, and sometimes ruthless "boss" of the Transport Workers, Britain's largest trade union, has been chosen as Minister of Labor. Hugh Dalton, an economist, who served as Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the last Labor government, will head the Ministry of Economic Warfare. An unexpected selection is that of Lord Beaverbrook to take charge of a newly created Department of Aircraft Production. One of Britain's chief press magnates, Beaverbrook until the outbreak of war was both a crusader for British isolation and a critic of the government's air policy. Now he is slated to speed up the output of planes at a time when Britain's island security is threatened as never before. In reconstructing the government Mr. Churchill has cleared out a good deal of dead wood, but he has been forced to pay several political and personal debts. The elevation of Sir Kingsley Wood, a power inside the Tory organization, was probably a necessary concession. Less easy to explain, except on the basis of long friendship, is the choice of the fascist-minded Lord Lloyd as Colonial Secretary. The appointment of an old-line imperialist, Leopold Amery, as Secretary for India is also disturbing.

*

THE REPORT THAT JAPAN IS SEEKING A truce in its three-year undeclared war against China bears the earmarks of authenticity in so far as it reflects Japanese policy. With the collapse of its recent major offensive in northern Hupeh and southern Honan, the Japanese army appears to have reached, for the moment at least, the limit of its striking power. A breathing spell would give it an opportunity to replenish its depleted reserve of munitions and permit it to consolidate its now shaky position in the chief occupied areas. A truce would also give Japan an opportunity to profit, both strategically and financially, from the European war, and thus alleviate domestic discontent. The Japanese have not forgotten the fabulous profits made in the last war. While it is not unreasonable to suppose that Japan would be willing to withdraw from a considerable portion of China in order to gain the foregoing advantages, it is difficult to see why the Chinese should accept such an offer. Chiang Kai-shek has every reason for carrying on the struggle, difficult though it may be. China's morale remains excellent; its military strength is greater than at the beginning of the war. Chungking has denied the report that informal peace talks are already under way at Hongkong, and unless new evidence is uncovered it would be well to accept this denial.

*

NO DOUBT CHARGES OF INCONSISTENCY will be leveled at the Supreme Court because of its decision upholding the 1937 Guffey Act. Two weeks before, in the Madison Oil Trust case, Justice Douglas had ruled for the court that the Sherman Act forbade combinations of business men to fix prices. In the coal case Justice Douglas handed down an opinion permitting prices to be fixed by district boards under government control. Thus the court forbids price-fixing in the one case and permits it in the other. The distinction actually is quite simple. Price-fixing by business combinations is illegal because Congress made it so in enacting the Sherman Act. Congress, in the exercise of its power over interstate commerce, can decide otherwise when and where it chooses. "What Congress has forbidden by the Sherman Act it can modify," Justice Douglas said. "It may do so by placing the machinery of price-fixing in the hands of public agencies." The conclusion to be drawn by businesses that want price-fixing is that they should obtain "Guffey acts" of their own and then gain control of the price-fixing boards. This not too attractive prospect may temper jubilation over another "liberal" decision by the Supreme Court.

*

THE SAME MAIL BRINGS US A RELEASE FROM the Civil Rights Federation in Michigan and the "free speech" briefs filed by Messrs. Cravath, de Gersdorff, Swaine, and Wood in the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals on behalf of Henry Ford. Ford complains that the Labor Board has forbidden him to distribute leaflets among his employees urging them not to join a union. The Civil Rights Federation complains that a Dearborn ordinance restricts the distribution of leaflets in the vicinity of the Ford plant during the hours when Ford workers go to and from work, and prevents union organizers from giving them leaflets urging them to join a union. The Civil Rights Federation asks support for Councilman Clarence Doyle's campaign to repeal the ordinance. Ford, as Dearborn's largest taxpayer, is not without influence in its city government, but we do not recall that he ever objected to the leaflet ordinance or even to its predecessor, which forbade the distribution of any leaflets in Dearborn unless the City Clerk first approved their contents. To call national attention to the collapse of free speech and press in Dearborn at a time when Henry Ford is manfully protecting the Bill of Rights against the Labor Board seems a deplorable lack of tact.

*

HEARINGS ON MIGRATORY FARM LABOR now being held by the La Follette committee represent more than a humane interest in a luckless portion of our population. Small farmers, freed from feudal tenures, contributed greatly to the development of our characteristic democratic and equalitarian ways. The changes which have been taking place in rural areas, by depriving large sections of our farm population of economic freedom and security, are a serious threat to the institutions these same areas did so much to nurture. We are developing a rural proletariat, and the Russian and Spanish examples remind us of the revolutionary and counter-revolutionary tinder that exists in landless and hungry rural masses. We can do no more at this time than point to the high lights of the testimony before the committee. More than half a million farms in this country consist of land so poor that no farmer can make a living on it no matter how hard he tries. At least 2,500,000 persons live on these pauper farms. The strange phenomenon of "farmers on relief" has made its appearance: at some time during the last seven years more than one out of every four farm families has required assistance from WPA or FSA. Equally new and strange is "unemployment on the farm": the 1937 Unemployment Census showed 1,500,000 farmers jobless. Steinbeck's Joads are a vivid symbol of a growing misery and unrest. The future of democracy in America may depend on our ability to cope with the problem they represent.

Supposing Hitler Wins

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

A GRIM game has become popular these days. It consists of thinking of all the things that will happen if Hitler wins the war. It is a game one can play by oneself, or with one's friends, or in a letter to the New York Times, or, if one has the luck, in an editorial column such as this.

What will happen to the United States if Hitler wins? people ask. And then they talk about Greenland and the West Indies and the Guianas. Or about navies and the possibility of long-distance invasion. Or about autarchy and foreign trade. Or about political freedom.

What will happen to the British Empire? That is another favorite starting-point. And they discuss India and Singapore and Hongkong. Or the position of the dominions and the relations between Canada and the United States. Or the British fleet.

Less commonly the game is played about Europe. What will happen to Europe if Hitler conquers Europe? Hitler has been conquering Europe for years, and the game has become almost tiresome. The answers have already been made—in Spain and Czechoslovakia and Poland. But in these last few days and nights I have found myself stating over again the questions and the too obvious answers in terms of England and of France, especially of England.

I play the game with small pieces. I think about people, and ways of considering and doing things. About Chamberlain, for instance, and Bonnet. What will happen to them if Hitler wins? And I decide immediately. Both of them will be put in concentration camps. That they are reactionaries won't help them. Their past services to the Nazis won't save them. In the end they turned against the bearers of the New Europe and so they must be crushed. (I remember Schuschnigg; where is Schuschnigg now?) Of course they may be spared if they bow to the logic of fascist conquest (I remember Hacha and Sirovy) and help to rule according to the Nazi pattern. Chamberlain won't do that, I decide. He is too stubborn. But Bonnet might serve the Nazis; I rather imagine he will.

I think about many other leaders. Churchill will be killed. The Nazis will kill him and then announce that he was accidentally shot while trying to escape. But nobody will believe that lie. The Labor men will be killed or buried in concentration camps, those who cannot escape. I'm not sure about the Communists. Hitler will be afraid of them in spite of their services during the present struggle; but he will be afraid of Russia, too. I think he will preserve the Communists, and watch them.

I think about the governments of Britain and France. Hitler, I decide, will permit them to be "independent." That will mean that they will be run by approved English and French fascists and that the parliaments will be suppressed in both countries. Mosley deserves the job of Top Fascist in England, but if he gets it he won't hold it long. He is too proud and self-willed. Hitler will soon replace him with a man who will better understand Britain's future role.

I think a lot about other organizations in France and Britain; in Britain particularly. It is a country that loves committees and societies. Bird-lovers and people interested in the Balkans; birth-controllers and vegetarians; all the groups that insert notices in the New Statesman and Nation; they will go, because they will not fit in an England that fits in the New Europe. More still I think about the French and British labor organizations, and the British-Labor Party most of all. They will dissolve with the liquidation of their leaders. And I realize, suddenly, as I consider their end, how much of England is encompassed, for me, in the stodgy, ineffective, compromising, and generally decent democracy of the British Labor Party.

I think about the schools and universities of France and Britain, teaching ways of thinking that can have no meaning if Hitler wins. I think about Huxley and Hogben and Bernal. I think about the press—the vivid, venal press of France; the solid, free journals of England. I think of the weeklies—the New Statesman and Nation, bold and honest and effective; the Spectator, that should be dull and stuffy because it is conservative, but manages to be brilliant. I think of the Countryman; I try to imagine the Countryman in Hitler's England. It would run articles on Diplomacy and Boar Shooting. I think of the end of the great free press of Britain . . .

And the books and the art, the authors and the painters. Will Shaw be preserved in some fascist museum for his childish sins against democracy? Wells may escape to America. James Joyce will die in France. Malraux will die fighting.

Will all the books be burned? Will Western learning and Western thought crumble in the flames of a thousand bonfires in the squares of France and England? Probably not. The Nazis have a nice eye for the commercial value of forbidden things. They burn samples, not collections. The literature of France and Britain and their forbidden art are not as likely to be destroyed as they are to be locked up. Learning and beauty will become museum pieces, and the museum will be closed to the public.

I think about the Jews of Britain and France, and of all Europe . . .

But the game at last becomes unbearable. It is not possible for the sane mind long to contemplate the end of sanity. These things must not happen. That they can happen and indeed may happen is not an answer that we know how to tolerate.

Essentials of Defense

PROOF of the falsity of the statement that neither the war nor its outcome was any concern of ours has been provided once and for all by the spontaneous alarm felt throughout the country as soon as it was realized that a rapid Allied defeat was by no means impossible. Had fortunes on the western front been reversed, we would have experienced no tremors. No Allied triumph would have stirred us into a reexamination of our own defenses. But the prospect of a Nazi domination of Europe conjures up in our minds such visions of immediate and tangible dangers to vital American interests that we accept almost unanimously the grim necessity of adding huge amounts to already heavy defense expenditures.

The first moral to be drawn is plain: even though we do not enter the war, common sense demands that everything possible be done to bolster the western front by making available to the Allies food, raw materials, and the products of our industries. For this reason, the outstanding sentence in the President's message on defense last week was his request to Congress not "to take any action which would in any way hamper or delay the delivery of American-made planes to foreign nations which have ordered them or seek to purchase more planes."

Subject to this all-important proviso, Mr. Roosevelt asked for immediate appropriations and authorizations totaling $1,182,000,000, and Congress, accepting his estimate of the situation, went to work with unparalleled haste to carry out his wishes. Much as The Nation dislikes the thought of diverting useful resources to so unproductive a task as rearmament, it agrees with the President that our defense policy must take into account the dangers arising from the new turn of events in Europe. At the same time, it is necessary to point out that there is a great deal more to defense than the mere appropriation of large sums of money. If this is to be spent wisely, a far greater degree of correlation in the direction of our armed forces than has yet been achieved is absolutely essential.

To begin with, there is need for much greater precision about the lines we are going to defend. There could be no attack on these shores unless an enemy had first established naval and air bases within striking distance. But as Mr. Roosevelt made clear in his message, the increased range of modern planes has greatly enlarged the area which our defense plans must take into consideration. The general principle that we are vitally concerned with the integrity of any state in the Western Hemisphere is perhaps sufficiently established, and it can almost be taken for granted that we would not permit a potential enemy to gain a foothold in any of the Caribbean islands. But what about Bermuda, Iceland, the Azores, and the Cape Verde Islands? How far are we prepared to go to prevent such territories from being converted into bases which might be used against the Americas? And to what extent are we willing to defend trade routes which connect us with sources of vital raw materials? These are questions which demand answers before we can decide the amounts and types of armament needed. Nor can such questions be left to military and naval officers, for they involve matters of high policy which are the responsibility of the government as a whole.

For this reason we are sorry that Mr. Roosevelt has cold-shouldered proposals for a bi-partisan committee on national defense. There is a real need for such a body, which should be headed by the President himself, both to pass on major strategic objectives and to provide for the coordination of the different services and for the efficient organization of supplies. In order to provide the necessary technical advice a general-defense staff, representing both army and navy, is also essential. We should heed the lesson of Great Britain's experience in keeping its defense services in too watertight compartments.

Another field in which a greater degree of coordination is desirable is that of procurement of supplies, especially aircraft. Under the stimulus of Allied orders the productive capacity of the industry has expanded considerably and is now estimated at about 12,000 units a year. But actual production at the present time is at the rate of only about 5,000 units, and while some plants are fully employed, others are half idle. If we are to raise production rapidly to anything like the 50,000 annual capacity at which Mr. Roosevelt says we should aim, a high degree of cooperation within the industry will be necessary. It will be essential to select a small number of types and to devote one or more plants completely to each type. Only in this way can the benefits of mass production become available. Concentration of this kind implies willingness on the part of the various aircraft manufacturing companies to make sub-contracting agreements with one another. It would be the task of a coordinator of aircraft supply to promote such agreements, to make sure that there was a steady flow of tools, parts, and materials, and to enlarge bottle-necks which threaten to slow up production.

These matters, while highly important, are technical and should not prove beyond the industrial genius of this country. But if our defenses are to be put on a really efficient basis, it is even more vital to promote unity and the cooperative spirit between the different elements in the nation on whose labors success depends. It is disturbing, therefore, to find that the present emergency is being seized on in some quarters as a handy argument for modifying or even destroying safeguards which the workers have belatedly won under the New Deal. There are voices calling for amendment of the wage-hour law and the Walsh-Healey Act, and for drastic economies at the expense of the WPA. The same voices declare that the rapid increase in production required for defense can only be provided by full reliance on private enterprise. That may be so, though we have found that in building the navy, private enterprise has lost few opportunities of skinning the Treasury. However, we ought not to permit the protection of the workers to be diminished while making possible the enlargement of profits. We shall not build our defenses by adding to social injustice. Rather, while mending our ramparts against external foes, we must diligently work to eradicate the causes of social tension which threaten our democracy from within.

White-Collar Salaries

THOUGH the wages of workers in industry have been rather thoroughly investigated, comparatively little has been known until recently about the salary scales of white-collar workers. To a large extent this lack of information has been the result of employer policies. Wage schedules such as exist for manual workers are rarely found, and many employers have sought to conceal the essentially capricious basis on which salaries are fixed by a policy of strict secrecy about the compensation of individuals. The rule has not always been rigidly enforced, but white-collar employees are usually reticent about discussing their salaries.

The unfortunate results are clearly demonstrated in the survey of salaries in the book-publishing industry just released by the Book and Magazine Guild—the first such ever made. All of the thirty-six firms covered by the report are located in New York, where salaries are well above the average. The survey reveals tremendous variation not only between firms, but for a given type of work within a single establishment. There seem to be no accepted standards for beginning salaries, increases, advancement, or bonuses. Stock and shipping clerks vary from $12 to $28 a week; switchboard operators receive from $14 to $30 a week; and assistants in the production, advertising, and editorial departments get from $18 to $70 a week. Beginning salaries for stenographers vary from $17 to $32. The situation with regard to increases seems little short of chaotic. Some employees after from five to eight years' service receive little more than the lowest beginning salary paid any employee. Only one-third of those who have been employed by the same firm five years or more have received increases of more than $10 a week. Practically a third of all the employees have never received a raise, or have had their wages cut. Some of these discrepancies may be accounted for by differences in individual ability, but in many instances no such explanation seems possible.

Although presumably the white-collar workers in the publishing firms are better trained and are at least as efficient in their jobs as manual workers in the printing trades, their salaries fall far below the wages paid union printers. As against an average salary of $26.94 for employees in the editorial, business, and advertising offices, the New York union scale is $54.48 a week for compositors, $64.32 for electrotypers, and $64.80 for pressmen. Part of this difference may be accounted for by discrimination against women, since four-fifths of the employees of the publishing houses are women. The extent of this discrimination may be seen from the fact that the average salary for men editors, editorial assistants, and proofreaders is $47.22 a week, while the average for women in the same category is only $26.17. Men tend in general to occupy the more responsible positions and to be favored in advancement. But even for the same work, women's average salaries are materially lower than those of men.

It may also be that office employees of publishing houses, despite their superior training, are expected to be content with lower wages than printers and typesetters because of the prestige of their positions and the vague chance of advancing to executive positions that pay somewhat better than the top posts open to workers in the printing trades. But the difference in compensation is probably due chiefly to the differing strength of unionization in the two fields. Printers have long been well organized and have succeeded not only in achieving a high wage scale but in bringing about standardized conditions. In contrast, the publishing industry remains relatively unorganized despite the Book and Magazine Guild's success in signing contracts with some sixteen individual firms.

Although the specific findings of the Book and Magazine Guild's study are applicable only to a fairly restricted industry, there is no reason to believe that the employees of publishing houses are paid less, or are more unfairly treated, than hundreds of thousands of office workers throughout the country. Further studies of this kind are badly needed as a step toward improving the status of white-collar employees in every field.

British Labor Expects. . .

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, May 17, by Cable

THE Labor Party conference was almost unanimous in its decision to enter the Churchill government. It had, indeed, no moral alternative. The gravity of the crisis and the responsibility it bore for the defeat of Mr. Chamberlain made its full partnership inescapable. The personnel of the government is not from a Labor standpoint all that it might be. A price has always to be paid for coalitions. But Hoare has gone, Simon is permanently sidetracked, Chamberlain is bound hand and foot in the War Cabinet by men who are against appeasement in any shape or form. The three pivotal economic positions in the Ministry are held by Labor. Behind their occupants is the solid support of the trade unions. These are gains of an immense kind. They mean that Labor dominates the economic organization for the conduct of the war. That is not all. Attlee and Greenwood are aware that the conference stands firmly by its Socialist principles both in the domestic and the international field. They will be expected to press with all their strength for the acceptance of those principles; they will be judged by the degree to which they succeed in securing their application.

Labor expects an agreement with India. It expects a new approach to the problem of Soviet relations. It expects a wholesale reorganization of the economic front on the bases, one, of a full use of man power under full national control and, two, of rigorous equality of sacrifice in the real meaning of the term. It expects to see large-scale social reforms during the war—in public health and education and in the treatment of the aged and of soldiers and their dependents. It expects to see full preparation for immense reconstruction after the armistice.

These things must begin now. They are part of the capacity to show that the new government can enlist the whole spirit of the nation for the defeat of Hitler. They are the proof that Labor, as a full partner, can recover the dynamic spirit of democracy. The peace aims of the party stand. It is for a full victory. Hitlerism must be unmistakably defeated. But there must be no peace of revenge. There must be an end to the sovereignty of the state. There must be a new world order which, by making aggression impossible, makes the struggle for armaments unnecessary. The party is clear that the coalition government continues only as long as it accepts these purposes—as a government representative of a nation united for victory. That capacity ceases when victory is won, or the moment that any of the essential principles of the Labor movement are denied by the non-Socialist members of the government. The Labor Party would have destroyed any claim to the respect of the nation had it refused responsibility in this historic moment. It is not merely that the nation is fighting for its life; it is, as the conference said, that the alternative to victory is the reduction of France and Britain to the position of slave states under the heel of Hitler. British public opinion has called upon Labor to share in these decisions upon which our fate depends. By helping to organize victory now it has a great opportunity to win power for socialism once the victory is won. And though we shall pass through grim hours in the next month, we know that in the end victory will be ours. Out of that victory we shall take the power to start building the first democratic socialist state in the modern world.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 637
EDITORIALS:
SUPPOSING HITLER WINS by Freda Kirchwey 640
ESSENTIALS OF DEFENSE 641
WHITE-COLLAR SALARIES 642
BRITISH LABOR EXPECTS by Harold J. Laski 643
DEFENSE HARMONY by Charles Malcolmson 644
MURDER MONOPOLY. I. THE INSIDE STORY OF A CRIME TRUST by Joseph Freeman 645
MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT
VII. TAFT FOR SAFETY by Robert S. Allen 649
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 652
IN THE WIND 653
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 654
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
CRIME A poem by Robert Penn Warren 655
MY SON A poem by David Cornel Dejong 655
AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY by Reinhold Niebuhr 656
MONEY-CHANGER IN THE TEMPLE by James Wechsler 658
PROFILE OF A PERIOD by Robert Dell 659
SOVIET ECONOMY by Albert Lauterbach 660
IN BRIEF 661
DRAMA by Joseph Wood Krutch 661
ART: THE GENIUS OF MEXICO by Paul Rosenfeld 661
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 662

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Defense Harmony

BY CHARLES MALCOLMSON

Washington, May 21

NOT since the honeymoon of 1933 has there been such an outburst of acclaim and activity on Capitol Hill as followed President Roosevelt's request for $1,182,000,000 in emergency defense funds. Timed to perfection, the President's message caught the legislators staggering from the impact of the Nazi invasion of the Low Countries, and their almost unanimous reaction was a resolve to prove that democracy could do a little blitzkrieging of its own. For a while the leaders were even talking of rushing the whole program through in forty-eight hours; they later compromised on a streamlined "regular order" that has kept committees and subcommittees stepping all over one another in their haste to approve various sections of the program. As a result, if the $896,000,000 in appropriations and $286,000,000 in authorizations have not been voted and sent to the White House by the time this is in print, they will be on their way very shortly.

The President plans to attack the problem of expanding our national-defense facilities on four fronts by (1) purchasing equipment for an army of 1,000,000 men, (2) replacing outmoded military and naval material, (3) increasing munitions production, (4) vastly stepping up armament, particularly airplane, manufacture. To expedite this last he requested a special $200,000,000 appropriation to be expended at his discretion, explaining only that the money is to be used largely for "increasing production of airplanes and anti-aircraft guns and the training of additional personnel for these weapons." The badly demoralized Republicans and isolationists have been hoping vaguely to stir up opposition to this "blank check" proviso, but even the most sanguine expect their protests to be brushed aside. There is plenty of precedent for such a request anyway, Congress in 1917 having voted Woodrow Wilson a similar fund.

The President placed great emphasis upon the need for rapid expansion of airplane production and expressed the hope that the industry could be "geared up to the ability to turn out at least 50,000 planes a year." There is no doubt this goal can be reached under his plan to establish inland a score or more plane factories with government financing. The question is, how soon? Our top production right now is about 12,000 planes a year. The most rational estimate is that a good eighteen months will be needed to double it, making November, 1941, the earliest deadline for a production rate of 25,000 to 30,000 planes per year. Some private aviation experts here, however, insist that with government help and assembly-line methods the 50,000-per-year rate can be attained by January, 1942.

Two extremely significant legislative by-products have resulted from the President's program. The first is the serious consideration being given the demand, put in the form of a resolution by Senator Lodge, that a bipartisan Congressional committee explore the whole subject of national defense. The second is a proposal, advanced by Senator Walsh and indorsed by leaders at both ends of the Capitol, that during the emergency Congress relax the provisions of certain "restrictive" legislation, notably the Walsh-Healey Act and the wage-hour law. The demand for an investigation of our national-defense program and of the army and navy bureaucracy has been getting up steam for some time. At the moment the Administration is looking pointedly in the other direction, but there is a chance that just such an inquiry will be undertaken. There are a thousand questions which should be answered, such as why the army has only one ninety-millimeter anti-aircraft gun and only a handful of less effective types, or why the navy has stubbornly refused to adopt high-pressure steam boilers. And Congress only recently has come to suspect that the new Garand semi-automatic rifle isn't all it has been supposed.

Equally serious is the threatened sabotage, under the guise of war emergency, of most of the New Deal's labor legislation. Congressional leaders are looking favorably upon the suggestion that the hours limitations in the Walsh-Healey and wage-hour laws be relaxed in the interest of production speed-up. Incidentally, the same shipbuilding interests which initiated these proposals in testimony before the Senate Naval Affairs Committee also advocated "removal" of restrictions in both the Vinson-Trammel Act—limiting profits to 10 per cent—and the Wagner Act. While there is no immediate danger that Congress will go to quite such lengths during its current case of war jitters, unquestionably the President's program has supplied reactionaries with an excuse for renewing their assault on labor legislation.

At the same time, the centering of Congressional attention on national defense has served one good purpose: it has greatly relieved pressure for passage of other measures, notably the Walter-Logan bill and the NLRB amendments. Except for the emergency relief bill, which goes to the Senate this week just as the President requested it—$975,000,000 for WPA over an eight-month period—there now appears to be a good chance that no other major legislation will be enacted by Congress this session. (Also excepted, of course, are the army and navy supply bills, which are being revised to include portions of the emergency defense program.)

The Walter-Logan bill, aimed—in the words of Congressman Gene Cox—to "get" the Labor Board, the Wage-Hour Division, and the SEC, has run up against solid Senate opposition that promises to defeat it. The measure faces a Presidential veto, anyway. House reactionaries have about given up on the Wagner Act amendments, both those proposed by the Smith committee and the "milder" Norton version. They fear, not without reason, a repetition of the fiasco which followed House consideration of the Barden wage-hour amendments a few weeks ago. These were tangled up with so many "fly-paper" amendments that the House joyfully sent the resultant mess back to committee. Liberal forces are plotting precisely the same tactics in the event the Smith or Norton bill reaches the floor; and with the Republicans inclined to wash their hands of the whole business, any real effort to force the issue is unlikely.

Hatch Bill No. 2 is still buried in the House Judiciary Committee, where Chairman Sumners, despite the prod of a discharge petition, intends to sit on it as long as possible. There are some ironic touches to this situation. The President, who was dead against Hatch Bill No. 1, strongly favors the companion piece. So do the Republican leadership in Congress and a sizable block of Democrats. But both national chairmen, John Hamilton and Jim Farley, are vigorously and actively opposed. The most effective opposition comes, however, from the bloc of Southern Democrats who, oozing political high-mindedness, last year denounced the President for his failure to back Hatch Bill No. 1. The shoe, transferred to the other foot, is pinching. There is still a fifty-fifty chance that the measure will go through.

The one good laugh of a pretty lugubrious session is being supplied by the House didos over the housing bill. This is the measure that passed the Senate last year with provision for $800,000,000 in USHA loans, only to have a combination of Republicans and Southern Democrats—the latter headed by breast-beating Gene Cox—block House consideration. Now a compromise has been effected to swing the farm bloc into line—a $500,000,000 program with $200,000,000 devoted to rural projects—and overnight Georgia's Gene has become a wild-eyed booster of federal housing. He has even offered to lead the floor fight for the compromise measure. The other day when Republicans accused Housing Administrator Nathan Straus of lobbying in Capitol corridors for the bill, Cox leaped to his feet bursting with outraged dignity. "I'll have you know," he bellowed at the flabbergasted hecklers across the aisle, "that Mr. Straus has every right to be here. In fact, he is here at my invitation!"

Murder Monopoly

I. THE INSIDE STORY OF A CRIME TRUST

BY JOSEPH FREEMAN

AGAINST a background of violence, sensation, and sadism—all tending to obscure its real import—Brooklyn's District Attorney, William O'Dwyer, has run to earth a criminal network which puts in the shade the great racketeering organizations of a generation ago. "Murder, Inc.," is journalese for the ring, and the name is an inspiration; it shows that to some extent at least the press has caught the meaning of Mr. O'Dwyer's discovery: that crime, like business, has outgrown the forms of rugged individualism and moved on to the greater glories of monopoly. Confessions by leaders of Murder, Inc.—its own name for itself is "the Combination"—show that it is a nation-wide, highly organized business which operates major rackets from coast to coast, trains its personnel, has its own code of conduct, and kills on contract. It is a grotesque caricature of American big business, and its ramifications are almost as manifold: labor unions, politics, and industry all covertly recognize the racketeer as a functionary of American society—though they may not be aware of the extent to which his activities center in Murder, Inc.

Today it is almost impossible for a gangster, big or small, to conduct an independent racket. Whether he runs a policy game which nets him millions or a peanut machine which brings him in $30 a week, he can work his racket only with the permission of the Combination. The leaders grant each racketeer his territory, just as an automobile manufacturer grants a dealer his territory. If a racketeer leaves New York for Chicago, he can set up in business only with the consent of the Chicago leader of Murder, Inc. Similarly, no murder can be committed without the okay of the boss of the zone. The boss even reserves the right to choose the killers.

The killings—and they are numbered by the score—are by-products of widespread business operations involving millions of dollars. The Combination exercises control over gambling, prostitution, the illicit traffic in narcotics, the policy game, bootlegging, and the loan-shark racket, to cite its outstanding spheres of influence. By sheer force it also dominates certain trade-union locals, and has a financial stake in various night clubs and cabarets. It operates certain legitimate enterprises and muscles in on others, where it exacts tribute from business men by threats or use of violence. Through its control of slot machines it collects pennies and nickels even from the schoolchildren of the nation. And not least, through its connection with corrupt political machines, it plays an important and sinister role in urban politics. The Combination even has its own banking and credit system designed to lend racketeers money—at an exorbitant rate—with which to start in business. It protects the member racketeer against unauthorized rivals and punishes him when he violates the laws of Murder, Inc. The punishment is usually a violent and horrible death.

At the moment public attention is centered on the first trial which has come out of O'Dwyer's investigations. The defendants, Harry (Happy) Maione and Frank (the Dasher) Abbandando, are charged with killing a fellow-gangster named George Rudnick in 1937. The victim was wiped out because he had turned police informer. According to the prosecution, the defendants strangled Rudnick with a rope, perforated his head and other parts of his body with sixty-three jabs of an icepick, and, to make sure, bashed in his skull with a meat-chopper. Technically the trial is concerned with only one killing, but it is merely the opening gun against Murder, Inc. So far the prosecutor's investigations have shed light on fifty-six hitherto unsolved murders in New York, and he has leads, he told me, which will uncover the bodies of scores of men whose murders were not even recorded on the police blotters. He believes Murder, Inc., can explain the mysterious disappearance of Peter Panto, progressive waterfront union organizer, and of many other members of the waterfront union.

Although his work has just got under way, O'Dwyer has already forged links between various branches of Murder, Inc., in New York. He has related the Combination to Lepke and Gurrah's racketeering in the garment and fur industries, flour trucking, the bakery trade, and narcotics; to the gambling, bootlegging, extortion, and trucking rackets headed by Charles (Bug) Siegel and Meyer Lansky; to the prostitution, policy, loan-shark, and narcotic rackets of the Bronx heirs of Dutch Schultz, whose mob continues to do business as part of Murder, Inc.; and to the various criminal and political activities of the Brooklyn underworld headed by Albert Anastasia and Joe Adonis. From New York the lines lead to other cities and other big shots: to the Purple Gang of Detroit; to Frank Nitti, former aide of Al Capone, who now runs the rackets in Chicago and Miami; to Frank Costello, boss of the New Orleans underworld; and finally to Dutch Goldberg of California, who is believed to be the biggest shot of them all.

Much of the information which enabled O'Dwyer to piece together the pattern of social decay that is Murder, Inc., has come from Abe (Kid Twist) Reles, now state's witness in the case against Maione and Abbandando. This slight, kinky-haired, brown-eyed gangster, with the flat nose, low wrinkled forehead, and heavy lips, began his criminal career in 1920, at the age of thirteen, as a professional racketeer of the prohibition era. He has been arrested forty-three times on every charge ranging from juvenile delinquency and disorderly conduct to murder (no less than five times), and in the course of the present trial has confessed to eighteen murders, six of which he calmly described on the witness stand. In all but five arrests Reles went scot free.

He is known in Brownsville as a cruel, sadistic slugger. His voice is harsh; the words come rapidly; the language is clipped, full of that underworld argot in which money is "sugar," confessing is "singing," and lending at high rates of interest is "shylocking." Behind this lingo are a shrewd, predatory mind and a strange rationale. Reles considers himself and his associates cool, calculating business men operating a vast enterprise.

"The Combination," he boasted to O'Dwyer, "is operated like the Lehman banks. It is practically one organization and spreads all over the country." Reles compares Murder, Inc., to a "tree with all its branches branched out," and in a less idyllic mood to the "airplane trust." He emphasizes that it extends from coast to coast, with headquarters in cities like New York, Chicago, New Orleans, Detroit, and Los Angeles. In the entire United States there are hundreds of thousands of people in the Combination, and in the five boroughs of New York alone there are several thousands. According to Reles, the nation-wide crime syndicate is an outgrowth of the fierce competition in the alcohol racket during the era of needled beer and bathtub gin. "There was no price regulation," Reles told O'Dwyer. "The rule was, I'll do you and you'll do me." Profits ran into the millions, and that was bound to create war. Prohibition gang shootings are now part of American legend, like the predatory excursions and killings of the frontier cattle rustlers. Reles looks back on that era with horror, but for other reasons than the public. He feels that machine-gun competition was in the long run unprofitable for the racketeer.

"Nobody cared how he moved around," he said. "I looked to kill you and you looked to kill me. Somebody did something out of the way and got shot, and then his friends went gunning for the man who did the killing, and he got shot. There was no sense in that. So the leaders of the mob said, Why not stop this crazy competition and go out and make money instead? So six or seven of the leaders got together and said, 'Boys, what's the use of fighting each other? Let's put our heads together, all of us, so that there can't be a meeting without one another.' That's how they all got together, to make no fighting."

Reles claims that the crime trust was from the beginning organized on a nation-wide basis. Modern means of communication and transportation made this logical. The syndicate developed its own hierarchy. Gradations in income, power, and authority were based on original accumulations of capital. When prohibition went out, the gangs had to seek other sources of income—race tracks, cabarets, gambling joints, bordels, policy games, the corrupt sections of the labor movement, the fur and poultry industries, the trucking business. Everywhere the mobs "muscled in" and chiseled off "a piece."

The ordinary small-time mobster was in no position to muscle in. In crime, as in other modern enterprises, the day of the small entrepreneur was over. He might have "brains" as Reles put it, but "he didn't have a chance because he didn't have a dime." He needed capital or credit to start a racket. Failing that, he was forced to become a "worker" for wages, employed by the bigger racketeers. That is how the hierarchy started. In the prohibition era Tim Murphy, a witty Chicago labor racketeer, used to say that Smith and Wesson made all men equal. Now the racketeer with the money had the last word.

A gangster who wanted to run his own racket had to borrow money. He would go, let us say, to Henry (Dutch) Goldberg. During prohibition, Dutch had done quite well running beer; he had wiped out rivals and piled up millions. After the great show was over, he invested some of his money in legitimate distilleries. He also became, according to Reles, head of the Broadway syndicate known as the Big Six. Dutch Goldberg has a police record in New York of four convictions for grand larceny and manslaughter and has served time in Elmira and Sing Sing.

Secure in his millions, Dutch acted as banker for other racketeers; he financed gangsters who started various legitimate and illegitimate enterprises, and received in return a big slice of the racket. In the credit system of the crime trust Reles sees the operation of a natural law. "If you haven't got any money," he remarked philosophically to District Attorney O'Dwyer, "you can't go any place. So the main thing is, you must have money." It was this credit system which first gave wealthy racketeers like Dutch Goldberg, Frank Nitti, and Joe Adonis their leadership in the crime trust. After that, rule was maintained by rigid organization and discipline, with murder the ultimate instrument of control.

As Reles describes it, the racketeers in each zone are governed by an "inner circle" of overlords whose decisions are law. These are the big shots who direct the various "business" enterprises, arrange murders, and acquire heavy bank accounts. Below them are "vice-presidents," like Happy Maione, Pittsburgh Phil Strauss, who is to be tried separately for the Rudnick murder, and Abe Reles. The word "mob" is no longer used to designate the rank and file. They are now "troops" or, less glamorously, "punks," in the employ of the top men. Big shots operate in terms of profits—all the traffic will bear. Secondary leaders and punks work for wages. Reles emphatically denies that Murder, Inc., triggermen have committed murder for as little as $5. "That's just newspaper stuff," he says indignantly. "You don't get paid for that kind of work. When you kill, it's duty. When you work in a shop, and the boss wants you to do something, he doesn't say, 'I'll give you five or ten dollars.' He is paying you a salary, and you've got to do what he tells you." Similarly, the triggerman is on the pay roll of the Combination; any work he does is "part of the routine."

The salaries of Murder, Inc., employees vary from $100 to $250 a week. In addition, some of them are given small rackets of their own: running slot machines or collecting tribute from storekeepers and pool parlors. If the income from these is small, the "trooper" may keep it all: if it runs into real money, he has to kick back part of the take to gangsters higher up. Salaries are paid regularly all the year round, according to Reles, and all the boys make a "good living."

That is the optimistic view natural to a foreman; he resents any implication that his men are underpaid. "Punks" like Pretty Levine and Duke Maffetore, now caught in the O'Dwyer net, tell another story. They say that "troopers" make little money. They are often broke; they are compelled to borrow at fantastic interest rates from the syndicate; and they commit murders for as little as $5, or even for coffee and cake. They have no choice, because once they are in the gang they can't quit. And Reles admits that nine times out of ten when a mobster wants to quit he is killed. The widow is not told what happened to her husband, though she may learn about it from the newspapers. However, she receives his salary as long as his gang is making money. This is Murder, Inc.'s own form of life insurance.

In his confession Reles has insisted that the Combination is a "business" outfit, an economic syndicate whose main object is not murder but money. The murder is incidental to the struggle for money, just as in the moral world wars may be incidental to the struggle for markets. Since Murder, Inc., obtains its money by illegal means, it must purge rivals, code violators, and renegades by illegal means. Under the laws of the community this is murder; from the viewpoint of the crime trust it is just execution.

The economic setup of Murder, Inc., apes big business; its "troops" ape the military machine; its internal justice fantastically mimics our official courts. Charged with violating mob law, a gangster may under certain circumstances demand and obtain a trial by his peers. Here the leaders are judges, and various gangsters appear as prosecutors, witnesses, and "lawyers" for the defense. On several occasions, Reles will tell you proudly, he appeared as counsel for fellow-gangsters on trial before a Murder, Inc., court. He has a flair for legal jargon; he has had plenty of opportunity to hear it in the forty-three times that he has been brought into the official courts. He has defended fellow-gangsters by arguing, "This ain't admissible evidence," or "There ain't no corroboration for this."

Verdicts of Murder, Inc., courts and executions ordered by its leaders are accepted without question by the membership. Loyalty to the group transcends all friendships, all blood ties. The big shots may inform a gangster: "Your brother was a rat; we had to shoot him." The gangster, knowing what is best for him, accepts his brother's execution in silence. Fifteen years ago Louis Capone's own gang killed his brother. Louis, no relation to Al Capone but a powerful figure in the Brooklyn underworld, has known this all along and has done nothing about it. It all happened within accepted mob regulations.

The crime trust, Reles insists, never commits murders out of passion, excitement, jealousy, personal revenge, or any of the usual motives which prompt private, unorganized murder. It kills impersonally, and solely for business considerations. Even business rivalry, he adds, is not the usual motive, unless "somebody gets too balky or somebody steps right on top of you." No gangster may kill on his own initiative; every murder must be ordered by the leaders at the top, and it must serve the welfare of the organization.

A murder by the crime trust can be arranged only by one of the big shots. An ordinary citizen cannot hire Murder, Inc., to do away with someone he does not like. You may, of course, approach a minor triggerman with a proposition to bump off someone for $5,000. But if he did that, Murder, Inc., would kill him. Such a triggerman, Reles says, is not safe to have around. Any member of the mob who would dare to kill on his own initiative or for his own profit would be executed. "Suppose," Reles says, "I come to a triggerman on my own hook and give him $5,000 to rub out someone I don't like. What's to stop him from taking $10,000 from someone else to rub me out?" The crime trust insists that murder must be a business matter, organized by the chiefs in conference and carried out in a disciplined way. "It's real business all the way through," Reles explains. "It just happens to be that kind of business, but nobody is allowed to kill from personal grievance. There's got to be a good business reason, and the top men of the Combination must give their okay."

In support of this contention, Reles gives examples of "good business reasons." George Rudnick, whom Happy Maione and Frank Abbandando are accused of having removed from this earth, had turned police informer—a simple instance of cause and effect. Willie Weber, the policy racketeer, rated death because he bucked the Combination's attempt to organize the policy racket along trust lines. All other policy men entered the Combination. They had one boss, Lucky Luciano; they all turned in their profits to him, and he paid them a salary. Weber held out for the old laissez faire system; he kept his own policy bank and insisted on continuing in business for himself. The Combination decided to execute him. Weber turned out to be tough; he escaped death, though they managed to blow his shoulder off with shotguns. Pittsburgh Phil Strauss was bitter about the failure to rub out Weber. It was a great financial loss to the Brooklyn mob. Under the verbal contract with Luciano the killing of Weber would have given them 50 per cent of his policy racket—perhaps a million dollars clear.

Another clear case cited by Reles was that of Walter Sage. The boys liked Sage. "He was like one of us," Reles explained, "hanging around the corners of East New York making a living this way and that." Pittsburgh Phil staked him to the peanut-machine racket on a percentage basis. But Sage disappointed everybody. He doublecrossed his patron and ran away with Strauss's share of the profits. Accordingly his friend Big Gangi was detailed to visit him in Sullivan County. Later handsome, green-eyed Pretty Levine, an unfeeling triggerman, was sent up to meet the boys. They took the unsuspecting Sage for a pleasure trip through the woods in a 1937 Oldsmobile sedan. Without warning Big Gangi and Pretty Levine stabbed Sage with an icepick fifty-four times, tied a slot machine around the corpse, and threw it into Swan Lake. "There's the motive," Reles added, "when you have no respect."

Under syndicate rules it is "illegal" to kill a man outside your own territory. If New York wants a man rubbed out and he escapes to St. Louis, the job must be done through the St. Louis branch. The St. Louis leaders must give their okay and choose the killers. For strategic reasons they may call in triggermen from out of town, "so the man who will be killed won't know them," Reles explains, "and they can put him on the spot. You go to St. Louis and you don't know a thing about the man you are going to kill or why he is being killed. When you get there, you are told what to do."

Often the killer has to read the newspaper to find out whom he has executed. Then he goes into hiding, usually in Detroit. There is a special fund to take care of him, to cover his living expenses in hiding, to defend him if he is caught. Every branch of Murder, Inc., contributes to it.

Reles insists that any murder committed in the United States which has not been solved within a reasonable length of time is a murder committed by the Combination. It has got to be, he says; a private killing is broken sooner or later by the police, usually within six months or a year. If a killing remains unsolved for five or ten years, you may be sure it was the work of Murder, Inc.

[This is the first of a series of articles by Mr. Freeman on Murder, Inc. Further revelations will appear in an early issue.]

Men Who Would Be President

VII. TAFT FOR SAFETY

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

TWO facts about the Presidential candidacy of Robert Alphonso Taft are significant. One is that the inner leaders, who own and run the G. O. P., are privately predicting that either the Ohioan or a dark horse will win the nomination. The other is that although few of them know him well, and none are excited about him, all are sure he is absolutely safe. The last words tell the whole story of the rise and potency of the Taft boom.

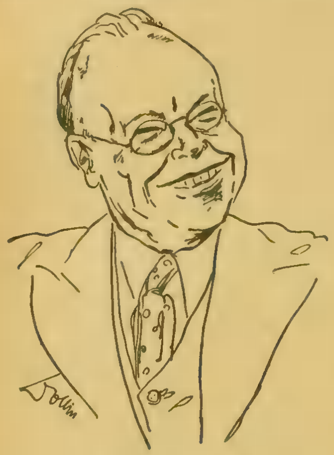
Robert Alphonso Taft is no glamour boy. He is scraggly bald, bespectacled, and a careless dresser, with a voice like a crow's caw and a personality that chills on sight. But he has the one essential ingredient of a winning Republican aspirant—irreproachable safeness. He was safe locally in Cincinnati, he was safe in state matters as a member of the Ohio Legislature, and he has been 100 per cent safe as a United States Senator. To the Joe Pews, the Charley Hilleses, the Ernie Weirs, the du Ponts, the Hoovers, and the other moguls of the Republican Party, that counts above all else. Personally Taft may not stir them, but his unblemished tory record moves them to the core. Of all the candidates seriously in the running, he has the record most after their own hearts. They know where Taft stands, and it is just where they want him to stand, unreservedly and imperturbably on their side.

That is why with them it is either Taft or a dark horse, like Governor Bricker—Joe Pew's secret first love—or Justice Owen J. Roberts or the smart little House floor leader, Joe Martin. On the basis of the "form chart" Taft should make it. He will go to the barrier at Philadelphia on the inside rail, with more pledged and hidden delegate strength than Dewey and with the backing of some of the most powerful chiefs in the G. O. P. But with all these advantages he still may not get the nomination. It has happened in the past that others just as favorably placed have fallen by the wayside on the home stretch. On the final lap there are several tough hurdles that may trip Taft—one in the region below the Mason and Dixon Line.

Taft managers claim most of the Southern delegates, and it is significant that the claim is not seriously disputed by the rival camps. Now as any novice in politics knows, Southern delegates have frequently been put in the category of a cash-and-carry commodity. Taftites hotly deny that their prized Southern booty was obtained by other than legitimate means, but tucked away in the effusive Life profile several months ago—which Dave Ingalls, Taft's manager and cousin, liked so well that he sent out scores of telegrams calling attention to it—was this very interesting observation: "So far the funds have been enough to meet the peculiar requirements of Republican campaigning in several Southern states." Peculiar is not what the politicians call it.

The hectic 1920 convention in Chicago offered proof that Southern delegates can be as much a liability as an asset. Under certain conditions, such as the heat of a Senate campaign-fund investigation, they have a marked explosive propensity. And the Democratic majority on the investigating committee now functioning is decidedly rarin' to go. It can be taken for granted that the boys would love nothing better than to prepare some juicy headline material at the expense of a leading G. O. P. candidate. And certain not disinterested Republicans apparently feel the same way—to judge from pointed hints that have been quietly dropped in the ears of committee members. Taft campaign managers vigorously assert that they are not at all concerned and would welcome an inquiry.

In mental equipment Taft is by far the ablest of the active Republican candidates. He also is the most forthright and the only one who has had the courage and honesty to take a stand on specific issues. He is an unrelieved tory; a corporation and utility lawyer who if elected will administer the affairs of the nation rigorously from that viewpoint. And he makes no bones about it. In a speech in Philadelphia recently he laid his cards bluntly on the table. "There is only one solution for the nation's ills," he said, "and that is to repeal a large part of the laws authorizing the regulation of agriculture, commerce, and industry, and in those laws which must remain, prescribe definite standards to which the regulators must conform." He also denounced the New Deal for imposing taxes "not to raise money but to attempt a redistribution of wealth," and castigated the AAA, the Wage-Hour administration, the National Labor Relations Board, the Housing Authority, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and reciprocal trade treaties. Ultra-reactionary certainly. You may not like it, but at least you know where he stands—which is a lot more than can be said about his fellow Republican candidates, whose outpourings have been chiefly sonorous generalities mixed with glittering hokum. Whatever his views, Taft has courage and ability. In these respects he is no Harding, or Coolidge, or Hoover. By all odds he is the most competent old-line Republican who has sought the Presidency in many years.



Robert A. Taft

Intellectually and temperamentally Taft is his mother's son. Because in her day President's wives were seen and not heard, Mrs. William Howard Taft—née Helen Herron, daughter of a prominent Cincinnati corporation attorney—never emerged publicly in her true character. But those who know her are aware that she was a very clever, ambitious woman and the driving force behind her huge, amiable, lazy husband. Bob Taft has his mother's resolution and narrow but keen intellect. Charlie, the younger son, who is liberally inclined, is more like his genial father.

Like his mother, Robert Taft's wife is a woman of force and ambition who has been a definite asset in his public career. The daughter of President Taft's Solicitor General, Martha Bowers Taft is an effective political campaigner and glad-hander. To her husband's annoyance she is frequently compared to Eleanor Roosevelt. Intrinsically they have little in common. Eleanor Roosevelt is a person of wide sympathies, deep understanding, and great moral and intellectual courage. Martha Taft is a charming woman with a flair for politics.

Up to his entrance into politics Bob Taft's career followed the usual pattern for a serious-minded scion of a wealthy family. He prepared for college at the Taft School at Watertown, Connecticut, founded by his scholarly uncle; from there he went to Yale, his father's alma mater; he took his law degree at Harvard. Light is thrown on his capacity by the fact that he led his classes in college, was editor-in-chief of the Harvard Law Review, and passed the Ohio bar examination with top honors. Writing about him recently in a reminiscent vein, Howard Vincent O'Brien, columnist of the Chicago Daily News, painted this picture of Taft in college days:

> Myself a college classmate of Robert Taft, I am struck by the difference between his position as an undergraduate and that of F. D. R. Few, if any, of Roosevelt's classmates at Harvard ever dreamed of his attaining a great place in the world. But by Taft's classmates at Yale it was taken for granted that he would always be somebody.
>
> . . . I cannot recall that he ever did anything outstanding, such as being prom chairman, or captain of the football team, or editing the Lit. . . . His one pre-eminence was in studies. He was always at the head of the class. Strangely enough, however, his scholarship never excited the disrespect that college students usually give it. One reason, I suppose, was that he was never a "greasy grind," never honeyed up to teachers, never paraded his erudition, and was never above helping a weaker vessel.
>
> He is definitely "conservative." I think he is even a little narrow. . . . I don't think he understands the common man as well as F. D. R. does, but I think he can learn.

Refusing several attractive offers from New York law firms, Taft chose to serve his apprenticeship with Maxwell and Ramsey, leading corporation lawyers in his home town. Later, with his brother Charlie and several friends, he set up his own firm, which with the aid of the family's name and extensive business interests rapidly grew to be one of the largest and most successful in Cincinnati.

Defective eyesight kept Taft out of military service during the World War. But he served as assistant general counsel of the Hoover Food Administration and in that post began a friendship with the Great Engineer that still flourishes. For tactical reasons Hoover is keeping silent regarding Taft's candidacy, but the Ohioan is his first choice—after himself. Hoover still harbors a burning desire for another try, and the latest inside word is that if Taft is stopped, Hoover and Bricker, whose support of Taft is only skin deep, have a secret understanding to attempt a blitz-stampede for a Hoover-Bricker ticket.

Taft's first sortie into politics was in 1920, when he was elected to the Assembly of the Ohio Legislature. He served in the chamber until 1926, rising to be Republican floor leader in 1925 and speaker during his final year. He also served one term in the state Senate, from 1930 to 1932. He was defeated for reelection although another Republican senatorial candidate from the same district won handily—a fact that is not recalled in his official campaign literature or in the laudatory sketches that have appeared in the last few months in the big national weeklies. This omission points to one of the tenderest spots of Taft's candidacy—the often-heard charge that he is a poor vote-getter. Taft managers and press agents have gone to great pains to refute this. Practically every statement, handout, and article emanating from their typewriters or inspired by them contains some reference designed to offset this suspicion. Alice Longworth's extraordinary effusion in the Saturday Evening Post several weeks ago was "angled" entirely to deal with this matter.

Mrs. Longworth and the other Taft tooters make much of his decisive defeat of Democratic Senator Robert Bulkley, bearing down heavily on the fact that while Ohio went Democratic by over 600,000 in 1936, Taft retired Bulkley by 170,000. That is true, but it is far from the whole story. Taft won the G. O. P. nomination by only 70,000 votes, after what his opponent loudly charged was a spending orgy; the official records show that more than $250,000 was spent for Taft in the primary. Also, up to the last few weeks of the campaign most of the press reports rated his rival as the probable winner of the nomination. In the election contest Taft couldn't have asked for a weaker opponent. Besides being a bungling campaigner, Bulkley had a record that was impossible to defend. He was neither a New Dealer nor a conservative. He had taken pokes at labor, had talked economy and budget balancing, had been all over the map during the great court-reform battle, and had voted to lift the undivided-profits tax. Yet despite his many handicaps he defeated Taft overwhelmingly in the big industrial center of the state; Taft owed his election to the small-town and rural vote, which in Ohio is traditionally Republican in normal election years.

When referring to his career in the Ohio Legislature, Taft press agents never fail to emphasize his talents as a taxation authority. According to his official campaign biography, he "revised the entire tax system of Ohio." It is significant, however, that no details of this revision are ever given. The record shows that it was embodied in a so-called Classified Tax Act, under which personal property, such as stocks and bonds, is assessed at lower rates than real estate. He also sponsored legislation requiring towns and cities to set up budget systems which would compel them to limit their expenditures. Carefully omitted from the blurbs are these additional facts: During his first term he backed the Republican governor in proroguing the Legislature—the first time in the history of the state that the legislative branch was forcibly adjourned. He voted to appropriate $62,521 for coal companies as payment for fuel which an investigation of the previous Republican regime had disclosed had been bought at excessive prices. When Governor Donahey, a Democrat, vetoed the appropriation, Taft voted to override the veto. He strenuously fought a bill placing gas production and distribution under the state utilities commission as a move toward reducing rates. He vigorously supported a bill changing the method of assessing franchise taxes on local corporations. In vetoing this measure Donahey denounced it as designed to save corporations at least $1,500,000 a year. Taft led the fight to override the veto.

On the other side of the ledger stands Taft's excellent record on civil-liberty issues. He voted for a bill requiring the Klan and other secret organizations to file their officer and membership lists with the state, against a Klan-sponsored bill requiring reading of the Bible in public schools, and for an investigation of telephone rates. In this last he may have had a personal interest since the Taft family owns the Cincinnati Telephone Company, the largest independent in the country, and the probe was understood to be aimed at the Bell system. On the few labor questions that came up during his terms Taft also had a good record. He voted for a bill to establish minimum wages for women and minors in industry, for a constitutional amendment liberalizing the workmen's compensation system, and for outlawing "yellow-dog" contracts. This measure was fiercely opposed by industrial interests, but Taft went squarely down the line in support of it.

His part in the great reform battle that freed Cincinnati from one of the most corrupt political machines in the country and his 100 per cent reactionary record in the United States Senate are the two most important things left unmentioned in the flood of Taft propaganda. For decades Cincinnati had been ruled by a succession of notorious Republican bosses. Finally conditions became so bad that leading business men joined with labor, liberals, and other civic-minded groups in a rousing revolt that smashed the machine and set up a city-manager form of government. One of the leaders of the movement was Charles Taft, who still holds office as a reform councilman. Fighting him tooth and nail in behalf of the foul Republican organization was Robert Alphonso Taft. Bob Taft's apologists, when the issue is raised, insist that he was not against the clean-up, but that he wanted to accomplish the same thing by reform within the G. O. P. The Scripps-Howard Cincinnati Post, however, militant champion of the reform movement, was recently moved to this vehement protest at the blurbs in the slick-paper magazines:

> A decent respect for truth forces the Post to take issue with Life Magazine's amazing interpretation of Robert Taft's position during the fight for honest government in Cincinnati a decade and a half ago. . . . One paragraph is devoted to this phase of Robert Taft's career, as follows: "Meanwhile he had begun to be active in the Cincinnati Republican organization. At the start the organization was extremely malodorous, but fortunately > for his future ambitions he always remained a regular Republican. His brother Charlie was a leader of the Republican City Charterites, who bolted the party, joined with the Democrats to start a city-charter movement, and set up a city-manager government in Cincinnati. Bob Taft, more conservative, helped to write the city charter but would not join Charlie Taft's bolt. Instead, he stayed on in the organization, helped to clean it up. . . . "

>
> The purpose of this paragraph is to make it appear that Robert Taft was at heart a reformer but that he chose the method of working from within the Republican machine. The truth is that Robert Taft was a bitter enemy of the municipal-reform movement in Cincinnati and that he campaigned actively against the adoption of the charter amendments in 1924 which gave the city the P. R.-elected small council and city-manager administration.
>
> It was nearly two years after these basic amendments . . . were adopted that Mr. Taft was named (July, 1926) a member of a board to make further revisions and incorporate them in a new charter. . . . As to "reforming" the Republican Party from within, the record showed last fall that twenty-one of the twenty-six G. O. P. ward chairmen in the city were politicians taught by Rud Hynicka, the heir of the notorious George B. Cox. The "reformation" apparently has not been completed at this writing. The Post said during Mr. Taft's campaign for the United States Senate: "Robert Taft turned his face to the dead past; his first love and his first loyalty were given to party and he did not swerve from that narrow allegiance to take up the people's cause even while an angered citizenry smashed the party machine to give Cincinnati a decent government and a place of honor instead of shame among American cities."

Neither Taft, his managers, nor his apologists have yet answered this ringing challenge. The reason is obvious. They can't.

Nor can they talk away his equally reactionary record in the United States Senate. The only thing that can be said for it is that it has been consistent—Taft has voted the way he has talked. He has talked economy and budget balancing and has consistently voted against relief, farm, housing, and other Administration measures. He has denounced the TVA, Bonneville, and the other great power projects and voted to shut off their funds. He has assailed the SEC, the NLRB, and the Wage-Hour Division and has voted to slash their appropriations. His only important deviation from an anti-New Deal line has been in foreign affairs. In the neutrality fight last fall he supported the President's bill to repeal the arms embargo. On the other hand he battled hard for traditional Republican tariff protection by opposing renewal of the reciprocal-trade law.

This is the record of the man who a month from now may be the chosen standard bearer of his party at a time when the country is facing one of the most crucial periods in its history.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Blitzkrieg in Wall Street

A FEW weeks ago Robert Laffan, writing in the Wall Street Journal, gave the following recipe for confidence:

> What the stock market probably needs to sustain it or improve it, taking a short or day-to-day view, is freedom from fear of any sudden change in the complexion of things abroad, a war active enough to stimulate the exports upon which present hopes are built, yet not decisive enough to indicate an early end to the war. And, of course, a war in which the position of the Allies is never quite jeopardized. On top of that, what the market needs, according to the Street's own testimony, is a favorable outcome for domestic politics. (My italics.)

This may sound cynical, but recent events have shown it to be extremely shrewd. For while the war in Europe has taken a turn active enough to excite any munitioneer, the terrific power of the Nazi drive has unquestionably placed the Allies in a position of jeopardy. This, in turn, has jarred American complacency about the "inevitability" of a final Allied victory and led to really serious consideration of the possible effects on the interests of this country of a Hitlerian triumph in Europe. The obvious repercussions of this change in attitude on domestic politics are hardly conducive to "a favorable outcome" in the eyes of Wall Street.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the surge of Hitler's legions across the Low Countries brought on a wave of liquidation in the stock market. "War babies" and "peace babies," capital-goods and consumer-goods stocks, all shared in the débâcle. Commodity markets were also hit by a tornado of selling, with wheat dropping the full ten-cent limit permitted by trading regulations on two days in succession.

When the market atmosphere is supercharged with emotion, cold fact is always at a heavy discount. Hence, in the past week rather important indications of an improvement in the general business situation have been almost ignored. There has been, however, a sharp rise in the rate of steel operations to 70 per cent of capacity, and a sudden jump in the price of steel scrap is regarded as indicative of even further expansion. Other leading heavy industries, such as chemicals, which showed few signs of recession during the winter, are maintaining or improving their position. Residential construction is continuing to forge ahead of last year, and car loadings are gaining.

To what extent is the domestic picture likely to be distorted by Hitler's latest aggressions? On the debit side must be placed the loss of one and probably two important markets. Holland and Belgium are small, highly industrialized countries which consume considerable quantities of American goods, particularly farm products. In 1939 purchases from the United States of these two countries (including Luxemburg) totaled $161,000,000. By far the most important items were wheat, corn, cotton, and soy beans, and the destruction of these markets undoubtedly influenced last week's fall in commodities. Appreciable amounts of oil, automobiles, and machinery are also sold to the Low Countries in normal times. Against these losses, perhaps, can be set some probable gains in American exports to countries hitherto supplied by Belgium and Holland. Latin American importers who have been customers for Belgian steel and glass, for Dutch radios and farm machinery, may now place orders here. But, it must be remembered, Latin America has also lost a good market and its buying power will be so much less.

The destruction of the Low Countries as a source of supplies and the new intensity of military operations will increase the dependence of Britain and France on American resources. Both countries consumed large quantities of Belgian and Luxemburg steel, for instance, with the result that, in the past few days, they have been compelled to place large orders with American producers. In addition, the enormous wastage involved in battle operations on the scale now taking place is certain to lead the Allies to speed up their purchases of planes and trucks, and will probably lead to a large demand for shells and explosives, for which only comparatively small orders have been given so far. The oil companies, also, may begin to reap the war profits they have missed hitherto owing to the fact that military consumption has not offset the fall in rationed civilian consumption. Now the fierce pitch of aerial warfare, coupled with the closing of the Mediterranean, through which Britain and France imported oil from the Near East, suggests a rising demand for American oil.

On top of this prospective expansion in war-goods production there comes the stepping up of our own defense preparations, promising a large quantity of new business for shipbuilders, plane manufacturers, machine-tool makers, steel mills, and a large number of other industries. Hence a cold-blooded review of the situation does not indicate many sound reasons for liquidating stocks, always assuming that the war is not going to end rapidly in the defeat of the Allies. But there's the rub. The isolationism so marked in Wall Street since the beginning of the war, like so much of the isolationism in other quarters, has all along depended on an unspoken major premise—the certainty of final Allied victory. That premise has been as badly battered as the Belgian defenses in the past week, and in its place has arisen an alarming query: What will be the effect of a German victory, of a Nazification of Europe and its colonies, on American life, politics, and business?

To attempt even a tentative answer to this question would require a long article and would take this department far beyond its proper scope. But it is clear that our economy would to a large extent have to be made over. We should, almost certainly, proceed to rearm on a scale that would make even our present defense expenditure look like small change. The traditional basis of our foreign trade would vanish, and we should have to adapt it to comply with the requirements of totalitarian states in a position, perhaps, to control our sources of raw materials. Probably we should be driven to construct at a revolutionary tempo an autarchic system of our own, with devastating effects on our standard of living and the consequent development of far more dangerous social tensions than exist at present. If thoughts like these are beginning dimly to appear in the minds of those whose decisions animate the stock tickers, we need look no farther for the lack of confidence shaking Wall Street.

In the Wind

TOM DEWEY is in danger of receiving the Bund's indorsement of his Presidential candidacy. Bund leaders are solemnly discussing the move because of Dewey's recent isolationist stand. The only obstacle, they say, is the Kuhn conviction; and a promise of a pardon would fix that.

MOST NEWSPAPERS carried a detailed account of the Daughters of the Depression parley in Washington, held to dramatize the unemployment crisis. The publicity given to the affair was stimulated by Mrs. Roosevelt's presence. From Washington sources we learn that several prominent New Dealers, not including F. D. R., urged her—in vain—to shun the conference because it was accused of being "red."

BEFORE THE recent dinner of foreign correspondents in New York speakers were asked to submit thumbnail sketches of themselves. W. H. Auden replied: "In the course of the last fortnight I have heard myself described as a Communist, a Trotskyite, a Roman Catholic, and as one sent over by the British government to prevent there being another Rupert Brooke. As far as I know, none of these statements are correct."

SEVERAL IMPORTANT trade-union leaders who have frequently been accused of "Stalinism" may be denounced by the C. P. soon. The break will occur if and when John L. Lewis abandons third-party talk and returns to the New Deal fold, a move expected by most labor observers. It is felt that in the present setting third-party plans are out. Many leaders sympathetic to the Communists accept that verdict and will follow Lewis. The C. P. won't.

DURING A recent editorial conference in the PM offices a loud crash was heard, as if someone had fallen through the roof. George Lyon, PM's managing editor, a former Scripps-Howard executive, looked up and remarked, "It's Roy Howard."

THE NEW YORK Daily Worker last week lauded John Strachey as one of a "staunch group of sincere fighters against war." The editors seem to have been unaware of a letter Strachey wrote three weeks ago to the New Statesman and Nation, saying: "Every line written in the Daily Worker [British] drives me to the conclusion that those controlling the Daily Worker are prepared, for the sake of what they consider to be the interests of the Soviet Union, to give way to Hitler to any extent. . . . So long as that remains the case I . . . can have nothing to do with them . . . however much I agree with them as to the general character of the war."

IN ITALY, so anti-Fascists say, where there are ten Italians there are ten Fascists; where there is one Italian, there isn't any Fascist.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WALTER LIPPMANN has got the jitters again. More than three years ago, when it looked as if war was near in Europe, he declared that, if it came, the only way we could safeguard our neutrality would be to mobilize three million men at once and set them down on our shores. With incredible naivete and the lack of realism that is so often astonishing in this man who has been for so many years writing for the press, he actually set forth (see my Issues and Men of January 16, 1936) that this would be the surest way to prevent the rise of a great war party in the United States, demanding war as did Theodore Roosevelt and Leonard Wood in 1915-17, and the surest way to keep us out of war. It never occurred to him that an army of three million men, after it had made all the sacrifice of drilling for months and months, would be just crazy to get going and do something.

Now Walter Lippmann declares that our duty to America requires us to prepare to make over our state according to the Hitler model, especially if the Allies are defeated. Of course he does not use those words, and if he reads these of mine he will say that he never said anything of the kind. Yet what he calls for is none the less exactly that. This is what he actually wrote:

> Isolated in a world that envies us and despises us, we too shall have to become a nation in arms. We too shall have to have conscription; we too shall have to regiment capital and labor in order that we may be able to build the ships and the airplanes, and the guns and cannon without which we shall be harassed and intimidated, threatened and blackmailed by the coalition on both sides of us.

He elaborated further in these words:

> The next thing to do is to adopt a program of national defense of vastly greater scope than that which is now in operation. The experience of Great Britain should be a lesson to us that it is not enough to appropriate money to buy what the existing facilities can supply: it is necessary to create new shipyards, new airplane factories, new plants for the production of guns and other implements of war. There is needed a larger investment of new capital: it is not safe to let the aircraft industry, for example, wait for its expansion upon subsidies from the Allies.

Precisely. I have done him no injustice. Carry out this program, plus universal military conscription and the complete reorganization of American industrial life to make it part of the American military machine, as German industry has been made part of the German military machine, and you have the totally militarized state which can only lead to Fascism or National Socialism. What he wants America to do in order to protect our democracy is to undertake the very way of life which is most inimical to the continuance of republican institutions. If we take his advice we shall destroy democracy in order to defend it, destroy it by injecting into its veins the very poison which has proved fatal to it in so many countries abroad.

I find myself wondering whether Walter Lippmann would not admit that I am right, that the remedy may be as bad as the evil of conquest by the dictators, or lead in the last analysis to the same end, and say that he prefers to take the risk. I find many people caught in this dilemma. The minute the total war began they too cried out that we must arm at once, at all costs. They too forgot all their horror over Franklin Roosevelt's unbalanced budget, their bitter indignation that he was anxious to lift the debt limit still higher. And when I asked them what they were planning to do to safeguard democracy, they admitted the weight of argument on my side but added helplessly: "But what else can we do?"

Of course if Walter Lippmann had anything really to contribute to the defense problem of the United States except mere emotion and an incredible ignorance of military affairs, he would have recommended that we keep cool and quiet and ascertain why it is that we have no defense policy and that therefore our expenditures bear no relationship to any military program, and why we do not tell our army and navy what to defend and how to do it. He could then have pointed out (1) that the primary defense question for the United States, one that is still unsettled, is whether we are only to defend our shores or are to make ready to fight abroad; (2) that all our military expenditures are unintelligent, wasteful, uncoordinated, and often misdirected; (3) that there are the gravest faults in the organization of the War and Navy departments, and that they fail to cooperate adequately and will not function in war time. Why, he might have asked, is it possible for Major General Arnold to have told Senator Lodge that only one hundred of our thousands of airplanes are today fit to go into action in Europe? Just raising these questions and seeking the answers would have contributed more to a sane defense policy than all the wild words he has penned so far. But now that the President has come to this position, he will be the more certain he is right.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Crime

BY ROBERT PENN WARREN

Envy the mad killer, who lies in the ditch and grieves,
Hearing the horns on the highway, and the tires scream;
He tries to remember, and tries, but he cannot seem
To remember what it was he buried under the leaves.

By the steamed lagoon, near the carnivorous orchid,
Pirates hide treasure, and mark the place with a skull,
Then lose the map, and roar in pubs with a skinful,
In Devon or Barbados; but remember what they hid.

And what is hid? But he is too tired to ask it.
An old woman, mumbling her gums like incertitude?
The proud stranger who asked the match by the park wood?
Or the child who crossed the park every day with the lunch-basket?

He cannot say, nor formulate the delicious
And smooth convolution of terror, like whipped cream,
Nor the mouth, rounded and white for the lyric scream
Which he never heard, though he still tries, nodding and serious.

His treasure: for years down streets of contempt and trouble,
Hugged under his coat, among sharp elbows and rows
Of eyes hieratic like foetuses in jars.
Or he nursed it unwitting, like a child asleep with a bauble.

Happiness: what the heart wants. That is its fond Definition, and wants only the peace in God's eye.
Our flame bends in that draft; and that is why
He clutched at the object bright on the bottom of the murky pond.

Peace, all he asked: past despair and past the uncouth
Violation, he grasped at the fleeting hem, though in error;
Nor gestured before the mind's sycophant mirror,
Nor made the refusal and spat from the secret side of his mouth.

Though a tree for you is a tree, and in the long
Dark no sibilant tumor inside your enormous
Head, though no walls confer in the still house,
Nor the eyes of pictures protrude, like a snail's, each on its prong,

Yet envy him, for what he buried is buried
By the culvert there, till the boy with air-gun
In spring, with the violet, comes; nor is ever known
To go on any vacations with him, lend money, break bread.

And envy him, for though the seasons stutter
Past pulse in the yellow throat of the field-lark,
Still memory drips, like a pipe in the cellar-dark,
And in its hole, as when the earth wakes to the vernal shudder,
The cold heart heaves like a toad, and lifts its brow
With that bright jewel you have no use for now;
While still confused, despised with the attic junk, the letter
Names your name, and mourns under the dry rafter.

My Son

BY DAVID CORNEL DEJONG

Let him go and dishonor his sister,
Stride on and molest the reasonless love
Of his brother, and reach impossible mills
To grind his strength into an essence
Of faith and indefatigable ills.

Not now assail the hot and fevered
Tents of his thinking. He will yet defeat
His father, and burn his mother's feet,
Obeying a call that shot from the dark,
Leaving him defiant in the street.

Sometime he may chance upon love or power
And stand tilted before their pluming seas,
Letting his hands fall on slack thighs,
Caring no more for all that destroys
The endless pennants he flings to the skies.

Must he start at that hour to thread humbly
The sinews and arteries of every man
He slew together again? While his strength ruffles thin,
Must he again and again put out his hand to feel
Earth already drawn like a sheet to his chin?

Better to carry him in on a door ripped sadly
From its hinges, put him among zinnias and find
A chair to echo his creaking. Till then, old men,
Muffle your cacklings. I shall let him go where only
His muscles' destruction can temper him again.

[These poems were selected for The Nation by John Berryman.]

American Foreign Policy

A FOREIGN POLICY FOR AMERICA. By Charles A. Beard. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

ISOLATED AMERICA. By Raymond Leslie Buell. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE simultaneous publication of two books on foreign policy by such authors as Charles A. Beard and Raymond Leslie Buell whets the appetite for a great debate on foreign policy. One might suspect, in fact, that some national committee had been at work to pick the two best men to present contrasting opinions on the most serious issue now before the American people. But the debate doesn't come off. Mr. Buell is there with an exhaustive analysis of what isolation would mean in economic, political, and military terms. But Mr. Beard does not join the issue. He is content to deal with the problem in terms of tradition. He seeks to prove, I think successfully, that isolationism, or in his terms "continentalism," is the settled policy of the American people, one from which they have been periodically beguiled but to which they return perennially as to a safe harbor. He assumes of course that it is a good policy for America, but he does not go out of his way to prove it. He does not consider whether it is a good policy for the world but seems to have a slightly uneasy conscience about this omission, for he closes his book with a curious final sentence-paragraph which stands completely alone without an argument to support it. The sentence is: "This policy [continentalism] followed by the United States would favor, not hinder, the coming of peace to other nations of the world."

The thesis of Professor Beard's book is that two villains, "imperialism" and "internationalism," have tried to tempt America from the path of true innocence. Admiral Mahan and Theodore Roosevelt were the symbols of the imperialistic forces, and Woodrow Wilson was the final and most perfect expression of the impulse toward internationalism. "The original policy of continentalism was framed by the founders of the American Republic," who were "experienced, active, and effective statesmen." This basic policy was twice violated, but with the passage of the Neutrality Act in 1935 America returned to its original tradition. Even the amended act of 1939 "was thoroughly continentalist in letter and spirit, although it gave peace advocates all the pleasure they could derive from the sale of instruments of war to belligerents who could buy."

Mr. Beard holds the "governing élite" responsible for turning the "American nation away from its continental center of gravity"—one is left in some confusion about the identity of this "governing élite." He declares that the "idea of imperial expansion was not the business man's dream"; rather business men "were 'dragooned' into it by politicians." The forces behind internationalism are identified as "an intelligentsia large, educated, vocal, and ingenious and politicians unable or afraid to grapple with the domestic crisis." According to his thesis such "continentalists" as Thomas Dewey and Senator Vandenberg, and for that matter the whole Republican Party, represent the resurgence of popular forces who have recaptured the citadels of national safety from the élite. Something is wrong in this picture.

Mr. Beard has no great difficulty in proving the futility of a great deal of our internationalism. The heroes of the Kellogg Peace Pact are perfect subjects for his satirical observations. Nor it is difficult to point to the present international situation as proof of the failure of this internationalism. "Nearly every evil that was inconceivable in internationalist ideology in 1919 came to pass within the span of twenty years." Mr. Beard is willing to leave the question of the cause of this failure undecided. Perhaps internationalism was based upon "misconceptions respecting the nature and propensities of men and of nations." Perhaps the internationalists had merely "not adopted the correct approach to the goal they had set before themselves." The first explanation suggests that all attempts at international order are futile. The second explanation might prompt the elaboration of a more effective approach to the problem. But evidently Mr. Beard does not consider a choice between these two explanations necessary, since in any event tradition has determined the orthodoxy of our continentalist foreign policy.

It is to Mr. Beard's credit that he does not obscure the moral indifferentism which his policy involves. He declares that it is the duty of "public officials, especially the President and the Secretary of State, speaking in the name of the whole nation, to abstain from denouncing or abusing foreign states, good or bad, with whom diplomatic relations are maintained." He is quite right that a consistent policy of isolationism would involve just such an attitude, and it would be well in this hour, in which we face one of the greatest tragedies of European history, if Mr. Beard's less astute fellow-isolationists were able to understand and admit the moral implications of their position.

Mr. Buell does not seek to deny the isolationism of the Founding Fathers, though he casts some doubt upon its consistency. But he rightly doubts its relevance for our own day. His book is a closely reasoned and fully documented account of the power of America in an interdependent world and of the problems America would face in an anarchic world. He does not deny the failure of our excursions into "internationalism" since the World War. He attributes this failure to our divided mind. We had on the one hand a strong impulse to participate in a more decent world organization and, more recently, to stem the tide of authoritarian politics and the economics of Autarkie. But the isolationist impulses of our youth remained as vestigial remnants in our foreign policy and were reinforced by the comparative security of our continental position and of our economic power. "As a result of this unresolved conflict, the foreign policy of the United States has been full of inconsistencies and hesitations, which inevitably had an unsettling effect upon the world situation." In the world community America is a giant with infantile obsessions.

This divided mind revealed itself very clearly at the London Economic Conference, which we wrecked. "We adopted nationalistic methods of recovery as did every other power, trying to profit at the expense of others." While "Cordell Hull continues to preach the necessity of world order and understanding, his own country gives only lip-service to principles which it may yet openly repudiate." We lectured the world on the need of disarmament, but we refused to participate in any scheme of collective security which might make disarmament feasible. Several times we were driven very close to the minimal responsibility of promising to consult with other nations in the case of aggression, but in the end we always repudiated even such minimal obligations. We would not support "cooperative action in support of the anti-war pact of the Nine-Power Treaty," but the renunciation of the trade agreement with Japan was popular among us, and "it would not be difficult for some cynics to believe that the American people would support an old-fashioned war with Japan rather than participate in a system of international sanctions." Mr. Buell might have added that we are ready to spend untold billions defending ourselves against triumphant Nazism but are not willing to prevent its triumph.

Our divided mind revealed itself as recently as the invasion of Finland. The Senate came within three votes of abrogating our relations with Russia, but we would not give the Finns effective aid lest it might involve us in war. Our President satisfies the conscience of one-half of the nation by roundly denouncing the dictators while he is prevented by the apprehensions of the other half from doing anything in particular.

But this criticism is not the main purpose of Mr. Buell's book. Positively he seeks to prove that it is impossible for America to be prosperous in an impoverished world or healthy in an anarchic one. The barter system which fascist nations are introducing into world economy will seriously affect our economic life. We cannot even use our power to prevent such a system from spreading to South America and to establish a "continental" economy of self-sufficiency of our own, for we cannot absorb the surpluses of South America and cannot dispense with the rubber and other raw products of Africa and Asia. We imagine that we can prevent by a cash policy the kind of problem in which our credits to the Allies in the World War involved us. But as a consequence of our present policy we shall probably accumulate about "twenty-five billion dollars' worth of gold for which we have no domestic use. We lost ten billion dollars invested in the inter-Allied debt in the first World War; as a result of the second we may lose the larger part of twenty-five billion dollars' worth of gold. No doubt we shall again denounce the foreigner for such a result." Incidentally that gold would give us a tremendous opportunity to establish a stable international-currency scheme after the war; but we shall probably shy away from the risks and obligations of such an enterprise.

In terms of domestic politics Mr. Buell believes, I think rightly, that failure to take a positive attitude toward the preservation of democratic values "runs the risk of undermining the moral basis of our democracy." With no common faith to hold us together we shall have to seek unity and ward off the disintegrating force of warring creeds among us by coercive means. That will land us in fascism. In foreign politics the impulse to protect our continent in a warring and anarchic world will land us in a gigantic navalism. In economic life even our comparatively high self-sufficiency will not prevent the deterioration of our living standards if we seek, or are forced, to live on our own resources.

Mr. Buell's positive program for world cooperation is a carefully elaborated scheme which would combine an effort to end the war with plans for the rehabilitation of Europe. Naturally it demands a very considerable degree of respon-

New and Important Borzoi Books

THOMAS MANN'S
THIS WAR

A masterly analysis of the German mentality which has produced and supported Hitlerism, written as only a great German and a great human being could write it. $1.00

by CHARLES A. BEARD
A FOREIGN POLICY FOR AMERICA

A masterly analysis of our foreign policy from Washington's time to our own day, and a program for the present that every American should ponder. $1.50

Coming June 3
FREEDOM'S BATTLE
by the Foreign Minister of Republican Spain
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

"One of the great figures of the epic struggle in Spain. What he has to say to the American public must shed much light on a period and a people of the utmost significance to modern history." —VINCENT SHEEAN

381 pages, with frontispiece, index, and map. $3.00

Comprehensive · Authoritative · Challenging ISOLATED AMERICA
by Raymond Leslie Buell

A brilliant survey of two decades of world diplomacy—a plea for considered American mediation in the present crisis—a detailed plan for the management of international affairs.

457 pages, with index and map. $3.00

"A must for the traveler, a joy to the old-timer."
—New York Herald Tribune 'Books'

OUR SOUTHWEST
by Erna Fergusson

A complete, informed, and informal account of the author's own Southwest—Arizona, New Mexico, west Texas, southern Colorado. "Encyclopedic in its packed detail." —New York Times Book Review

With jacket in four colors by Miguel Covarrubias, 24 photographs by Ruth Frank and others, and 5 maps. $3.50

MAPS show you the War at a Glance
AN ATLAS-HISTORY OF THE SECOND GREAT WAR
by J. F. Horrabin

51 maps and charts, with explanatory text, showing today's zones of action and tomorrow's danger points. Indispensable as your newspaper. $1.50

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · N · Y ·

HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT

He's the Lincoln Steffens of the common man . . .

and his autobiography is just published

If You Don't Weaken

by OSCAR AMERINGER

Foreword by Carl Sandburg

Oscar's robust and hilarious story of his sixty years of being an American is the best and only book of its kind since The Americanization of Edward Bok. "He has the skill and quizzical humility of Will Rogers or Mark Twain." —CARL SANDBURG. 476 pages, illustrated, $2.75

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY, N. Y.

HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT

IF you are appalled and shaken by the war which threatens to engulf America • Mankind's growing economic and psychological insecurity • The growing attacks on American democracy.

There is an important message for you

in YOU MIGHT LIKE SOCIALISM

by Corliss Lamont

Corliss Lamont is an independent worker for Socialism. He owes allegiance to no party and no faction. In this clear and absorbing book, his emphasis is on what Socialism would mean to America—how it could come about peacefully, how it would be administered, what it would accomplish. In these times, this affirmation of man's hope for a better world is especially heartening and significant. 302 pages 95c

Modern Age Books New York

sibility on the part of America. Mr. Buell, unlike Mr. Streit, makes careful distinctions between problems which Europe alone must solve and those which concern the world. He does not involve America in Europe as if America were a European nation. Yet he knows that Europe cannot solve its problems alone. His carefully worked-out plan of regional and more general federations is admirably conceived.

Unfortunately the whole of it is based upon the assumption that the Germans will fail. By so much he adopts the isolationist creed and expects us to help only in the rebuilding of Europe. The tragic events of recent days tend to invalidate this whole assumption. The Nazis may conquer Europe while we make plans for its rehabilitation after an Allied victory.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Money-Changer in the Temple

SHRINE OF THE SILVER DOLLAR. By John L. Spivak. Modern Age Books. $2.

TO JOHN L. SPIVAK journalism is the joy of discovering someone else's social-security number. But it is also a weapon, and Spivak chooses his victims with discrimination. In these pages the high priest of a political faith emerges as a small-town manipulator of other people's money. Spivak has explored the Coughlin financial network more thoroughly than any previous investigator, and some of his findings are reported to be the basis of federal inquiry. Coughlin's cynical bookkeeping, as interpreted by Spivak, is not unique; is in an imitation of practices in that business world which the priest so piously abuses. While some of Spivak's disclosures, such as the record of Coughlin's Wall Street adventures, are not entirely new, a good many represent fresh discovery, and the documentation is impressive. Coughlin, as Spivak shows in detail, collected funds for the non-political Radio League of the Little Flower and used them for the very political National Union for Social Justice. He converted his high-sounding Social Justice Poor Society into a prosaic holding company for the magazine Social Justice. While decrying the wickedness of corporate capitalism, he even tried to evade the unemployment-insurance laws designed to protect his own employees. There are, Spivak asserts, irregularities in the statement of ownership filed by Social Justice; and in a host of other ways expediency governs financial affairs at the Royal Oak palace of worship. Although church officials in Detroit are notoriously hostile to Coughlin—for personal as well as political reasons—they have skilfully avoided any head-on collision with him. Spivak interviewed one of the archdiocese's officials and heard the official case for nonintervention. It is not too convincing.

If the details are frequently minor and tortuous, the cumulative picture of Coughlin as a business man is important. But some major mysteries remain unsolved. While he unfolds Coughlin's talents as budget-balancer, Spivak is unable to show conclusively that Coughlin is financed by some very worldly agents as well as by the "pennies of the poor." Spivak records the links between the Christian Front street brawlers and the Nazis, but he is unable to identify Coughlin's immediate brain trust or to uncover decisive proof of the priest's collusion with the Nazis—except the clues which appear in his speeches. Spivak's inability to throw any startling light on Coughlin's inner circles is testimony to the secrecy in which "the mad monk of the shrine of the silver dollar"—as some of his less worshipful neighbors call him—shrouds his activities.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

There is a more serious limit to the value of these revelations. Spivak writes like a detective with a social conscience; and detective stories rarely depict characters in their full dimensions. It is important to see Coughlin in the drab garments of a finagler who has a lawyer. But it is just as misleading to see him as no more than "Silver Charlie" as to see him as the "microphonic apostle"—Coughlin's description of himself. Coughlin's categorical imperative is not, I suspect, the quest for gold; no one has presented evidence to show that he has used publicly collected funds for private luxury. There are deeper power drives in the man which can explain the hypnotic effect he wields over the lonely and the underprivileged. The nation has been flooded with embryo führers trying to make a living out of fascism, but Coughlin has politically outlived most of them. I fear that most of his followers, if they read Spivak's exposé—which they won't—would write off the financial tricks as political genius. After all, the Shrine itself resembles a gilded automat, with slots on every side where the faithful can deposit nickels for one of the priest's many "funds"; but those who come to pray remain to pay. Coughlin's real crimes are far more serious than those Spivak has revealed, and far less susceptible of reprisal. His rhetoric is the triumph of half-truth and falsehood; and the invocation of postal laws against him is a puny sort of reply. Spivak has explained how Social Justice is financed. That is worth knowing. But it does not explain why Social Justice is read, and why Tommy Gallagher hawks it on the streets.

JAMES WECHSLER

Profile of a Period

AN AMERICAN IN PARIS: PROFILE OF AN INTERLUDE BETWEEN TWO WARS. By Janet Flanner. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THE title of this book is misleading and its subtitle still more so. It is a heterogeneous collection of magazine articles about personalities, beginning with Queen Mary and ending with Hitler. In between come William Bullitt, Picasso, Lady Mendl (Elsie de Wolfe), the late Coty, Stravinsky, Lily Pons, the late Isadora Duncan, the late Edith Wharton, Elsa Maxwell, four dressmakers, seven prominent criminals, two spies, and the late M. Deibler, executioner. Apart from the criminals and Deibler, only four of these—Coty, Lily Pons, Gabrielle Chanel, and Paul Poiret—are French, and all but three are or were survivors of the period before the last war and, if still alive, are advanced in age. Chanel would seem to be one of the youngest if, as the author says, she is in her late forties. In that case she must have been in her teens when she first opened a hat shop in Paris and, according to Miss Flanner, she had previously had one at Deauville. Miss Flanner is tactful. She rarely mentions a date in her pieces about living women.

Cohen-Portheim, who knew Paris as few of his countrymen since Heinrich Heine have known it, said in one of his

NOW OPEN

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES

HONEYMOON PARADISE

9 CLAY TENNIS COURTS

8 HANDBALL COURTS

NO GREEN FEES IN JUNE

In the Heart of the Adirondacks

HALF MILE OF SAND BEACH

Write for Booklet "UM"

SCAROON MANOR HOTEL SCHROON LAKE N.Y.

NEW YORK OFFICES: MU. 2-4083, CO. 7-2471

QUISISANA CAMPS

On Lake Kezar in Center Lovell, Maine

Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.) in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.

QUAINT • RESTFUL • ROMANTIC • CULTURED COMPANIONSHIP

Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass, Brook Trout. Non-sectarian. Ownership-Management.

RATES FROM $35 A WEEK. AMERICAN PLAN. WRITE FOR BOOKLET

N. Y. Address, 42 West 35th Street. Telephone Wisconsin 7-0200

Nation readers are invited to attend the

Twenty-Sixth Annual Conference

of the

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

FRIDAY, JUNE 14th, TO SUNDAY, JUNE 16th, 1940

AT UNITY HOUSE, FOREST PARK, PA.

SUBJECT:

"RE-THINKING THE PROBLEMS OF SOCIAL CHANGE"

Among the speakers will be:

JOHN BAUER
PAUL BLANSHARD
LEROY E. BOWMAN
PHILLIPS BRADLEY
WALLACE J. CAMPBELL
LEWIS COREY
JOHN W. EDELMAN
JOHN T. FLYNN (Tentative)
FREDA KIRCHWEY
HARRY W. LAIDLER
NATHANIEL MINKOFF
WILLIAM PICKENS
JOSEPH SCHLOSSBERG
JOEL SEIDMAN
MARK STARR
NORMAN THOMAS
GOODWIN WATSON
NATHANIEL E. WEYL

For further information write to:

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

112 East 19th Street New York City

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Readers Service Division

The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue - New York

To New York City Newsstand Buyers

Until further notice The Nation will not be distributed on subway newsstands. However, readers who are not already regular Nation subscribers will continue to find The Nation on sale at all principal surface newsstands throughout the metropolitan area.

books that the question in the first decade after the last war was whether Paris would remain the intellectual capital of the world or become an international Luna Park. Miss Flanner's strangely assorted gallery of portraits is not representative of Paris even when, thanks to the foreign invasion, it was in danger of becoming an international Luna Park. Even then the real Paris was still there, and it was not the frivolous and pretentious cosmopolitan roundabout that Miss Flanner seems to have known.

The author's statement in her introduction that Picasso, Stravinsky, Proust, and James Joyce were in the twenties "the biggest forces that France possessed" is absurd. Very few Frenchmen have ever read a word of James Joyce. The French translation of "Ulysses" had a comparatively small sale, and what sale it had was mainly due to the fact that the book had been forbidden in England on the ground that it was obscene. Even Proust, the only Frenchman among Miss Flanner's Big Four, has many more followers in England than in France, as is natural. With all his great qualities, he is all by himself in a backwater off the main stream of French literary tradition, and his un-French style derives perhaps to some extent from Walter Pater and certainly from George Meredith, some of whose books he translated into French and whom he considered the greatest English novelist of the nineteenth century.

Miss Flanner goes on to say that "around and between" her Big Four "arose" certain "locals." One of these locals, if you please, is André Gide, probably the greatest of living writers of French and certainly one of the most original, who, if I am not mistaken, was born in 1869 and who made his name in the nineties with the publication of "La Porte Etroite." Miss Flanner puts him in the same category and generation as Cocteau and the surréalistes! She has taken too seriously the intellectual snobs and poseurs who flourished in the twenties in the cafes of Montparnasse but are now rapidly becoming extinct. She does not mention any of the men who have come to the front in French literature since the last war, such as Jules Romains and Roger Martin du Gard.

Indeed, Miss Flanner seems to know less about French literature than about dressmakers and international hostesses. For example, she says that in 1921, when she went to live in Paris, "the first volumes of the dying Proust's 'Du Coté de chez Swann' were appearing." Proust wrote only one volume with that title, the first of a series called "A la Recherche du Temps Perdu," and it was published in 1913. Incidentally, Robert de Montesquiou—how Miss Flanner's omission of the particle would have annoyed him!—was the original not of Swann, as Miss Flanner supposes, but of Charlus.

Nevertheless, although the book does not justify its titles—still less the extravagant claims made in the publisher's blurb—it is a brilliant piece of journalism. Miss Flanner's portraits are very amusing and often delightfully malicious. That of Mr. Bullitt is, in my opinion, one of the best. The article on Hitler, originally published in 1936, shows that Miss Flanner at that time saw farther than many of her contemporaries. The part of the book that pleased me most is that dealing with celebrated crimes, which is first-rate descriptive reporting and extremely interesting. I am not so sure as Miss Flanner is that Stavisky was murdered by the police. She does not appear to have realized that the Stavisky scandal was exploited by certain politicians for party ends.

ROBERT DELL

Soviet Economy

TWO SYSTEMS: SOCIALIST ECONOMY AND CAPITALIST ECONOMY. By Eugene Varga. International Publishers. $2.50.

EUGENE VARGA is not only a "former professor of economics at the University of Budapest," as the book cover states, but the leading economic expert of the Comintern. His book was written in 1937, and although a postscript was added in July, 1939, nothing hints at a possible change in the Communist concepts put forward in periods preceding the Russo-German pact. Certain sections of the book might now be rather embarrassing for the author—for instance, his outline of "capitalist exploitation with precapitalist methods" in the present partner's country.

The major objective of the book is to show that everything is splendid in Soviet Russia, whereas everything is wretched everywhere else. A remarkable number of statistical data are employed in comparing the development of the material forces of production, labor and market conditions, the progress of agriculture, and the like in the Soviet Union with the trends in capitalist countries. Mr. Varga sees an unprecedented improvement of the living standards of both workers and peasants in the Soviet Union, while exploitation and impoverishment in the other countries steadily increase. Moreover, the Soviet Union, in his view, is the only existing true democracy and a sworn foe of national oppression.

Those sections of the book which show how the utilization of both labor and capital in the Western countries lags behind the available resources are worth reading, though Mr. Varga's statistical evidence also often lags behind his theoretical assertions. The material on the Soviet Union employs largely "percentage statistics" and other inconclusive methods, and very rarely takes into account such factors as efficiency or quality of production, housing conditions, or the transport bottleneck. This, however, may be the fault of Russian statistics rather than of Mr. Varga. The book teems with quotations, Stalin's speeches being a preferred source. Certain sections of the book are fairly objective, while others are written in the usual propagandist slang of the Comintern.

In accordance with Lenin and Stalin, Mr. Varga considers the Soviet system not a perfect communism but "socialism," or a preliminary phase of communism, with public ownership being achieved but the class struggle still going on. It can of course be objected that the usual conception of socialism is a different one, and that neither public ownership, nor increased production, nor abolition of unemployment appears in itself to be a sufficient yardstick of socialism—see the Nazi economy or even the war economy of Western countries; moreover, the growth of production during the industrialization of a backward country has almost everywhere been rapid, and it is even arguable whether an increased pace of capital accumulation is necessarily an advantage.

ALBERT LAUTERBACH

IN BRIEF

COCKPIT OF THE REVOLUTION: THE WAR FOR INDEPENDENCE IN NEW JERSEY. By Leonard Lundin. Princeton University Press. $3.75.

In his Introduction to Mr. Lundin's book (Volume II in the Princeton History of New Jersey) Professor T. J. Wertenbaker writes, "Local in scope, his volume is national in its implications." But important as is the military history of the region, it is not allowed to obscure the picture of the locality. Following Beard, the author shows the economic motives behind the political divisions.

THE END OF THE ARMISTICE. By G. K. Chesterton. Sheed and Ward. $2.

This arrangement of essays and passages written at various dates between 1933 and Chesterton's death in 1936 and dealing with Hitlerism and attendant problems is really, for all its denunciation of Prussianism, a glorification of war. Starting his syllogism with a conclusion nobody now denies, shifting the middle term unobtrusively, casually alluding to a questionable premise as though it were an established link in an accepted argument, the author gives us what must be the best bad logic since the original sophists

DRAMA

A SERIES of very pretty little sets for "Romeo and Juliet" has been built upon the revolving stage of the Fifty-first Street Theater. That, however, is just about all that can said in favor of the new production. Even these pretty little sets are quite evidently hard to act in, and the two stars somehow manage to make Shakespeare's lyric tragedy seem a foolish and feeble play. Vivien Leigh is merely amiably inadequate—like a schoolgirl who has been majoring in elocution; Laurence Olivier is unfortunately a good deal worse than that. His voice is so cultured and polite that it carries the faint suggestion of a lisp; his strange posturings in tights are so deliberate and so exhibitionistic as to be almost indecent. His conception of the role—if conception it can be called—seems that of a ballet dancer, for he leaps continually about the stage and tops off every important speech either by some sort of pirouette or by extending his arms high above his head in a gesture which is not a lifting of the hands to heaven but a sort of voluptuous stretch. In fact, his whole performance suggests a star-crossed lover rather less than it suggests a young Tom in a bed of catnip. There have been times when I have agreed with those who maintained that any production of Shakespeare in which the lines could be heard was better than no production at all, but if I have ever expressed any such opinion in print it is hereby retracted.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

The Genius of Mexico

IT CANNOT constitute the equivalent of a trip to Mexico, a visit to the Modern Museum and its brilliant summer exhibition of Twenty Centuries of Mexican Art. The masks and sculptures, feather-mosaics and paintings, textiles, gold and silver ornaments, lacquer work, and pottery composing the vast, rich, bewildering display are morsels detached from the natural conditions from which they sprang—the temples, churches, and houses that formed their background, the figures and habits of the people whose representations they are; and it precisely is through its gift of the ability to perceive relations between works of art and the totality of the milieu that travel provides its priceless experiences. Especially the southern baroque art appears to disadvantage in the museum, being insufficiently strong in point of form to impose itself without the framework of the ornate churches. Still, one may doubt whether a mere trip to Mexico, even the most observant, could afford a view of the sublime, the gay and terrifying art of Mexico in its last two thousand years more inclusive than the one given by this authoritative and systematic show. Many spaces as well as centuries are covered by the exhibits. Effectively the directors have disposed sundry of their items on miniature terra-cotta terraces suggestive of temple steps; others among tiny models of the Mayan pyramids or in settings of photographs of ecclesiastical architecture. Comprehensively they have represented the three great realms of art which, various in value and style but conceivably the expressions of one spirit and one strain or soil, have revealed Mexico's aesthetic gift or genius to the world.

Of these, the earliest and most important is that unequaled find of the research which of late years has drawn a new, profounder past about the race. It is the art of pre-Columbian America: its representatives fill the museum's ground floor and overflow into its sculpture garden. Several high, shadowy cultures speak in it: the gentlest, most archaic in the realistic clay effigies exhibiting a grasp of human peculiarities oftentimes humorous, sometimes beautiful, as in the young Hauxtec goddess of limestone. Somewhat younger appear to be the sculptural masks, stone yokes, palms in jade, obsidian, basalt generally called Totonac and notable for their noble, tranquil beauty of proportion and sensitive modeling. They are portions of a hieratic art, adjusting naturalistic detail to decorative motives; apparently a means of holding converse with sullen tropical gods and placating them in the interests of tribe survival. The monumental art stamped with the horror of death mainly is Aztec and mournfully fascinating at an hour when a new Aztec empire has risen on the banks of the Rhine. Yet much else of this pre-Columbian art reflects a lust to grasp and know the mystery of life-and-death. Still, what overwhelms is the splendor of the sculptural designs and abstractions. These Amerindian cultures left us art equal to the greatest.

Representatives of the second of the three realms honoring Mexico occupy most of Story II: they are examples of the polychrome religious statuary, the altarpieces, silver monstrances and chasubles, and the portrait-painting of the viceregal period which plunged the conquered land "headlong into Western civilization." Like the Mexican baroque or churrigeuresque architecture, the definitely baroque expressions in this group are both softer and more outlandishly opulent than their European models. The "barbaric pearl and gold" makes one feel the prosperity of the church and the luxury of the great families in this land of maize and mines—also the imagination and religious feeling of the Indians.

As for the third of the realms: it is not the modern mural and easel painting up on the third floor. Certainly these Mexican murals are more vigorous than our own. Orozco's line often has power, and easel pictures such as Fernando Castillo's and Rufino Tamayo's possess grace of color and design. The section as a whole none the less disconcerts with a feeling of effort and inflation. No, the third of the important realms is that of the folk art: the bright fiesta masks, carnival gimcracks, boxes, platters, lacquer work of the mestizos and Indians profusely flanking the colonial and "modern" exhibits. Frequently manifesting a skilful craftsmanship, these objects have an enormous gaiety—and a ferocity—quite their own. To their order must be added two happy groups of paintings. One of them is the group representative of the primitive painting which flourished after the liberation from Spain had broken the European tradition. This work is delicate and unaffected in design and feeling: one of its masters, José Maria Estrada, must be considered a great portraitist. As for the other happy group, it is that of the free and imaginative crayons and washes of the schoolchildren coached in our own time by Best-Maugard. PAUL ROSENFELD

MUSIC

IN THE quiet opening phrases of the Brahms B-flat Piano Concerto my ears detect saccharine—which is to say that in spite of the quiet there is excess in the feeling; and in spite of the quiet there is also straining for impressiveness. But at least though it is excessive the feeling is genuine; though there is straining for effect the passage is quiet. This passage, however, is broken into by agitated phrases from the piano, which for all their noise mean absolutely nothing—so that there is no reason for them either in themselves or in relation to what preceded. And this wholly arbitrary succession of attempts now at one artificially contrived effect now at another is what one hears in the entire movement; this combination of saccharine and bombast is what one hears in the rest of the work, and again in the C minor Symphony; and it was a whole evening of bombast and saccharine that Toscanini offered at his Carnegie Hall concert with the N. B. C. Symphony.

At this concert, moreover, one heard that quiet opening measure of the orchestra, which should continue with quiet figuration from the piano, continue instead with Horowitz's heavily struck, widely spaced low b-flats in figuration which picked up speed and tapered off to piano. And this distention and overemphasis one continued to hear in almost every phrase that he played until the last movement. It was a sort of stylistic elephantiasis which appeared to be Horowitz's way of measuring up to the big music he was playing. And to someone for whom, as for Mr. Downes, the work is "the greatest of piano concertos" the performance would indicate "impressively [Horowitz's] growth as interpreter." But I cannot imagine anything worse for the actual weaknesses of the work than this exaggeration of them, this piling of excess on excess. And one result was that in place of the extraordinary beauty of sound that Horowitz produces from the piano there was, in the first two movements, the harsh, jangling sound of all this pounding and crashing.

Nor did the thick, heavy orchestration of the two works permit Toscanini to produce, except for a few moments, the beauty of orchestral sound and texture that one would have heard if he had played music more worthy of the talents and energies that were wasted that evening. Some day Toscanini may forget about Brahms long enough to play the concertos of Mozart, and may forget about his relatives, his friends, his friends' relatives long enough to play these concertos with musicians as great as himself—with a Schnabel, a Szigeti.

The significance a piece of music has for us depends on how its sounds are brought into relation to one another in time and force; and it is in this respect that performances differ and that the differences may be important. There are works—Schubert's great C major Symphony is one of them—whose significance may be heightened and made more impressive by the performance of a Toscanini but cannot be destroyed by the performance of a Frederick Stock. So one may hear in the new Columbia set of this symphony made by Stock with his Chicago orchestra (M-403, $11), which in addition offers recording that is poorly balanced, excessively reverberant, and in other ways unattractive (and surfaces are annoying again). This is the poorest of the three versions of the work that are now available; and the best, I think, is still the Victor set made by Boult with the B. B. C. Symphony four or five years ago, which is also a little cheaper.

On the other hand, I know from Schnabel's performances the extraordinary significance that is in Beethoven's "Diabelli" Variations; but if I had had to judge by Egon Petri's performance at his recent recital I would have thought the work was an interminable bore. I stayed to hear Petri play the first two of Chopin's Etudes Opus 10; and what I heard in each was a tremendous bravura flourish at the beginning, followed by fussy nuances of pace that made things easier but apparently not easy enough for mere perfection in the difficult chromatic passages of No. 2. I have heard Petri do better: he played as a better musician in the National Orchestral Association's performances of Mozart's Concerto K. 537 and Beethoven's No. 5—though not as a musician of consistently good taste in the Mozart, nor as a great musician in the Beethoven; he has recorded some fine performances of Beethoven sonatas; and he does a brilliant virtuoso job in the trashy Liszt-Busoni Spanish Rhapsody, which he has recorded for Columbia with the Minneapolis Symphony under Mitropoulos (X-163, $4.50). This is the sort of music to which Mitropoulos's explosively dynamic style appears to be suited. Recording is excellent.

The Metronome All-Star Nine are excellent in the ensembles of "All-Star Strut" (Columbia 35389), and there are fine short solos by Stacy, Jack Teagarden, and a few of the others, but the rapid succession of these solo bits makes the record unsatisfying. There are also good solos in the Benny Carter "Sleep" and "Slow Freight" (Vocalion 5399). And enjoyable for a moment or two, but tedious for two sides, is the Basie piano style backed by the rest of the superb Basie rhythm section in "Dupree Blues" and "Red Wagon" (Decca 3071).

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at the London School of Economics, delivered one of the principal addresses at the recent Bournemouth conference of the British Labor Party.

CHARLES MALCOLMSON is a Washington newspaperman formerly on the staff of the Philadelphia Record.

JOSEPH FREEMAN was for many years on the staff of the New Masses. He is author of "The Soviet Worker" and "An American Testament."

RORERT S. ALLEN is coauthor with Drew Pearson of the syndicated column Washington Merry-Go-Round.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, has written many articles for The Nation concerned with the conflict of morals and politics.

Letters to the Editors

Puerto Rico Pays

Dear Sirs: To your recent articles on Puerto Rico I should like to append this footnote to bring into the picture factors which will have a decisive influence on the destiny of the Island. No visitor to Puerto Rico can help noticing the activity in the harbor of San Juan. The airport at Isla Grande and the dredging and construction projects are plainly visible as the ship points its prow into Morro channel. Probably it occurs to few tourists to ask who is paying for it all. In these days of easy money for all kinds of projects, perhaps they take it for granted that some alphabetical agency in Washington is undertaking the construction of a modern Gibraltar here.

No one is happier than I to see San Juan coming back to something like its former self. From Drake in 1597 to Sampson in 1898 many have tried to capture the city, but none have succeeded. Yet enemy fleets could not leave that fortress behind and operate freely in the Caribbean. Some of us interested in national defense have been wondering for years when the army and navy would wake up and see what the Spaniards saw as early as 1533—that Puerto Rico is the key to the defense of the Western Hemisphere.

But leaving history aside, who is paying for the new defensive grandeur of Puerto Rico? The report of Governor Blanton Winship for the year ending June 30, 1939, says:

> The Insular contributions to the national defense program in Puerto Rico have been very substantial. Among them are: (1) Authorization by the Legislature of the cession if Isla Grande and adjoining reclaimed lands in Miraflores Bay, in San Juan Harbor, to the federal government for use as a naval base and for other naval purposes—value of this land is estimated at $10,000,000; (2) dredging San Juan harbor to provide a channel and anchorage base deep enough for heavy war craft; (3) construction of a runway nearly a mile long for planes at Isla Grande, and similar runways on Mona Island, Culebra Island, Vieques Island, and at other points in Puerto Rico; (4) construction of a large modern graving dock at San Juan. . . .

Governor Winship pointed with pride to this accomplishment. The War and Navy departments pat the Island politicians on the back. If the people of Puerto Rico share this satisfaction, it is at a price.

When the air base at Pensacola needs new runways or when the submarine base at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, needs dredging, the War and Navy departments do not ask the state of Florida or the state of New Hampshire to pay for it. And if they did, the governors of Florida and New Hampshire would certainly object to the unwarranted taxation of their people to raise money for such purposes, which should be paid for by the country as a whole. But the people of these states elect their governors. A governor of Puerto Rico appointed by the President of the United States is there not to take care of the interests of the island but, or so their duty has been interpreted by certain incumbents, by hook or crook to spend the Island's meager revenues on projects which to the Puerto Rican mean nothing.

Only one-third of the Puerto Rican budget is devoted to education. I wish you would ask Mr. Ickes what proportion is being spent for national defense. And ask the Puerto Rican Commissioner of the Interior how much extra money he is spending to widen insular roads so that anti-aircraft batteries and their trucks may have no difficulties in negotiating the curves. How much more will the maintenance of those roads cost after they have been subjected to the extra heavy traffic of military activities? The Governor forgot to thank the Puerto Ricans for that.

Admittedly the increased garrisons will benefit the Island by spending their pay there, but why not recruit there the men needed for those units? That would have been a great help—economically by taking hundreds of men off the relief rolls; culturally by giving them the opportunities for self-education that the army and navy have to offer.

RODOLFO O. RIVERA

Durham, N. C., May 14

Peace Lovers vs. War Lovers

Dear Sirs: I have often read Mr. Villard's articles with approval, but the one in your issue of May 11 is in my opinion sheer hypocrisy. I can tell him some reasons why Great Britain is not prosecuting the war with the "strength and ability of the Nazi machine," with the "dash, lightning-like strategy, and tremendous organizational ability" of the Germans. It is because the nation has been weakened by peace talk such as Mr. Villard advocates and by a belief in the League of Nations. It is because it had a Labor government which did absolutely nothing in preparation for war. It is because it has been under a Chamberlain-Tory-fascist government which has been friendly to Hitler.

It is certainly not consistent or reasonable for a man to preach peace and then profess such admiration for the efficiency of the dogs of war, to educate a nation to love peace and then expect it to fight a wild cat with the ferocity of a cave man, to expect a peace-loving nation to go into war with the stomach of a people who have been taught to love and glorify war. Let us at least be honest, and admire either the effects of a love of peace on a nation or the effects of a love of war, and not profess one and applaud the other.

ETHEL E. MIST

Windsor Locks, Conn., May 16

A "Must" Book

Dear Sirs: Your reviewer's description, in your May 4 issue, of Erika Mann's recent and important book, "The Lights Go Down," as a "kind of idyl of babes in the woods beset by marauding wolves" comes as a shock. Miss Mann presents a poignant and powerful picture of the effect of Nazism on all the people of Germany. Aristotle defined art as the expression of the general through the particular. Miss Mann, recognizing that generalized statistics bring home nothing to the reader, has chosen the method of art but first used painstaking scholarship to gather her facts.

This, I submit, is a "must" book. Anyone who is willing to open his eyes and his mind to the dreadful impact of Nazism on all the peoples in Germany should by all means read this book. It is not propaganda. It does not concern the Jews. It pulls up the curtain on Nazi Germany and shows the dreadful facts behind that curtain.

JAMES N. ROSENBERG

New York, May 17

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is idexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

RESORTS

UNCAS LODGE A Camp for Adults

- Beautiful Private Lake
- Excellent Sports Facilities

Musicals — Dramatics. Direction, Saul Aarons, Composer "Picket Line Priscilla," of TAC.

Special Decoration Day Week-end—4 days $12
New Low June Rate: $18.00 Weekly

DIANA & ABE BERMAN, Uncasville, Conn.
Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5

STAY AND PLAY AT

MAUD'S SUMMER-RAY

NORTH BRANCH SULL. CO., N. Y.

Tele: Callicoon 95

PRIVATE LAKE	RUMBA — BAR
ALL SPORTS	SOCIAL DOINGS
BASEBALL	DANCING
VOLLEY BALL	DRAMATICS
TENNIS	MARIONETTES
HANDBALL	MUSICALES

Special Decoration Day Festivities

Special Decoration Day R. R. Rates
DAILY — BUSSES DIRECT
Erie R. R. to Callicoon
For Information: DIckens 2-5786

Pine Hill Farm House

PLEASANT VALLEY, N. Y. Dutchess County
100 acres of secluded farm and woodland. Modern conveniences, open fireplace, homey atmosphere. Badminton, handball, boating, fishing, swimming. June rate, $18. Phone: Pleasant Valley 2741. Louis Sakow.

PRIMROSE FARM
New City, N. Y.

30 miles from New York City. Swimming, Tennis, $30 Weekly; $5 Daily—Open All Year
ROSE ROMAINE
New City, N. Y.
Telephone New City 2156

BARLOW FARMS
SHERMAN, CONN.

Your nearest and friendliest home for week-ends and vacation. Swimming, tennis, fishing. Excellent food.
Free Booklet
New Milford 756-J-3

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

PIONEER YOUTH CAMP

Rifton, N. Y. Walter Ludwig, Director

17th SUMMER, PROGRESSIVE CAMPING
*BOYS-GIRLS, 6-14 YEARS. SMALL AGE GROUPS

All Camp Sports, Painting, Clay Modeling, Woodwork, Dramatics, Folk Dancing, Music. Creative use of historic Hudson Valley. Mature division heads and counsellors

Non-Sectarian Non-Profit-Making

Nine-Week Season, $150.

Few Scholarship Rates Available on Application
Address: Mrs. Frima Frumes, Camp Registrar
PIONEER YOUTH OF AMERICA, INC.
219 W. 29th St., N. Y. C. PE 6-3055

*WORK CAMP FOR 15 TO 17 YEAR STUDENTS. SPECIAL RATES.

Camp CHI-WAN-DA

FOR BOYS and GIRLS
ULSTER PARK, N.Y.

On the Mountain Lake Esopus overlooking the Beautiful Hudson River

We present a modern cultural environment for your children. All cabins with latest improvements. Reasonable rates. For full information, write or call for booklet.

JACOB I. DOROSHKIN, Director
[illegible] 5th Ave., MU 2-4218—DI 2-7432

MEADOW LARK CAMP

A small camp with happy home atmosphere in the Berkshires — at Monterey, M[illegible] For boys and girls from [illegible] to 12. Limited enrollment. Under trained and competent supervision. Apply Hedwig B. Lefarth, M. A., Director, 267½ West 11 St., New York, N. Y.

SUMMER RENTALS

Westport, Conn. — Stonybrook Colony — charming house, and bungalow. Swimming, tennis, children's play groups, easy commutation, ideal vacation spot. Also acreage for sale. TRafalgar 7-4679, mornings.

Delightful modern cottages, fireplaces, all improvements, tennis, bathing, badminton, secluded country, commanding distance. WA 9-7793; Peekskill 3515 M 2.

Free Acres, N. J. 50 min. City. Luxurious bungalow; acre woodland; double garage. 4 rooms, porch, tiled bath. Antiques. All improvements. Community swimming pool. Children's day camp. $325 season. Gitnick, CH 3-9476.

Cottages in small congenial colony—Wallkill, N. Y. 160 beautiful acres, river, swimming, fishing, tennis court, sports. Secluded. 70 miles from N. Y. Phone TR 8-5761 from 9-12 or KI 6-0988 from 5-8.

3-room bungalow, electricity, gas, frigidaire; swimming, tennis. Hersh, Long Pond (near Girl Scout Camp) Mahopac, N. Y.

Beautiful 4-room cottage in mountains. Modern improvements; in a colony of writers and intellectuals. $250. Call Rappaport, KI 6-1856.

Greenwood Lake, N. Y. 3-room apartment; 7-, 8-room houses; attractively furnished, modern improvements, secluded, spacious grounds, accessible. TR 7-0427, Gross, 222 West 77th Street.

Bungalows, studios, all conveniences, electrical refrigeration; tennis, swimming, 10 minutes walk to stores; 30 miles from N. Y. Primrose Farm, New City, N. Y.

Would your Club or Group like to have new country quarters, accommodate 30 adults, swimming, tennis, baseball, etc., on own grounds. Excellent commuting Manhattan. Low rental. Grudin, Nanuet, N. Y. Nanuet 2476.

Attractive bungalow, 4 rooms, completely furnished, on hillside overlooking beautiful countryside; swimming, tennis, near Peekskill. $400 season. Tel. WO 2-1445.

Mahopac, N. Y. Cottage for rent, fully equipped, desirable Jewish community. Tel. Edward Loeb, SE 3-1208, after 5.

SUMMER HOME TO SHARE

Beautiful private modern country home, Bucks Co., Penn. Secluded, spacious. Woodlands; convenient to New York. Family of well-known artist will welcome another family. Summer rental $200. Box 1244, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT OR SALE

Artistic community. 3-room bungalow, screened porch, all improvements, fireplace. All sports. 27 miles N. Y. Children's day camp. Reasonable. TO 2-1204 before 9 a.m. or after 6 p.m.

LAND FOR SALE

Acreage, Building lots for sale. Swimming privileges. 30 miles from N. Y. C. Box 1243, c/o The Nation.

FOR SALE

BERKSHIRES. FARM BARGAINS

New roads opening hitherto inaccessible spot between Austerlitz and New Lebanon (near Stockbridge, Mass.). Colonial houses $2,000 up; land $15 acre. Terms. Scenery unexcelled in all New England.

SCOFIELD FARM AGENCY, Chatham, N. Y.

LECTURE

THE GROUP FORUM
Meets at Hotel Peter Stuyvesant—2 West 86th St.

Tuesday Eve., MAY 28, at 8:45 P. M.
LUDWIG LORE speaks on
The World's War and the United States

Tuesday Eve., JUNE 4, at 8:45 P. M.
Gen. Wm. C. RIVERS speaks on Europe's War and America's Security

BOOK

IT IS YOUR LIFE
Keep Healthy ■ Stay Young ■ Live Long
By M. M. ROSENBERG, M.D.

Fortify our First Line of National defense—the good health of every American citizen—by [illegible]ing a copy immediately.

[illegible] chapters, 475 pages, illustrated. Price $2.50

THE SCHOLASTIC BOOK PRESS
158 E. [illegible] St., New York Or Your Bookseller

LANGUAGES

BARGAIN PHONOGRAPH COURSES. All makes. We sell, rent, purchase, exchange. Mail Orders. Booklet N. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 18 East 41st Street, N. Y. C.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

Handwriting scientifically analyzed. Detailed, sincere, helpful. $3. Questions answered. Send 15 pen-written lines. State age, sex. Dr. Alfred Reiss, Ph.D. Formerly Heidelberg. 1775 Broadway, N. Y. City.

SITUATION WANTED

Wanted job as liaison man. Hours no object. No selling. $10 weekly. Employer must have "Nashooma." Gorden, c/o Linotyper, 114 East 11 St., N. Y. C.

College girl, literature major, desires summer position in country; manuscript typist, highest recommendations. Call DI 6-5623 after 4 or Box 1245, c/o The Nation.

NO ORANGES UNTIL NOVEMBER

"Abnormal weather in January prevented summer oranges. Old crop exhausted. Will start shipping new crop November first. Will have seedless Limes during July-August-Sept." A. H. Burket, Sebring, Fla.

WEARING APPAREL

For values, not label, try Miss Goodman's Original Model Clothes! Distinctive apparel, Hats at Special prices. 474 7th Ave. (36th St.) LA 4-0413. Dresses from $12.75, Hats from $5.00.

APARTMENT TO SUBLET

Facing Gramercy Park, large duplex interesting old furnished apartment; fireplace, library, records. Sublet sacrifice. Ernest L. Meyer, GR 3-0481.

FURNISHED STUDIO

Exceptionally large; Hudson breezes; artistically furnished, private bath; maid. Steinway; telephone; central location; complete privacy; quiet. SU 7-9880.

ROOMS FOR RENT

Brooklyn, near St. George Hotel. Large, sunny room, completely renovated house, housekeeping, garden, all subways. Reasonable. MA 4-8688.

114 St., 508 W.—Arizona, $5 and up. Opposite Columbia; Luxurious studios, housekeeping; 24-hour elevator, switch-board service; special monthly rates.

Furnished room in private apartment, family of 3; near Columbia; semi-private bath. $6. King, UNiversity 4-5783.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JUNE 1, 1940 NUMBER 22

The Shape of Things

THE TOLERANCE SHOWN IN BRITAIN SINCE the beginning of the war for various pacifist and pro-Nazi groups has come to an end. Revelations of the active treachery of fascist bodies in Holland have made imperative preventive measures which, unhappily, are bound to affect the innocent as well as the guilty. Clearly, a majority of the Germans now being interned in Britain are genuine refugees with every interest in the defeat of Hitler. But the Nazis have not scrupled to introduce their own agents under the guise of refugees, often with identity papers taken from men they have murdered in their concentration camps. More important is the action taken in the past week against domestic enemies, including Sir Oswald Mosley and his British Union of Fascists. This party has made little headway with its propaganda, but it has recruited some thousands of members, including a considerable number of out-and-out gangsters prepared to go to any lengths to turn Britain into a fascist country. Further measures have also been taken both in England and Eire to check the I. R. A., which now appears to be directly allied with Berlin. Another important arrest is that of Archibald Ramsay, M.P., a well-connected landowner, an active anti-Semite, and a vociferous rooter for Franco. So far the only action taken against the Communist Party has been the arrest of one leading member and the ban on a demonstration —which suggests that even in this grave hour the government is not yielding to panic. Communist propaganda is irritating but has cut little ice. Nor are party members likely to give direct aid to Hitler by way of espionage or sabotage. Full-fledged treachery is apt to hide behind more respectable and patriotic fronts than communism.

*

THREATENED BY INVASION AND FACED BY the possibility of a military defeat which would leave them impoverished and enslaved, the British people have grimly accepted a suspension of their liberties. The Emergency Powers Defense Act has been loosely described here as a measure of dictatorship for Premier Churchill. But the extraordinary powers it confers have been granted, not to a single person, but to a government representative of all major parties. Moreover, they have been granted by a Parliament which retains the right to question, to criticize, and to overthrow the government. Hence it is unnecessary to assume that Britain has abandoned democracy forever. If defeat comes, there can be little doubt that permanent dictatorship will be the British lot, but if the present acute danger is overcome, we have good reason to suppose that restoration of liberties will follow. The special powers enabling the government to conscript labor and property are all the more necessary now because under the Chamberlain government production had been allowed to fall far behind the tempo demanded by total war. According to the London Economist, planning was frequently confined to the final stages of production with little coordination of the equally vital sub-contracting industries. Moreover, only the most elementary steps had been taken to mobilize Britain's large reserves of labor. Yet it is in the factories that the war will be lost or won. It is hardly logical to conscript lives for the battlefields while leaving the home front to hit-or-miss methods of organization.

*

THE PRESIDENT'S SUNDAY NIGHT FIRESIDE talk on national defense did two things extremely well. It dispelled several persistent myths about the present state of our military establishment, and it effectively quashed the hopes of reactionaries that the new defense program could be used as a means of liquidating the New Deal. Taken as a whole the speech was a moving and convincing presentation of the position of America in the world and of the measures necessary to strengthen that position. But the President omitted one major theme that should in our opinion have been stressed. He said nothing at all about the urgent need of speeding up and multiplying our aid to the Allies. An American defense program cannot be realistically considered apart from the outcome of the war in Europe. If the Allies win, our problem is wholly different from that which will face us in the event of a Nazi victory. If the Allies win, the magnitude and tempo of our defense measures can be enormously decreased: we shall have one coast to defend instead of two; the protection of the southern half of the hemisphere will be less difficult and less urgent; Canada will continue as a vast safety zone instead of becoming an exposed frontier; our trade will not be threatened with totalitarian methods of attack. All other considerations aside, an Allied victory will be worth many billions to the United States in battleships and tanks and bombers. The President should have explained clearly to the whole country that aid to the Allies is more than an altruistic expression of sympathy for the victims of Nazi aggression; it is an integral part of a program of American defense—the first and most important emergency measure in such a program.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE BELIEF THAT SHEER SELF-INTEREST should persuade this country to help the Allies in every way possible "short of war" is beginning to spread. The Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, organized by William Allen White, has attracted support from influential citizens of all shades of political opinion. They agree that "the time has come when the United States should throw its economic and moral weight on the side of the nations of Western Europe." The question of how effective aid can be rendered is, however, a difficult one, for time is of the essence in the present acute danger of the Allies. Thus lifting the ban on credit or even the free gift of planes would be of little use until aircraft production is further increased. The latest authoritative figures place at 2,300 the number of planes actually delivered to the Allies since the outbreak of the war. But these are deliveries on this side of the ocean, and there is reason to believe that shortage of freight space has delayed shipments to Europe. This problem too will not be solved by credit. Nevertheless, we believe that the Johnson Act ought to be repealed if only by way of encouraging the Allies and removing their fear of exhausting dollar resources. In this connection we note that the latest Gallup poll now records a 51 per cent vote in favor of selling aircraft on credit. Probably an even larger proportion would be willing to make loans available for food supplies. The millions of refugees and the devastation of some of the most productive land of France have created a grave new problem. Large-scale assistance in this direction from an America burdened with surplus crops would be sensible as well as humane.

*

THE $1,120,000,000 RELIEF BILL PASSED BY the House last week was, despite two good amendments, even worse than last year's outrageous measure. Heed was given to the President's plea for elimination of the clause limiting to $50,000 the federal contribution to any WPA project. The provision in the present law requiring unpaid furloughs of WPA workers who have been employed eighteen months was modified by exempting heads of families forty-five years of age or older. But the remaining reactionary features of the present law were retained. The ban on theater projects remains, as does the clause discriminating against aliens. Stampeded by the current "fifth column" hysteria, the House went even farther and attached an amendment requiring all WPA employees to submit affidavits that they are members of neither the Communist Party nor the German-American Bund. The dangerous implications of this amendment can hardly be exaggerated. Denial of relief to aliens is thoroughly inhumane, but when this restriction is extended to Americans belonging to minority groups not in themselves illegal it strikes at the very heart of the Bill of Rights. We trust that the Senate will perform the function for which it was created and protect the country against the hasty action of the House.

*

THE APPOINTMENT OF SUMNER T. PIKE TO the SEC, succeeding Commissioner George C. Matthews, has received the blessing of Wall Street, but a blessing faintly tinged with suspicion. Mr. Pike fits almost exactly the specifications of investment bankers and utility magnates. He is a "practical" business man with wide experience both in Wall Street and in the oil industry. He has been a member of the famous utility-engineering firm of Stone and Webster and a vice-president of Case, Pomeroy, one of the most respected houses in the Street. Yet some of the comments in the financial columns betray a slight uneasiness because Mr. Pike's appointment is known to be approved not only by Leon Henderson but by that horrendous team of Corcoran and Cohen. Conversely, this fact is reassuring to liberals, to whom Mr. Pike's background does not, by itself, constitute a recommendation. During the past year the new commissioner has been assisting Harry Hopkins as a "dollar-a-year" man, and since February he has been representing the Department of Commerce on the TNEC. In this work he has impressed his colleagues by his independence and open-mindedness. There is an old adage about poachers turned gamekeepers, the truth of which, we hope, will be confirmed in this instance.

*

IN RELIGIOUS AS IN LABOR CASES THE requirement of a police permit for otherwise lawful activities is easily abused and may become a means of censorship and suppression. It is on these grounds—similar to those in the Jersey City case—that Justice Roberts for a unanimous Supreme Court has reversed the conviction of three members of Jehovah's Witnesses. They had been found guilty under a Connecticut law of soliciting funds for religious purposes in New Haven without a permit and playing before Roman Catholics a phonograph record attacking their church. On the first count Justice Roberts said it would be an interference with religious liberty to permit a state authority to define what is a religious cause and to make the solicitation of funds for a religious purpose dependent on the grant of a license by such authority. On the second count the court made it clear that it was upholding only the right to persuade, not a right to incite breaches of the peace. It found "no assault or threatening of bodily harm, no truculent bearing, no intentional discourtesy, no personal abuse . . . only an effort to persuade a willing listener to buy a book . . . in the interest of what Cantwell [the Jehovah's Witness preacher], however misguided others may think him, conceived to be true religion." The truth is not safe where government may decide what is error.

*

JOHN STRACHEY'S DECISION TO SEVER relations with the Communists is more than just another casualty among the fellow-travelers. His popularizations of Communist doctrine have been a major educational force for the party, and if he was not a blood brother in the fraternity he served as a valuable liaison between the comrades and the outside world. Faithful to the traditional delicacy of Daily Workers everywhere, the British Communist organ has rushed into print with the tardy revelation that Strachey was something of a rotter all along, but whether or not his going is a loss to the party is less important than the reasons for the break. Strachey still maintains the anti-war position which he has held since hostilities began, and in his criticism of the Communists, which appears in the New Statesman and Nation of April 27, he agrees substantially with them "as to the general character of the war." In doing so, it seems to us, he refutes the Worker's innuendo that his attack is motivated by considerations of personal safety. Strachey believes that the Communists have moved from opposition to the "imperialist war" to a definite interest in a German victory; that they are prepared "for the sake of what they consider the interest of the Soviet Union, to give way to Hitler to any extent." In their reply the editors of the Worker deny all bias with that Communist objectivity that equates the British seizure of Iceland with the German seizure of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and Luxemburg. But, they point out, "working-class fighters must judge the line of fight and where to strike the hardest blows. Ours are directed against the enemy nearest to us, Chamberlain and Co." That may be good Lenin and Liebknecht, as the comrades say it is, but they should not be outraged if the "enemy nearest to them" treats them as effective allies of Hitler and Co.

IMMEDIATE JAPANESE ENTRY INTO THE WAR on the side of Germany is being demanded by numerous fascist groups in Tokyo. Supported by a considerable section of the press, the powerful East Asia Construction League, headed by Admiral Suetsugu, former Home Secretary, has urged the government to abandon its policy of neutrality and "take its place with the totalitarians." The drive gained impetus when Germany announced early last week that it was not interested in the East Indies problem. This the Japanese extremists have interpreted as a "blank power of attorney" giving Japan a free hand in the East. It is doubtful, however, whether Japan is strong enough to launch an attack on the East Indies while deeply involved in China. Consequently we may expect further efforts to obtain a truce, or even a peace agreement, with China. The chief barrier to Japanese expansion in the South Seas at the expense of the Western powers, apart from involvement in China, is admittedly the United States. Although this country has made no threats and issued no clear statement of policy covering that area, the presence of the American fleet in the western Pacific speaks the language which Japan understands best.

Britain's Peril

SINCE their drive to the Channel, the Nazis have been smacking their lips audibly over the prospect of invading and devastating England. At Calais, where the straits are little more than twenty miles wide, they can see the white cliffs of Dover; and from this point their fast bombers can reach London in a bare half-hour. Little wonder that they should be hoping to succeed where Napoleon failed, armed as they are with weapons of which he never dreamed. Nevertheless, even if the German army succeeds in defeating the Allied forces bottled up in Flanders, it is still likely to find the task of invading England a formidable one.

It may be that the present loud talk is mainly propaganda intended to encourage defeatism in Britain and to curb the dispatch of reinforcements to France. If Weygand's attempt to cut the Nazi corridor fails, the logical next step for the Germans would be to turn south again in an effort to capture Paris and force France to make a separate peace. They would then be able to command the whole Channel, increasing their chances of landing an army in England and, in any case, placing them in a position to subject the island kingdom to long-distance siege.

As long as the British navy survives—and it is still very far from being put out of commission—the landing of an expeditionary force in decisive numbers on British shores presents a problem which even German military efficiency and daring may be unable to solve. It is true that, with German bombers based on the French coast and with the possibility of mounting heavy guns near Calais, the Straits of Dover have become a dangerous spot for warships. Probably British battleships and large cruisers will have to be kept away, but in any case their principal job is to guard the wider expanses of the North Sea. In the narrow waters of the Channel the watch will be maintained by swift destroyers, motor torpedo-boats (which are not a German monopoly), and submarines. In addition, Nazi transports heading for the British coast would be exposed to mine fields, air attack, and coastal batteries. Unless, therefore, the Germans can establish absolute air supremacy and destroy all of Britain's southern ports and shore defenses it is difficult to see how the proposed invasion is to be carried out. Rear Admiral Yates Sterling, writing in the New York Times, points out that an expeditionary force using Channel harbors could only employ comparatively light vessels. To ferry across an army of half a million and its equipment would require an armada of 500 ships, which would have to be assembled, loaded, sailed, and unloaded while all the time subject to fierce attack.

It is expected, of course, that an attempt would be made to support such an invasion with an advance force of parachute troops. But this form of attack has lost its element of surprise, and it is questionable if it can score more than minor successes unless it can depend on large numbers of fifth columnists. In Holland the Nazis had organized many thousands of their own nationals, and they had the support of a comparatively numerous Dutch fascist party. In Britain, at best, they could count on far smaller contingents, and the precautionary measures now being taken will probably deprive them of all but a handful of auxiliaries.

The fact that the danger of an early invasion may be exaggerated does not mean, however, that Britain's position has not some very perilous aspects. For although the Germans may not be able to cross the Channel themselves, they are well placed to hinder or possibly even forbid its use to merchant shipping. This would still be true even if they were driven out of the Channel ports as long as they hold Holland. Consequently the value of the port of London, which handles far more of Britain's sea-borne trade than any other center, is gravely diminished. The possibility of this development has long been foreseen, and several years ago the government was urged to develop and enlarge western ports which are less vulnerable. Unfortunately, there is reason to believe that little heed was taken of these warnings, and now that a large part of Britain's vital foreign trade will have to be concentrated at Bristol, Cardiff, Liverpool, and some minor west-coast ports, congestion and delay are certain to ensue. As long as the Irish Sea and the approaches from the Atlantic can be kept comparatively free from submarines and bombers, this need not prove fatal. But the enhanced importance of the west coast serves to explain the growing anxiety about the position of Ireland. If with the aid of the I. R. A., which has the makings of a really formidable fifth column, the Nazis could establish air and submarine bases in Ireland, Britain would be invested on all sides.

Under these circumstances supplies of foodstuffs and raw materials might begin to run low, and if at the same time massive air attacks were launched on Britain's crowded cities, a real danger of demoralization and disorganization might develop. Competent observers feel that many people in Britain do not even yet take the perils of the bomber sufficiently seriously. Up to now the country has experienced only minor raids, chiefly on well-defended naval bases. The defense has yet to be subjected to devastating attacks of the kind which left Rotterdam in ruins, and until these occur, it will not have been thoroughly tested. But it is persistent, large-scale air raids, made perhaps simultaneously from Norway on Scotland and from Holland on London and the Midlands, that are Britain's most immediate peril—air raids which would strike at ports, air fields, railroad centers, factories, and, incidentally if not deliberately, at congested centers of population. If by such means Britain's economic life and internal communications could be hamstrung, then the danger of invasion would become a reality.

Twofold Defense Needed

THE people of the United States need two defense programs, one to build up our army, navy, and air force, the other to protect social and economic reform legislation in the process. For it is clear that big business sees the new defense program as an excellent excuse and a favorable opportunity for the revision—the revision into impotence—of New Deal reforms. It was good to hear the President, in his fireside talk on Sunday night, take cognizance of the trend and express his determination to combat it. While Mr. Roosevelt intimated that he would not look with too friendly an eye on strikes that interfered with the defense program, he also made it clear that under no circumstances would he permit relaxing of the wage-hour law or the Walsh-Healey Act in the name of national defense, and he pointedly referred to the legal provisions protecting collective bargaining. The best way to prevent strike interference with defense needs is to enforce strict observance of the rights of labor in industries working on armament orders, particularly in the aviation industry, which has none too good a labor record.

Not only the wage-hour law and the Walsh-Healey Act are targets of the current campaign to ditch reform in the name of defense. Free enterprise is being called the best national defense, and the slogan is designed to bring about nothing less than repeal or emasculation of the whole range of New Deal reforms. That freedom of enterprise is part of the national well-being on which our defense depends is true, but the propagandistic use of the phrase is another example of the benefits to be reaped by giving a bad dog a good name. For the aim of the campaign is not to preserve true freedom of enterprise but to repeal legislation which has sought to protect a genuine free enterprise from the operations of the financial and industrial brigand. Speeches at the meeting of the National Industrial Conference Board held last week in New York indicate that those running this campaign are confusing freedom of enterprise with freedom of exploitation.

Virgil Jordan, president of the Conference Board, said that New Deal policies had weakened the nation's ability to meet the crisis. One wonders whether the nation would have been in a stronger position had we elected a Hoover instead of a Roosevelt in 1932 to let the jobless go hungry and malefactors of great wealth go unpunished. Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., of General Motors, thought the defense program ought to be placed in the hands of "those possessing the technical knowledge and experience to assume such a great responsibility unencumbered by the demoralizing influence of political considerations." We don't know what that means, but we hope it does not mean that big business ought not to be hampered by labor or profit restrictions in the defense program. The history of past defense programs is a history of shameless profiteering at the nation's expense. Defense will be weakened, not strengthened, by removing the safeguards that protect the public as worker, consumer, investor, and taxpayer.

The extent of the strengthen-defense-by-ditching-reform program was indicated by John K. Starkweather, chairman of the Federal Legislation Committee of the Investment Bankers' Association. In his address before the Conference Board Starkweather cited not only the wage-hour law but high-income and corporate taxation, the Holding Company Act, and "indirect interference with bank investments," as examples of interference with enterprise.

"At last," says the Financial Reporter, the security dealers' weekly, "the day of reckoning has arrived!" It feels that our national defense has been weakened by "the actions and efforts of a brazen handful of embryonic young barristers bent upon obstructionist persecution and juvenile witch-hunting . . . goaded onward by the President." It wants to get back to the good old days when an investment banker "did not have to become criminally liable for every possible mistake of reputable technical advisers." These are the terms in which Wall Street is thinking. We are glad that the President spoke out firmly and unequivocally and made it clear that these are not the terms on which our defense program is being conceived. It is not its Insulls and its Girdlers that make a nation strong, but a contented people with a decent standard of living.

Let in the Refugees!

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

SLOWLY American isolationism crumbles in the heat of the struggle in France and Belgium. Understanding is coming to take the place of complacency and detachment. In some quarters, high and low, panic is threatening to overwhelm understanding. But panic is nothing more than an unfortunate by-product of a necessary reaction. Women who waste time forming rifle clubs to deal with parachutists, legislators and local officials who propose laws to penalize aliens—these form the hysterical fringe. America had to wake up. Even now it is stirring itself too slowly to be of much use in helping to prevent immeasurable catastrophe in Europe. But the new mood of awareness is growing, and the Administration should take advantage of it.

What can we do to help the Allies resist Hitler?

We can send planes and guns and even ships—but planes most of all. We can provide credit for their purchase, or we can give them away if the Allies come short of funds or hesitate to place orders. We can offer some of our own equipment, as Senator Pepper proposed, if our factories are unable to turn out new machines fast enough. We can provide ships if Allied ships are insufficient to get the goods over there in quantities and in time. We can do all this, and we should—now.

But we can do one other great service, and I wish Mr. Roosevelt would give the idea his personal support. We can lower our immigration restrictions and take in refugees from Holland and Belgium and France and the other invaded and occupied countries.

Today millions of people are struggling along bomb-swept roads in a desperate, hopeless attempt to keep ahead of the invaders. The very machines of Allied defense are bogged down in this sluggish stream of terrified human beings, moving blindly away from danger, facing danger as they move. On foot, in cars and carts, and on crowded trains, often under the harrying attack of Nazi planes, they seek refuge—refuge where none is to be found. France has taken in hundreds of thousands from the Low Countries, but in the midst of its own struggle for life it cannot possibly provide shelter and food for everyone; it cannot even provide safety.

In case of Allied victory most of these people will go home. Their villages may be no more than a heap of stones, but with the endless patience of their kind they will again build up their lives and their houses, and existence will somehow go on. Even if the invaders should stay, many of the refugees would return to their homes, eager to cling to what they have as long as the guns are silent and a living can be made. But others will never dare go back to face a regime that neither forgives opposition nor tolerates resistance. The opponents of fascism and its appointed victims—trade unionists, Socialists, Free Masons, Jews—will have to keep out of reach until Hitlerism is destroyed. Still others will simply be stranded without homes or possessions. Thousands of children have been orphaned.

Where shall they go? France and Britain, whatever the fortunes of war, cannot support a population of refugees. Even today French people are themselves refugees from the occupied parts of France.

The United States can help by sending millions of dollars and shiploads of clothing and food to the victims of Hitler's invasions. But it can help far more by permitting large-scale immigration from all the invaded countries. The barriers should be leveled except for persons who are properly under suspicion as undesirables. Or, if Congress flinches from such wholesale relief, the combined quotas from each country for the next five years should be admitted at once. Or temporary visas should be granted, good for the duration of the war; when the war is ended, the fate of the immigrants can be decided according to the fate of their countries.

Fear of a "fifth column" should not deter the United States from opening its doors to the refugees. That fear is already being used as a handy excuse for promoting dubious measures of protection. It is a bitter irony that men like Dies and Reynolds should stand up in the Senate and propose fascist-inspired laws in the name of protecting the country from foreign agents and subversive elements. Dies wants an additional appropriation of $100,000 to finance a study of "fifth-column activities." Will this cover the activities of his own reactionary supporters and friends, such men as the pro-Franco Merwin K. Hart, or Charles Coughlin, or the anti-Semite James True? Representative Dies also wants to reduce the present immigration quotas by one-third and for five years admit only husbands, wives, and minor children of American citizens. Perhaps he is afraid of the dilution of our population by a horde of European anti-fascists.

Senator Bridges has introduced a bill to prohibit aliens from buying or possessing any sort of weapon. Representative Thomas of New Jersey, one of the solidest reactionaries in the lower house, has attacked Attorney General Jackson as a notorious coddler of aliens and has demanded that the FBI be removed from the corrupting influence of the Department of Justice so that it can do its work of uncovering sedition without radical interference.

It would be foolish to assume that no danger of fascist penetration exists in the United States. Events in Europe have only dramatized the known activities of the followers of Hitler and Mussolini. We have our fifth columns. And the first place to look for them is among the well-established, well-heeled, anti-New Deal supporters of Dies, Coughlin and Company. They form the most obvious and the most dangerous fifth column in the United States.

Aliens, too, may smuggle in fascist ideas and plots. To meet this danger more effectively the President has ordered the transfer of the Immigration Service from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice. The move may be a wise one, and it is reassuring to learn that the service will henceforth be under the direct supervision of Francis Biddle, a sound liberal. Let us by all means strain out such aliens or deport them if their behavior is suspicious, but let us not visit on the innocent victims of fascism the sins of the tyrants from whom they have fled. Now is the time to prove that the right of asylum is not dead in the United States.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 665

EDITORIALS:

BRITAIN'S PERIL 667
TWOFOLD DEFENSE NEEDED 668
LET IN THE REFUGEES! by Freda Kirchwey 669

WHILE ROME SQUIRMS by Julio Alvarez del Vayo 671

THE END OF CHRISTY TUCKER
A Story by Erskine Caldwell 673

MIRACLE IN CONCRETE by Richard L. Neuberger 675

ON "THE IRRESPONSIBLES" Comments by Max Lerner, Kenneth B. Murdock, Waldo Frank, Hans Kohn, Waldo Leland, Perry Miller, Joseph Freeman, Willard Thorp 678

IN THE WIND 682

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 683

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE WHOLE OF HOUSMAN by Morton Dauwen Zabel 684
AFTER THE PEACE by Stuart Chase 686
HISTORY OF THE GERMAN ARMY by Oswald Garrison Villard 687
NEVER THE LIFE by Maxwell Geismar 688
GRANVILLE HICKS IN 2040 by Louis B. Salomon 689
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 690

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

While Rome Squirms

BY JULIO ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

IN THE past few weeks anxious eyes have been fixed on the balcony of the Palazzo Venezia. For it was there, in the fall of 1935, that the Duce announced the invasion of Ethiopia; it was there, in May, 1936, that he proclaimed the empire; and it was there, three years later, that he triumphantly announced the entrance of Italian troops into Barcelona and the imminent collapse of the Spanish republic. It was there too that Mussolini, on September 23, 1939, addressing the leaders of the Tenth Legion of Bologna, promised the Italian people coming decisions of historic importance. From that day on the stage at Rome was carefully set, with all totalitarian Italy's well-known dramatic skill, to keep the attention of the Italian people at fever pitch. Meanwhile, from another, less spectacular balcony, the Italian dictator safely watched the development of the conflict in France.

Since the war has passed from the first phase of propaganda combat and isolated encounters at sea and in the air to actual invasion, Mussolini's tactics have been twofold: a controlled press, always skirting the limits of non-belligerence, keeps the Italian people in a constant state of effervescence while the Duce attempts to find out to what extent the claims of the German High Command are confirmed by the facts. On the surface, especially since the meeting at the Brenner Pass, he seems to have definite knowledge of the precise moment for Italy's entry into the war. And yet—even last week when everything seemed to indicate that war was a question of hours—the balcony of great pronouncements remained as empty as if it were part of an uninhabited palace. The Duce will appear on it suddenly if and when the tremendous offensive of the new French command proves futile.

This indecision is justified. First of all, Mussolini is too much of a realist not to know that it is one thing to conquer the Allies decisively every morning in the Italian press and quite another to face them on a battlefield while they are still capable of vigorous resistance. In the second place, he knows better than anyone else the danger to Italy of a protracted war. Bottled up in the Mediterranean by British command of the Suez Canal and the Straits of Gibraltar, Italy is already experiencing a serious shortage of materials and has been obliged to ration sugar and coffee and to place severe restrictions on the use of its meager coal reserves. Moreover, there is the problem of the army. As soon as the war put an end to the Munich honeymoon, during which a mere threat or a gesture of bravado was sufficient to assure success, Mussolini was forced to take account of disturbing deficiencies in Italian military preparation. Those vulnerable spots partly motivated the "changing of the guard" which followed. Among those relieved of duty were the Ministers of War, Pariani and Valle, whose optimistic reports on the military situation did not stand up under the Duce's inspection.

With dangerous shortages in military equipment and with an economy which by sheer force of imagination and perseverence has just managed to survive without attaining the hoped-for autarchy, the reluctance of a section of Italian public opinion to being dragged into the war on the side of Germany is easy to understand. The "changing of the guard" had for another of its aims the silencing of this opposition. Outstanding fascists, militants imbued with the squadrista spirit, were removed from leadership in the party. The housecleaning has been carried down into the ranks, too. Many old functionaries of local organizations have disappeared from the political and trade-union scene. The systematic purge of the last six months has removed, it is hoped, all obstacles that might crop up when the Duce makes the supreme decision. But the Vatican organ Osservatore Romano, that pro-Ally "foreign newspaper," as Roberto Farinacci, editor of Il Regime Fascista, has labeled it, is growing in popularity.

To assure himself a share of the booty, when a division is made either around a treaty table or by Hitler's dictate, Mussolini needs a short war. From the beginning he has not abandoned the illusion of such a possibility. The most important fact that emerged from his conversations with Sumner Welles, as reported by authoritative European newspapers, was Mussolini's conviction that the war should be a short one and that the Western powers would have to resign themselves to an early compromise peace. A "white peace" has not disappeared from his speculations even when he has seemed most ready to intervene. In the judgment of his most devoted party leaders, the two ideas are complementary. Thus the Telegrafo, Count Ciano's newspaper, reported on March 21:

> The Duce has his ideas on the reorganization of Europe and would be very content if they could be realized peacefully. But the Duce is also head of a great empire and has a high concept of the prestige and dignity of his country. He knows that there are terrible epochs in the history of the world when the only language is that of cannon and when it is useless to try to intervene in any other manner.

Amid the maze of contradictory desires that determine

Italian policy the factor which in my opinion will resolve the question of Italy's entry into the war—and determine the moment as well—is German pressure. All the arrogance of the Fascist policy cannot disguise Italy's fundamental dependence on the Reich. Commenting on the Berlin-Rome military pact, the historian Gaetano Salvemini aptly enough wrote: "A permanent and unconditional alliance of this type between a country of 90,000,000 inhabitants and a country of 44,000,000 is not a treaty of alliance but a bond of vassalage."

Il Duce

Until now Germany has had little interest in Italy's possible military intervention. By the simple continued threat of entry into the war Italy has been able to immobilize a good part of the Allied forces in the Mediterranean. And it provides good ports of transit for materials which Germany could not receive directly—iron and mercury from Spain, for example. But the situation can change at any moment if the German army is stopped in France and the war tends to drag out; or if Hitler believes that Italian action in the Mediterranean can deliver the coup de grâce to English resistance; or if Mussolini feels that a German victory without Italian aid would place him in a subordinate role with respect to the victor and substantially diminish his share in the redivision of spoils.

If Italy enters the war no one can reproach the Allies for not having courted Mussolini up to the last moment. From 1938, when the Anglo-Italian pact was signed, "the essence of which"—I am not quoting any red spokesman, but the London Economist of November 19, 1938—"is that Great Britain condones Italy's destruction, by unjust and lawless force of arms, of the independence of Republican Spain," up to a few days ago, when François Charles-Roux, French ambassador to the Vatican, was selected to replace Alexis Leger as General Secretary of the Quai d'Orsay, no effort has been spared in courting the favor of the Duce. At the same time that the exuberant Italian journalist, Signor Coppola, was accusing France and England of having "preferred a war of attrition to a war by arms, a currency war to a blood war, a war of usury to a war of soldiers," the French censors were carefully deleting even the mildest references to Rome by Pertinax or de Kerillis. In one of his first addresses as Prime Minister, Paul Reynaud on April 20 declared that various offers had been transmitted to Rome before and since the beginning of the war, and that although it had not yet received a favorable reply, France remained disposed to exchange views with Italy regarding the possibility of an acceptable solution of the problem of the needs and legitimate interests of the peoples bordering the Mediterranean. Mussolini's response was to replace the more temperate Baron Attolici, Italian ambassador to Berlin, by Dino Alfieri, fanatical supporter of the military pact, whose paramount ambition is to precipitate his country's entry into the war.

Faced with a conciliatory attitude on the part of the Allies, intransigent Fascist Italy has drawn up an imposing list of grievances. The principle of equality in the Mediterranean does not interest Mussolini. Italy seeks hegemony, conceives the Mediterranean as mare nostrum. And it is precisely in the Mediterranean that Mussolini is reserving for himself the definite blow. If he enters the war, it is not his army that he will expect to win new laurels. The efficiency of the Italian army has been put to the test in Ethiopia and in Spain. In Ethiopia incendiary bombs and mustard gas accounted for the victory. The natives, half naked and without gas masks, dared Mussolini's aviators to come down to earth and "fight like men." General de Bono himself, the conqueror of Ethiopia, admits this in his Memoirs: "Of important engagements," he writes, "we had none; much less anything that might be called a battle." In Spain, at Guadalajara, if the Republican command had been able to throw two more divisions of fresh reserves into the battle it would have driven the Italians all the way to Burgos. The Italians fought in Catalonia against an army which on January 5, 1939, the date of the fall of Borjas Blancas, had only 37,000 rifles for a quarter of a million men, according to the figures of the Republican General Staff.

Should Italy become a belligerent, it will be its speedy vessels and its aviation, rather than the army, that will prove particularly dangerous in the Mediterranean, thanks to the policy of "non-intervention." It is well known that during the Spanish war the Balearic Islands were, to all purposes, an Italian possession. They continue to be so today. Last week General Kindelán was named governor general of the Balearic Islands. During the war he was nominally in command of rebel aviation. Actually he took his orders from the Italian expeditionary forces. Today no boats other than those of Italy and Germany touch at the Balearics. The naval and air bases of the islands are of superior strength. In "The Defense of Britain" Captain Liddell Hart, British expert on military affairs, wrote:

> The mere possibility that air and naval bases on the eastern seaboard of Spain and in the Balearic Islands might be available for our opponents' use seriously complicates the problem of maintaining our traffic through, or even our forces in, the Mediterranean.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

In the first World War Gibraltar lay thousands of miles away from the nearest enemy airdromes. Today it is dangerously close to Italian bases, and from the airdrome of Los Barrios, north of Algeciras, planes can take off and bomb Gibraltar in less time than is necessary to sound the air-raid sirens. Four airdromes between Ceuta and Tetuan are only a few minutes' flying distance from the Rock. Still more important, guns have been installed by the Germans in Spanish territory on both sides of the strait.

If Italy goes into the war, Spain will not necessarily enter with it. In the assignment of functions to the various totalitarian countries, Spain serves only as a paper pledge on the part of Italy. Spain's non-belligerence, that is, fictitious neutrality, will be as useful to Germany and Italy as any direct intervention, for its airplane and submarine bases will continue to be at the service of those two countries.

Time will tell whether the Allies' policy of appeasement will next be directed toward Spain. A London cable to the New York Times on May 24 reported the "great joy" with which Madrid received the projected appointment of that subtle apostle of appeasement Sir Samuel Hoare as British ambassador in Madrid.

British loans are a further indication that such an attempt is in the wind. It will be a sheer waste of time. It would be simpler to make out the check directly to Mussolini or Hitler—or both.

The End of Christy Tucker

BY ERSKINE CALDWELL

CHRISTY TUCKER rode into the plantation town muleback late in the afternoon, whistling all the way. He had been hewing new pickets for the fence around his house all morning, and he was feeling good for having got so much done. He did not have a chance to go to the plantation town very often, and when he could go he did not lose any time in getting there.

He tied up the mule at the hitching racks behind the row of stores, and the first thing he noticed was the way the other Negroes out there did not seem anxious to speak to him. Christy had been on friendly terms with all the colored people on the plantation ever since he and his wife had moved there three months before, and he could not understand why they pretended not to see him.

He walked slowly down the road toward the plantation office wondering why nobody spoke to him.

After he had gone a little farther he met Froggy Miller. He caught Froggy by the arm before Froggy could dodge him.

"What's the matter with you folks today?" he said. Froggy Miller lived only a mile from his house in a straight line across the cotton field, and he knew Froggy better than anyone else on the plantation. "What's the matter, anyway, Froggy?"

Froggy, a big six-foot Negro with close-cropped hair, moved away.

He grabbed Froggy by the arm and shook him.

"Now, look here!" Christy said, getting worried. "Why do you and everybody else act so strange?"

"Mr. Lee Crossman sent for you, didn't he?" Froggy said.

"Sure, he sent for me," Christy said. "I reckon he wants to talk to me about the farming. But what's that got to do with—"

Before he could finish, the other Negro had pulled away from him and walked hurriedly up the road.

Without wasting any more time Christy ran toward the plantation office to find out what the trouble was.

The plantation bookkeeper, Hendricks, and Lee Crossman's younger brother, Morgan, were sitting in the front office with their feet on the window sill when he ran inside. Hendricks got up when he saw Christy and went through the door into the rear room. While the bookkeeper was in the other room, Morgan Crossman stared sullenly at the Negro.

"Come here, you," Hendricks said, coming back through the door.

Christy turned around and saw Lee Crossman, the owner and boss of the plantation, standing in the doorway.

"Yes, sir," Christy said.

Lee Crossman was dressed in heavy gray riding breeches and tan shirt, and he wore black boots that laced to his knees. He stood aside while Christy walked into the back room, and closed the door on the outside. Christy walked to the middle of the room and stood there waiting for Lee Crossman.

Christy had moved to the Crossman plantation the first of the year, about three months before. It was the first time he had ever been in Georgia, and he had grown to like it better than Alabama, where he had always lived. He and his wife had decided to come to Georgia because they had heard that the land there was better for share-cropping cotton. Christy said he could not be satisfied merely making a living; he wanted to get ahead in life.

Lee Crossman still had not come, and Christy sat down in one of the chairs. He had no more than seated himself when the door opened. He jumped to his feet.

"Howdy, Mr. Lee," he said, smiling. "I've had a good chance to look at the land, and I'd like to be furnished with another mule and a gang plow. I figure I can raise twice as much cotton on that kind of land with a gang plow, because it's about the best I ever saw. There's not a rock or stump on it, and it's as clear of bushes as the palm of my hand. I haven't even found a gully anywhere on it. If you'll furnish me with another mule and a gang plow, I'll raise more cotton for you than any two share-croppers on your plantation."

Lee Crossman listened until he had finished, and then he slammed the door shut and strode across the room.

"I sent for you, nigger," he said. "You didn't send for me, did you?"

"That's right, Mr. Lee," he said. "You sent for me."

"Then keep your black face shut until I tell you to open it."

"Yes, sir, Mr. Lee," Christy said, backing across the room until he found himself against the wall. Lee Crossman sat down in a chair and glared at him. "Yes, sir, Mr. Lee," Christy said again.

"You're one of these biggety niggers, ain't you?" Lee said. "Where'd you come from, anyway? You ain't a Georgia nigger, are you?"

"No, sir, Mr. Lee," Christy said, shaking his head. "I was born and raised in Alabama."

"Didn't they teach you any better than this in Alabama?"

"Yes, sir, Mr. Lee."

"Then why did you come over here to Georgia and start acting so biggety?"

"I don't know, Mr. Lee."

Christy wiped his face with the palm of his hand and wondered what Lee Crossman was angry with him about. He began to understand why the other Negroes had gone out of their way to keep from talking to him. They knew he had been sent for, and that meant he had done something that displeased Lee Crossman. They could not afford to be seen talking to anyone who was in disfavor with the plantation owner and boss.

"Have you got a radio?" Lee asked.

"Yes, sir."

"Where'd you get it?"

"I bought it on time."

"Where'd you get money to pay on it?"

"I had a little, and my wife raises chickens."

"Why didn't you buy it at the plantation store?"

"I made a better bargain at the other place. I got it a little cheaper."

"Niggers who live on my plantation buy what they need at the plantation store," Lee said.

"I didn't want to go into debt to you, Mr. Lee," Christy said. "I wanted to come out ahead when the accounts are settled at the end of the year."

Lee Crossman leaned back in the chair, crossed his legs, and took out his pocketknife. He began cleaning his fingernails.

There was silence in the room for several minutes. Christy leaned against the wall.

"Stand up straight, nigger!" Lee shouted at him.

"Yes, sir," Christy said, jumping erect.

"Did you split up some of my wood to hew pickets for the fence around the house where you live?"

"Yes, sir, Mr. Lee."

"Why didn't you ask me if I wanted you to do it?"

"I figured the fence needed some new pickets to take the place of some that had rotted, and because I'm living in the house I went ahead and did it."

"You act mighty big, don't you?" Lee said. "You act like you own my house and land, don't you? You act like you think you're as good as a white man, don't you?"

"No, sir, Mr. Lee," Christy protested. "I don't try to act any of those ways. I just naturally like to hustle and get things done, that's all. I just can't be satisfied unless I'm fixing a fence or cutting wood or picking cotton, or something. I just naturally like to get things done."

"Do you know what we do with biggety niggers like you in Georgia?"

"No, sir."

"We teach them to mind their own business and stay in their place."

Lee Crossman got up and crossed the room to the closet. He jerked the door open and reached inside. When he turned around, he was holding a long leather strap that had been studded with heavy brass bands. He came back across the room, slapping the strap around his boot-tops.

"Who told your wife she could raise chickens on my plantation?" he said to Christy.

"Nobody told her, Mr. Lee," Christy said. "We didn't think you'd mind. There'd be plenty of yard around the house for them, and I built a little hen house."

"Stop arguing with me, nigger!"

"Yes, sir."

"I don't want chickens scratching up crops on this plantation."

"Yes, sir," Christy said.

"Where did you get money to pay on a radio?"

"I snared a few rabbits and skinned them, and then I sold their hides for a little money."

"I don't want no rabbits touched on my plantation," Lee said.

He shook out the heavy strap and cracked it against his boots.

"Why haven't you got anything down on the books in the plantation store?" Lee asked.

"I just don't like to go into debt," Christy said. "I want to come out ahead when the accounts are settled at the end of the year."

"That's my business whether you come out owing or owed at the end of the year," Lee said.

Christy nodded his head in acceptance.

"Take off that shirt and drop your pants and get down on your knees straddle that crack," the white man said.

Christy looked at him in fear and anger.

"What are you going to do to me, Mr. Lee?"

"I'll show you what I'm going to do," he replied. "Take off that shirt and pants and get down there like I told you."

Christy backed away.

"Mr. Lee. I can't let you beat me like that. No, sir, Mr. Lee. I can't let you do that to me. I just can't!"

"You black-skinned, back-talking coon, you!" Lee shouted, his face turning crimson with anger.

He struck Christy with the heavy, brass-studded strap. Christy backed out of reach, and when Lee struck him the second time, the Negro caught the strap and held on to it. Lee glared at him and then tried to jerk it away.

"Mr. Lee, I haven't done anything except catch a few rabbits and raise a few chickens and things like that," Christy protested. "I didn't mean any harm at all. I thought you'd be pleased if I put some new pickets in your fence."

"Shut your mouth and get that shirt and pants off like I told you," he said, angrier than ever. "And turn that strap loose before I blast it loose from you."

Christy stayed where he was and held on to the strap with all his might. Lee was so angry he could not speak after that. He ran to the closet and got his pistol. He swung around and fired it at Christy three times. Christy released his grip on the strap and sank to the floor.

Lee's brother, Morgan, and the bookkeeper, Hendricks, came running into the back room.

"What happened, Lee?" his brother asked, seeing Christy Tucker lying on the floor.

"That nigger threatened me," Lee said, blowing hard. He walked to the closet and tossed the pistol on the shelf. "You and Hendricks heard him threaten to kill me. I had to shoot him down to protect my own life."

They left the back room and went into the front office. Several clerks from the plantation store ran in and wanted to know what all the shooting was about.

"Just a biggety nigger," Lee said, washing his hands at the sink. "He was that Alabama nigger that came over here two or three months ago. I sent for him this morning to ask him what he meant by putting new pickets in the fence around his house without asking me first. When I got him in here, he threatened me. He was a bad nigger."

The clerks went back to the plantation store, and Hendricks sat down at his books.

"Open the back door," Lee told his brother, "and let those niggers out in the back see what happens when one of them gets as biggety as that coon from Alabama got."

His brother opened the back door. When he looked outside into the road there was not a Negro in sight. The only living thing out there was the mule on which Christy Tucker had ridden to town.

Miracle in Concrete

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Grand Coulee, Washington, May 15

THE morning fog lifts like a curtain in the granite canyon of the Columbia River and reveals the most massive concrete escarpment in the world stretching from cliff to cliff. It is nearly a mile long and as thick as two city blocks at the base. Already it towers thirty stories above bedrock, and soon it will be higher. Its bulk is three times that of the Great Pyramid; it contains enough concrete to pave a roadway around the globe. Behind it there is filling up an enormous reservoir that will be almost as long as Lake Ontario.

This is the Grand Coulee Dam, started in 1934 and to be finished by the end of this year. To dedicate Grand Coulee is one of the President's principal ambitions. As far back as 1920, when he was a candidate for the Vice-Presidency, he said at Spokane after his Pullman car had paralleled the route of Lewis and Clark down the Columbia:

> Coming through today on the train has made me think pretty deeply. When you cross the Mountain States and that portion of the Coast States that lies well back from the ocean, you are impressed by those great stretches of physical territory, just land, territory now practically unused but destined some day to contain the homes of thousands and hundreds of thousands of citizens like us, a territory to be developed by the nation and for the nation. As we were coming down the river today, I could not help thinking, as everyone does, of all that water running down unchecked to the sea.

Grand Coulee Dam will irrigate and reclaim 1,200,000 acres of land. This is an area equal in size to the whole state of Delaware. It is not much less than the acreage of all the farms in New Jersey. Several months ago, in an address to the White House Conference on Children in a Democracy, the President said:

> I have read a book; it is called "The Grapes of Wrath," and there are 500,000 Americans who live in the covers of that book. I would like to see the Columbia Basin devoted to the care of the 500,000 people represented in "The Grapes of Wrath."
>
> Up in the state of Washington we are spending a great many millions to harness the Columbia River, for a great dam up there which will pump the water up on to a huge area of land capable of providing a living for 500,000 people, irrigated land, today a desert, which can be made a garden with the process of modern science.

Twenty-five years ago George W. Norris, Senator from Nebraska, stood beside a little creek cascading to the Columbia and asked a native of a nearby village why the power was not used. The reply came with finality: "Jim Hill owns all the power sites. We don't have much to say about 'em." No railway magnate owns all the power sites now. Soon, over the brink of the Grand Coulee spillway will crash a sheet of water with five times the volume and nearly three times the height of Niagara Falls. This shattering drop in the nation's second-largest river will generate annually 10,708,000,000 kilowatt-hours of power, an amount equal to one-fourth of all the hydroelectric power produced in the United States in 1938. So much "juice" will be turned out that the twin powerhouses, each as big as a skyscraper and packing more than twice the force of Muscle Shoals, will have to be run by remote control lest the operators be electrocuted.

Ranchers and settlers on the dry mesas are wiring their houses and cabins; they will be able to buy electricity for $2.50 a hundred kilowatt-hours. New industries, desperately needed in a frontier region that imports 75 per cent of its manufactured goods, are also expected to take advantage of the lowest commercial power rates in America. Already aluminum and steel factories are being built along the Columbia near Bonneville. Seattle and Portland business men, who regularly denounce the President, admit that his dams are saving the Northwest and will give it an industrial foundation to replace the lumber industry.

Not all Grand Coulee's fabulous supply of power will brighten farmhouses and move the wheels of factories. Five of the eighteen generators will operate a dozen stupendous pumps, one of which could pump enough water for New York City. Each pump can lift fifty tons of water a second. And here is what the pumps will do. Grand Coulee Dam will raise the level of the Columbia River approximately 355 feet. The pumps will hoist part of the river another 250 feet, through great tunnels and conduits, from which it will flow into a deep chasm a mile wide and from twenty-five to thirty miles in length. This chasm, with walls as precipitous as the front of a safe, is the Grand Coulee of the Columbia River. It was carved ages ago when the river was diverted from its course by the Pleistocene ice sheet. The dam and pumps will duplicate the job the ice sheet did.

From the Grand Coulee the water will be coasted on to 1,200,000 acres of land which needs only irrigation to grow peas, beans, pears, prunes, potatoes, celery, onions, alfalfa, and the other crops that mantle the green valleys of the Northwest. This land will not be monopolized by great corporate farms such as dominate agriculture in California, nor will it be scarred by the feudalism of tenant farming. It will be tilled by families working their own land. For Congress has passed a law limiting land ownership at Grand Coulee to eighty acres a family; a single man can retain only half that much. The considerable portion of the region now held by private owners and in old Northern Pacific land grants will have to be sold at the price fixed by government appraisers. Any land held beyond the amount allowed will not be cut in on the irrigation system and will stay in its present virtually worthless condition.

The total cost of the Grand Coulee project will be $394,500,000. In this the principal elements are $99,960,000 for the spillway dam, $61,500,000 for the hydroelectric plant, $129,220,000 for the vast network of irrigation ditches and canals, $29,540,000 for the pumping system, and $11,330,000 for preparing the enormous reservoir in the prehistoric river bed. Other items on the expense side of the ledger are for preservation of the Chinook salmon runs, and for transmission lines, field offices, and land surveys.

The surveys are under way now. Every foot of the 1,200,000 acres is being classified as to contour, value, ownership, soil content, and crop possibilities. It is the most extensive land survey ever undertaken. President Roosevelt has made up his mind that the Coulee area, which he considers a "Promised Land," shall not be colonized carelessly. The National Resources Committee is at work studying where schools, hospitals, sewer systems, railroad yards, and warehouses should be located. Twenty-five thousand families cultivating fertile soil can support a large urban population. The towns near Grand Coulee will expand; other towns will spring up. The Resources Committee is trying to find out the opportunities for people with special training and abilities—doctors, nurses, school teachers, printers, lawyers, ministers, electricians, mechanics. Perhaps in this modern Canaan in the Northwest some of the highly skilled refugees from Europe may get a chance to participate in American life.

Forty years ago some of the Coulee lands were homesteaded or bought from the railroad. That was before anyone realized that the rich alluvial plain left behind by the glacial sheets did not get enough rainfall. The settlers dry-farmed successfully for a few years. By that time they had used all the moisture held in the soil. Their land caked and hardened. Sagebrush encroached on the wheat. Many of the settlers moved on. Some lost their farms to banks and mortgage companies; others went to Seattle and Spokane to start over again, but still clung to their deeds and titles. These people are coming back now and forming irrigation districts which will buy water from the federal government. The votes creating the districts indicate that local sentiment is in favor of this program of small, owner-operated farms: at Wheeler 178 were for the district and 10 against; at Shragg 143 for and 9 against; at Drumheller 26 for and 11 against; at Pasco 228 for and 8 against.

The Grand Coulee project is one of the New Deal's principal political assets along the Pacific seaboard, and Republican approval of the undertaking now is not fooling many people. More than twenty years ago Rufus Woods of the Wenatchee World wrote an editorial proposing a mammoth dam to irrigate the arid land and develop the water power of the Columbia Basin. Three Republican Presidents gave lip-service to the idea—and did nothing. In his 1932 campaign Mr. Roosevelt said he would do something about the Columbia River region, and he kept his promise. Western voters know how to compare words with deeds. The state of Washington has not elected a Republican Governor, Senator, or Representative since Grand Coulee was begun.

The anti-New Deal San Francisco Argonaut says of Grand Coulee, "The Pacific Coast may be confident that in the future it will have occasion to point with pride to a new 'land of plenty' here in its midst." Yet there are some questions, of course. What will the colossal dam do to the valuable and important salmon runs in the Columbia River? Is it logical for the government to spend millions for this new farm area in the West while it spends other millions to restrict agricultural production elsewhere? The late Paul Y. Anderson asked the President this question in 1937 and received no conclusive answer. And what about the Dust Bowl nomads whom Roosevelt wants to settle at Grand Coulee? They are penniless. How can they get farm equipment, lumber, seeds, and other necessities?

The salmon are in jeopardy; of that there is no doubt, although all kinds of elaborate apparatus have been constructed for fish conservation. The Department of the Interior resolves the paradox of irrigation in one region and crop control in another with the statement that the most troublesome surpluses are in corn, cotton, and wheat and that the Grand Coulee region will produce garden vegetables, fruits, and fodder. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch has observed also that probably most of the crops will be consumed in the area rather than raised for the market. And the government will stretch its credit resources to the limit in an effort to give the neediest migrants an opportunity to settle in new farm homes. Other reclamation projects have required that each colonist possess $2,000. At Grand Coulee this sum can be made up from FSA loans, old equipment, automobiles, and furniture.

Despite all doubts and reservations, men of many faiths have stood on the granite crags above the huge dam and said, "This makes sense." The Pacific Northwest is the final frontier, the last refuge for people now living on exhausted soil in the Middle West, for men and women crowded in the tenements of the Atlantic coast. Major Roy Bessey of the Northwest Regional Planning Commission says that "with a reasonable development program, from 1,000,000 to 2,500,000 additional people could readily be absorbed in the region within a generation. Migration toward the region during recent years seems to indicate that the population increase may approach the higher figure." Of no other part of continental United States may this be said, and Grand Coulee is the principal feature of "the reasonable development program." The Columbia has three times as much potential hydroelectric power as any other river in America. Above its swift reaches is a great sweep of land that needs only water to replace sagebrush with orchards. The river twists through the Cascade Range and into the core of the Inland Empire. With dams and locks it could become a navigable waterway instead of a rapid-studded chute. Why not develop all these resources for men and women who must find a place to go?

The late William E. Borah, for many years the most illustrious figure of the Columbia Basin, once said, "The Northwest cannot pay the freight both ways and continue to live and prosper." A "colonial empire" for the East, it ships out its raw materials and buys back finished products. Perhaps the biggest chunk of power in the world will help develop mills and factories so that the Northwest's raw materials can be processed there instead of being shipped across the country.

Dusk settles on the Columbia like a curtain dropping back. The tumble-down farmhouses which the settlers abandoned long ago lose shape in the twilight. But at the great dam ten thousand lights are turned on. Work goes forward night and day. This is a defense of democracy, too—as important as new destroyers and bombing planes. Perhaps this frowning wall of concrete will be the most enduring monument to Franklin Roosevelt's Administration. That jackhammer man down in the chasm, wiping his forehead in the glare of the searchlights as he drills a tunnel through the cliffs for the water that will make a million acres bloom—perhaps he is doing more to protect America from foreign ideologies than the man who rivets a dreadnought's mast or prepares a torpedo for the open sea.

On "The Irresponsibles"

[Because of the importance of the issue raised by Archibald MacLeish in his article The Irresponsibles published in The Nation two weeks ago, and the wide interest it aroused, we are herewith publishing a number of comments by scholars and writers. Others will be printed in future issues.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

MAX LERNER

Professor of Political Science, Williams College

MY COMMENT on Archibald MacLeish's deeply felt and eloquent article must take the form of what the lawyers call a plea in confession and avoidance. Most of the scholars and writers of America deserve richly the drubbing they get from Mr. MacLeish. But if they have been irresponsible, the responsibility for that is not wholly, in fact not principally, theirs. And why?

Is it not because the defense of our inherited culture has up to now been carried on as part of the defense of our inherited economic and social system? The scholars have been encouraged and in many instances even coerced to choose pure science as their model because otherwise their scholarship, if it were really put into a form which would reach the people, would be dangerous. And the writers have been encouraged and even coerced to take pure art as their model because otherwise their writing, if it really took sides and manned the intellectual barricades, would be dangerous. Dangerous, I say in both cases, to the established order of a corporate capitalism. Mr. MacLeish might easily have broadened his indictment. In all fields we have sent experts out into the world without a knowledge of values, and we have sent philosophers without a grounding in social fact. This cleavage is not just the result, as Mr. MacLeish surmised, of the natural process of specialization. It is, as Thorstein Veblen long ago pointed out in his book on "The Higher Learning in America," a consequence of the tenacious defense of corporate capitalism by the men who have controlled our universities, our press, our research foundations.

I want to make it clear that I regard the present tendency, represented not only by Mr. MacLeish but also by Lewis Mumford and Waldo Frank and others, to put the primary blame and responsibility for our present chaos upon the intellectuals as not wholly without merit. It is true that our intellectuals have failed. Nevertheless, I do not consider that this analysis reaches to the core of the problem of world chaos today. Mr. MacLeish speaks of Hitlerism as a "revolution against." He is in the main right, although I believe that he, as well as Rauschning and others who speak of the revolution of nihilism, do not make enough allowance for the fact that to many millions of people it is poverty and insecurity that represent the real nihilisms. For them even Hitlerism has an affirmative psychological appeal. Even a "revolution against," if it is to succeed, must have deep roots in a preceding social chaos. And Hitler's revolution has these roots. Hitler's revolution is only the outward expression of more basic revolutionary forces at work in the world today. These revolutionary forces proceed from the incapacity that world capitalism displayed in organizing world peace after the last war; from the impossibility of making the political nation-state a valid economic unit without heroic economic change; from the failure of most nations, including America and the Allies, to respond to the imperatives of planning which alone, under today's conditions, can mean survival in either peace or war. Above all, these revolutionary forces proceed from the failure of the democracies to refashion their economic and social institutions so as to bring them into line with the democratic creed and into line with the basic drives in men.

In short, if the intellectuals failed, their failure happened long before the rise of Hitlerism as a world movement, and long before their failure to recognize the threat that Nazism carries for all cultures. It was the basic failure to see that the incapacity of the democracies to change our social system by democratic and humane methods would necessarily leave the field open to the brutal changes of totalitarianism.

And the blame for this earlier failure, if we are at this late date to play the game of apportioning blame, must lie not only with the writers and scholars but with those other men who have held positions of power in our economic and political world. No matter how greatly we exhort them, writers and scholars cannot by themselves defend or change social institutions. Mr. MacLeish mentions Thomas Mann, yet the possession of a Thomas Mann by Germany did not change the course of events there. Mr. MacLeish talks of our having split in two the earlier man of letters; yet the one country where the man of letters has continued into the modern time—France—has also not been exempted from the common doom. Mr. MacLeish mentions Milton and Voltaire. Yet both of them were effective because their courage and their vision as men of letters were linked with the rising energies of new classes to a common fight against old classes and dying cultures. The writer's power to defend and change cultures is never great unless it is similarly linked with expansive and not merely with defensive forces in a culture.

What this means is that if we are to meet the "revolution against" represented by Hitlerism we must do so militantly and aggressively, with a revolutionary democratic force that challenges Hitler's revolutionary totalitarianism, with a revolutionary affirmative force that challenges Hitler's revolutionary nihilism. We cannot do this merely by defending our culture and our intellectual freedom. If we restrict ourselves to defense, we have three-quarters lost the battle already. Scholars, writers, and men of letters alike must today not only defend our system; they must also help transform it. In transforming it, the writer can have an important role. But let us not overestimate that role, and let us not ignore the fact that it will be frustrate unless it is linked with revolutionary social energies in labor, in the professions, in responsible business groups, in science, in politics.

KENNETH B. MURDOCK

Professor of English, Harvard University

ANY CANDID observer must agree with most of what Mr. MacLeish says of the "irresponsibility" of many scholars and writers, and of the peril which this irresponsibility involves. But he neglects, it seems to me, a major reason for the futility of the scholar. It is not the scholar's interest in the past or his concern with a special scientific problem that most often makes him impotent, nor is it the separation between the writer and the devotee of learning—a separation perhaps inevitable if the whole range of knowledge indispensable for the support of our civilization is to be mastered. Far more serious is the rift between scholar and teacher. Most scholars now are academics in institutions where the privilege of teaching is committed to them. Too often they have neither interest nor skill in teaching. If they have not, their study of the past, often the richest source of inspiration for defenders of true culture, their zeal for relatively objective tests of truth, which should be the best weapons against the irrational violence of champions of deceit, their pursuit of the learning that may make life more decent and defy most effectively those who would leave it no hope of decency are useless; not because scholarship is useless or its methods devitalizing, but because the scholar does not carry to others the inspiration, the zeal, and the sense of values that he brings to his specifically scholarly task.

The future must depend largely on those whom the scholar is supposed to educate; if he teaches badly or irresponsibly, his case is lost; if he teaches well, determined to prove the superiority of truth over lies, reason over unreason, emotion grounded in intellectual conviction over emotion born of falsehood and blood-lust, no ivory tower can contain him. From his pupils will come new scholars and teachers and writers, and his work will be the reserve of material without which even the greatest man of letters must be helpless when he fights those who parade false history, false science, and false faith, as truth.

WALDO FRANK

Author of "A Chart for Rough Waters"

IT IS encouraging that a poet of the wide appeal of Archibald MacLeish enters the battle which a too small number of American authors has waged on the common attitudes of our intellectual life. Mr. MacLeish is stirred by our writers' and scholars' impotence and seeming inertia before the night of Europe, whose shadows spread to our own shores. But Mr. MacLeish stops at symptoms, and thereby reveals that the disease is deeper than he is conscious, for one of the basic causes of the threatening chaos is our obsession with symptoms, our indifference to fundamentals—a lethal habit at this time of cultural revolution in which human history is making a turn more dangerous (and promising) than any since Western history began.

I do not believe with Mr. MacLeish that the sin of our writers has been their aloofness, their refusal of responsibility, their unconcern, or their division of labor between past and present—with an abyss between. The writers who rushed to the Bolshevik bandwagon were not aloof, not refusing to reinterpret the past with all the "scholarship" at their command: nor the liberals and socialists. The trouble was both deeper and more simple. They did not know enough; their method of knowing was false; therefore their measures of reality for the present, from which they drew the materials of their books, and for the past, which they studied to forge a happier future, failed them in the issues of action.

The analogies of Mr. MacLeish reveal the same case. He suggests a relationship between our modern writers' attitude and Leonardo's, whose "study of beauty occupied his whole heart"; not realizing that the Italian inherited and implicitly accepted an organic culture which made what he meant by beauty cogent to his life, whereas our writers and their publics have deliberately denied—and not known how to replace—the roots of that organic culture. He wants modern men of letters like Las Casas and Voltaire. But Las Casas fought for the ideal values of a commonly accepted culture-religion against its betrayers (who did it lip-service). Voltaire on the other hand was one of the progenitors of our chaos, in that like ourselves he worshiped certain laudable end-fruits of the same culture-religion, yet neglected or attacked the roots in vision and intuition whence those fruits drew life. In such vagueness of analogy and fact there are confusions which Mr. MacLeish might have avoided by asking: What is our culture? Have our writers and their public an implicit religion?

Other symptoms he records should lead to similar questions. "Caliban is conquering!" he says. But to Shakespeare, Caliban was a futile fellow, beneath Prospero and his ally, Ariel. What has happened to our Prosperos to reverse the position? Why? "The country of the man of letters," he deplores, "has been divided between his heirs," the poet and the scholar. Does he not see that this "country" has been shrunken? Donne and Newton also divided it. But such former masters shared a whole coterminous with all human energy and aspiration. Our writing men too have a "whole"; but it is shriveled and a fragment; it does not touch the quick and deep of experience, and thereby leaves the fertilizing of the fields of action to the anti-poets, the anti-philosophers, the anti-persons—true creators and hierophants of the Hitlers.

The intellectuals who these past years have pontificated on letters, art, politics, past, present, future, from the shut booth of vulgar Marxism or the dustbins of empirical rationalism (our modern religion), have not disdained wholes, responsibility in social action. Their fatal fault has been that their "whole" was only a part; wherefore their methods and programs for conditioning life creatively of course went wrong. A part which acts as if it were the whole: there is the modern tragedy in a phrase. It is the program of fascism. But it also characterizes the religions of liberal, pragmatist, Marxist, transcendental Christian—all of whom had to play their preparatory role before the fascist could come on the scene to "mop up."

Mr. MacLeish scores the defeatist mood of our intellectuals in accepting material forces as the sole history makers. But what in our culture brought about this suicidal doctrine? We must study the sources and dynamics of our values to understand what has made the progressive nations, from France to Sweden, so futile, fumbling, and unvigilant beside fascist energy and efficiency. It is not accident that Ramsay

MacDonald and Léon Blum were weaklings while Göring built his air armada: and that our own President betrayed his conscience and intelligence in refusing legal help to Spain in that crucial hour before the fall of Barcelona, when both French and British labor were ready to follow his lead, and our fate was perhaps sealed for generations. "The disorder of our time," says Mr. MacLeish, "is a revolt against the common culture of the West." Of course! But what if we, the proud moderns, were the first who revolted? What went wrong with the grandiose programs of Renaissance and Reformation? We all know by now that the greatest nations in spiritual, intellectual, and technical heritage—and we among them—stood by while Hitler fattened on our cowardice and crimes. The urgent question is, Why? While our intellectuals grow elegiac in the defense of culture, how did they become, and why do they continue to be, the betrayers of that culture? Until Mr. MacLeish helps to define our calamity by asking such questions I fear that his eloquent and noble lament belongs to the rhetoric now being drowned in Europe by the roar of the Heinkels.

I am fully aware that I lack space here for a single definition. The sin of our writers seems to me: first, ignorance of and consequent impotence against the evils of our own reality—ignorance issuing from our vicious, implicit, almost universal "religion," empirical rationalism; and, second, confusion and despair as they saw their protests and their "desperate remedies" fail to halt the tailspin of our world into war—a prevalent despair now expressing itself in isolationism and silence. It is not quite too late, if we realize that we have been in this war—and shirking it—from the beginning. Let us humbly, from our past defeats, move to a reconsideration of all the values and terms which Mr. MacLeish takes for granted. That would be a creative revolution in American letters, and a hint of dawn in a world which must now seek dawn in America or nowhere.

HANS KOHN

Professor of History, Smith College

MR. MACLEISH'S stirring comments about the responsibility of scholars and writers for the present catastrophe were long needed. The responsibility lies not, however, with scholars and writers alone; it lies as heavily with educators, leaders of youth, and politicians, who were unable or did not wish to understand the fundamental nature of the great moral and spiritual counter-revolution which was going on.

I believe that the source of the evil from which Western civilization seems likely to perish in an astonishingly swift collapse is deeper than the division of scholars from writers. It is rather a general indifference to, or contempt of, moral values, a complacent belief in economic and social factors as the prime motivation in man's life. This moral and mental confusion, developing already before the first World War and forcefully promoted by the "debunkers" of the post-war period, has turned socialists into isolationists and has led men to affirm that they do not see any difference between the governments and aims of the British and French and those of the fascist countries. After taking this position they were driven, by a certain uneasiness of their minds, to justify themselves by stressing all possible faults of the democracies and by whitewashing the acts of the fascists, thus dulling all sense of morality and of moral distinctions. They closed their minds to an understanding of the true implications of the tremendous revolution against all moral values which is fascism, and thereby destroyed the possibility of any effective resistance to fascism. They thus, unwittingly, precipitated the destruction of the foundations on which their own world rested. A future historian will triumphantly relate that the rise of the new millennium of which the fascists speak was made possible by the fact that the defenders of the pre-fascist civilization, with nothing more urgent to do than to quarrel among themselves, failed to face unitedly and understandingly the common threat to all the values they cherished.

WALDO LELAND

Director of the American Council of Learned Societies

WHAT ANSWER is to be made to Archibald MacLeish's challenge to "the irresponsibles"? Not one but many answers will be offered, and perhaps no one of them, nor all of them together, will soon answer it. Many reservations might be made, as Mr. MacLeish himself suggests. Perhaps he has not done justice to the countless exhortations of scholars, scientists, and educators these last ten years, denouncing the evil that was growing on the earth and warning us of its fatal consequences. Perhaps he does not realize how much earnest, even desperate, effort has been devoted to the study of the social, economic, political, and spiritual problems of mankind, in the hope of reducing if not of solving them. I think that he does not sufficiently take into account the part that scholars and scientists, especially those of the United States, have had since 1920 in the endeavor to bring about a new era of mutual understanding and cooperation among the intellectuals of the world. He may not appreciate the acuteness of their distress as they have seen colleagues persuaded, or more often terrorized, into, apparently at least, abandoning the ideals of intellectual and spiritual freedom and submitting to the dictates and perversities of relentless authority.

But the fact remains, and there is not much satisfaction in deceiving ourselves, that we have failed; at least at the present moment we seem to have failed. For if we had succeeded, the world would now be a better place in which to live, instead of which it is a far worse place than it was twenty years ago. Why have we failed? Where does the blame lie?

Archibald MacLeish thinks that the fault lies in "the organization of the intellectual life of our time"; in the fact, as he sees it, "that intellectual responsibility has been divided . . . and by division destroyed." Is there not much truth in this diagnosis? I think there is.

As we look about us we see scholars who feel acutely that much is wrong, blaming the scientists, or the educators—especially the educators. They are loath to admit that they have a responsibility beyond their own research; the scientists also decline responsibility beyond their own investigations and discoveries; the educators, divided among themselves as to their aims and their methods, blame each other, or unite in blaming the scholars and the scientists. Is it strange, therefore, that amid this confusion of disclaimers and recriminations, evil flourishes and reaches monstrous proportions? Is it strange that those who are confused, or weary, or disgusted, turn to authority and seek to "achieve at least . . . the dignity of obedience"?

PERRY MILLER

Associate Professor of History and Literature, Harvard University

I CANNOT speak for the writers, and I speak for scholars only in so far as I myself aspire to be one. I think MacLeish is not correct when he says, or implies, that the crisis was not primarily a crisis of food, of arms, created by political forces and economic collapse; but however it was created, it is indeed a revolution against the common culture of the West. MacLeish is right that in the face of the crisis the scholars and writers stand hopelessly divided and the scholars paralyzed. He is right when he says that the Ph.D. thesis is the perfect image of the scholar's world, and his description of the thesis is wholly accurate.

The conception of the scholar as one who cultivates objectivity, detachment, dispassion arose at a time when those virtues were something to be fought for; they promised hope not for scholars alone but for all mankind. There was a grand and militant faith behind them, and there was, it might be said, something to be dispassionate against. MacLeish forgets that in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries the scholars were fighting for objectivity against enemies that also were threatening the common culture of the West. And to a fair degree they won. They won because society wanted them to win, wanted it strongly enough to back them up. Then, when they had won, the tension out of which had emerged the ideal of objectivity passed away, or seemed to pass, and the idea remained—remained for a thousand reasons, but most notably because more people wanted to be educated than ever before, and so there were more jobs for educators, and educators must be scholars.

The more it became an affair of jobs and the less an affair of objectivity—for the sake of truth alone—the more the Ph.D. flourished. Most men in America do not write a Ph.D. thesis for the sake of the work, they do it to get a job; they don't write learned articles in unreadable trade journals for the work itself, they write them to get promotions. MacLeish distinguishes between the practical man who can be indifferent to these troubles and the scholar who should not be indifferent. But the fact is, the scholar has become, by and large, a practical man. And like other practical men he finds the reign of liberalism, the lack of corporate responsibility, the freedom to do what he will and as he will, comfortable. He has forgotten that he came into being because there was a function for him in society, and he will not remember until society reminds him. As yet society has exerted no pressure upon him sufficient to stimulate his imagination and to make him grasp what it has a right to demand of him. The few with broader vision are met by their colleagues with spoken or implied rebukes for having deserted the citadel of the fraternity, their precious freedom from partisanship. What these colleagues really mean is what any American business man means: "Let me alone. I am doing a profitable business and I do not want to be disturbed until I have to be."

JOSEPH FREEMAN

Author and Former Editor of the New Masses

AFTER THE first World War, Julien Benda accused the clerks of treason, lashed writers for abandoning their true office and submitting mind and will to their governments. Then Romain Rolland proposed his International of the Mind to safeguard the autonomy of the intellect against the organized force of states, classes, and parties. Finally there came Henri Barbusse's "Clarté," frankly partisan, openly serving a struggle for the future. This set the pattern for similar groups throughout the world.

For some reason history did not always consult the writers and scholars, either singly or in groups. Now and then it took surprising turns. But at least the pattern set by Barbusse had one practical advantage. It did not assume that men of letters are gods, priests, prophets, or miracle men who by isolated moral fiat or the splendor of their vision can determine the fate of mankind.

It is a long, long time since anyone has seen an ivory tower. Writers have been anything but irresponsible about the vital issues of our age. Both as men and as men of letters, the best of them have spoken and acted persistently and passionately on the right side of the great struggle; and they have certainly done their best to oppose evil with all the arms of scholarship and writing at their command.

Mr. MacLeish's grave indictment, therefore, involves not the irresponsibility of the writer but his incapacity to prevent the moral consequences of a civilization's decay. Whose the blame? True, modern science and industry have brought division and specialization into every field, literature and learning included. But imagine blaming the wars and famines of our time on the Ph.D. thesis!

Suppose the universal literary genius should appear, the man of letters pure and whole, who has eaten both of the Tree of Knowledge and the Tree of Life, and can therefore know and create at the same time. Could he, by magic incantation, halt the sea and start it rolling again at will? Voltaire was a genius, a great political pamphleteer, an adept at intrigue, a speculator, a prophet, and an opportunist. For all his contributions to the French Revolution, would you say it was he and his fellow-writers who unleashed it? Milton, a far nobler man and writer, was in the ranks of a political movement, a member of a revolutionary government, an active partisan of a great dictator who dissolved Parliament, butchered the Irish, imposed a new and more democratic order with fire and sword. Were Milton's poems and pamphlets responsible for Cromwell's regime? More likely "Paradise Lost" and the Protectorate were two aspects of the same profound social change.

If writers are to be true to their office, they must begin by surrendering the illusion that their words have the magic power to govern the course of events. It was not our words which loosed murder in the world nor is it our visions which can halt it. We can, however, try to understand the real forces which govern events and ideas, and we can communicate this understanding to some of those who are misled by unscrupulous men in power, whether these be men of action or men of words.

What Mr. MacLeish wants—what we all want—is not only a world of security and peace but also the enhancement of the human spirit in all its potential freedom, dignity, and creative force. That must be the work of an entire civilization. It will require the writer to take part in the realm of practical affairs. It may also require him to reconsider the relationship of all aspiration to the reality with which it must come to terms. Perhaps some of the values most vital to scholar, writer, and reader cannot, in any culture, be found in the practical world but only in imaginative learning and art; and perhaps it is by keeping the aspiration alive and clear that literature, as such, becomes a practical force.

WILLARD THORP

Associate Professor of English, Princeton University

I CAN only agree with what Mr. MacLeish says in The Irresponsibles and regret the situation which he sets forth. There may be some point, if we can hope to amend that situation, in looking further into the causes which have produced it. I should like to suggest two subsidiary reasons why American scholars feel themselves justified in their irresponsibility—which they designate by such sanctified terms as "scholarly aloofness," "dispassionateness," and "devotion to permanent values."

In the first place, the American scholar, especially in the private institutions of learning, is not master in his own house. Our private universities are controlled by trustees or overseers, a system of government handed down from colonial days, which is now altogether antiquated and ridiculous. It is tacitly assumed by trustees and faculty members alike that no group of feckless scholars is capable of governing its own concerns, whether that entails the safe investment of funds or decisions on educational policy.

The scholar, thus refused, and then presently not desiring, the full responsibility for the destiny of his smaller world, rationalizes his position. That responsibility, he argues, would be a needless burden. His larger responsibility is to the scholarly ideal, to ultimate truth. All he asks is to be let alone to pursue that ideal with an incorruptible devotion. To yield to the exigencies of one's time would be to admit one's corruption.

As Mr. MacLeish implies, the scholar in letters is trained to irresponsibility by the Ph.D. process to which almost anyone who hopes to succeed in the profession must now subject himself. There was a time when it was possible for critics to hold professorial chairs in literature. This is no longer true, save in rare instances. There is now one road to success; the graduate seminar, the Ph.D. oral, the published article, the research project, the monograph, the paper read at the meeting of the learned society, are the milestones along the road. This elaborate process of achievement has developed into a ritual, the faithful performance of which becomes all-important and brings a sense of accomplishment.

A part of the ritual prescribes the proper attitude the scholar must take toward the author he has chosen for a lifetime's investigation. He has been trained to avoid passing judgment on the ideas of Milton or Dryden or Johnson; it is his function to set them forth but not to treat them as if they were contemporary with him or to try to determine their present validity. He prefers to neglect, for a more lofty pursuit, that portion of his author's career which was turned toward the world of his time. He produces a picture of Arnold or Wordsworth which is an image of himself. In this picture Arnold, the highly serious poet, becomes a vastly more valuable person than the author of "Culture and Anarchy."

In the Wind

BEFORE HIS recent speech on American foreign policy Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh held a series of private conferences with William R. Castle, former Under Secretary of State. One of Herbert Hoover's representatives also participated in the discussions. They met in New York.

ALTHOUGH ITS burial won't be officially announced for some time, the La Follette Anti-Labor-Spy bill is dead. There may be further talk about it at this session, but it will probably never reach a House vote. "National defense" excitement killed it.

JOE McWILLIAMS, leader of the Christian Mobilizers, will be a candidate for Congress this fall. He is running in New York's Eighteenth Congressional District, which includes Yorkville. It will be New York's first election campaign on an anti-Semitic program.

THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL recently carried this Associated Press dispatch: "James H. R. Cromwell, United States minister to Canada, announced Monday that he would resign his post May 21." The dispatch was headlined (by mistake) "Public Improvement Promised."

WHEN THE documentary anti-war film "Lights Out in Europe" was shown in Boston, censors approved it with one qualification. All scenes showing corpses had to be eliminated at Sunday presentations.

A PUBLICITY MAN'S nightmare was exemplified by the closing of Ernest Hemingway's play, "The Fifth Column." With the phrase "fifth column" splashed over every newspaper, it looked as if the play would have an indefinite life. But Franchot Tone had a bad throat.

IN THE Harvard Law School announcement of courses for 1939-40 this item appeared: "International Law (omitted 1939-40)."

WHILE THEY aren't saying so publicly, relief officials see the armament program as a virtual—if temporary—end to their headaches. One Washington official has privately estimated that seven million potential relief clients will be taken care of by the program.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE President's speech to Congress was undoubtedly the most brilliant piece of political strategy and the most adroit use of a given situation that have ever been seen in this country. Franklin Roosevelt has a veritable genius for timing, for seizing upon an event and exploiting it to the full for his administrative or political purposes. He accurately sensed the horror and alarm in the public mind at the developments in Holland, Belgium, and France and achieved what he wanted with the maximum of speed and ease. No President was ever applauded more warmly by Congress, or more overwhelmingly supported.

When all this is said, however, it does not follow that the President was fair in his presentation of the situation or that the program which he asked for can be executed in a short period and without a terrific burden of expense. Indeed, I think his speech was in many ways a typical Rooseveltian performance—embarking the country on a huge economic program before the proposal had been thought through. It came very close, through its half-truths, to misleading the public. I am not accusing him of any deliberate deception, or of insincerity. Far from it. I have reason to know that he is worried greatly by the fear of foreign invasion and that he has been in this frame of mind for some time past. None the less, many of the things he said are likely to arouse false hopes about what can be done to defend the country; they also misrepresent the actual danger of an invasion from overseas.

Take, for example, his statements as to the time it takes to fly from once-distant points to the United States. He said that it is only six hours by air from the fjords of Greenland to New England and that modern planes starting from the Cape Verde Islands can be over Brazil in seven hours. Those are true statements; individual aviators can unquestionably do this. But they have left in the mind of the reading public the idea that great masses of planes could come over at any moment from these distant places, bomb us, and then go back. That, of course, is not the case. The Germans are fighting like mad to obtain air bases in Holland and France which will be only twenty or fifty miles from England. They have found that even with their advanced aviation they cannot effectively bomb England from the more distant German bases. And what is equally important, only a year or so ago Admiral Leahy, then the head of our navy, testified that the fortification of Guam would be no menace to Japan because no bombers then existent could fly from Guam to Japan—750 miles.

What the President forgot to tell the country is that when a squadron of bombers leaves its base it leaves behind it hangars, machine shops, great depots of bombs and machine-gun ammunition, supplies of the highest-grade octane gasoline, a ground force of thirty men to every pilot, and a spare pilot for every machine. In other words, an air base must be practically a small town, if the bombing squadron is of any size. The Germans are reported to be changing their plane engines after each long flight and actually doing it in the phenomenal time of five minutes—this on the statement made to me by an American who timed such a change in Berlin last August. Obviously, to establish an air base like this takes a large number of laborers in addition to the skilled mechanics, and if the base is overseas there must be a number of steamships in service to transport all the necessary material. The establishment of any such base would not only take time; it would require so much open preparation that it could not be concealed in any country in South or Central America. These are some of the things that Mr. Roosevelt forgot to tell the American people when he led them to believe that bombers could fly up here from Mexico in two or three hours. Nor did he point out that if a few sporadic bombers came over this country they could achieve no worth-while military objective, though unquestionably they might kill and destroy.

Only a year ago a high official in Washington told me that if Hitler pressed a button on his desk, 1,500 German bombers could be in Rio de Janeiro next day. I repeated this to some experts and they declared it preposterous. If the official had stopped to consider how many landing fields there were in Rio de Janeiro he never would have made such a statement. Of course he overlooked the fact that there are no aviation shops, no trained ground forces, no reserve engines or machine tools, and not many mechanics in the city. In this he displayed the same superficiality of thought of which the President has been guilty. Finally, I think the President ought to have told the public what Captain Whiting, a lifelong naval flier, said to the New England Aviation Conference at Hartford on May 18—namely, that if 10,000 of the 50,000 planes asked for should be awarded to the navy, no fewer than 300,000 ground men and 20,000 pilots would be needed, which is considerably more than twice the number of officers and men now in the navy for its every purpose. In short, 50,000 planes will mean 1,600,000 pilots and ground men!

THE WHOLE OF HOUSMAN

BY MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

IN 1894 A. E. Housman, having been given a manuscript of his brother's poems to read, sent that prolific author a minutely detailed criticism that included the following sentences:

> What makes many of your poems more obscure than they need be is that you do not put yourself in the reader's place and consider how, and at what stage, that man of sorrows is to find out what it is all about. You are behind the scenes and know all the data; but he knows only what you tell him. It appears . . . that in writing that precious croon you had in your head some meaning of which you did not suffer to escape one drop into what you wrote: you treat us as Nebuchadnezzar did the Chaldeans, and expect us to find out the dream as well as the interpretation.

The irony here requires no italics. Two years later Housman published the book that sped his fame through the English-speaking world. "A Shropshire Lad" caught the pathos of its generation; its accents of loss and regret are fixed in the consciousness of all modern readers, and its croon has been judged sufficiently precious; but the grimly disciplined poignance that forms its claim and appeal to the world, though sometimes quavering toward intimacy or revelation, remained to the end of Housman's life masked and inscrutable.

That inscrutability was the mark and habit of his character. By the age of thirty-seven he had set his back implacably on the vivacity of spirit that had once made him the gayest member of his family. He had weathered the crushing blow of failure in Greats at Oxford; he had fallen under the "heavy change" that made him a stranger to his relatives. Ten years of drudging service in the Patent Office had passed like a slow purgatory, varied only by solitary labor under the gas lamps of the British Museum, where he won the mastery of classical texts that was rewarded in 1892 by the Latin professorship at the University of London. Long before he reached the middle of his road, Housman had withdrawn into the secret fastness of his nature. Robinson alone among modern poets offers a comparable figure of mute austerity; Conrad's abrupt check to intimacy or confidence in his personal writings becomes almost genial by contrast. "Can you get him to talk? I can't!" cried Robert Bridges on one occasion; and when Housman was told that Wilfrid Blunt, speaking in his diaries of a visit from the poet, had said, "He would, I think, be quite silent if he were allowed to be," he answered, "That is absolutely true."

Silence is the initial condition of Housman's poetry *, as it was the token of a painful diminution of personality that befell him at the outset of adult life. His verse was set from the beginning, by an almost violent mandate, in a fixed and deliberate mold. It offers no characteristic modern pattern of growth, experiment, and discovery. Only Hardy's shows as undeviating an identity from first to last. His distance from the great poets of tragedy or pessimism—agonized, rebellious, impressionable—is great: not only from Baudelaire, Verlaine, and Villon, for whom he expressed a distaste, or from Heine, whose continuous influence brought so little of the German's critical wit and exhilaration into his lyrics, or from Arnold and Hardy, whom he admired above all his contemporaries, but from Pascal and Leopardi, those two stricken witnesses of the dark abyss and the frightening heavens, whom he "studied with admiration" and whose anguished vision and starlit shudders are sometimes caught in his own finest songs. Beyond any of these brothers in darkness he stifled his agony before the mystery and fatality of life. His lyrics speak from the threshold of silence itself. Had their discipline become as absolute as the one he imposed on his practical emotions, his poems would have receded wholly into the reserve that marked Housman's outward character.

That discipline was as final as any poet, short of the defeat of his gifts, could make it. Housman's first problem as a lyrist was to perfect a form and language exactly expressive of the extreme mandate of will he imposed on his sensibility. He once admitted Heine, Shakespeare's songs, and the Border ballads as his models but was "surprised" at the imputation of Latin and Greek influences. But these cannot be slighted. Housman's whole temper, recognizing its suspension between an active poetic impulse and a willed surrender of it, between an instinctive fervor for life and a tragic denial of its value, sharpens toward irony, seeks resolution in the ambiguity of epigram, and tends to express the ingrowth of its forces and the tension of its faculties in a salient virtue of the Latin lyric style—its integrity of structure, its verbal and tonal unity, its delicate stasis of form. What it gave him—as did the Elizabethans, among whom he once called Jonson his master—were the interlocking balances and inversions of phrase, the distributed reference in nouns and pronouns, the hovering ambiguity of particles, the reflexive dependence of verbs and subjects that give his stanzas their tightness and pith. Had he coerced a purely modern and explicit English into these structures he would have produced a language continuously—instead of intermittently—stilted. But here one of his strongest sympathies came to his rescue—his love of folk speech. The aphoristic tang and irony of peasant idiom, grafted to the sophistication of the Horatian style, relaxed his temper, freed it from formulated stiffness and cliché, and gave Housman his true and single medium as a poet—a verse style marked by a subtle irony of tragic suggestion, a tensile integrity of phrasing, a sense of haunting human appeals playing against the grim inexorability of law. In that medium, rising above the inertness of a formula and the desperate repression of his impulses, he wrote his finest poems.

---

* "The Collected Poems of A. E. Housman." Henry Holt and Company. $3.

These, now that his work stands complete, no longer appear in some of his most quoted lyrics, those that cast his thought into the inflexibly didactic form that is always the bane of a negative temperament. The lesser Housman, the one most vulnerable to parody, imitation, and personal attack, is seen wherever his lyric style hardens into such inflexibility and his pessimism into the hortatory despair that becomes by inversion sentimental. Originally, it appears, Housman had an extremely uncertain taste in words and meters. He was fond of the singsong lilt or chant used in rather tawdry and superficial poems like Atys, The Land of Biscay, and "Far known to sea and shore." Of Atys ("Lydians, lords of Hermus river, Sifters of the golden loam") he once said that he was so fond of the rhythm that he always doubted the merit of any poem in which he succumbed to its attraction. He came to guard himself from that music as he guarded his emotional impulses from the appeals of common life and friendship. At both ends of his narrow lyric range, as at both ends of his emotional character, he exercised a ruthless vigilance: here from the spontaneity of feelings that had to be canceled, there from the violence of a censorship so strong that it could end not merely in silence but in emotional paralysis and the logic of suicide. Recoiling from instinctive music or feeling, he produced poems of an opposite extreme: of a deadly and inverted romanticism, of a pessimism so imperative and bare of realistic qualities that they produce a repellent travesty of his talent. Here the Latinized concentration bristles with guards to emotion, and starkness of vision becomes as cloying as the lines in which he rings changes on the ale, the lads, the night, the noose, and the gallows to the point of comic surfeit. It appears at its worst in "Think no more, lad," The Welsh Marches, "Say, lads, have you things to do," "Others I am not the first," "The laws of God," "Yonder see the morning blink," The Immortal Part, and The Culprit. The authentic part of his talent demanded escape from confines as laming as these, and it is only when he gives some voice to the instinctive delight of his senses, to memories of lost youth, or to responses to nature, that he arrives at the finer sincerity of "With rue my heart," On Wenlock Edge, "Far in a western brookland," and The Merry Guide. He succeeds best of all when the repressed emotion becomes externalized, released from an iron-clad vigilance, adopts a dramatic mask or situation, and so takes on the life and pathos of genuine lyric realism: when, in Bredon Hill, Hughley Steeple, "Is my team plowing," "To an athlete," "I to my perils," "In valleys green and still," and "With seed the sowers scatter," he resolves the hostilities of his nature to their finest delicacy and harmony, avoids both the curt asperity and the occasional Aeschylean pomp of which he was capable, and contributes exquisite poems to the English lyric tradition.

They succeed, moreover, in revealing and relaxing the enigmatic nature of the man who wrote them and in dissolving the contradiction that gave him his quality as a character. They make credible the tyrant of Latin texts who could flay rivals or sycophants alive, yet who led a life of painful loneliness and who, given evidences of affection, described their effect as "almost overwhelming"; the solitary who called himself a Cyrenaic but who favored Epicureans above Stoics; the critic who disliked democracy and defended slavery but who protested the tyranny of the laws of God and man and pleaded for the felon taken to prison "for the color of his hair"; the man who enjoyed bitterness and kept notebooks carefully indexing his vituperations but who saw himself in T. E. Lawrence's words as stricken by "a craving to be liked—so strong and nervous that . . . the terror of failure in an effort so important made me shrink from trying"; the recluse who was contemptuous of comfort and flattery but who told a young American admirer, "Certainly I have never regretted the publication of my poems. The reputation which they brought me, though it gives me no lively pleasure, is something like a mattress interposed between me and the hard ground."

He was complex obviously and an eccentric certainly, a personality of laming deficiencies and self-persecuting logic; a lyric artist of the most limited order. He lends himself almost naively to J. Bronowski's attack (in "The Poet's Defense") as a victim of inverted sentiment from whose "welter of standards" little emerges but a cancelation of feelings almost antiphonal in regularity and as a self-belittler who took evasive refuge in negations of life, of emotion, of the nature and meaning of poetry itself. Housman's admirers have done him the disservice of blind adulation; his detractors, with the added cooperation of his own perverseness and inconsistency of temperament, will go to inevitable extremes. There are even severer measures of his stature. The cry of despair has sounded in modern poetry, as in ancient, with an anguish but also with an illumination that Housman seldom or never attains. "Wer wenn ich schriee, hörte mich denn aus der Engel Ordnungen?" "Selfwrung, selfstrung, sheathe- and shelterless, thoughts against thoughts in groans grind." "I must lie down where all the ladders start In the foul rag-and-bone shop of my heart." "L'Irréparable ronge avec sa dent maudite Notre âme." Of the protest, intensity, and courage of these castings down of spirit he dared little, and his loss in range and force of character is inevitable.

Yet as we now see Housman in his full stature, as the obscurity of his temperament begins to wane, so also the exacerbation of his emotion and his evasion of responsible feeling begin to take on the alleviation of what at its best becomes a subtle and ennobling lyric dignity, a mastery of selfhood and of style that surmounts the imposed denials of his life and the implacable tragedy he saw there but, having seen and faced it, refused to disguise from himself. What that tragedy was is too much a part of the complex of his nature and his poems to bear crude expression, but this much he makes unmistakable: it was his realization that he was destined to live a life deprived of human love. That fact, implicit everywhere, is written clearly enough into the poems on pages 28, 66, 68, 114, 187, 221, and 233. Whatever irresolution exists in his book is a reflection of the contradiction imposed on his faculties by nature itself; the pervading frustration resulted from an intelligence that permitted no blinkers before the fact. But concealed in Housman's nature, masked by his forbidding exterior and his scholarly isolation, existed the true stuff of the poet, once free and impulsive but surviving even its later curtailment, and he was strong enough to make of that conflict the strength and charm of his poems. The science and realism that permit us to see the errors or defects of men also impose the responsibility of understanding them. Outside his poems Housman made that understanding difficult enough, and even inside his verse the slightest comparison with Baudelaire and Hopkins, Yeats and Rilke, immediately gives the measure of his lower station. Yet if he ate of the shadow so long that he became something of the shadow of a man, he at least refused to lapse into sullen silence over the whole wretched business of existence. His endurance was the sign of his character, and the lyrics he wrested from grief and discipline are the mark of his true, if minor, genius. He is one of the most complete instances in literature of the man determined to live by will alone, and his lyrics too often reveal what the discipline of will does to a poet. Yet the discipline was real, and its reward came when his suppressed forces broke from him in the form of an exact and exquisite art. It saved him from languor and annihilation, and in the complete book of his songs, standing between the perils of sense and insistence of death, are the lyrics that hold their permanent beauty. They sufficiently redeem his title as a poet and bring to mind what his friend A. C. Benson once said in assaying the talent of Edward Fitzgerald, a fellow-sharer with Housman of the melancholy shadows of life:

> The process of estimating the character even of the best of men must be of the nature of addition and subtraction. It is the final total that is our main concern. . . . There can be little question on which side the balance lies. We may regret the want of strenuousness, the overdeveloped sensibility, which led him to live constantly in the pathos of the past, the pain of the contemplation of perishable sweetness. But we may be thankful . . . that the long, quiet years were not misspent which produced, if so rarely, delicate flowers of genius. To enrich the world with one imperishable poem, to make music of some of the saddest and darkest doubts that haunt the mind of man—this is what many far busier and more concentrated lives fail to do. . . . To touch despair with beauty—this is to bear a part in the work of consoling men, of reconciling fate, of enlightening doom, of interpreting the vast and awful mind of God. Truth itself can do no more than hint at the larger hope.

After the Peace

THE UNITED STATES OF EUROPE. By Alfred M. Bingham. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

THE continent of Europe like a great magnet has been drawing our attention since the conference in Munich. With the invasion of the Low Countries it is difficult to think of anything else. Yet the news which comes to us is bent by censorship, distorted by propaganda, rewoven by commentators. We have had few dependable facts about Europe for a long time—the best proof of which is the erroneous conclusions we formed about the defense of Finland, the defense of Norway, and the internal weakness of Germany. We have been misled by oratorical contrasts between the slave psychology of the totalitarians and the superior initiative of free men. Lately, however, the slaves have been showing most of the initiative.

From these mountains of information and misinformation we build our generalizations. In making them each one adds a cartload of his own previous prejudices and fixed ideas. The result is an edifice of abstractions wonderful to behold. An analogy which comes to my mind is that of a very tall lighthouse, pierced with a multitude of windows and bathed in drifting fog. At every window is an American, seeing something which no one else sees in quite the same way. Each window represents a picture of Europe.

Here is the picture of Hitler the monster, moving to devour the planet. If he is not stopped, we shall all be engulfed. Here, at a different level, is the picture of the old, old struggle for power in Europe, with Germany making another bid for dominance and Britain and France trying again to thwart it, while Italy and Russia wait to see which way the cat is going to jump. Hitler becomes only an incident in an ancient and bloody game. Here is the picture of an ideological clash between two systems, one called totalitarianism, the other democracy. Here is the picture of European man at last overcome by his machines. Spengler once looked through this window and wrote "The Decline of the West." Here is a picture which frames a complete blank, leading the onlooker to the conclusion that there is nothing in Europe worthy of attention by the United States. There are many more windows giving equally contradictory results. Dorothy Thompson is shouting out of one; Hamilton Fish out of another directly opposite.

The sad thing is that no window gives an adequate world picture. We haven't the facts upon which to base competent generalizations. What do we know, for instance, about the real relations between the governments of Russia and Germany, Russia and Italy, Germany and Italy? Most of us lack the mental techniques to order the facts if we had them. Our logical processes are distorted by a primitive language structure and by emotion. There is something going on over there too huge and cloudy for us to grasp.

There is one outlook, well toward the top of the tower, at which I sometimes sit and peer and which Alfred Bingham seems to have frequented as he wrote "The United States of Europe." What we glimpse through the clouds is this: Technology has tended to forge a unified economy in Europe, as it has in North America. Both continents are bound together internally by a network of power lines, railways, highways, waterways. In North America the technological realities are permitted relative freedom of action by our political organization. In Europe, on the other hand, the technological structure is frustrated by the political structure. Five great powers wrestle for supremacy within this limited, interlocked area, knocking over a score of lesser sovereignties as they struggle.

A political structure which was workable, if not altogether happy, in the pre-power, pre-bombing-plane age, is no longer workable. Its nemesis has come. It had to come. Somehow, the people of Europe must reorganize their political life to give passage to the flow of food, raw materials, and energy, or they must go down into the pit. The balance-of-power formula is no longer tenable. Rival armed sovereign states are no longer tenable. As a federated continent they might fight with other continents and survive, but when they fight among themselves, it becomes in effect a civil war in which they bomb, blast, and shatter their own subsistence. From this window, the German attack on the Low Countries seems as self-destructive as an armed assault by New York on Connecticut and Rhode Island.

BURLINGAME LIBR

Whichever side wins this war, it must establish a workable federation of the continent, or Europe will become an abode of cave men. It cannot be long held together by sheer force of arms and squads of secret police. It is impossible to operate a high-energy economy on that basis. A federation designed by the Allies would undoubtedly be better than one designed by the Germans. But God help both sides if no design is made at all.

Mr. Bingham has given careful attention to a practical design. Here it is in barest outline:

1. The power of European national states to make war on each other must be ended. Therefore all the great powers must disarm and join a United States of Europe. The smaller nations will come in automatically, including those in North Africa and the Near East. Russia need not join.
2. There must be a federal air force, army, and navy to maintain the peace of the continent.
3. There should be a Colonial Administration to supervise all colonies held by European nations and provide ready access to raw materials by all members. The mandate technique of the League of Nations can be helpful here.
4. The federal government shall have power to balance the Continental economy by undertaking public works, by tariff controls, by supervision of railways, posts, telephone, telegraph, radio, rivers and harbors, and commercial flying. It shall work toward the establishment of a unified currency.
5. The federal government shall have the power to tax its member states.
6. Machinery must be set up to protect national minorities, to provide for easy migration with property intact, and to insure against persecution. Complete civil liberties will not be possible at the beginning.
7. The federation should have a Department of Foreign Relations to deal with countries outside Europe, and might well experiment with three legislative bodies: one representing cultural groups—Slavs, Scandinavians, etc.; one representing member states; one representing population—"all possessing certain drawbacks."

Mr. Bingham is well aware of the difficulties, and the unknown variables, in this program. He does not offer a rigid formula, but rather a tentative and exploratory one. His long residence abroad makes him especially wary of hard-and-fast rules. Taking the available facts into consideration, he says in effect: "Is this not the place where the argument can begin?" It strikes me as the best foundation for further discussion I have yet seen—far superior to Mr. Streit's complicated geography. Europe is a unit now, though most Europeans are unaware of the fact. Our author goes on to explore the possibilities of a world union arising out of a federated Europe, Russia, Asia, and a federation of the Americas. This sounds remoter than ever today, and he admits it will not come tomorrow.

Mr. Bingham's approach is shrewd, realistic, hard-boiled, yet charged with humanity. He has been called an isolationist—that curious label without a living referent. Yet what he is trying to do is to find a formula by which the people of Europe may some day save themselves. I think that this is probably more helpful than joining the current civil war and seeing how many of them we can kill.

STUART CHASE

History of the German Army

THE GERMAN ARMY. By Herbert Rosinski. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

MR. ROSINSKI'S book is not, as its title might imply, a study of the Nazi army, but a brief history of the standing armies of Germany from the earliest times, with special reference to the social status of the German officer since the rise of Prussia. So large a field could, of course, be only superficially surveyed in this compass, but Mr. Rosinski, who has been a lecturer in the Berlin War Office and at German military and naval academies and was a founder of the German Society of Military Sciences, brings complete competence to this, his first book to appear in English. He is now connected with the British Department of Information. Nearly half of the volume deals with the World War and the post-war period. It stops, however, before the present struggle, which is the more regrettable since Mr. Rosinski's opinion about the functioning of the Hitler army would be of special value at this crucial hour.

In discussing German defeat in the World War, Mr. Rosinski lays the chief responsibility at the door, not of the second Moltke, who so gravely weakened the Schlieffen plan, but of Moltke's successor, General von Falkenhayn, who failed to resume the offensive after the Marne. The German army had for generations been trained to rapid mobile warfare. When the Schlieffen plan failed through no fault of its author, Von Falkenhayn threw the army machine permanently out of gear, on September 15, 1914, by assuming the defensive. A fresh advance before the lines were frozen into an immobility of four years was by no means beyond possibility. Mr. Rosinski quotes the very able Field Marshal Haeseler—who was too old to take the field in 1914—as saying that the trench warfare would never have come to pass "if we had not been led by such deplorable incompetence."

As for Ludendorff, Mr. Rosinski speaks of his "blind fanaticism, primitive outlook, his coarseness of thought, and massive materialism, painfully evident where he tries to deal with spiritual forces." Considered Schlieffen's "most brilliant pupil," Ludendorff could carry out the principles of his master in Russia, but failed wholly when he had to try to adapt himself to the war of immobility on the western front. Mr. Rosinski declares that Hindenburg's and Ludendorff's interference in political affairs invariably produced results opposite to those sought.

Discussing the present service, Mr. Rosinski admirably brings out that under the republic the efforts to deceive the Allies and evade the Treaty of Versailles created an atmosphere of deceit and intrigue in the army itself. "The officer," he says, "was taught that it was his duty to deceive not only the enemy but his own government." Whether this persists under Hitler's regime, Mr. Rosinski does not say. If it does, it is bound to be a factor of great importance in the event that things begin to go wrong in the face of a powerful enemy.

Mr. Rosinski describes succinctly and accurately the undercover struggle that has been going on, and still continues, between the Nazis and the army, and shows how the former have almost invariably outplayed the slower-witted military. Engrossed in the hasty building of a huge army, the military leaders, Mr. Rosinski says, failed to realize that their concentration on that task prevented them from dealing adequately with the political situation and handicapped them in their incessant underground struggle with the Nazi leaders.

Two important points brought out by Mr. Rosinski are, first, that the mass increase of the army has destroyed the old homogeneity and extraordinary efficiency of the little Reichswehr of the republic; and, second, that in its worship of the new idea of a "total war," with total mobilization of the whole country and its resources, the army has abandoned all its previous theories in favor of the creation of "a purely mechanical centralized control." Mr. Rosinski quotes a "leading person" as saying to him in 1936: "Among our elder staff officers the idea of being prepared for every emergency has developed such fantastic notions of the supplies needed that, if these gentlemen had their way, within three years the whole of Germany would be nothing but a gigantic munition dump, with a single private left to guard it!" It would not be difficult to show that we are well on the same road in the War Department in Washington.

Unfortunately, Mr. Rosinski's book is badly translated and inefficiently edited and is without an index. Why must such publishers send out a sloppy book? It does not help, for example, to read on one page that Clausewitz's first publication was "more than a hundred years ago" and five pages farther on that it was "more than sixty years ago."

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

QUISISANA CAMPS
On Lake Kezar in Center Lovell, Maine
Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.) in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.
QUAINT ■ RESTFUL ● ROMANTIC ■ CULTURED COMPANIONSHIP
Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass, Brook Trout. Non-sectarian. Ownership-Management.
RATES FROM $35 A WEEK. AMERICAN PLAN. WRITE FOR BOOKLET
N. Y. Address, 42 West 35th Street. Telephone Wisconsin 7-0200

LATIN AMERICA
MEXICO: 7 trips. 3 to 4 weeks in Mexico. Prices $228 to $541. More than mere sightseeing. Programs and contacts arranged by a distinguished committee, headed by the Minister of Education.
ECUADOR: A survey. Academic credit available. 1 month. $330.
THE OPEN ROAD
12th floor
8 West 40th Street New York

Buy Your Books Through The Nation
At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.
The Readers Service Division
The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue - New York

Never the Life

MARGARET FULLER: WHETSTONE OF GENIUS. By Mason Wade. The Viking Press. $3.50.

"YOU might not always have been sympathetic with her," Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt once remarked on Margaret Fuller, and this has always seemed a delicate phrase. Coming, indeed, from a source of compassion in itself both international and seasonless, undeterred neither by climate nor custom, wind, storm, nor dark of night, this is perhaps a most magnificent stipulation. And despite the efforts of a series of noted commentators from Emerson and Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance," down through Katharine Anthony, Margaret Bell, and now Mr. Wade himself, it is still problematical whether we are sympathetic with Margaret Fuller even most of the time. Pretentious if noble, arrogant if emancipated, radical but romantic, with her "habit" of castigating her friends (and others), her apparent monopoly of genius, her "mountainous me" and brain fevers, Margaret Fuller fulfilled Martineau's description of a gorgeous pedant. Was it a role worth playing? "With the intellect I always have, always shall, overcome," Margaret herself confessed; "but . . . the life, the life! O, my God! shall the life never be sweet?"

By and large, I'd say, it never really was, though Mr. Wade tries to make it so. Scholarly, intelligent, his study builds up the most generous portrait possible of this tragic career, and in a curious way that is the trouble with it. Perhaps a less tolerant account might have given us a more acute picture. Like our country, Margaret Fuller was probably more often wrong than right, but right or wrong she was always Margaret Fuller, and this sense of her vitality which marked Katharine Anthony's biography in 1920 is lacking here, so that the older study still seems to me actually a better human history. Miss Anthony's work was of course avowedly "psychological" (what biography can afford not to be?), while Mr. Wade eschews what he terms "the first wave of literary Freudianism." Is there much of a distinction? "The vision of the trampling horses," says Miss Anthony about Margaret's adolescent conflicts, "is an erotic fantasy common among hysterical maidens." "The trampling horses," says Mr. Wade, "which commonly figure in the dreams of adolescent girls and hysterical women, suggest that Margaret was sexually precocious. . . . " The "second wave" hasn't changed very much, though Mr. Wade seems to have a Freudian—or at least a literary—resistance to accepting the groundwork provided him.

This is understandable to be sure, and while we often complain that our neighbors don't really listen to us, it might make us uneasy if they really did. Since 1920, moreover, there has been much revaluation of Margaret Fuller's period, and Mr. Wade does give us a solider and integrated study of the Transcendental movements and offshoots surrounding his heroine—the sections on Margaret's Conversations, the Dial, and Hawthorne are excellent. And viewing transcendentalism through the eyes of Margaret Fuller herself throws a new and valuable, if less flattering, light upon some of its manifestations. Through her, indeed, its self-consciousness becomes clearer, its literary origins, its evasions and essentially sterile individualism, its seeking of the good life much too strongly ever to achieve it. Reading the pages of Van Wyck Brooks, Odell Shepard, and Mr. Wade, one cannot help feeling the attraction of this brief and haunted cultural flowering. But it is equally impossible not to feel its remoteness from that "cotton-spinning, dollar-hunting, canting and shrieking, very wretched generation" which just then was opening up a continent while these folk discussed divination versus experience. MAXWELL GEISMAR

Granville Hicks in 2040

THE FIRST TO AWAKEN. By Granville Hicks with Richard M. Bennett. Modern Age Books. $2.50.

WHAT will the world be like a hundred years from now? Always a fascinating speculation, it has sired such fictional accounts as Poe's "Mellonta Tauta," Bellamy's "Looking Backward," Morris's "News from Nowhere," Wells's "Time Machine" and "Things to Come," Huxley's "Brave New World"—to say nothing of Buck Rogers—and now "The First to Awaken." Mr. Hicks's inter-century traveler, a typical middle-class, middle-aged New Englander, put to sleep in a secret vault in 1940, wakes up in 2040 to view a Norman Bel Geddes landscape, streamlined, mechanized, inhabited by a super-society of happy, healthy, peaceful, thoroughly rational human beings (they don't even ask him to indorse a cigarette or run for President). They owe their contentment to elaborate social planning from which they derive all the economic advantages of regimentation without sacrificing any of the priceless benefits of individual freedom—a state, needless to say, which ought to satisfy anybody. Unfortunately, books like this almost inevitably fall into the pattern of question and answer, like a minstrel team, and even though Mr. Hicks enlivens his pages with drawings by his collaborator, sprightly allusions to people and events of our own time, and an apparatus of pseudo-scholarly footnotes, the tempo of the story lags somewhat: the Elysian social structure of 2040 and the history of the intervening years sound none too plausible, and the gadgets, for the most part, are not sensational enough to vie with disintegrator pistols or interplanetary rocket-ships. Nevertheless, reading about 2040 à la Hicks is incomparably more reassuring than reading about 1940 as the newspapers see it (censored at the source). Incidentally, newspapers are virtually eliminated in 2040. LOUIS B. SALOMON

IF you are appalled and shaken by the war which threatens to engulf America ▪ Mankind's growing economic and psychological insecurity ▪ The growing attacks on American democracy.

There is an important message for you

in YOU MIGHT LIKE SOCIALISM

by Corliss Lamont

Corliss Lamont is an independent worker for Socialism. He owes allegiance to no party and no faction. In this clear and absorbing book, his emphasis is on what Socialism would mean to America—how it could come about peacefully, how it would be administered, what it would accomplish. In these times, this affirmation of man's hope for a better world is especially heartening and significant.

302 pages. 95c

Modern Age Books New York

WAR AND PEACE MAPS

"ENVIRONMENT and CONFLICT in EUROPE"

Second edition, revised, to be ready June 1.
Four basic maps and 14 special maps: distinctive, accurate, in full color on a single sheet 35 x 45 inches, with accompanying booklet.

MILITARY OPERATIONS may be followed on a large map of Central Europe and surrounding areas and on three smaller maps of the western theater of war, of Northern Europe, and of the Near East. These maps show topography, railroads, roads, canals, principal towns, international boundaries, etc.

A FAIR SETTLEMENT FOR PEACE will take account of such data as appear on 14 special maps. These illustrate circumstances of nature and society under which the nations of Europe have been living, strengths and weaknesses in their structure and resources, and their relationships. They show population distribution, languages, critical climatic elements, mineral resources, navigable waterways, international trade, types of land use, international boundary changes, magnitude of world powers, routes to the Far East (the British "lifeline")

The accompanying booklet contains an explanatory text, a complete list of sources used in preparing the maps, and an index of names on the maps.

Price: $1.00

The AMERICAN GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY of New York
(Publishers of the Millionth Map of Hispanic America)
3753 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

RECORDS

ONE turns to Smetana's String Quartet "From My Life" not for the impact of greatness but for the charm and loveliness of its flow of Czech-flavored melody, the piquancy of its Czech rhythms. Columbia's new set (M-405, $6) offers a performance by the Curtis String Quartet that is admirable in its warmth and spirit, and that is well recorded. The group also reveals technical competence in such matters as tone, intonation, precision; but what one encounters in the Victor set of Dvorak's Sextet Opus 48 (M-661, $8) is the sheer incandescence of the Budapest Quartet and its two assisting players. This work, however, is not equal to the Smetana Quartet or to the best of Dvorak himself.

To the existing versions of Beethoven's beautiful Sonata Opus 24 for violin and piano Columbia adds another (M-404, $5). Taken by itself this performance by Jeno Lener and Louis Kentner is very fine; comparing it with the Busch-Serkin performance I find that while Lener's tone is more beautiful than Busch's there is more brightness and life in the sound of Serkin's piano than in the sound of Kentner's; moreover in the Busch-Serkin performance—and also in the Goldberg-Kraus—I find a greater suavity of style, which I prefer for this work; and outstanding, finally, in the Busch-Serkin performance is the unanimity of feeling and execution of another great ensemble team.

The music from Handel's "Alcina" recorded for Columbia by Weingartner with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra (X-164, $3.50) includes most of the Ballet Music—some of it charming—that Mengelberg recorded with the New York Philharmonic years ago, and also the Dream Music, now recorded for the first time, and some of it strikingly imaginative. The performance is excellent, the recording good, if not quite as fine as in the recent Weingartner sets of Handel concerti grossi.

FOLLOW THE WAR WITH
Major Eliot's cloth-mounted
GIANT STRATEGY MAP
INDEXED MAP THAT GIVES YOU EXPERT INFORMATION ON THE WAR IN EUROPE.
Drawn by Richard E. Harrison
33" × 27" SIX COLORS
Tear out this ad. Write name and address in margin. Attach $1 and send now to Reynal & Hitchcock, 386 Fourth Ave., N. Y. for YOUR MAP. Sent postpaid. N
$1

On a Columbia single (69841-D, $1.50) is Gieseking's superb performance of "L'Ile joyeuse," which for me is not one of Debussy's best works, but which amounts to infinitely more than his "Pagodes" on the reverse side. The performances are excellently recorded, except for the pianissimo g-sharp octaves in the bass at the top of page 11 of "L'Ile joyeuse," which are not recorded at all. The Concerto for harpsichord and organ by Soler, an obscure eighteenth-century composer, on another single (69842-D, $1.50), I find quite uninteresting; the performance by Gerlin and Pierront and the recording are good. As for the single of Stravinsky's "Baiser de la fée," it arrived broken.

Victor's outstanding orchestral release for May, I would say, is the record of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1 (15945, $2). This is not the best of the "Leonore" overtures, but it has wonderful moments—or at any rate moments that are wonderful in Toscanini's marvelous performance. Agreeably surprised by the unusually fine recording that Victor had achieved I glanced at the label to get the number and discovered that Toscanini had made the record not, as I had assumed, with the N. B. C. Symphony during his recent Beethoven cycle but with the B. B. C. Symphony in London.

As for Koussevitzky's set of Schumann's Symphony No. 1 (M-655, $8), the weakness of Schumann's symphonies that one reads about constantly is his ineffective and faulty use of the orchestra, so that what should be prominent is often obscured, what should be brilliant is often dull, and so on. This has led conductors to make changes in the orchestration; and it provided Frederick Stock, many years ago, with the excuse for not merely distributing the musical substance of the Symphony No. 3 among different orchestral instruments but changing the substance itself—adding measures, introducing new counterpoint, substituting a new coda at the end, altering rhythms, displacing accents—in all as presumptuous and tasteless a job as any that Stokowski has been guilty of. But this weakness of Schumann has been exaggerated: Toscanini has shown repeatedly that without changing anything in the score a skilful conductor can make everything stand out clearly and sound well; and Koussevitzky shows this in his performance of the Symphony No. 1. And the ineffective scoring of the musical substance is not very important compared with the inferiority of the musical ideas themselves, which is what really makes Schumann's symphonies inferior to his songs and works for piano. The Symphony No. 1 has a beautiful slow movement and fine moments in other movements; but no amount of excellence in performance—and Koussevitzky's performance has a great amount—can conceal the feebleness of the rest. The recording is a little over-brilliant and reverberant in the way many Boston Symphony recordings are.

I mentioned recently the bad rattle on the second side of the Victor set of Roy Harris's Symphony No. 3. This rattle was the distortion I had said previously was to be heard on the second side of the Victor set of "La Mer"; and I should have mentioned that it was to be heard also in the slow movement of the Haydn sonata played by Ernst Victor Wolff on Columbia, and in the H. M. V. recording, issued here by Victor, of Schubert's A major Sonata played by Schnabel. The technical people I asked about this said it was due to the overcutting they showed me on the records: the cutting needle of the recording apparatus had swung too far laterally. This would not happen, they said, if the companies recorded at a low volume level and depended on amplification by the phonograph to step the volume up. It would not happen if they recorded in this way for electrical phonographs and at a high volume level for the large number of acoustic phonographs that are still in use and that are incapable of stepping volume up or down. It does happen because the companies produce one record for both acoustic and electrical reproduction.

B. H. HAGGIN

[CORRECTION: In the article entitled Don Sturzo's Liberal Catholicism, by G. A. Borgese, in The Nation of April 27, a sentence which should have read, "A society with justice and freedom cannot but be a society of intellectual criticism without a field reserved to authoritarianism or totalitarianism of any kind," appeared through a printer's error with the "but" omitted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

Letters to the Editors

Fifth-Column Experts

Dear Sirs: The appointment of the former Austrian Bundeschancellor Dr. Arthur Seyss-Inquart as governor of the Netherlands is highly interesting if one knows the fifth-column background. For many years Dr. Seyss-Inquart has been very intimate with one of the leading Nazis in the Netherlands—Dr. Rost van Tonningen, chief deputy of the "Führer" of the Dutch Nazis, Anton Mussert, and editor of the Dutch Nazi journal Nationale Dagblad. The circle around Dr. van Tonningen and Anton Mussert has played an important role as a fifth column in the Netherlands.

The new governor, Dr. Seyss Inquart, worked with Dr. van Tonningen for many years in Vienna, where the latter was League of Nations controller for Austrian finances until 1936. The finance dictator van Tonningen and the secret Nazi Seyss-Inquart often had conferences concerning the Austrian Anschluss. Their discussions were sometimes shared by Dr. Franz von Papen, fifth-column "expert" since his work in the United States in the first World War. After the annexation of Austria Hitler appointed Dr. Seyss-Inquart, first, Bundeschancellor, later German Minister Without Portfolio, in appreciation of his "merits." After the occupation of Poland he was made deputy governor of the occupied area.

Van Tonningen came to Berlin immediately after his dismissal as finance controller for the League of Nations in 1936. There he had many conferences with the Nazi leaders before beginning his fifth-column work in his Dutch homeland, and even after. He will probably soon be allotted a more important role in the Netherlands under the Nazi regime—as "reward for his merits."

R. M. W. KEMPNER,
Formerly Legal Adviser,
Police Department, Berlin

Philadelphia, Pa., May 22

Civil Disobedience and the Indian Army

Dear Sirs: The usually well-informed Nation was grievously in error in stating in its issue of April 27: "In preparation for the showdown over civil disobedience practically all native Indian troops have been moved out of the country." The native Indian army, exclusive of white troops, at full war strength, totals approximately 250,000 men, of which at the present time less than 80,000 are serving outside India. The Indian police forces, totaling roughly 35,000 men, of whom less than 3,000 are white officers and sergeants, cannot be sent "out of the country" under any circumstances. During the last civil-disobedience campaign native police forces, led by white officers, were largely used to subdue rioters, and although "brutal repression," to use your own term, is largely a matter of opinion, there was little bloodshed or organized terrorism. Troops of the Indian army were not used for this purpose for the simple reason that such troops are invariably composed of races inimical to the Hindu majority, such as Sikhs, Dogras, Punjabis, Pathans, and others, whose delight in cracking a few Hindu heads would not have added to the growth of peace and order in India or facilitated the task of responsible British officials, some of whom, I can assure you, are genuinely anxious to aid a decent and fair measure of self-government in that country.

GEOFFREY A. BALDWIN

San Francisco, Cal., May 21

Mr. Haggin Explains

Dear Sirs: A man who in effect accuses me of carelessness and unfairness in my treatment of Victor's leaflets, as Lawrence K. Rosinger did recently, may be expected to give what I wrote about them the careful reading that constitutes the minimum of fairness to me. With such careful reading he would have seen that what I referred to as "vastly more pretentious" was not technical discussions and musical notations but the technical discussions and musical notation with which I said the writer of the leaflets made a pretense of knowledge and actually revealed ignorance.

If I did not point out that some of the other material was pretentious in the same sense, this was not because I overlooked it but because I had only limited space which I preferred to use for what I considered most important. It is the work of art itself that is important, not any historical facts about it; and it does not matter to me, therefore, what interesting facts the reader is told about the composer and his period if he is told things about the music that will mislead or confuse him as he listens to it. For this reason I did speak of the non-technical statement about the "rhapsodic exultation" in the slow movement of Schubert's Quintet Opus 163—a statement which may be significant to Mr. Rosinger but which attributes a wrong significance to the music.

Perhaps Mr. Rosinger will now understand why my tone was so sharp. I wasn't being witty in that last remark; I was being angry; and anger for good cause has a place in The Nation.

New York, May 11 B. H. HAGGIN

Good Writing

Dear Sirs: Will you please convey to Keith Hutchison for me my congratulations on his constant clarity and good, simple writing. He makes the subject of money, which I believe most of us find dull or complicated or both, alive and understandable.

I particularly enjoyed and was enlightened by his review of J. M. Keynes's book in the issue of May 4. He seems to understand the difference between clear writing and oversimplification. LOWELL BREADY

Santa Cruz, Cal., May 20

Pacifists Against Society

Dear Sirs: In reply to the letter in your May 11 issue from Lucille B. Milner about pacifists in war time, I should like to say that for pacifists to fuss about whether they are going to be fairly treated is contrary to the whole idea of pacifism. The pacifist, by opposing methods of force and violence, becomes the open and declared foe of the state in war time. He refuses to support the law of the land. If, on top of this, he also expects to be well treated, he is reversing the admonition to love your enemy and demanding that his enemies love him. In other words, he is asking that they live up to his principles, which they have, at least for the time being, renounced.

Why should the pacifist's opponents tolerate or try to understand his point of view when they have abandoned the peaceful means of settling disputes on which the pacifist insists? How can the pacifist expect the belligerents to play ball with him under such circumstances? The two camps, belligerent and pacifist, simply don't talk the same language. When war comes and violence is legally and socially sanctioned, the pacifist is in the position of a minority that seeks to obstruct, defy, break, or possibly resist the law.

The pacifist in war time refuses to abide by majority rule. He puts his own law, the law of his conscience, above the law of his country. He pits himself against society. He will not defend his country by means of violence even when his country's flag may be in danger. Therefore it is easy to understand how those who are willing to fight and give their lives for patriotic reasons, or who otherwise uphold war, can regard pacifists as traitors and anarchists.

For the pacifist to hope that when the emotions of his countrymen are aroused by war fever and when his country is engaged in what it regards as a just and imperative crusade, people are going to take much trouble to listen to his views or to sympathize with his plight strikes one as incredibly naive. Of course, the pacifist attitude isn't going to be understood in war time. It is barely tolerated even now. Naturally pacifists will be condemned and perhaps persecuted. In the obituaries of George Lansbury I have seen his Peace Pledge Union described as the "defeatist arm of Britain's 'fifth colunm.' " Pacifists in England are being rounded up by Scotland Yard now. Those who oppose the war are liable to fines and seven years' penal servitude. England has been more lenient to its conscientious objectors than other countries; so we need not go into how they are dealt with in France and elsewhere. The point is that to be a pacifist nowadays is hardly to be in tune with the spirit of the times. And for this failure to keep in step with the crowd the pacifist must be prepared to pay the penalty.

ANNE E. MOFFETT

Atlantic City, N. J., May 17

Sidewalk Sketch

Dear Sirs: I am a girl thirteen years old, and would like to tell you about a recent experience with a member of the New York police force.

Upon leaving the circus on its opening night, I overheard a man saying something about a strike of the "roughnecks"—later I found that there were pickets which I hadn't seen—so I went up to a fat, rosy-cheeked cop and asked him how long the circus people had been on strike and what they were striking about.

With a sneer he replied in a thick Irish brogue: "A red, hey?" "Not quite," I said, somewhat shocked by his sudden outburst, "I only wanted to—" "What are you then? Only a dirty red would want to know that." I was furious and was just about to say "Only a member of the Christian front would say that," but my companion tugged at my arm and we walked away. Maybe there should be a closer check-up of the New York police force—not by Martin Dies.

KATHERINE WEISS

New York, May 8

Medals for Civilians

Dear Sirs: In the press within the past few weeks two items have taken my attention. First, Eleanor Roosevelt, writing of the banquet at which The Nation presented her with an award, mentioned that William Allen White was present and said some very interesting things which she would carry home to the President. The second was a small item saying that the President had presented the Congressional Medal of Honor to George M. Cohan for writing "Over There" and another patriotic song during World War I.

I am all for honoring George Cohan, but why has this Congressional Medal not been awarded more frequently to men and women in civilian life who have made real contributions to American life and culture? Why not an award of the Congressional Medal to William Allen White? Or to that peerless First Lady of All Time—Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt?

At least we might put our leading citizens on an equality with the army, navy, and marines when it comes to awarding this highest decoration an American can receive—the Congressional Medal of Honor.

C. R. BODEN

Hollywood, Cal., May 18

Mr. Mayer Was Right

Dear Sirs: Arthur Mayer was perfectly right in his Who Wants Good Movies? in your issue of April 20. Another diehard and myself poopoohed older and wiser heads, and produced "The Fight for Peace" a couple of years ago. While the critics raved, audiences were notable by their absence on the few occasions when we could get dates. Our distributor is ashamed to report the grosses, or maybe he can't afford the stamps, but it is well under $5,000. The picture cost three times that.

HERBERT L. BREGSTEIN

Hollywood, Cal., May 12

Willard Gibbs's Life

Dear Sirs: I am at work on a biography of Willard Gibbs, the American physicist, and I shall be grateful for any material that will contribute to a clearer knowledge of his life and times—recollections, letters, photographs, and the like.

Please address all communications to me at Doubleday, Doran and Company, 14 West Forty-ninth Street, New York City.

MURIEL RUKEYSER

New York, May 16

Henry Mussey's Letters

Dear Sirs: I am making a collection of the letters of Henry Raymond Mussey. I would appreciate it if you or any of your readers having letters from him or anything written by him would send them to me in care of the Wellesley College Library, Wellesley, Massachusetts. All originals will be copied and returned if requested.

VIRGINIA MUSSEY

Wellesley, Mass., May 20

CONTRIBUTORS

JULIO ALVAREZ DEL VAYO, before he became Spain's war-time Foreign Minister, was one of Europe's outstanding newspapermen.

ERSKINE CALDWELL is generally accepted by critics as one of the most important novelists now writing in the United States.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is the author of "Our Promised Land," in which he discusses the social and political problems of the Northwest. He is on the staff of the Portland Oregonian.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, formerly editor of Poetry, is the author of "Literary Opinion in America."

STUART CHASE, author of many books on American economic and social questions, has lately turned his attention to problems of European economy.

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JUNE 8, 1940 NUMBER 23

The Shape of Things

IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO KEEP UP WITH THE defense measures tumbling through Congress or emerging from the President's study. Up to the hour of going to press, the score for the past week was as follows: Senate and House appropriated $15,000,000 to start work on a third set of locks for the Panama Canal. Both houses approved a bill to increase naval strength by 11 per cent and provide the navy with 10,000 planes manned by 16,000 pilots. The President stepped up the $3,300,000,000 arms program by another billion dollars; the whole vast measure is, of course, still under consideration. Two financial bills were introduced in the House: one to raise the debt limit to $48,000,000,000 and another to increase taxes by $656,000,000 annually for the next five years. This proposal is discussed by Keith Hutchison in Everybody's Business on page 708. The President has further indicated that he will urge a 10 per cent slash in all government spending not connected with defense. An advisory council, comparable to the War Industries Board of the last war, was appointed by the President to supervise the economic defense program. The most controversial event of the week was the President's request for authority to call the National Guard and army reserve into active service if necessary to "safeguard neutrality" and bolster the national defense. This met resistance arising from a feeling that such powers should not be handed to the President unless the need for them is fully explained. If a situation exists that makes military action seem imminent or even possible in the near future, the President should tell the people and Congress what it is. If he cannot tell, he should say so and explain why.

*

THE BOMBING OF PARIS ALMOST CERTAINLY preludes a new and even more dreadful phase of the war. The Germans claim they were attacking air fields, but forced by the defense to fly at tremendous heights, they scattered their missiles over a wide area, killing many civilians. Inevitably the Allies will retaliate on military objectives near German cities, with similar results. Reports from Berlin suggest that the Paris raid is preliminary to a new major offensive against the French lines along the Somme and Aisne, which may be accompanied by Italy's entry into the war and an attack on France through the Alpine passes. But the Flanders pocket has not yet been cleared up, and Allied troops are still holding Dunkirk. It seems clear that a large part of the armies which, a week ago, the Germans claimed were completely trapped have been evacuated. Moreover, Allied morale has been restored by the dogged success with which the British and French troops fought their way out of an impossible position, after their left flank had been exposed by Leopold's surrender. The evacuation also shows that the British navy is neither sunk nor helpless but a force very much to be reckoned with should the Germans attempt to invade Britain.

*

ALTHOUGH ITALY HAD NOT ENTERED THE war at the hour of going to press, it seems unlikely that the fateful step will be much longer delayed. During the past week a series of measures have been taken which admit no other interpretation. Blackouts have been put into effect in the industrial cities of northern Italy; negotiations with Britain for lessening blockade restrictions have been canceled; Italian children have been called home from strategic Greek islands in the Mediterranean; the 1942 World's Fair in Rome has been indefinitely postponed. Mobilization is reported to be virtually complete. It now appears that, at the outset at least, the Italian attack will be directed primarily against France and England, though there is a chance that Greece will be taken into "protective" custody. Tension between Italy and Yugoslavia has been materially reduced, possibly because of the sudden and decisive improvement in Soviet-Yugoslav relations. Hungary, which a few weeks ago seemed likely to be involved, suspended mobilization after a conference with Premier Molotov in Moscow. Another factor quieting the Balkans has been the weakening of Allied influence as a result of the setback suffered by Britain and France in Belgium. Bowing to the inevitable, Rumania replaced its pro-Ally Foreign Minister, Grigore Gafencu, by Ion Gigurtu, who is openly sympathetic to Germany. Turkey remains the one country having territory in Southeastern Europe which can definitely be counted on to oppose Axis penetration.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

REPORTS OF FIFTH-COLUMN ACTIVITIES IN Latin America have suddenly cropped up on all sides. A great deal has been written in the past two years about German trade and cultural penetration in South America. It now appears that in addition to their annoying but legitimate activities some of the German groups, particularly those in Brazil, Uruguay, and Chile, are highly organized on a semi-military basis. Pressure is being brought by the Gestapo in several of these countries to line up Germans whose zeal for the Nazi cause is in doubt. Parades by Nazi sympathizers are reported from Chile and Ecuador. German air lines continue to operate in Brazil, Ecuador, Peru, Chile, Bolivia, and parts of Argentina. Sensational reports have also come from Colombia and Mexico. Appraisal of these charges of subversive activity is difficult because the situation differs widely in the various Latin American countries. At one extreme we have such reports as those from Mexico, which, as Harry Block maintains elsewhere in this issue, may be strongly colored by propagandistic efforts by the oil companies to discredit the Cárdenas regime on the eve of a general election. The correspondents making these allegations have been called before Mexican authorities and challenged to provide evidence to substantiate their charges. At the other extreme are Brazil, with its compact German minority of two million, and Uruguay, with its effective, though much smaller, German organization. While it is easy to exaggerate the threat of these Nazi activities to our security, they cannot be disregarded.

*

THE CONSTITUTION IS BEING TRAMPLED ON in Congressional agitation over possible alien "fifth columnists," and some very odd people are ostensibly trying to hamstring the Trojan horse. One of them is Senator Reynolds of North Carolina, who has not been noticeably anti-Nazi in the past. Reynolds has amended the La Follette civil-liberties bill to forbid the employment of more than 10 per cent of aliens in any industry engaged in interstate commerce. We hope the House will excise this nonsense before passing the bill. If the House doesn't, the Supreme Court will. Just before the last war Arizona passed a law that in all business enterprises in the state employing more than five persons at least 80 per cent of the personnel must be citizens. The law was declared unconstitutional in 1915, and Chief Justice Hughes, then an associate justice, said for the court, "It requires no argument to show that the right to work for a living in the common occupations of the community is of the very essence of the personal liberty and opportunity that it was the purpose of the [Fourteenth] Amendment to secure. The discrimination is against aliens as such in competition with citizens in the described range of enterprises, and in our opinion it clearly falls under the condemnation of the fundamental law."

*

GEORGIA, WHICH SEEMS TO HAVE HAD THE worst attack of anti-alien hysteria, has an Attorney General, Ellis Arnall, who has asked all the state's Senators and Congressmen to amend the Constitution in order to remove its protection from aliens. Why not just remove the Bill of Rights altogether? The reality of a fifth-column menace has been demonstrated by European experience, but its exaggeration and abuse may themselves become a weapon of fifth-column subversion. Some of those talking loudest about the fifth column seem to be our own potential Quislings. Louis F. Post's famous "deportations delirium" after the last war disclosed the extent to which apparent attacks on aliens may be turned into attacks on the rights of citizens. During the Alien and Sedition Law excitement in 1798 James Madison raised his voice in effective protest against attacks on the alien. We suggest that Governor Rivers of Georgia, who seems bent on driving all aliens out of his state, Governor James of Pennsylvania, and other overheated super-patriots have a look at the speeches Madison made in Congress at the time. Madison was not a fifth columnist, although suspiciously friendly to the French Revolution. He was only the father of that subversive document, the Constitution of the United States.

*

"NOW I KNOW HOW QUEZON FEELS," SAID Mayor LaGuardia at one minute after midnight on June 2, when he embarked on the country's greatest experiment in municipal socialism by taking over the B.-M. T. subway and bus lines for the city of New York. The other privately operated rapid-transit system, the Interborough, will be taken over on June 12. By his cryptic remark the Mayor meant that, like Quezon and Philippine independence, having obtained the subway lines he wasn't sure he wanted them. His uneasiness is no product of a neurotic imagination. New York's great banking interests and newspapers, which pawed the air frantically when the Mayor wanted to build a $45,000,000 light plant, were strangely enthusiastic over his plan to bring the privately operated rapid-transit lines under public ownership. The reason for their enthusiasm was that the private lines were losing more and more money as a result of rising labor costs and increasing competition from New York's newest subway system, the publicly owned Independent line. The price paid for the private lines is about $180,000,000 more than the cold-blooded stock market thought them worth, and the principal benefit to the public of this experiment in public ownership will be a higher subway fare.

*

NATIONAL DEFENSE, THE THIRD-TERM ISSUE, and personal rivalries have combined to bring to a boil the seething pot of organized labor. Within the past few weeks Sidney Hillman's Amalgamated Clothing Workers and David Dubinsky's International Ladies' Garment Workers celebrated their twenty-fifth and fortieth anniversaries, respectively. In both cases the conventions were made the occasion for sharp criticism of John L. Lewis's leadership of the C. I. O., pleas for genuine efforts toward peace with the A. F. of L., and expressions of boundless enthusiasm for a third helping of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The differences were largely of degree. Dubinsky charged C. I. O. leaders with full responsibility for failure to patch up the quarrel and brought the I. L. G. W. U. almost to the point of returning to the A. F. of L. fold. Officially what keeps him still from the Green pastures is the failure of the Federation to clean out its racketeers and its autocratic suspension of dissenting affiliates. Beyond these excellent reasons, however, lies Mr. Dubinsky's distaste at the prospect of finding himself cheek by jowl with some of the Republican hierarchs of the A. F. of L. at a time when his union is passionate about keeping the New Deal in office. And there are those who see in his hesitancy the added consideration that perhaps changes are pending in the control of the C. I. O. that might make it worth his while to look before he leaps.

*

CERTAIN IT IS THAT JOHN L. LEWIS'S STOCK has slumped badly of recent weeks. His prediction of an "ignominious defeat" for Roosevelt should he try for a third term, his dark hints of a third party, his extreme isolationist position, and his opposition to the defense plans of the Administration—all have met with the sourest possible reception in the numerically greatest units of his organization. Lewis's loss has been Hillman's gain, and the Amalgamated chief reached a peak of prestige last week when Roosevelt appointed him as labor's sole representative on his Advisory Commission on National Defense. Hillman's new position may explain his urgent plea for peace in the labor movement, but he is not likely to achieve more success than Lewis unless the Federation, stung to the quick by the appointment, is given a place in the Presidential councils. As for his grip on the C. I. O., much will depend on the special meeting of the executive board which is being held as we go to press. Numerically, Hillman has the membership, but with each union entitled to one representative on the board, Lewis still has the votes.

Saving the Front Line

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE rush of Hitler's legions to the Channel; the threatened invasion of England; the imminent drive toward Paris—these are making American policy. For beyond these horrifying realities lies the much more menacing possibility of a total German victory with consequences for the United States which can still only be guessed at. Even the isolationists go no farther, these days, than to decry "hysteria" and insist that Germany can never physically attack this continent. They no longer argue the doctrine of American economic or political immunity. We all know that a Nazi victory will mean either American submission to German domination of world trade or a stubborn, solitary resistance, backed by economic and military weapons as mighty and ruthless as those of triumphant fascism. Neither prospect pleases; but no one doubts we shall choose the second.

In fact we have already chosen. We shall resist. We will not be gleichgeschaltet without a struggle, and we have the resources for a mighty struggle. So much is settled already. Our decision is implicit in a succession of requests from the President answered by swift enactments in Congress. In a headlong rush we are attempting to make up for lost time and lost money. We are repenting of our complacence. In our eagerness to prepare for what may happen we are already committing many foolish acts which will have to be rescinded. Taken together, however, the defense measures passed by Congress and others still under consideration represent a united American determination to resist with all possible weapons the threat to our future.

But the primary step in defending America against the consequences of a Nazi victory is neither a vast arms program nor measures to stamp out fifth columnists, real or imagined. The first step is to prevent a Nazi victory if it is still possible. At this moment France and Britain are defending a line that is, in a sense both actual and immediate, our own front line. If that line holds, many of our frantic enactments of the past week can be repealed or modified. If it is lost, those measures will serve only as a foretaste of what is to come.

In the last four years democracy has lost several crucial front lines. One was in Spain. That was handed to the fascist enemy by the British and French, with the United States as an active accessory. Another was in Czechoslovakia. That was handed to the enemy by the British and French without interference from the United States, unless the President's unheeded appeals for peace can be rated as protests. Since September of 1939 the line has moved westward, country by country. And the British and French have learned the hateful lesson that fascism cannot be held off by surrendering to fascism.

Perhaps they have learned it too late. That we do not yet know. We only know that they learned it late enough to imperil their own national existence, to make their present defense a struggle against final extinction.

So far the United States has only half learned the lesson. We were shocked by the betrayal of Spain and Czechoslovakia—a majority of us, at least—but only as we might be shocked by the murder of an innocent man. Only a few Americans recognized it as an attack on our own safety, a threat to the future of democracy in this land and in our own time. We were much more shocked by the successive swift conquests of Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, with all those conquests revealed of fascist preparation and penetration, of democratic unreadiness and demoralization.

Today we are both shocked and frightened by the spectacle of Britain and France at bay, retreating slowly, face to the enemy. We are frightened enough to scramble toward a state of preparedness in this country. But isn't it obvious, and shouldn't it be understood, that the present front line against fascism is now held by France and Britain with the support of their empires? Criminally and tragically, they refused help to the nations that held the line before them. Shall we, criminally and tragically, refuse help to France and Britain? If we do, we shall deserve the fate that Hitler's victory promises.

We are selling planes and guns for French and British cash; we are sending them in foreign ships. But only a few so far, and too slowly. We still haggle over terms and watchfully guard the letter if not the spirit of our neutrality law. Instead of looking upon arms for the Allies as arms for our own defense, we wonder how much of our production can be spared for Allied orders.

But powerful forces are beginning to realize the imminent need of far greater and speedier aid. The President himself sees the alternative clearly, and has said that necessary war goods for France and Britain should take precedence even over American army orders. Wendell Willkie in one of his most effective political speeches said, "If Britain and France lick Hitler now, we may be saved billions of dollars, billions of tons of armaments, billions of hours of wasted effort and unfruitful work." The isolationist chorus in the colleges has been offset by some realistic pronouncements from officials and teachers and even from students. And several organized groups, notably the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, headed by William Allen White, are crystallizing sentiment and focusing it on the proper authorities in Washington.

On the pages which follow, The Nation analyzes specific proposals for immediate measures to aid the anti-Hitler forces. Such proposals are urgent. They cannot be delayed while Congress debates future foreign policy or even the size of the army and navy. They are the first step in an American defense program.

What America Can Do

PLANES

IN THE moving accounts of the Battle of Flanders given to American correspondents by the battered survivors, there is a recurring theme: if only we had more planes, more guns, more tanks, but particularly more planes. Man for man these Allied soldiers believe they were a good match for the Nazis, and their orderly retreat, under conditions which would have excused demoralization among the best troops, proves that they are not boasting. But there is no doubt about the superior weight of the German equipment, and that superiority remains even though the fighting of the past three weeks may have reduced somewhat the Nazis' edge in the air.

Recognizing, as we do, that the Allies are manning a front-line trench between us and danger, we ought to ask whether we are doing everything in our power to help them hold that position. Time is Hitler's enemy. In a year or eighteen months our industry may be geared up to the point of providing Britain and France with an overwhelming margin in material; but that may be too late. The vital need is for deliveries now, when every additional plane in hand is worth six in an uncertain future.

We are indebted to Elspeth Freudenthal, author of a recently published book, "The Aviation Business: From Kitty Hawk to Wall Street," for some cold statistical facts about shipments of aviation material from this country to the Allies. Very large figures have filled the headlines, but these refer to orders. Deliveries are another matter. Actually orders have been placed for 7,700 planes of all types, of which roughly 2,000 have been delivered. But this second figure includes shipments made a considerable time before the war started; during the eight months from September, 1939, to April, 1940, only 832 planes and 1,300 engines have been dispatched to Britain, France, and Canada. This is not a very impressive showing when we consider that the capacity of our aviation industry has been doubled in the past year and is now upward of 10,000 war planes annually. However, only about 60 per cent of that capacity is employed, and the rate of output is about 500 units a month, with prospects of an increase to 700 later in the year. Assuming an average delivery of 350 machines monthly to the Allies, it will take more than sixteen months to work off current orders.

We shall not attempt to blame anyone for this state of affairs. As intricate an industry as aviation cannot be changed from a peace footing to a war footing overnight even if its needs are given complete priority over those of all other forms of production. There are bottle-necks to be overcome in machine tools, in labor, in materials, and in engines; and there are difficulties caused by lack of standardization. If production could be concentrated on a half-dozen types, as it is in Germany today, a far higher output could be achieved.

It has been reported from time to time that delays have resulted from hesitancy in placing orders on the part of the Allied Purchasing Commission. We have reason to believe that there is little truth in this charge, but, in some instances, negotiations may have been unduly protracted by the difficulty of agreeing on terms. For in accepting Allied orders American aviation manufacturers have not only made certain of handsome profits but have also sought to exclude all risks. Thus the Allies have advanced capital funds for the expansion of the three main engine companies. In the case of the Pratt-Whitney and Curtiss-Wright concerns this took the form of a premium of $3,500 a motor on each of 6,000 ordered by France. As large airplane engines cost from $12,000 to $15,000, it can be seen that this added very appreciably to costs.

The reluctance of the War Department to release certain late types of aircraft also seems to have caused some delay. Its objections finally yielded to Presidential intervention, but the army was able to insist on terms which, according to the Wall Street Journal of April 3, mean that the Allies "must pay not only the development costs on the units they buy but must pay the development costs on the improved models to be built later for the army." In other words, while we are still hoping that the Allies will save us from the necessity of fighting Hitler, we are charging them handsomely for the privilege.

The President has declared that nothing done to expand our air fleet should be allowed to hinder deliveries to the Allies. But beyond that we ought to see whether a way cannot be found to make available a worth-while reinforcement of machines from government reserves. In the development of our own air service the most immediate need is for training planes; until we have more pilots, large numbers of new bombers and fighters will be of little use. Could we not therefore turn in to the manufacturers some hundreds of war planes which they could resell to the Allies? These might not be the latest types, but in the present crisis any serviceable machines would be welcome on the other side. This is the proposal which has been put forward by Senator Pepper of Florida. We hope Congress will act on it as a matter of urgency.

CREDITS

THE GERMAN successes of the past two months have serious economic as well as military implications for the Allies. The little countries which have been overrun or cut off were leading sources of supply. From Scandinavia and Holland, Britain purchased large quantities of meat and dairy produce. Imports of steel from Belgium, chemicals from Norway, and timber products from Sweden and Finland had great economic and military importance. Now the Allies must try to make up for their loss elsewhere, and much of the business will come here.

Allied resources in the United States are still large, but the burden on them must inevitably be greatly increased by these developments. At the same time the collapse in Wall Street has reduced the value of securities owned by the Allies by 20 per cent or more, while making their liquidation more difficult. Under these circumstances the repeal of the Johnson Act and of the ban on credits in the Neutrality Act has become a matter on which quick action ought to be taken. For the Allies would then be able to pledge the securities they control and wait for the better market which is likely to come unless Germany carries its campaign to a victorious conclusion this summer.

There is no need here to review once again the old arguments for and against giving credit to a belligerent. Hitler's sweep across the Low Countries and into northern France has forced us to face the fact that we have a definite, selfish, material stake in Allied victory quite aside from the question of whether we "invest" in it or not. We now know that if France and Britain are overcome, we shall, at best, have to devote a huge part of our resources to defense; at worst we shall be compelled to fight for democratic existence alone. Even if we freely give billions to the Allies, that is likely to prove a cheap price.

It may be said, of course, that this is not a matter of immediate urgency: Why not wait until the Allies' funds are exhausted and then reconsider the matter? But so long as the prohibition on credit holds, the Allies must proceed on the assumption that their own resources will have to suffice, however long drawn out the war may prove. They will be forced to be niggardly in their buying, to forego essentials in order to make certain of absolute necessities. The present state of the war is far too critical to permit such a policy to be pursued with safety, and we shall be shortsighted about our own interests if we insist that they follow it.

REFUGEES

THE EXISTENCE of five million war refugees—women, children, and old people—presents a responsibility and an opportunity that America cannot evade. In the last war the United States earned the gratitude of the entire world by feeding and caring for millions of civilian victims of the conflict. Today the suffering is far more widespread. The millions who fled from the path of the Nazi juggernaut as it rolled across the Netherlands, Belgium, and northern France seek shelter in a country already overcrowded with persons in a similar plight. For the last year France has been caring for more than 150,000 Spanish refugees. In recent months it has received tens of thousands from regions bordering on the Maginot Line. Even in normal times it is inconceivable that a country the size of France could shoulder this burden alone. In war time, with its entire male population mobilized and fighting for the nation's existence, it cannot begin to care for these people. Hundreds of thousands may starve unless aid comes from abroad.

And this may be just the beginning. Even if the present Allied lines hold firm, millions of additional civilians will in all probability seek refuge from Nazi air attacks. Another Nazi break-through would swell the total to tens of millions. In that case an emergency would arise such as the world has never seen. The lives of untold numbers would depend on immediate, almost superhuman action on the part of the American people.

It is not necessary to bring this horde of unfortunates to the United States. By far the greater part of them can best be cared for in France and England, provided food, clothing, and other necessities can be sent to them. The Red Cross has made a brave start by boosting the quota of its war-relief drive from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000. But obviously much more will be needed, and needed quickly. Food, clothing, medical supplies are required—not merely money. It happens that the United States government has in its warehouses a vast amount of wheat and cotton, together with other agricultural surplus products. Is it unreasonable to ask that Congress, which is spending billions on emergency defense measures, ship part of these surpluses to Europe for immediate civilian relief? In addition, it should make a cash appropriation of at least $100,000,000 for the purchase and shipment of supplies not found in the government warehouses.

Supplies and money may salve our consciences, but they will not meet the entire problem. Among the refugees are many thousands who cannot be cared for in Europe. An invasion of England or a further invasion of France, necessitating the evacuation of cities like London and Paris, will not only increase the number of refugees but will cut down the area in which they will be safe from dive-bombers and machine-gun fire. And among them are many—such as the Spanish and anti-fascist German refugees—for whom there is no haven in Europe. There are also tens of thousands of children for whom no decent provision can be made in the midst of war. Simple humanity demands that at least some of these be given temporary shelter in the United States.

In saying this, we recognize that the opposition to the admission of refugees is probably greater today, in some quarters, than ever before. Many sincere, generous persons have been so frightened by the stories of fifth-column activities in the Netherlands and Norway that they are afraid to let in aliens, however desperate their need; another group still fears that refugees will take the jobs of good Americans. Both of these fears are legitimate, but we can take steps to protect ourselves against such real dangers as exist without closing our doors on the innocent victims of the Nazi terror. The Department of Justice has ways of dealing with genuine fifth-column elements, and already has the power to eliminate any dubious refugees who may seek entrance. As far as unemployment is concerned, it should be recognized that the greater number of persons needing aid are women, children, and older persons—potential consumers, not producers. A few may be employable, and these might be admitted frankly on a relief basis; individuals or organizations would be required to assume responsibility for their support during the war. German refugees, who have little hope of ever returning to their native land, would obviously have to be excepted.

The established quotas are much too small to allow the entrance of any significant number of aliens during this crisis. Instead of attempting revision at this time, Congress should recognize the emergency and make provision for the admission of a large number under the sponsorship of private relief organizations such as the Red Cross. A minimum of 100,000 should be admitted on a temporary basis, in addition to those who may enter under the quotas. The cost of bringing 100,000 refugees here and caring for them would be little to pay for the preservation of those humanitarian traditions which represent Americanism at its best.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 693

EDITORIALS:

SAVING THE FRONT LINE by Freda Kirchwey 695
WHAT AMERICA CAN DO 696
MR. JACKSON'S DILEMMA by Charles Malcolmson 699
HERE COMES PM by Richard H. Rovere 700
MEXICO'S PHANTOM CONSPIRACY by Harry Block 703
THE APEX INDECISION by I. F. Stone 705
AND THEY LYNCHED HIM ON A TREE
by Katherine Garrison Chapin 707
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 708
IN THE WIND 709
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 710

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR by Mildred Adams 711
THE CRISIS IN MARXISM by Abram L. Harris 711
THE HONEST PROJECTOR by Donald A. Roberts 714
FLORIDA CRACKER-FOLK by Louis B. Salomon 715 DRAMA: THROTTLEBOTTOM REDIVIVUS
by Joseph Wood Krutch 716
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 716
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 717

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

LIBRARY
Cal.

Mr. Jackson's Dilemma

BY CHARLES MALCOLMSON

Washington, June 3

DESPITE the recent shift of political tides, the unhappiest man in Washington these days is not a Republican. He is Attorney General Robert H. Jackson, upon whom has been thrust the task of defending the Bill of Rights from the gravest dangers that have threatened it since 1918. A thankless task it is, too, for the Attorney General must winnow from the genuine threats against our American democracy the alien-baiting and the other forms of minority oppression that are prejudicial to our American concept of civil liberties.

To one as sensitive to the delicacy of such distinctions as Bob Jackson, the separation of spy, sabotage, and fifth-column activities from perfectly legal but perhaps unpopular expressions of opinion by our political minorities presents tremendous problems. (Twenty-two years ago, the young city attorney of Jamestown, New York, stood fast against war hysteria and refused to adopt extremist proposals.) Perhaps the one encouraging aspect of the situation is the fact that Jackson is fully aware of the pitfalls before him but is nevertheless determined to steer a middle course. He knows he is going to be subject to bitter criticism from both patrioteers and libertarians, and he knows that—whatever his decisions may be—they will not add to his political or personal popularity. With equal realism he admits that the 3,600,000 aliens legally in the United States and the estimated 100,000 illegally here face harassment, discrimination, and persecution even with the Attorney General looking out for them.

Jackson was not consulted beforehand on the transfer of the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization from the Labor to the Justice Department and was not anxious to add its problems to his already monumental woes. But he is now convinced that the move has three marked advantages: (1) it coordinates the "internal" elements of the national defense program; (2) it permits a thorough reorganization of a bureau which has long allowed immigrants to be victimized; and (3) it gives aliens more adequate protection against extremist measures taken by state and local authorities. All three contentions are debatable, of course; particularly so since the Attorney General himself is the victim of interference from the White House, which the FBI's John Edgar Hoover now visits regularly for an approving pat on the head.

Jackson's present plans call for a complete housecleaning of the bureau by Solicitor General Francis Biddle, whose liberal record is not to be ignored, and its establishment on an equal footing with the FBI and the Bureau of Prisons. Furthermore, unless President Roosevelt again intervenes, Mr. Hoover, who has long been itching to get his hands on the agency and who is suspected of no little responsibility for the transfer, will not have a part in the new set-up. The rest is not so cheerful. Jackson is genuinely convinced that registration—which includes photographs and fingerprints of aliens—is not only inevitable but desirable. This has long been the practice in Europe and, Jackson believes, may be the solution of the civil-liberties problems involved. Whether a federal registration law would actually forestall or counteract the vicious anti-alien legislation proposed in Congress and some of the Southern states is, however, extremely doubtful.

A flood of such proposals is already pouring into the Congressional hopper. Last week the Senate passed the La Follette civil-liberties bill by a vote of forty-seven to twenty, thereby reaching a new low in legislative hypocrisy. The original measure was intended to outlaw labor spies and professional strike-breakers, but amendments attached by Senator Reynolds of North Carolina would make it a criminal offense—subject to $10,000 fine and five years' imprisonment—for employers in interstate commerce to give more than one job in ten to aliens or to hire Communists or Bundists at all. (Characteristically, the Senate exempted sugar-beet growers and other agriculturalists so that they could employ cheap Mexican labor.) Reynolds has also introduced a resolution calling for a special Senate investigation of those fifth columnists who may, by some miracle, escape the Dies committee. Chairman Dies, not to be outdone, wants another $100,000 to continue his work. Congressman Celler of New York is seeking to legalize FBI wiretapping in the face of two Supreme Court rulings prohibiting the practice; and Dies wants to outlaw the Communist Party and the Bund.

Fortunately the distorted La Follette bill has met obstacles in the House, where it has been shelved by the Labor Committee; but there is no assurance that the alien-registration measure indorsed by Jackson will have the same happy effect upon the other noxious proposals. In its present mood Congress is likely to pass anything labeled "for national defense."

Where the Attorney General faces his most pressing problem, however, is in counteracting the fifth-column scare. With state authorities calling on all aliens to register "or else," and with even the Hobos of America pledging themselves to be on the lookout for "fifth-column stuff," Jackson has been more than just remiss about informing the public as to the true facts of the situation. These are that the Department of Justice—as well as the Army and Navy Intelligence Corps—knows the names, habitats, and activities of all the important foreign spies and saboteurs now in the United States. If so inclined, the federal government could tomorrow pick up every foreign agent of importance now at large. What is more, federal officials have been keeping these agents under surveillance for months, if not years, and in a majority of cases prefer to continue this course. After all, it is better to keep watch on a spy or saboteur than to take him out of circulation and have to worry about his successor.

Privately, the Justice Department regards the mysterious fifth columnists as far less dangerous than current activities to repulse them. Jackson points out that for Trojan horse activities to be effective three elements must combine—paid foreign agents, a sympathetic group within our borders, and national indifference—and that there is no immediate threat of such a combination. It is too bad he was not so frank in his official announcement calling upon the citizenry to report "acts, threats, or evidences of sabotage, espionage, or other disloyal activities"—to which the response was immediate and frightening: the New York office of the FBI received 120 "complaints" within twenty-four hours, and vigilante groups, including 200,000 volunteer firemen along the Atlantic coast and female rifle clubs in half a dozen states, mushroomed overnight.

Actually, as the Attorney General is the first to admit, the danger which the country faces from parachutists and iron filings in airplane motors is not so great as that overhanging citizens and aliens with crew haircuts or "foreign accents." The latter, of course, is Jackson's major problem, one which he fortunately recognizes. His promise—and it comes from a man as sincerely devoted to civil liberties as anyone in the nation—is that he will not countenance any invasion of civil rights if he can prevent it. The unfortunate part is that he may not be able to prevent it.

Here Comes "PM"

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

THE amazing thing about PM, New York's forthcoming afternoon tabloid, is that it is based on the ideas of people who said it could never be done. For despite the advance publicity given to such new manufacturing gadgets as frozen ink and a revolving color scheme, PM represents first of all a revolt against the prevailing modes of American journalism. It refutes the long-established credo: papers with advertising can't be honest and papers without advertising can't exist. PM will be a liberal, mass-circulation newspaper, but unlike its predecessors that have died aborning or been driven from their chosen course, it will not attempt to exist on the sufferance of reactionary forces. It has kicked over the controls that keep newspapers from attaining ideal journalistic excellence and social objectivity. In order not to be influenced by advertisers, PM will carry no paid advertising; in order not to be controlled by wealthy backers, it has accepted aid from no one who was unwilling to waive from the start all prerogatives in the formation of editorial policy. If there is reason to fear that even these safeguards may in the end prove insufficient, it is at least true that at the outset the editors are able to work with a feeling of responsibility only to themselves and to their readers.

Two weeks before the scheduled appearance of PM the air is still thick with the rumors that have surrounded it since the days when it was a mysterious venture known simply as Publications Research, but the facts are to be had for the investigation. The paper has been financed, on the terms of stockholder non-intervention, to the extent of $1,500,000. The legal guaranty of management control is a five-year employment contract between the twenty directors representing the preferred stock and Ralph McAllister Ingersoll, the former Time, Inc., executive who is PM's founder, editor, and publisher. The contract, which has been accompanied by $500,000 worth of insurance on Ingersoll's life as investment protection, gives him "complete, absolute, and exclusive power to formulate the editorial, advertising, circulation, production, and promotion policies."

Under Ingersoll's direction a staff of well over one hundred business and editorial workers is now on the job. Housed in a three-story brick and stucco factory in downtown Brooklyn, which will gradually be transformed into modern, permanent editorial offices, they are producing trial issues daily, systematizing the division of labor, and discussing such all-important problems as whether to get final baseball scores into the last edition. Barring last-minute obstacles, the first regular issue of PM, a neat package of thirty-two pages, smaller and squarer than a regular tabloid, will be on the streets in the forenoon of June 18.

Journalistically, PM is not so much a complete innovation as a new combination of patterns and techniques developed and tested elsewhere. Ingersoll, whose personality will be reflected in every comma of the new paper, has been managing editor of the New Yorker and Fortune, publisher of Time, and supervisor of Life in its pre-publication stages. From talking with him and reading his early prospectuses and memorandums, one gathers that he is leaning heavily on his experience with those four publications in designing his own paper. Although he insists that PM will not be written in "Time-style," its writers are being trained to present details according to a theory of interest and relevance that is almost the sum of Time's method. "In PM," Ingersoll has written, "the murder will not take place in 'Number 2614 Amsterdam Avenue' but 'in a six-story brick tenement house in upper Amsterdam Avenue (Number 2614), the ground floor of which is shared by a German delicatessen and a Polish newsdealer.'" PM's departmental system, its search for human interest in routine stories, its use of pictures "to tell a story, not merely to illustrate it," its exploitation of news in literature and the arts—all these have been seen before, though they have not been used widely or all in combination in daily journalism.

Aside from better and livelier writing, PM's handling of orthodox news will be marked by the use of common sense in space allotment. The news will first be assigned to one of the usual departments—local, national, foreign, business, sports, and the like. The editor of the department will then decide, in consultation with the city desk, whether the story is to be told in words or pictures. If pictures are used, the job is one for artists, photographers, map and chart makers, morgue researchers, and caption writers. If words are to be the medium, the piece will be studied for further classification within the department.

According to its significance for the reader, a story will be handled in one of four ways. Prominently placed in each section will be an article by its editor bringing together in a running account all the developments of the day in his field. News covered in orthodox stories will of course be mentioned in this column, but it will also be a receptacle for stray items and follow-ups that ordinarily get lost at the bottom of end pages; the effort will be to corral in one article the news that other papers distribute through five or six. In addition, each section will have two columns of random marginalia: For the Record and File and Forget. The first will carry important news of little interest; the second, interesting news of little importance. In the national news section, for example, For the Record might report a prominent Senator's indorsement of a Presidential aspirant, while File and Forget would announce the engagement of the daughter of the Governor of Ohio to the star outfielder

Who's Who on "PM"

The following is a partial list of persons on PM's editorial staff, with their former affiliations:

Editor and Publisher—Ralph Ingersoll, Time
Managing Editor—George H. Lyon, Scripps-Howard
Assistant Managing Editors—John Lewis, Scripps-Howard; Lowell L. Leake, Washington Post; Herbert Yahres, Associated Press; Elmer Roesner, New York World-Telegram
National News Editor—Forbes Parkhill, Denver Post
Foreign News Editor—Robert Neville, Time
Chief of Washington Bureau—Kenneth Crawford, New York Post, The Nation
Press Editor—Hodding Carter, Delta (Mississippi) Star-Times
City Editor—Wesley Price, American Magazine
Labor Editor—Leo Huberman, author of "We the People" and "The Labor Spy Racket" Business News Editor—Nathaniel Keith, Wall Street Journal
Special Assignment Photographer — Margaret Bourke-White, Life
Art Director—T. M. Cleland, designer of Fortune
Art Editor—Charles Tudor, Life
Picture Editor—William McCleery, Life
Photo Manager—Harry Baker, International News Service
Drama Editor—Louis Kronenberger, Time
Music Editor—Henry W. Simon, Teachers College
Radio Editor—John T. McManus, Time
Movie Editor—Cecelia Ager, Variety
Art Critic—Irene Sacartoff
Sports Editor—Joseph F. Cummiskey
News for Living Editor—Elizabeth Hawes, author of "Fashion Is Spinach"
Advertising Digest—Otho J. Hicks, National Retail Dry Goods Association
"Presearch" Editor—Tom Davin, Cosmopolitan
Assistant departmental editors, staff writers, and artists include: Duncan Aikman, Carl Randau, David Ramsey, James Wechsler, Leon Goodelman, Leane Zugsmith, Robert Rice, Sutherland Denlinger, B. R. Crisler, Jules Korchien, Charles Abermeyer, Harold Vatter, Helen Gwynn, Charlotte Adams, Helen Canavarro, Dan Fitzpatrick, William Sharp, Charles Martin, Leo Hirschfield, John Kobler, and others.

of the Cleveland Indians. Such items will be disposed of in fifty words or less, allowing space for really extended treatment, in regular stories, of news that is both interesting and important.

Once the founders had resolved to do away with paid advertising, their job was to devise a commercial formula whereby the paper could succeed on the basis of sales alone. The formula they hit on was five cents for a smaller paper. But while Ingersoll and his collaborators realized that reliance on advertising revenue often proves subversive of editorial integrity, they also knew that to great numbers of women readers the news coming out of Gimbel's bargain basement is as exciting as a Blitzkrieg and as important as election results. An $18.98 dress going for $7.49 is news, and the paper that does not announce it is as remiss as one that fails to cover the New Jersey primaries.

So PM has developed a substitute for advertising. In place of the large and elaborate layouts occupying more than half the total space of most papers, it will attempt to sift the actual news—bargains, new styles, new processes—from the ads appearing in other newspapers and present them in a section of from two to four pages called Advertising Digest. Messengers will pick up copy and proofs from advertisers two or three days in advance of publication and bring them to the PM office, where a staff of consumer experts will delete the ballyhoo and white space. Each item described in PM will be illustrated by a thumbnail sketch. In the case of advertised products critical and analytical judgments will be suspended; other members of the staff, however, will furnish reports accompanied by an expression of editorial opinion on commodities not advertised in any of the day's papers. All this, of course, will be pie for the merchants. How the other newspapers will react to a competitor giving free space remains to be seen.

Advertising Digest will actually be only part of a much larger section called News for Living, which will be under the direction of Elizabeth Hawes, the eminent dress designer and anti-faddist. This is perhaps PM's only genuine innovation. Here housing, medicine, education, and amusements will be discussed for the benefit of the individual who wishes to make the most of available resources. Studies by government bureaus, a shamefully neglected source of news, and consumer services will be digested by the staff for simpler presentation to the readers. One page of News for Living will list the twenty or thirty best food buys of the day—as reported by the New York Department of Markets, not by the chain stores—and will suggest ways to prepare and use them. In the sections on housing, medicine, and education PM will plump for all three in greater quantity and better quality and at less cost. Some idea of the refreshing good sense with which Miss Hawes is approaching her job can be found in this statement of hers: "PM knows that a girl can get all the cosmetics she needs for $1.50 a year, but we don't necessarily think it's immoral to buy a lift—even by paying $7.50 for exactly three cents' worth of perfume. We only think people should know what they're buying when they buy beauty products, male or female."

Apart from the increased freedom of intellectual motion which it allows, PM's rejection of advertising provides several journalistic advantages. The fact that no set space has to be reserved for ads gives complete editorial power of maneuver within the limits of the paper's size. Since it does away with any fear that visual displays will compete with paid-for columns, PM can use larger body type, drawings, and photographs as it pleases. Since it has no need to fear radio as a rival suitor for the favors of big business, it can report the news coming out of that industry without having to worry lest clients find radio's attractions so appealing that large accounts will go over to the networks. A major feature of PM will be a complete radio section containing schedules, news, criticism, and scripts worth reprinting. The fact that it is not a competitor for advertising will give PM an added opportunity to criticize the rest of the press.

Through its honest treatment of problems directly affecting the well-being of its readers PM promises to make a real contribution to democratic journalism. On broad social and political matters, however, it has thus far offered only the vague statement of principles contained in the stockholders' prospectus:

> We are against people who push other people around, just for the fun of pushing, whether they flourish in this country or abroad. We are against fraud and deceit and greed and cruelty, and we will seek to expose their practitioners. We are for people who are kindly and courageous and honest . . .

PM announces, moreover, that to begin with it will have no editorials, but will instead have a page of readers' letters, to be edited by Louis Kronenberger. Since PM is frank to admit that it believes objectivity in news writing to be an unattainable dream, one is forced to assume that editorial opinions will largely vary with the individual writers, except in so far as Ingersoll himself fixes policies.

The point is important, for PM's political position has already aroused lively speculation. It is no deep secret that a number of Communists and fellow-travelers have been given places on the staff. A sprinkling of journalists of this political persuasion is certainly to be found on every daily newspaper, and their presence is a matter of no particular significance; but when more than an average number of a newspaper's staff fit into this category, the circumstance is not to be explained away as coincidence or even as a noble attempt at proportional representation. It is extremely unlikely, however, that PM will let itself become a tool of factional politics. The great majority of the paper's working corps are old-line non-political newspapermen, with a fair number of unattached liberals. Nor would a Communist-front organ be likely to win, much less keep, the kind of financial support that has come to PM, among whose backers are Marshall Field III, John Hay Whitney, Mrs. Marion Rosenwald Stern (Sears, Roebuck), and Huntington Hartford II (A. and P.). Finally, there is the argument that concerning matters of American foreign policy, a touchstone for the purpose, Publisher Ingersoll is anti-isolationist, in flagrant contradiction of the current Communist Party line. The liberal sprinkling of party members and sympathizers on the staff is difficult to explain, but for the most part it is probably to be attributed to the influence of a few well-placed comrades.

To succeed as a commercial venture PM needs a steady circulation of 300,000. Although little has been said about where the readers are to come from, it is assumed that they will be drawn from the most intelligent of the three million who read New York's morning tabloids, the Daily News and the Mirror. How well PM has assessed the habits of its prospective readers is a question that will not be answered for a year or more, but there is some room for speculation. As a five-cent paper PM will be the most expensive in the city—two cents above most of its competition and three cents above the two papers whose readers it hopes to attract. Any number of successful five-cent newspapers already exist, but most of them are in cities where that rate is standard.

PM has already risked the loss of large sections of potential readers by its decision not to publish stock-market quotations, display advertising, comic strips, or gossip columns. If, on top of this, it proves unable to match its competitors in sports coverage, it will lose another large group. Its present press schedule is not timed to make possible the publication, even in the final edition, of baseball scores, and the shortcoming has been a subject of debate. But the solution of this and other deadline problems will not be known until June 18, for Ingersoll is keeping PM's closing time a secret in order not to be boxed by the other papers.

It is obvious that PM will have to leap some sizable hurdles. But they are hurdles of its own placing and hurdles for the most part that need to be leaped in the interests of newspaper progress. PM has taken steps toward securing an independence that has long been held impossible under existing conditions. It has accompanied these with a carefully and ingeniously conceived plan for a paper that can take full advantage of all sources of information. It may prove to be something less than the grandiose "adventure in civilization" that its founders predict, but if it surmounts the difficulties that confront it, it will be an exciting adventure in journalism.

Mexico's Phantom Conspiracy

BY HARRY BLOCK

Mexico City, May 26

ON MAY 22 President Cárdenas officially and flatly denied the existence of "fifth-column" activities in Mexico and declared that all such rumors were an invention of the country's enemies for obvious political ends. On the early morning of May 24, and as if to belie the President's categorical statement, came the attack on Leon Trotsky. A score of men, disguised in police and regular-army uniforms and heavily armed with machine-guns and automatic pistols, overpowered Trotsky's permanent police guard of five and poured a barrage of machine-gun fire into his bedroom for several minutes. Trotsky's secretary, Sheldon Harte, either fled or was kidnapped—at any rate he has disappeared. Two cars were driven away from the garage and later abandoned. In spite of the hundreds of shots fired, no one, fortunately, was injured. Trotsky has declared that his attackers were special agents of the G. P. U. sent to Mexico to assassinate him. The Mexican Communist Party has vigorously disowned any connection with the outrage and brands it a plain provocation intended to pave the way for an anti-Communist drive. It should be recalled that Trotsky's presence in Mexico is largely a personal responsibility of President Cárdenas, who granted him asylum here, and the failure adequately to protect him would thus be an extremely grave reflection on the present government.

There are a number of puzzling features in the assault. The police guard was disarmed and bound without disturbance; but despite their superiority in numbers, the lack of interference, and the ample time at their disposal, this gang of gunmen bent on murder then proceeded to riddle the house with machine-gun slugs without hitting anybody. How, in fact, did they enter the house, cut the secret burglar alarms, and make their way so unerringly to Trotsky's bedroom? And how were they able to drive off the automobiles, for which they must have lacked the ignition keys? (The missing secretary would appear to be vital to both these questions.) Why, above all, was this particular moment chosen for the attempt, when, if they were really "fifth-column" terrorists, it would have been to their obvious advantage not to give the immediate lie to the Cárdenas statement?

We have here the materials of a first-rate mystery story, but the demand for an explanation is based on more than mere idle curiosity. El Popular, Mexico's leading labor daily, called the attack on Trotsky an attack on Mexico and demanded a complete investigation that would reveal the truth. Characterizing the incident as an "outrage for export," it ascribed it to the necessity of Mexico's enemies to produce immediate justification for their charge that the Mexican government conceals fifth-column plotters aiming at an uprising under combined "Nazi-Stalinist" auspices. This accusation has been indiscriminately broadcast during the past several months, and its espousal by the Dies committee, together with the gratuitous offer to "investigate" Mexico, has, as was to be expected, aroused bitter indignation here.

The general theory underlying the charge may be briefly stated: In the coming Presidential election Almazán, candidate of the conservative opposition, has the demonstrated support of the "popular masses." Hence, in order to prevent his election, the "Communist and Nazi followers" of Avila Camacho, the Administration candidate, will stage a coup d'état before the election and seize power through the "armed militia" of the trade unions, setting up a totalitarian dictatorship. The aim of these remarkable shindigs, presumably, is to create such headaches for the United States in Latin America as will impair American aid to the Allies and to provide Germany with a continental base for an attack on the United States itself. This lurid tale, although it has yet to be buttressed by any concrete evidence, has been gravely parroted, with additional embroidery, by the anti-Administration papers in Mexico. Even here, where people are certainly in a position to know better, there are undoubtedly thousands of dupes of the sensation-mongers who are firmly convinced that Mexico stands on the ragged edge of totalitarian rule.

A glance at the concrete situation which this yarn is intended to confuse will reveal the motive back of it. There is one proposition on which both the friends and the enemies of Cárdenas can agree, however violently they disagree about his methods: that his is the first government since 1910 to take literally the neglected promises of the Mexican Revolution and attempt to translate them into action. This is not to say that Cárdenas has "remade" Mexico or that many of his innovations have not been attended by a great deal of incidental hardship. But it is precisely because his policies give promise of ultimate success that the Mexican reactionaries and their foreign mentors who have tenaciously opposed them for five years are preparing a decisive assault on them.

Everyone here knows that while the P. R. M. (Party of the Mexican Revolution) controls the electoral machinery Almazán's chances of winning the election are precisely nil; in fact, Almazán himself knows this better than anyone else, for he has not come through thirty years of Mexican politics without learning the facts of life. There are, then, only two possible alternatives: either Almazán is simply going through the motions of running for President or else he seriously entertains the hope of ruling Mexico. In the latter case, since he can scarcely believe he will achieve his goal by peaceful means, his campaign must be nothing but camouflage for the preparation of revolt; both the P. R. M. and the C. T. M. (Confederation of Mexican Workers) have directly charged him with that intention. It is also clear that in view of the high degree of popular organization behind the Avila Camacho candidacy, such a movement would have to count on powerful aid from abroad. Almazán's prolonged and eloquent silence on the oil question has condemned him in the eyes of most Mexicans as a tool of the foreign oil companies, and when he broke that silence the other day, his acrobatic straddling of the issue simply confirmed the general belief. In Mexico's political struggles, whenever larger social, rather than merely factional, antagonisms have been involved, the reaction has historically never hesitated to seek support against the Mexican people from alien sources. This was true in 1810, in 1857, and in 1913. The situation today conforms in all essential respects to this traditional mold.

The utility of the fifth-column agitation as a smoke screen behind which these plans might mature and also as a means for enlisting foreign sympathy and support thus becomes clear. The pattern hardly varies. In Germany Hitler needed an outrage as a pretext to unleash the Nazi terror and to disfranchise enough of the population to insure complete power: the Reichstag was providentially burned. The Spanish militarists could not move against the Popular Front until its "excesses" had provided what might be advanced as a plausible motive for their treason: churches were burned and widespread violence magically developed. Examples might be piled up almost indefinitely, from all countries. The technique of provocation grows more reckless; its essence remains unchanged. Investigation may possibly prove otherwise, but for the moment the clumsy attack on Trotsky's house seems too pat to be true. It bears all the earmarks of a put-up job in which Trotsky, as well as a credulous public, is being victimized, and it is a logical pendant to the other instances of sporadic violence which have punctuated Almazán's campaign.

There is thus no great mystery about the "fifth column" in Mexico. What is happening is that the witch-hunters, for all their feverish activity, have been looking in the wrong direction. The real potential fifth column is composed of the Almazán following. Fortunately, they are a small minority of the population. Fortunately, too, their plans have received a sharp setback from the successful settlement with the Sinclair Oil Company and the renewed prospect of settlement with the other American and British interests, a prospect which has worked a substantial improvement in Mexico's international position, both politically and economically. It is impossible to foresee to what measures of desperation Almazán's friends may eventually resort, but as the situation here clarifies, it appears extremely unlikely that any trouble will develop this summer with which the regular police are unable to deal. Almazán's fifth column seems due to evaporate into the same thin air of which today's phantom of the headlines is composed.

LIBRARY

The Apex Indecision

BY I. F. STONE

THE United States Supreme Court, like other oracles, often finds obscurity the better part of discretion. No one yet knows, no one can know, the full meaning of its decision in the Apex case. Six justices agreed that the sitdown strikers who occupied the Apex hosiery mill in Philadelphia during the late spring of 1937 did not violate the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and need not pay the $750,000 in punitive damages assessed against them. So much is clear, and it is a clear victory for labor. Nine justices agreed that labor unions, despite the exemption granted them by the Clayton Act, are subject to the anti-trust laws, and that is a defeat for labor. Left tantalizingly obscure is the extent to which unions are subject to the anti-trust laws.

The Supreme Court's decision in the Apex case cannot be understood if it is read solely as a statement of law. It is best approached as an exercise in judicial power politics and in juristic theology. As judicial power politics, it is the sum of the concessions, evasions, compromises, quid pro quos, necessary to bring about an alliance of six diverse minds for a verdict in favor of the Apex strikers; it is as much the product of haggling as of reasoning. As juristic theology, the decision follows a pattern typical of the pronouncements of institutions dependent for their authority on the possession of a special revelation. The court tries to change its mind without appearing to contradict its past. The court's rulings, like claret, command a more respectful market if decorated with a few cobwebs. The majority sets out, by elaborate legalistic ritual, to demonstrate that its pro-labor attitude toward the Apex strikers is really in accord with the anti-labor decisions of the past, from Debs and the Danbury Hatters down. The danger in this kind of systematized self-deception—an occupational habit inevitable in the performance of a function requiring both adaptability to change and conformity to tradition—is that it may boomerang. A later court may as easily prove that a return to the philosophy embodied in the Danbury Hatters' case is in no way inconsistent with that of the Apex case. Reversal sub silentio has its drawbacks. The silence registers more plainly than the reversal.

Our courts have been peculiarly hesitant about using the anti-trust laws against the trusts. The most progressive Supreme Court in our history hesitates even now to give up their use against the trade unions. The sitdown strike which shut the Apex plants lasted fifty days. The sitdown strike of the courts against the anti-trust laws has been going on for fifty years. When Congress in 1890 passed the first federal anti-trust law, the Sherman Act, "trust" was synonymous with Standard Oil, and Standard Oil with Rockefeller. The act was used almost at once to break strikes, but sixteen years went by before any action was taken under it against Standard Oil and five years more before the Supreme Court finally ordered Standard Oil of New Jersey, heart of the Rockefeller combine, to "dissolve." The dissolution decree was effective only in bringing about the disillusion of the trust-busters. Standard Oil of New Jersey common was selling at $600 a share at the time of the decree. Six years after this most gentle of executions $2,390 was bid for the same stock. Like the lady in the sideshow, Standard Oil was none the worse for having been sawed in half.

Talmudic is the nonsense tortured by our courts out of the Sherman Act's provision that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states . . . is hereby declared to be illegal." The net result was a new weapon against unionism while big business combination suffered slight inconvenience. Attorney General Olney early noted this trend of interpretation "as strikingly illustrating the perversion of a law from the real purposes of its authors," but the perversion has continued. Casuistry similarly disposed of the trade-union exemption written into the Clayton Act in 1914. "The labor of a human being," Congress then declared, in a triumph of sentiment over observation, "is not a commodity. . . ." "Nothing in the anti-trust laws," it continued, "shall be construed . . . to forbid or restrain" labor or farm organizations "from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof." The court's alchemy, which often operates in reverse, turning gold into lead, easily reduced these words to what had been the worst practice always. Chief Justice Taft found little difficulty in reconciling this "Labor Magna Charta" with court orders jailing pickets as in restraint of trade.

It is clear from the Apex decision that part of the majority would like to grant some recognition after all these years to the Clayton Act's exemption of labor unions from the anti-trust laws but cannot yet muster enough strength to do so. The majority's indecision contrasts with the sharp protests made by Brandeis and Holmes in the past against the anti-labor use of the anti-trust laws, and is painfully feeble after the great reversals of the New Deal period. The majority's inability to make up its mind reflects the split within liberal ranks and the fact that the New Deal has itself begun to wield this old weapon against labor. In the Apex decision the majority creeps toward its goal through a thick underbrush of implications. Labor's chief gain is the majority's adoption of the thesis brilliantly expounded in recent issues of the Columbia Law Review by Louis Boudin. The phrase "restraint of trade" in the Sherman Act, he argued, is to be given not its literal but its old common-law meaning. This may seem an erudite quibble, but in the court's verbalistic universe the difference is crucial. Chief Justice Hughes in his dissenting opinion adopts the literal meaning. He says that restraint means "to hold back, repress, obstruct." The majority, speaking through Justice Stone, answers that this definition would bring "practically every strike in modern industry" under the Sherman Act. The majority rules that "restraint of trade" is to be taken "in the common-law sense of restriction or suppression of commercial competition" (my italics). The majority admits that the Apex strikers interfered with the interstate transportation of hosiery but declares that this was not a violation of the Sherman Act because it was "not intended to have and had no effect on prices of hosiery." This narrows the applicability of the anti-trust laws to labor.

The majority goes on to give a rough indication of the area of exemption it would allow. Strikes may restrict the power of some employers to compete, but this does not bring the striking unions under the Sherman Act. Success in obtaining wage agreements "may have some influence on price competition by eliminating that part of such competition which is based on differences in labor standards," but this also involves no violation of the Sherman Act. The majority recognizes that unions have a right to "eliminate the competition from non-union-made goods. . . . But this effect on competition has not been considered to be the kind of curtailment of price competition prohibited by the Sherman Act." This, to avoid blunter terms, is disingenuous, but it is pleasant to hear the majority say it. Finally, the majority indicates the limits of exemption. It says that the Apex strike was "not a case of a labor organization being used by combinations of those engaged in an industry as the means or instrument for suppressing competition or fixing prices." Unions, the majority implies, are subject to the anti-trust laws when they conspire with employer groups to cut down competition or fix prices. Fairly interpreted, this is a standard that endangers the racketeer only. If it stirs fear at all, it is because the courts have so seldom been fair in applying the anti-trust laws.

Within the boundaries sketched by this decision there is an important area of ambiguity—the secondary boycott. The majority says labor unions may eliminate the competition of non-union-made goods. The principal means of elimination in the past has been the secondary boycott. Does the majority believe secondary boycotts were outlawed by the Sherman Act? Brandeis, Holmes, and Stone all recorded their belief that this form of boycott was a legitimate trade-union weapon. On this point the majority is coy. First it speaks of the right to eliminate competition from non-union goods. Then it respectfully cites past precedents penalizing secondary boycotts against non-union goods. Later it indicates that secondary boycotts may be permissible. This brings us to another of the pivotal verbalisms in the field of the anti-trust laws—"the rule of reason." In 1911, in order to provide a loophole large enough for the oil and tobacco trusts, the Supreme Court decided that "every contract . . . in restraint of trade" meant every contract in "unreasonable" restraint of trade. Chief Justice White and a majority of his colleagues then proceeded to find most of the oil and tobacco-trust activity reasonable. Now the majority hints that it may make the benefits of "the rule of reason" available to labor. It says that in forbidding the secondary boycott earlier decisions failed to consider "the applicability of that rule to restraints upon commerce effected by a labor union in order to promote and consolidate the interests of its union." If unionization is reasonable, are not restraints of trade arising from union activities reasonable restraints? The majority also asks, again by implication, whether it was proper to forbid secondary boycotts after the Clayton Act had exempted unions—at least in their "lawful" activities—from the anti-trust laws. There is both disappointment and promise in the majority's answer: "We are not now concerned with the merits of either point."

It is the Supreme Court's privilege to change its mind, and a new line-up among the Nine may put a frost upon the tender sprouts visible in the Apex decision. As it stands, the decision weakens the Department of Justice in its attack on the trade unions. The Department has already dropped plans to appeal the District of Columbia Teamsters case. There the department had unsuccessfully sought to use the anti-trust laws to end a jurisdictional dispute. Clearly jurisdictional disputes cannot be attacked as an attempt to restrict commercial competition.

The distinction drawn in the Apex decision between interference with interstate transportation and restraint of interstate commerce should prove helpful to New York's convicted teamsters. The sudden conviction of the Communist leaders of the Fur Workers' Union under a six-year-old anti-trust indictment may be reversed on appeal as a result of the Apex decision; the Nazi-Soviet pact is not a price-fixing combination. Many of the building-trades indictments are affected. Only those unions which have served as blackjacks for trusts can take no hope from the Apex decision. "We have become," Thurman Arnold wrote, to illustrate the growth of monopoly, "a nation of employees." The Apex decision should help to protect the rights of those employees from Thurman Arnold.

And They Lynched Him on a Tree

A Ballad Poem for a Chorus

BY KATHERINE GARRISON CHAPIN

It is night. In a clearing by the roadside among the turpentine pines, lit by the headlights of parked cars, a Negro has just been lynched. The white crowd is breaking up now, going home, a little sobered, but with a hysterical voice lifted here and there.

WHITE CROWD

We've swung him higher than the tallest pine
We've cut his throat so he can't start to whine!
Come along fellers . . . come along home.

WHITE MEN

Come along home, start up the car.
Gee, but I'm thirsty, and I'll bet that you are!
Come along home . . . come along home . . .

WHITE CROWD

We've swung him higher . . .
Come along home . . .

The moon's gone out, and so have the stars.

WHITE MEN

Come along fellers, start the cars.

Start those cars, it's mighty dark—
Headlights showing where you park.
It's mighty dark, and it's growing cold—
Better go home now the night's growing old.

WHITE MEN

Come along home . . .

WHITE WOMEN

We've swung him higher, higher, higher than the tallest pine!
God, I'm glad he's no son of mine!

WHITE MEN

Come along home . . .

The muttering refrain continues until the white crowd is gone. After a silence a quiet moaning begins as the Negroes gather, feeling their way in the darkness.

NEGRO MEN

Look dere, look dere, is dat a shadow?
Look dere, look dere, is dey all gone?
Creep softly, de dawgs are in de meadow,
Creep softly, de dawgs have just gone along.
Creep softly, watch where you step.
Out of dis black night we'll find him yet.

NEGRO WOMEN

Here's de limb an' here's de tree!

NEGRO MEN

Here's de limb an' here's de tree!

NEGRO MEN AND WOMEN

Here's de limb an' here's de tree!
O my God have mercy on me!

NEGRO WOMAN

Oh sorrow, oh sorrow,
You've taken my hand.
I must walk with you
To the Promised Land.

Oh sorrow, Oh sorrow,
Oh my son!
Oh Jesus, my Jesus,
What have they done!

I can remember the day he was born, and the pains tore me—he was such a man child . . . and the day he left me, goin' down the road . . . down the road to trouble . . . with his too easy smile, too quick fists . . . and him creeping home, running from the men, and the dogs baying in the pine woods . . . I remember the flies buzzing in the courtroom and the judge saying, for the rest of your life, for the rest of your life.

NEGRO WOMEN

He was her baby. At her breast
He drew his life. By her hand
He learned to walk. In her love
She sheltered him.

He was a man, his proud head
He carried high. Quick with a gun,
Quick with love, he passed by.
Now he swings high.

NEGRO MEN

He was a man, strong with an ax,
Sharp with a gun, ready to laugh,
Strength in his loins, sweated with sun,
Close to the earth. He was a man.

CHORUS

He was a man, quick with a gun, he fell on evil days.
Trouble was after him, trouble followed his ways.
Trouble lay behind the edge of his smile.
Trouble got him in the end, trouble was waiting all the while.
Women all loved him, women came at his call.
They stood in the doorways, they watched from the fence,
They waved from the windows. He was strong and tall,
Women all loved him, but he had no sense.
So he ended in jail, and they gave him "life,"
Took away his name and his coppers and his knife.
Took away his name, in the name of the law,
But justice was a slow thing to be waiting for!

NEGRO WOMEN

He was a man
Strong with love
He passed by.

NEGRO MEN

He was a man
  Quick with an ax,
Strength in his loins,
  He was a man.

CHORUS

They took away his freedom, in the name of the law,
But justice was a slow thing to be waiting for!
Justice was too slow the white men said,
So they got together when the sun was high,
They marched to the jail, and broke into the cell,
And roped the prisoner to drag him out to die.
They dragged him on his knees, and they lynched him on a tree,
And they left him hanging for the world to see.
Justice was a slow thing to be waiting for,
In the false name of justice they broke the law!

NEGRO WOMEN

Oh my Jesus,
  Where is your hand?
They've taken this boy
  To a dark land

He did wrong,
  But couldn't they let him be,
Not die like this
  On a roadside tree?

CHORUS

They left him hanging for the world to pass by,
But a bloody sun will rise in a bloody sky,
A bloody sun will shine across this sand,
And a long dark shadow will fall on the land.
  Cut him down from the gallows tree!
  Cut him down for the world to see!
  Speak to your brother and take his hand,
  And clear this shadow that falls across your land;
  The long dark shadow, the long dark shadow.
  Oh trust your brother and reach out your hand
  And clear the shadow that falls across your land!

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Defense Economics

THE extent to which some reactionaries would like to sacrifice the social advances of the last eight years on the altar of defense has been revealed by the Financial and Commercial Chronicle, whose circulation is so exclusive that it can afford to be candid: "A catalogue of the policies standing in the way of national defense," it declares, "is virtually a catalogue of the major New Deal policies to date." Specifically it mentions the Walsh-Healey Act compelling government contractors to observe fair labor conditions, the wage-hour law, the Wagner Act, and the new efforts to enforce a stricter interpretation of the Sherman Act. In addition, it advocates appreciable cuts in taxes on corporations and higher-bracket incomes, and of course it would like to see drastic reductions in non-defense budget items—unemployment and farm relief, housing, public health, et cetera.

Supposing that the kind of program desired by the Financial and Commercial Chronicle were carried out, what would it mean? Surely an increase in the proportion of the national income accruing to owners of capital and a decrease in that received by workers, employed and unemployed, and by farmers. Further it would mean a redistribution of income inside the capitalist class, for while manufacturers of investment goods, including armaments, would be profiting from assured government contracts, industries and trades geared to mass consumption would face a relative, if not an absolute, decline in purchasing power.

Although I, in common with most readers of The Nation, would like to see armaments and profits permanently divorced, I am very doubtful that much can be done about it at the present time. Assuming that we must increase supplies of planes, tanks, warships, and guns rapidly, we shall have to depend on those who control the means of production of these articles. In view of the time element, it would be unrealistic to suggest that the government build up an arms industry of its own. Nor is wholesale requisitioning of existing plants practical except by means of M-day legislation involving the conscription of labor and resources generally. And as long as the emergency remains "short of war," that is a development we all wish to avoid. Thus, in order to swell our defenses at the greatest possible speed, we must look largely to private enterprise, and we must expect to pay through the nose. Patriotism is not enough to produce the goods under a system whose vitalizing principle is profit.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

It is one thing, however, to reconcile ourselves to paying a tribute to big business; it is something else again to allow business as part of its price to dictate political, fiscal, and social policy. Heavy as the burden of armaments may be, it is not yet such that we are forced to follow the policy of the belligerent countries and reduce our standard of living in order to free resources for defense purposes. With ten million people unemployed we have a large margin for increased production. Last year, with roughly 45,000,000 persons gainfully employed, we had a national income of almost $70,000,000,000. The full absorption of the unemployed should, therefore, make possible an expansion in national income of around 20 per cent, or $14,000,000,000.

The emergency defense appropriations now under consideration in Congress, together with the supplemental $1,250,000,000 which the President is expected to request, will comprise an addition to the national budget of approximately $2,500,000,000. Assuming that the whole of this sum is provided by deficit financing, and that there are no offsets, it will mean in effect an addition to the investment outlay of the country of the same amount. But the addition to national income will be much greater since, apart from the direct employment afforded, a still larger volume of indirect employment will be made possible. This is so because a large part of the wages, salaries, and profits paid out as the result of a new investment pass into the stream of purchasing power and become in turn the basis for increased wages, salaries, and profits in other industries. The extent to which the expenditure of capital adds to national income depends on many variables, but it would be fairly conservative to multiply the sum invested by two-and-a-half. Consequently an extra $2,500,000,000 of defense expenditure covered by borrowing might be expected to swell national income by some $6,250,000,000. This would take care of many of the unemployed but still leave over half the ten million without jobs.

Moreover, we have assumed that there are no offsets, and of course there will be. As unemployment falls there will be a reduction in the amount spent on relief which will reduce to some extent the net deficit. Further additional taxes totaling some $700,000,000 are under discussion. The larger part of this sum, according to present plans, will be raised by levies on articles of general consumption, reducing purchasing power and canceling out part of the benefits of increased defense expenditure. Again, the spread of the European war, which is the immediate cause of our rearmament program, is checking exports. One after another our European markets are being cut off, and the impact of the war on foreign trade, which up to now has been favorable, may shortly become a decidedly adverse factor. Under these circumstances it might be wiser to defer the new tax program until the economic effects of the defense policy have become clearer. We shall make haste slowly by slapping an extra 10 per cent on all taxes alike and calling it a financial policy. To make the most of our resources and to promote the interests both of defense and the economy as a whole we need more careful fiscal planning than that.

In the Wind

NEWSPAPERS HAVE hinted that an exposure of Britain's "fifth column" may break any day, perhaps before this reaches print. The New York Times, insiders report, has had details concerning the coming blow-up for nearly a fortnight. Editors discussed them in a private session last week, but since the material was emphatically "off the record," the Times, like other dailies, had to wait.

DESPITE INSISTENT criticism of the White House by the Youth Congress, Mrs. Roosevelt is still pushing the organization. Last week she came to New York, urged the Congress to support the President's defense program, was received respectfully, and was voted down. A few nights later she gave a private dinner for Youth Congress leaders and introduced them to influential guests, stilling reports that she was cooling toward the Congress.

OVER NEW YORK Station WMCA recently a commentator reported fierce battles in Belgium and huge casualties. The program was sponsored by the King David Memorial Park, New York; between bulletins from Europe the announcer described the cemetery as a "wonderful resting place."

THERE'S A weird joker in the amended La Follette bill passed by the Senate. The bill provides that Communists cannot be employed in interstate industries. Newspapermen point out that the press, according to the ruling in the Watson case, is an interstate industry. To avoid penalties, therefore, the Daily Worker would have to be edited entirely by simon-pure non-Communists.

AN ADDRESS by Monsignor Fulton J. Sheen of Catholic University was reported in a recent issue of the Brooklyn Tablet. He maintained, the Tablet solemnly averred, that "the only viewpoint worth while in the world today is the viewpoint of faith. It was through faith, he said, that he was able to predict the Nazi-Soviet pact one year before it happened."

ON THE morning that Germany invaded Holland and Belgium newspaper city desks received a new edition of Facts in Review, the German propaganda pamphlet. Its lead story, entitled Whitsuntide in Germany, proclaimed, "The festival of Pfingsten (Pentecost) is celebrated throughout Germany with a wealth of quaint customs whose sources are rooted both in Christian tradition and in old pagan custom."

THE COMING convention of the Newspaper Guild will be held in Memphis, despite the hostility of that city's officials to the C. I. O. If the city turns thumbs down at the last moment and the Guild can't get a hall, it may hold its sessions on a boat.

[The $5 prize for the best item submitted in May goes to W. L. of New York for the story about Facts in Review published this week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE President has not yet taken the American public into his confidence in regard to his defense plans. He has not told them how large a standing army a fleet of 50,000 airplanes will call for, and he has given them no indication of what will be the cost of keeping up such an air armada. More than that, he has not told them whether he now for the second time favors a two-ocean navy, or whether he is going to advocate universal military service. As for the financing of the whole tremendous enterprise, that is only just beginning to be a subject of discussion. It is characteristic of the President's method that the financial aspect is entirely subordinated—first commit yourself to a program and then see how you can pay for it. This may be good politics, but it is neither statesmanship nor good finance.

The President has just announced the composition of a civilian board to supervise the carrying out of the industrial side of the armament program—a useful idea. Perhaps he felt the universal disapprobation of the idea that these matters should be left to Frances Perkins, Harold Ickes, Harry Hopkins, and Henry Morgenthau. But none of this goes to the root of a successful defense program. Nor will that program be furthered by such misleading statements as those of his address to the public of May 26. For example, he said then that the navy in 1933 had only 1,127 useful aircraft and that at present it had 2,892 planes on hand or "on order." It appears that no fewer than 1,100 of these planes are on order, and, according to Phelps Adams of the New York Sun, "it will be many months under present production schedules before those 2,892 planes that the President mentioned will actually take the sky." In 1933, the President said, we had only 355 anti-aircraft guns. Now, he said, we have 1,700 modern anti-aircraft guns "on hand and on order." Actually very few of these guns are on hand. Similarly the President spoke of 1,600 modern infantry mortars being "on hand or on order." Yet today the army possesses only 3 modern six-inch mortars and 163 modern eighty-one-millimeter mortars! Finally, the 1,700 modern tanks and armored cars which the President cited simmer down to but 114 new armored combat cars and 485 lightly armored scout cars now on hand. Is this being fair with the public?

Granted that the President now intends to speed up these programs to the fullest possible extent, the most important thing will still remain to be done. There can be no efficient military defense of the United States until the War Department is overhauled and modernized. Let me recall once more what General Johnson Hagood has said about the War Department:

> It is so involved that no Secretary of War has ever been able to understand it, and no Chief of Staff, however well qualified, has ever been able to keep it under control or to know just what was going on among his subordinates . . . no human being, no archangel of heaven, could operate a machine which is as badly constructed and as complicated as the War Department is under existing law. It is too big. It is top-heavy. It has too many independent agencies working at cross-purposes to each other and with no fixed line of authority or responsibility.

The General has solemnly warned Congress that "if we became involved in a serious war in which we do not have allies to keep things going while we get ready, the War Department would collapse as it did before." In his book he recalled that in 1917-18 America spent a billion dollars on the manufacture of artillery and artillery ammunition, but that not a single shot was fired from an American gun by an American on the western front, except from some railroad cannon of the navy's.

If the President really wanted efficient defense he would not only insist upon the reorganization of the War and Navy departments and put at their head efficient and able men in place of such lightweights as Woodring and Edison; he would go before Congress and demand that the Congressmen and Senators who have insisted for political reasons on maintaining 420 posts, barracks, and forts recede from their position in the interest of an efficient army. He might also inquire why it is that, as the present Chief of Staff, General Marshall, has just testified, it costs the United States $21 to maintain a soldier for every dollar that foreign countries spend for the same purpose. Of course one reason is that the United States pays decent wages to its soldiers, whereas foreign nations pay only a few cents a day. But that is only part of the story. Much could be saved by business methods.

The President must know these things or he is not competent to head a defense program. He must know that if we are to fight the Germans, we must put our organization on a business-like basis, free from politics. But I fear that John T. Flynn is correct when he writes that it looks to him as if the President were merely throwing a smoke screen around his failure to put the unemployed to work and to restore prosperity.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Spanish Civil War

FREEDOM'S BATTLE. By J. Alvarez del Vayo. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

PUT Alvarez del Vayo's black-clad book as a somber period at the end of your long shelf of red and yellow volumes. That phase of freedom's battle called the Spanish Civil War is over, and lost. There is no time for mourning, for the next phase is on us, the phase we might have prevented had we only known then what we know now. That some of us did know some part of it, and were unable to find the words that the rest would listen to, only makes the moment more bitter.

That there is so little bitterness in this book is to the credit of Spain's Foreign Minister, who wrote it out of his own experience in those tragic years. He saw his country strangled in the non-intervention noose which a Tory government in England and a Socialist government in France put about its neck, while a democratic government in the United States acquiesced. He tried with all the power and persuasion at his command to make them see what that course would mean to them, as well as to the Spanish republic, and he failed. His failure brought tragedy to the republic. What we now see is that it helped prepare the tragedy which is overwhelming the rest of Europe.

Both in its official character and in the fulness of its detail this book is so important that it must be appraised not only for what it does but also for what it fails to do. Its positive contributions to the already considerable literature on the subject fall into three groups: it relates certain inside details of the struggle in the international field, it clarifies the clashes of policy and personality in the Republican Cabinet, it emphasizes the military lessons to be learned and applied, with reservations, to what is now going on. The first and the third are of daily importance. The results of the second are still simmering in refugee colonies and relief headquarters. That they may not always remain quiescent is clear to anyone who knows the Spanish habit of alternating between oblivion and headlines.

The most immediately vital chapters in the book are concerned with military lessons. Its account of the systematic way in which Germany used the Spanish struggle as a dress rehearsal for the European war receives fresh emphasis in every day's communiqués. It was in Spain that Hitler carried on bombing practice, learned how to machine-gun fleeing victims with economy and dispatch, trained a steady stream of aviators in the techniques that are taking toll in France. Even his favorite Blitzkrieg theory was tried by the generals he was supporting, and though hardly "discredited" by their failure with it, it was proved to need added strength. Spain had minerals, harbors, potential air and navy bases that the totalitarian governments needed—that we all knew. Its strategic importance is still an unplayed card in their hand. What few outside of the German High Command realized was that while Italy had had practice in Ethiopia, Germany's new army needed training ground, targets, practice maneuvers for the testing of weapons both military and psychological. Spain's abortive civil war offered all these, at low cost as long as England, France, and the United States kept defensive weapons out of the republic's hands. In the light of that knowledge, the three years of Republican resistance become an incredible achievement, and a hopeful omen.

The details of the struggle against non-intervention are not so clear. The villains in the piece—Bonnet, Laval, and Downing Street—are there. The legendary Blum, great Socialist statesman, emerges futile and irresolute. But in a farce whose tragic consequences mount daily, those villains shrink to pawns. Señor del Vayo does not show—probably he does not know—just what combination of prejudice, stupidity, venality, and pressure it was that drugged the English and the French governments into playing Hitler's game.

Nor does he reveal—and this he surely does know—the exact proportion of power and the pattern of interaction between parties in the Republican Cabinet. Now that the Popular Front has been torn to bits there are many readers who hunger for those facts. He makes it clear, of course, that the degree of Communist influence and Soviet aid was enormously exaggerated—by the Communists for their purposes, and by the Nazis as a means of paralyzing possible democratic aid to the republic. Perhaps he could not say more at this moment, but the republic owes it to itself and to its friends to set this matter in the open.

Despite these omissions, "Freedom's Battle" remains the most important single book on the Spanish War which has yet appeared.

MILDRED ADAMS

The Crisis in Marxism

STALIN'S RUSSIA AND THE CRISIS IN SOCIALISM. By Max Eastman. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

SINCE the Nazi-Communist pact and Russia's occupation of Poland and invasion of Finland many Marxists have come to the conclusion that collectivism is but the reverse of the fascist coin. They now look upon it as the natural basis of bureaucracy and political tyranny instead of as the road to the new freedom of the classless society as taught by Marx and Lenin.

This view of collectivism, recently presented by Lewis Corey in The Nation's columns, is supported by Max Eastman in his latest book. Like others who share the view, Eastman has undoubtedly been influenced by Russia's recent role in international politics. But, as his book shows, Russian international diplomacy culminating in "socialism" on bayonet points is the logical product of changes within the domestic economy. Eastman has been a close student of Russia's internal economy since the October Revolution, and it is to changes inside the country that his revised conception must in the main be attributed. He finds that practically every reform inaugurated by the revolution under the leadership of "Knocks into a cocked hat most of the histories of our time."

—GEORGE SELDES

The FAT YEARS and THE LEAN

A History of Post-War America

by Bruce Minton and John Stuart

The authors of Men Who Lead Labor have written a factual, hard-hitting story of the past twenty years in American life. It digs beneath the surface, bares the forces that have struggled and are struggling for mastery of our country. Thoughtful readers will find here the background of the questions that are now troubling America. $3.75

Modern Age Books 432 4th Ave., N. Y.

GOT THE HEADLINE JITTERS?

Explore a saner, better-ordered fascinating world in

THE FIRST to AWAKEN

A Novel of the Year 2040

by GRANVILLE HICKS with R. Bennett
author of I Like America

This is the absorbing story of George Swain who shut his eyes on our mad world to open them a hundred years from now on a world strangely like yet amazingly different from our own. "It is in the real tradition of William Morris's News from Nowhere. The same spaciousness and sunlight is in it and the same quiet sense of humanity."—MAX LERNER. 40 illus. $2.50

Modern Age Books 432 4th Ave., N. Y.

Lenin and Trotsky has been emasculated by the Stalin machine. Proletarian equality, the greatest ideal of the revolution, is repudiated, he tells us, by a governing élite of officials, technicians, artists, and party bosses. The development of a ruling élite has been made possible by a system of differential rewards in which the typical income of highly placed officials is more than eighty times as great as that of the lowest paid workman. According to Eastman this disparity in pay is as great as that between the average unskilled worker and a top corporation executive in capitalist America.

It is not only the system of gross income inequality but also the receipt of "unearned income" which makes the élite the chief beneficiaries of the usufruct of industry. "These happy beneficiaries of the 'triumph of socialism' . . . are able to invest their income not, to be sure, in risky shares and debentures producing on the average, if they are lucky, 4 or 5 per cent of interest, but in government bonds which pay 7 per cent, or failing that, to deposit them in savings banks where they are exempt from both inheritance and income taxes, and earn 8 per cent of interest." In short, the position of this group is substantially that of the rentier under capitalism. (Eastman's statement appears to conflict with Gedye's cable from Moscow to the New York Times, April 7, 1940, concerning the new income-tax law of the Soviet Union. The new law, Gedye reports, provides for levies against wages and salaries above 150 rubles and against all other income above specified amounts.) Maintaining that the élite is a new ruling class, Eastman dismisses as wishful thinking the Trotsky position that it is simply a parasitical caste infesting socialized property and perverting its real character. Above all, he contends that in the rise of this new class and the "totalitarian gang-rule" that accompanies it the intrinsic character of collectivism is made manifest.

Eastman thinks that some of the fundamental evils of collectivism arise from its destruction of the free-market mechanism. When this mechanism is abolished, the power of making decisions is shifted from the economic to the political arena. The power diffused among numerous capitalists and checked to some extent by the consumer's and worker's freedom of choice under a system of private property now becomes centralized in the boss of the political machine. Thus by its destruction of the free market collectivism inevitably leads to the suppression of individual freedom and the repudiation of democracy. Now the possibility of retaining the free-market system in a collectivist economy is highly debatable. Eastman, however, fails to consider the question and is perhaps justified in neglecting it, since he is more concerned with the mistakes of the fathers of socialism than with the problems of theoretical economics. From this standpoint what really matters is not whether collectivism must on principle destroy the free market; it is rather the fact that the disciples of Marx have always considered its destruction essential to the proper functioning of the socialist system.

The failure of Bolshevism reveals crucial flaws in Marx's blueprint and in class struggle as a means of social progress. Marx was wrong in assuming that "men, once wealth-producing property is owned in common, will find themselves living together in natural cooperative brotherhood." He also was wrong in holding that "material" changes offer scientific proof that "the world is traveling of necessity and by its own motion" to this "higher" form of society. As Eastman notes, there is nothing in the facts of experience to show that human beings are "sufficiently capable of self-dependence and malleable in a cooperative direction, so that a collectivization of property would naturally lead to the society of the free and equal." But Eastman is inclined to place too much emphasis upon the Hegelian metaphysics as a source of Marx's optimistic view of human nature. Marx's view was to a large extent shaped by the doctrines of the natural-rights school and the eighteenth-century Enlightenment. Like Godwin and others of his predecessors, Marx seemed to believe that man, although fundamentally good, was spoiled by bad economic institutions. Furthermore, it is not only human imperfections but economic facts which render improbable a society governed by Marx's formula "From each according to his abilities, to each according to his needs." This principle could be practiced only if the things desired by men and for which labor and industry must now be expended became so abundant that no one need worry about how much he could have or when he could have it.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Eastman's statements about the pernicious effect of the Hegelian metaphysics upon Marx's thinking are well founded. But the reviewer finds it difficult to accept his remark that Marx's "Capital" is mainly dialectic philosophy. And it is somewhat paradoxical of Eastman to dismiss "Capital" as metaphysics and at the same time retain "surplus value," the most metaphysical concept in the three volumes, for practical use. Of course no one would deny that Marx's analysis of capitalist production was indeed subordinate to his passionate revolutionary interests. Still, many scientific students think that in the second and third volumes of "Capital" Marx anticipated in fundamental respects the ideas of some present-day economists concerning the relation of wages, employment, and investment to the trade cycle. Professor Oskar Lange is authority for the view shared by the reviewer that as a theory of development Marx's economics is vastly superior to the best that orthodox theory offers. The main defects of Marx are not connected with his description of economic evolution but with his predictions of the way people would respond to economic changes. He assumed a too direct and rational relation between economic events and the behavior of human beings. The effect of the past—traditions, social habits, and customs—of which Marx was certainly aware, was thus minimized by him in the long view of social change. Scientific insight may have led Marx to conclude that "the dead hand of the past weighs like a nightmare upon the brains of the living"; but he was constrained by revolutionary ardor to believe that the impact of economic changes would rapidly resolve all antagonisms into the one great antagonism of capital and labor.

The current reexamination of Marx of which Eastman's book is but one example serves to clear the atmosphere for serious thinking on current social problems. The next step, if the forces of progress are really to be regrouped, is to think out a constructive program of action. That this is a difficult task is shown by Eastman's proposals of "What to Do Now." While recognizing conflicting class interests as a concrete fact of life, he would dismiss as sheer mysticism the view of class struggle as a sort of inner dialectic of history.

ORPHANS OF FINANCE . . .

Supreme Court Justice Douglas describes unorganized investors as "orphans of our financial economy."

"THE problem," Mr. Justice Douglas said, when he was Chairman of the SEC, "is how to achieve some form of real representation for those security holders who are not associated with management . . . the development of some permanent national organization to which grievances could be carried and which could efficiently intervene."

American Investers Union offers the unorganized investor the protection of a non-profit organization made up of investors like himself. To the "orphans of finance" who join its ranks, AIU sends a monthly magazine, Your Investments — edited for the non-expert investor.

UNLESS you are a financial expert, or unless you can afford to hire the services of accountants, lawyers and other specialists in corporate finance you will always be at the mercy of insiders and management.

To protect yourself, you need the expert guidance and the collective support that AIU membership provides.

AMERICAN INVESTORS UNION
A NON-PROFIT ORGANIZATION FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE INVESTING PUBLIC

American Investors Union
10 E. 40th St., N. Y. C.
Here is my remittance for a subscription as indicated below.
☐ $1 Introductory Offer
☐ $5 for one year
Start with the .... issue
NAME..
ADDRESS..
....Nat. 6-8

Contents
Your Investments

Issue No. 3
The "Death Sentence" —Bogey or Blessing?
The A. G. & E. Bankruptcy
Adam Smith vs. Wall Street
What Morgan Didn't Buy

Issue No. 4
Senator Wagner on Investment Trust Legislation
American Tobacco Stockholders Meet
"Technical Accuracy" vs. Truth
Pennroad: A Corporate Catspaw
What Stocks Do the Experts Buy?
The Biggest Corporation of Them All

Forthcoming Issue
Will contain a 36-page analysis of savings banks, and a reply to Raymond Moley's recent article in The Saturday Evening Post on the TNEC's insurance inquiry

Subscribe Today
INTRODUCTORY TRIAL OFFER
$1
FOR 3 ISSUES
YOUR INVESTMENTS

R E S O R T S

NOW OPEN

[illegible] HOLE
GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES

HONEYMOON PARADISE

9 CLAY TENNIS COURTS

8 HANDBALL COURTS

NO GREEN FEES IN JUNE

Write for Booklet "UM"

In the Heart of the Adirondacks

HALF MILE OF SAND BEACH

SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL SCHROON LAKE N.Y

NEW YORK OFFICES: MU. 2-4083, CO. 7-2471

QUISISANA CAMPS
On Lake Kezar in Center Lovell, Maine

Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.) in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.

QUAINT ■ RESTFUL ■ ROMANTIC ● CULTURED COMPANIONSHIP

Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass, Brook Trout. Non-sectarian. Ownership-Management.

RATES: From $35.00 a week per person, including meals. WRITE FOR BOOKLET
N. Y. Address, 42 West 35th Street. Telephone WIsconsin 7-0200

C O N F E R E N C E

Nation readers are invited to attend the Twenty-Sixth Annual Conference
of the
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
FRIDAY, JUNE 14th, TO SUNDAY, JUNE 16th, 1940
AT UNITY HOUSE, FOREST PARK, PA.
SUBJECT:
"RE-THINKING THE PROBLEMS OF SOCIAL CHANGE"
Among the speakers will be:

JOHN BAUER
PAUL BLANSHARD
LEROY E. BOWMAN
PHILLIPS BRADLEY
WALLACE J. CAMPBELL
LEWIS COREY
JOHN W. EDELMAN
JOHN T. FLYNN (Tentative)
FREDA KIRCHWEY
HARRY W. LAIDLER
NATHANIEL MINKOFF
WILLIAM PICKENS
JOSEPH SCHLOSSBERG
JOEL SEIDMAN
MARK STARR
NORMAN THOMAS
GOODWIN WATSON
NATHANIEL E. WEYL

For further information write to:
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
112 East 19th Street New York City

B O O K

Kamiat's volume gives us a new instrument for evaluating what is happening today. If the view is correct, much of present-day history, sociology, and psychology will have to be rewritten.

SOCIAL FORCES in PERSONALITY STUNTING
By ARNOLD H. KAMIAT

An analysis of the forces which prevent the average individual from growing up psychologically.

Most of the phenomena in our present-day world are passed in review from the standpoint of maturity. The argument is incisively developed against a rich background of psychological, sociological, psychiatric and anthropological data. A constructive programme is offered to remedy the situation.

"The book is written in popular, readable style, so that it can be easily grasped by an intelligent, thinking person. . . . The author is a learned scholar and thinker, who yet can speak to the common man. . . ."—PROF. LEROY ALLEN, Social Science.

[illegible] Pages—Clothbound—Indexed—$2.50 (postpaid)
SCI-ART PUBLISHERS, Harvard Sq.—T—Cambridge, Mass.

With this there can be no quarrel. But here is the rub. Eastman would "marshal the proletarian class forces behind some such program as that which Max Lerner calls 'democratic collectivism.'" This program would retain private initiative but at the same time regulate capitalism through a system of planning boards. What, however, Eastman's book seems to show is that planning, socialist or otherwise, contains the seeds of totalitarianism. ABRAM L. HARRIS

The Honest Projector

DEFOE'S REVIEW. Reproduced from the Original Editions, with an Introduction and Bibliographical Notes by Arthur Wellesley Secord. 22 volumes. Published for the Facsimile Text Society by the Columbia University Press. $88.

THE honest projector, says Defoe, is he who, having by fair and plain principles of sense, honesty, and ingenuity brought any contrivance to a suitable perfection, puts his project into execution. Defoe had hardly emerged from Newgate when he became an honest projector who put his project into execution. After the agonized uncertainty of jail and the utmost horrors, none the less unreal because largely unrealized, of the pillory, whatever suggestion of a project Harley may have proposed to him must have seemed manna in his wilderness of debt, of dubious Dissenters, of wrathful High Fliers, and of his own teeming imagination. The Review in its inception may have expressed the measure of Defoe's gratitude to the shrewd and cautiously generous Harley; but in its fulfilment it was the realization of the character and the peculiar genius of Daniel Defoe himself.

In all its memorable features the Review is Defoe. It is Defoe in its unobtrusively organized style—straightforward, homely; a style subtly convincing through its apparent naturalness, fashioned of those words which men actually use but which catch them unaware. It is Defoe in its fecundity of ideas, ideas that, first considered, seem the common concepts of every reader, but that in reality are startlingly original in their simple wisdom and their innate capacity to transform a maze of folkways into an ordered economic and social entity. The Review is Defoe in its cautious daring, in its searching criticism tentatively expressed, in its velveted stings of chastising satire, in its gameness and decency amid the coarse brutality of contemporary controversy, in its breadth of observation and its detailed knowledge of existing policies and living men, in its ardor of devotion to a cause deemed worthy or just, in its vivid journalistic sense, its copiousness, and its tolerance. To those who know Defoe only as the greatest forerunner of the founders of English fiction, particularly as the author of the deservedly immortal "Robinson Crusoe," each succeeding volume of the Review adds to the stature of its creator as a literary artist and as a pioneer student of social issues. It is not the first English periodical, nor is it the only important journal of its day, for Defoe met steady competition from the Observator, the Post Boy, the London Gazette, the Daily Courant, the Flying Post, and others. Clearly, however, the Review was the most significant undertaking of early British journalism. The physical labor required for the writing and publishing of its many hundred pages arouses simple wonder; but when the content of its nine volumes is examined in the light of Queen Anne politics and of Stuart social theories, it stands forth clearly as the first landmark of enlightened journalism.

The Review has long been difficult of access to scholars, and well-nigh unavailable to general readers. The surviving sets, most of which are incomplete, are widely scattered in great libraries or private collections. No reprint has ever been made of the entire work, and no selection of its choicest passages is in print. The learned and painstaking editorial work of Professor Secord and the imagination and resourcefulness of the Facsimile Text Society have now completely overcome all the obstacles that formerly stood in the way of an available text of the entire Review. In the twenty-two handsome volumes of this edition appears a photographic reproduction of every issue of the periodical from February 19, 1704, to June 11, 1713, except one, which the most diligent search has not uncovered. Included also are the Little Reviews made up of Defoe's expansion of his Advice from the Scandal Club, and the rare numbers prepared while he was in Scotland on secret official business. The editor has provided compact, informative introductions devoted principally to bibliographical notes concerning the originals and to consideration of the circumstances under which Defoe wrote.

In every way the work reflects the greatest credit upon all who had part in its creation. May it be the precursor of more efforts of its kind. DONALD A. ROBERTS

Florida Cracker-Folk

WHEN THE WHIPPOORWILL—. By Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

UNSEEN, perhaps completely unsuspected by the tourist tribe, these Florida Cracker-folk of Mrs. Rawlings's live back in the piney-woods or in the scrub. With a profound mistrust of Yankees and a typical backwoods-individualist scorn for the law, they are as inimitably American and earthly as the sandy soil from which they scratch a living—that is, unless they choose to make out by trapping, fishing, or moonshining.

In this delightful volume of short stories and novelettes, all of which, I believe, have appeared previously in magazines, Mrs. Rawlings presents her rangy Floridians in various moods and colorings, from uproarious comedy in Benny and the Bird Dogs to deep pathos in Jacob's Ladder. In a Crop of Beans she spins an engrossing tale of heroic perseverance in the face of hard luck and cruel disappointment. The dark shadow of violence hangs like a threatening cloud over The Enemy, but even here some light penetrates the gloom, a light generated by the essential wholesomeness of the people.

While Mrs. Rawlings's skill as a story-teller needs no recommendation to a public that has already reveled in "The Yearling," I should like to pay tribute, in passing, to her adroitness in capturing dialectal speech, a tricky art in which I know no writer who surpasses her. This dexterity, along with her sincere admiration and fellow-feeling for her neighbors, makes "When the Whippoorwill—" a distinguished collection, with each story a gem. LOUIS B. SALOMON

Book Bargains

Former prices to $5.00
NOW 21¢ to 98¢

All brand new latest editions! Save up to 80%
but act quickly as quantities strictly limited!
Satisfaction, or money back in 5 days!

1 FORTUNES IN FORMULAS, by Hiscox and Sloane. Make and save money! 10,000 trade secrets, formulas, recipes, and processes for home, farm and work shop. 910 pages.
Formerly $4.00. NOW 98c

2 FOOD, FITNESS, AND FIGURE, by Jacob Buckstein, M.D. "Explains the what, why and how of diet . . . Contains new scientific diets for reducing, also for putting on weight . . . as well as valuable charts showing calorie content, vitamins, food values, height and weight figures, etc."—Diabetes Review. 252 pages. Illustrated.
Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

3 GUIDING YOUR CHILD THROUGH THE FORMATIVE YEARS, by Winifred de Kok, M.D. "More solid facts and more helpful suggestions than in a whole library full of those dull wordy encomiums that most child psychologists of today feel it their solemn duty to write." —New Republic. Illustrated.
Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

4 PSYCHOANALYSIS FOR TEACHERS AND PARENTS, by Anna Freud. "Lucid, simplified exposition of Freudian principles." —Times Literary Supplement.
Formerly $1.75. NOW 87c

5 CHILDBIRTH: YESTERDAY AND TODAY, by A. J. Rongy, M.D. "A clear picture of the progress of midwifery and obstetric practices throughout the centuries. Delightfully presented . . . illustrated with telling pictures." —American Journal of Public Health. 192 pages. Profusely illustrated. Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

6 SAFELY THROUGH CHILDBIRTH, by A. J. Rongy, M.D. "Tells . . . just what to anticipate before and after childbirth, and of the processes of labor, and answers the many questions a woman asks of her physician."—Clinical Medicine and Surgery. 192 pages. Profusely illustrated.
Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

Extra Saving—order No. 5 and No. 6 together for $1.49.

7 ANSWERS TO SEX QUESTIONS OF CHILDREN, by T. F. Tucker, and M. Pout, B.Sc.—Foreword by Angelo Patri. "Simple, truthful answers to the 'embarrassing' questions asked by children about birth and sex."
Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

8 CREATIVE PLAY, by Ivah Deering. Describes games and activities in detail and tells exactly how to guide the play of youngsters. "Wise and practical . . . fosters the native powers of children through creative play." —Joseph Lee, Former President National Recreation Association. 206 pages. Profusely illustrated.
Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

9 RHYTHM OF LIFE: A Guide to Sexual Harmony, by Sofie Lazarsfeld. "A scientific discussion of the sexual relations between man and woman." —Journal of Medicine. 343 pages. Contains a wealth of case histories. Formerly $5.00. NOW 98c

10 PROSTITUTION IN THE MODERN WORLD, by G. M. Hall, M.A. "Valuable because it supplies evidence based upon intimate and confidential knowledge."—C. E. Raven, D.D. 200 pages. Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

11 ON YOUR GUARD, by Carl Warren. Edited by M. J. Exner, M.D. "At last a tactful, well written yet simple discussion of the venereal diseases, with concrete, specific advice toward prevention. The various prophylactics are discussed and evaluated." —Hygeia (Published by the American Medical Association) 160 pages. Profusely illustrated.
Formerly $1.00. NOW 49c

12 WOMAN'S PRIME OF LIFE: Making the Most of Maturity, by I. E. Hutton, M.D. "Modern woman does not have to grow old and fat and useless during or after her Change of Life." — Journal of Nursing. "Should help considerably to ease the domestic tension which threatens many marriages at this period."—Marriage Hygiene.
Formerly $2.00. NOW 98c

13 SAVE YOUR HAIR, by Oscar L. Levin, M.D. "If you really want to save your hair this book tells you exactly how to go about it. Contains a wealth of strictly reliable scientific information about the care of the hair, including what to do about dandruff." Illustrated.
Formerly $2.00. NOW 49c

14 INSOMNIA, by John Millet, M.D. (Physician and Psychiatrist) "No sleep? Here's how to obtain it!"—Montreal Standard. 195 pages.
Formerly $1.75. NOW 87c

15 SEX AND THE LOVE IMPULSE, by J. H. Burns, B.Sc. "Simple, concrete . . . biological and psychological facts of sexual development . . . sound mental hygiene."—Quarterly Review of Biology. Formerly 50c. NOW 21c

16 ADVICE TO A LOVER, by William Cobbett. "Never a dull moment [in these] views on love, marriage. Not for sentimental lovers." — Kansas City Star. "One dollar, but worth five."—West. Features Syndicate.
Formerly $1.00 NOW 33c

17 THE MAN TAKES A WIFE, by Ira S. Wile, M.D. "Outlines thoroughly the requirements of a successful marital relation . . . wholesome, well written, thoroughly thought out."—Journal of the American Medical Association. 277 pages.
Formerly $2.50. NOW 98c

Order Now! Supply Limited!

Return this Coupon NOW to HEALTHCRAFT, Inc., Dept. 59-B, 247 West 19th St., New York City
Send me following (encircle numbers of the books you want):
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9
10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17

☐ I enclose payment
☐ Send C. O. D.
{I reserve the right to return any book(s) within five days for full refund. I am over 21 years old.}

Name..

Address...

DRAMA

Throttlebottom Redivivus

"LOUISIANA PURCHASE" (Imperial Theater) is a grand show, certain to take its place immediately among the smash hits. Perhaps it is never actually quite so swift and sharp and sure as it promises in the two opening scenes to be; perhaps, even, none of the other turns is quite so good as the rollicking mock-heroics of "Sex Marches On," which is the first song after the opening chorus. But for all that it is at least as good as anything of the sort seen here in a long time—better, I think, than any musical satire since "Of Thee I Sing." Irving Berlin's score is accomplished and his lyrics are witty. The book by Morrie Ryskind is genuinely hilarious at times, though it might, since it starts out as satire, be better if it made more of an effort to maintain some consistency of style and purpose instead of surrendering as easily as it does to the disintegrating influence of the more idiotic conventions of the song-and-dance tradition.

Obviously there is only one person in the world who ought to play the part of Oliver P. Loganberry, the Republican Senator from New Hampshire who comes to New Orleans to investigate corruption while continuing to dream wistfully of the dear dead days when it was still legal for members of his party to be President. That person—whose services must have been secured before the part was written—is of course Victor Moore, and he plays the role with all the mild hopelessness which has made him the most heartbreaking clown of our generation. This time he is not quite a complete fool. Mr. Ryskind has given him just that quiet insight into the ways of crooks which even a dull man might be expected to acquire after a lifetime in politics; and it is a delight to see him turn the tables now and then, though of course he loses in the end when he cannot cross the picket line about the State Capitol which was built by non-union labor and hence is under the ban of both the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. Mr. Moore is not by any means the only star. There are also the tirelessly energetic William Gaxton, the graceful Vera Zorina, and the expert Irene Bordoni, who, by the way, makes a great deal out of "Tomorrow Is a Lovely Day," one of the most taking of Berlin's sentimental songs. Nevertheless, Mr. Moore is four-fifths of the show for me. Who else could handle a scene like that in which he gazes helplessly at a menu at least two feet square and make painfully funny the sadly apologetic remark to the impatient waiter, "It's in some foreign language"?

But to return to the fact that Mr. Ryskind might well have insisted upon a bit more integrity in his book. A serious love interest we no doubt have to have, but even in musical comedy it is a little disturbing to be compelled to forget periodically that the romantic hero is at other moments the head man among the swindlers and that presumably he (let's just call him Mr. Gaxton) is going to live happily ever after with the beauteous Zorina, bringing up the children she dreams of so sweetly in a very sentimental ballet on the proceeds of one pile of lumber stolen from the WPA and sold once every month to the state of Louisiana. I might add that Mr. Ryskind seems to play pretty consistently for Union League laughs. That is doubtless good box office in a piece designed for the limousine and ticket-scalper trade; it is also anybody's right, since — Senator Loganberry notwithstanding—it is still legal to be a Republican. But it does seem a bit strange coming from a well-known liberal who has even, on occasion, been a valued contributor to these high-minded pages.

"Russian Bank," a sort of romantic farce dealing in shaky amateur fashion with the early days of the Bolshevik revolution, will probably have passed away before this notice appears, and that leaves only "Keep off the Grass" (Broadhurst Theater) for further comment. The latter rejoices in the services of Jimmy Durante, and only he ever succeeds in making it more than a routine review. Even he—as the standard phrase of commentators goes—"has little to do," but he does it with his accustomed frenzy. Like Mr. Moore he is one of our best clowns, but the two stand at opposite poles. Mr. Durante is one of Punch's innumerable progeny—a symbol of brainless energy, something as senseless and overpowering as a thunderstorm, the triumph of vitality over intelligence, or even intelligibility. Mr. Moore is a symbol of no triumph at all. He is Pierrot in store clothes, the eternal victim, the man who gets slapped and does nothing about it. To the Moores nearly everybody else in the world seems to be acting like Durante; the Durantes don't even know that the Moores exist.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

TO GO to the movies often these days is an experience which confirms the observation of happier times: the average picture offered by the great industry is emotionally still on the level of the pulp magazines and intellectually even beneath that. Excellent production, distinguished actors and directors, and impressive technical achievements do not change this fact. It is true, of course, that no collective expression of a given society can be much farther advanced than the society itself, but the point is that the expression can be much less far advanced than the society. This seems to me to be the case with the films. No sane person will ask that a picture reflect the latest turn of the war. Yet the distance between the world we live in and the world the pictures show is too great to be bridged by the excuse of "entertainment." Entertainment, too, has its serious side.

In the past weeks I have seen only one film which failed to annoy me by pretentiousness or falsity or simple stupidity and rudeness. This was "Lillian Russell" (20th Century), not a great picture, not an especially fine picture, but an honest one which entertains in light and pleasant fashion and does it with taste and talent. Half real life, half fairy tale, it is excellently told and sung. It is worth ten films like "Waterloo Bridge," in which the sincerity of the original play was completely lost. Myra (Vivien Leigh, captivating at times) is of course innocent when the dashing officer (Robert Taylor, unsuccessfully painstaking) meets her, and from then on one accident after the other is used to make a plot. Even in this war-time picture the producers failed to use their opportunity to tell a little bit of timely truth.

"My Son, My Son" (RKO), after the best-selling novel, is a very uneven film drama, at times approaching greatness. Brian Aherne as the father never becomes a real person, not to speak of his inability to make us believe that this mediocrity of a man is at the same time a successful novelist and playwright. The picture has one quality though: Louis Haywood as the son gives a very convincing performance. He really makes an unpleasant character live and even makes him likable. The quality of his sharp characterization reminds one of Robert Montgomery's Earl of Chicago.

The other pictures I have seen may as well be forgotten. One of the latest, "Torrid Zone" (Warner Brothers), takes place somewhere in the tropics on a banana plantation. The general manager of the American fruit company rules the country and orders the natives shot when they interfere with his business. Nobody objects to the procedure, and the picture draws a lot of fun from this basic situation. Cagney and O'Brien, the old combination, and Ann Sheridan give entertaining performances. The audience enjoyed their tough dialogue and fast shooting. The same audience applauded the Belgian king because he was riding a handsome horse. But suddenly the house became dead quiet when the newsreel changed to show the bombed and machine-gunned Belgian refugees on the roads to Paris.

FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

THE second volume of Chopin Mazurkas issued by Victor (M-656, $10) contains a number of the finest of Chopin's achievements in this genre, admirably played by Artur Rubinstein and excellently recorded. There is also fine playing by Serkin—though on a dull-sounding piano—with beautifully matched playing by the Busch Chamber Players in the set of Mozart's Concerto K. 449 (M-657, $6.50); but the work itself, despite occasional exquisite details that are inevitable with Mozart, does not interest me in the way some of the others do. Recording is good.

Worse than the music of our Hindemiths, Harrises, and Coplands is their talk; for listening to the music itself people know at once what it means and what it is worth, but the talk—with its ad hoc aesthetics, its misstatements and misinterpretations of history, and its other confusions—is like parachute troops sent down behind the defenses of people's understanding. Constant Lambert, in his "Music Ho!" dealt brilliantly with the Hindemith brand of portentous nonsense, some of which is quoted in the leaflet issued with the Victor set of "Der Schwanendreher": "What is generally regretted today is the loose relation maintained by music between the producer and the consumer. The composer these days should never write unless he is acquainted with the demand for his work. The times for consistent composing for one's own satisfaction are probably gone forever. On the other hand, the need for music is so great that it is urgently necessary for composers and hearers to come to some understanding at last"—this business-like talk being a defense of the business-like setting down on paper of notes which, when they are translated into sound, reveal not the slightest trace of the emotional impulse that alone can justify the setting down of notes on paper. When "Der Schwanendreher," a viola concerto on old German folk melodies, was first given by the New York Philharmonic in 1937, Hindemith said he had set out to function like the medieval minstrel who expanded and embellished the melodies he played, "preluding and improvising according to his fancy and ability"; and in the leaflet for the recording he has made with Fiedler's Sinfonietta (M-659, $6.50) he tells us his aim was "to try how the old German folk songs could be adapted for today's concert work, e. g., with a modern arrangement and even in the spirit of the originals." But to both statements there is one answer: unlike those of the medieval minstrel, Hindemith's modern expansions, embellishments, preludings, improvisings are—in their astringency of idiom and aridity of feeling—unsuited to the simple old folk songs and twist them into something as distorted as his own music. Performance and recording are good.

In the case of Sibelius the nonsense has been uttered by other people. Good works have been absurdly overestimated; and what is probably the worst of all the insignificant incidental music that Sibelius has composed—the Prelude for a production of "The Tempest"—has elicited from Cecil Gray the statement that it is "one of the grandest pieces of storm music in existence. . . . All the old familiar ingredients—chromatic scales for the strings, whole tone harmonies for the wind, the employment of a vast battery of percussion instruments, the confused rumblings of the double basses—they are all there, but they are exploited with such technical resources and infused with such an intensity of inspiration that they take on a new lease of life. . . . It is a piece of music which is, literally, entirely without any thematic material whatsoever. It consists throughout of nothing but realistic effects of the kind described. . . ." The work is in the Sibelius Society Volume VI issued here by Victor (M-658, $10.50); and Gray's statement is one of many of the sort in the accompanying booklet. The other works in the volume are not for a person whose enjoyment of a work by Sibelius is commensurate with its quality; they are for the fanatic to whose ears music as pretentiously empty as "The Bard" and "In Memoriam" will convey Sibelius's unfathomable profundity, and things as inconsequential as the incidental music for "Pelléas et Mélisande" or as bad as some of "En Saga" will be infused with his "intensity of inspiration." Beecham's superb performances with the London Philharmonic are excellently recorded.

On a single record (15894, $2) are two heavily sentimental Russian songs—Gretchaninov's "The Captive" and Malashkin's "Oh Could I but Express in Song"—and the negligible "Tilim Bom" from Stravinsky's "Histoires pour enfants," all well sung by Kipnis. I prefer Alessandro Scarlatti's charming "Son tutto duolo" and "Le Violette," beautifully sung by Schipa on another single (2062, $1.50).

General Records, 1600 Broadway, has issued the Gamut set of Mussorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death" (MS-5, $4.50)—not the Rimsky-Korsakov versions that Gorin recorded for Victor but the Mussorgsky originals, sung by Moshe Rudinov with the beauty of voice and sensitiveness and subtlety of phrasing that he revealed in the Gamut set of Mussorgsky's "Sunless" cycle.

Bach's Sonatas Nos. 1 and 2 for viola da gamba and harpsichord sounded extremely dull to me when Scholz and Wolff recorded them on these instruments for Columbia, and sound just as dull now recorded by Emanuel Vardi and Vivian Rivkin on the modern viola and piano for Royale (Set 34, $3.50). The performances are good; the recording is afflicted by the rattle I spoke of last week. On a Royale single (603, $1) is Handel's Sonata in G minor, impressive in spots, dull in others, competently played by Eddy Brown, Roman Totenberg, and Ernst Victor Wolff, and recorded with shrillness that gets to be ear-piercing at times. Better recorded is a good performance by the York String Quartet of the moderately enjoyable Boccherini Quartet Opus 33, No. 6 (593/4, $2). The same group did a good job with the Quartet Opus 49 written by Shostakovich, and tripe none the less (Set 23, $2.50).

B. H. HAGGIN

AUTHOR! AUTHOR! World-famous literary agency now available to new writers. Those who qualify receive same skilled management that placed "Liliom," "Grand Hotel," "Kind Lady," "The Shop Around the Corner," "My Dear Children," hundreds more hits of stage, screen, radio, and book stores. Enlarged organization permits individual criticism and coaching of talented beginners. Booklet describes unique methods. Write: Edmond Pauker, Inc., Studio N-6, 1639 Broadway, New York City.

Letters to the Editors

On "The Irresponsibles"

Dear Sirs: Archibald MacLeish's The Irresponsibles, in The Nation of May 18, was a splendidly moving statement that may turn the tide in American literature. It affirms the autonomous function of the man of letters, who has aped the artist, cringed before the scientist, or served as a mere instrument of agitation. It asserts the free will of the writer, too long forgotten in a world that has been drugged by fatalism. This is the great voice that has won so many revolutions and made of poets and writers the givers of laws who have stood for truth and for courage and freedom. I know of no document of our time that is more likely to rouse our thinkers and set our intellectual world in action.

VAN WYCK BROOKS
Westport, Conn.

Dear Sirs: I was deeply impressed with the article by Archibald MacLeish in your issue for May 18. It's a grand indictment. Most scholars are "irresponsible" in the sense he means.

But at the same time this isn't the whole picture. There's a minority—a very vigorous and definitely "responsible" minority—and a full perspective must include them; not limit the minority to the single though effective voice of Thomas Mann. I'd like to remind Mr. MacLeish of the scholars in the field of science who protested against Hitlerism over a year ago, of those in the American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom, in the National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights, the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born. Then, too, he must not forget the many active, "responsible" scholars in the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Lawyers' Guild, the American Federation of Teachers, and the American Association of University Professors. Perhaps among them are no Voltaires or Miltons, but in the aggregate they embody no small block of "responsibility."

Mr. MacLeish's thesis is predominantly sound. It is quite true that the honorable goal of comparative objectivity has produced a tragic "irresponsibility" that menaces the truths on which all scholarship is based. But at the same time it must be recognized that within the last few years there has been a steady awakening of a sense of this very responsibility, an awakening which is already beginning to show its effects in organizational form. Doubtless it is true that among these scholars there are no writers capable of dramatic leadership by voice or pen; yet there are hundreds of persons, less gifted perhaps and less inspired, who are illumining their modest capacities with a devotion and a perseverance that will in the end carry them far.

Mr. MacLeish, by this article and by his previous writings, has himself contributed notable acceleration to this belated awakening. If as yet he has been unable to recognize a Milton or a Voltaire with powers of utterance adequate to meet the challenge of leadership of these new "responsibles," may it not perhaps be true that he has been looking too far afield? I, for one, should be well content to intrust that leadership to Mr. MacLeish himself.

ROBERT E. MATHEWS
Ohio State University

Dear Sirs: Mr. MacLeish tells us that scholars and writers, by separating their functions, have lost their value for social progress. Mr. MacLeish's argument involves two assumptions, neither of which appears to hold much validity. First, there is the assumption that scholars could be writers if they would. Even if scholars possessed the necessary time and the necessary eloquence, the complexity of knowledge they must possess hardly permits of "writing" in the sense of Mr. MacLeish. Useful knowledge is apparently always complicated and quantitative; the "writer" necessarily and inevitably underplays the complexity and quantitative aspects of knowledge, and ipso facto is no longer a scholar.

A more serious assumption by Mr. MacLeish, however, is the view that writers could be very effective at the present time. We doubt it. The day is gone, unfortunately, when a hand-press and a pikestaff could serve in the cause of human progress; the avenues of communication are now privileged, and apparently privilege cannot be ousted—neither in Germany nor, one may fear, in the United States—without control of modern implements of war. Mr. MacLeish urges the use of the weapon of honest writing. What is the likelihood of success against outright, subsidized propaganda? What chance does writing have against tear gas and machine-gun?

No. New problems—or old problems in new circumstances—demand new solutions. America will not, in this day and age, be saved by Voltaire, nor by a whole legion of Voltaires.

HERBERT S. CONRAD
University of California

Dear Sirs: I have read Mr. MacLeish's moving words with deep interest. I agree with all that he says about the seriousness of the cultural crisis of our time, and with his diagnosis of the causes that make the scholar and the writer so impotent to meet it. But I am troubled by the post-mortem spirit that pervades his article.

Nothing is to be gained for culture and morality by a silly optimism, and every sensitive person will share Mr. MacLeish's feeling that the present hour is very dark. But is it the hour for defeatism? . . . President Hutchins's proposals for the universities (in "No Friendly Voice" and "The Higher Learning in America") seem to offer a method for overcoming the "kind of academic narcissism" of which Mr. MacLeish speaks. If he sees some weakness in them, I wish he would make a criticism or offer some alternative.

There is one important cause for our present plight that he seems to have omitted from his discussion. It is the disposition which scholars and writers have to act alone, to ignore or find fault with the work of others even when its general purpose is the same as theirs. Such an attitude encourages division, where unity is the great need. Isn't it time for all men of good-will—writers and scholars alike—to bury their differences and unite to defend what is left of civilization? The questions who leads and who follows, who is famous and who is obscure, ought to be forgotten when the whole cause of truth and beauty is at stake.

JOHN U. NEF
University of Chicago

Dear Sirs: The pessimism of Archibald MacLeish will be a sore disappointment to many of his admirers. Especially disturbed will be those who have heard him read his "America Was Promises," with its confident affirmation of the possibilities of American life.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

RESORTS

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG

A Delightful Hideaway in the Mts.
You CAN have EVERYTHING!

Vacationtime here means [illegible] incomparable setting, abundant sports and adult diversions, fascinating friendships, inviting quarters (new 'Luxury Lodge' now ready) tempting vittels—EVERYTHING! Write — or fone — Fallsburg 53.

— M E N U —

SWIMMING in our filtered, luxurious pool
BOATING on "Lake Godsend" right [illegible] premises
PLUS—all other sports and pastimes

WOODBOURNE Open All Year NEW YORK

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7755

A resort of unusual beauty and charm. 150 acres of beautiful trees, lakes, and brooks. Only 40 miles from New York.

We just completed [illegible] New House luxuriously equipped with up to the minute conveniences. Each room, accommodating two guests only, has private bath and shower.

ALL FACILITIES FOR SPORTS
OPEN ALL YEAR

MOON HILL Lodge

IN HEART OF ADIRONDACKS

on SCHROON LAKE

Honeymooners' Paradise

Country Club Activities. Hotel accommodations. Golf, Tennis, Saddle horses, unsurpassed food (dietary laws).

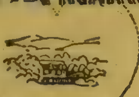
Low June Rates

All facilities in June

Write for booklet "N"

Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co. N.Y.
N. Y., 516 5th Ave.
MU 2-3383

IN THE HEART OF THE RAMAPO MTS



1 hour from N. Y. 225 acres in fascinating hiking country, [illegible] miles of paths. Tennis, Handball, Golf, Riding, Swimming, Bicycles, Roller Skating, Library. Congenial atmosphere. Excellent Cuisine. Adults.

Mgt. Fannie Goldberg
Tel.: Highland Mills 7895
OPEN ALL YEAR
Formerly Lewisohn's Estate

Birdland CENTRAL VALLEY, N.Y.

Ideal for Honeymooners

The LITTLE CLUB

ON SCHROON LAKE
In the Adirondacks
NEW YORK

GOLF ● RIGHT ON LAKE ● PRIVATE BEACH
All Sports, Excellent Cuisine
SPECIAL RATES TO JUNE 24th T. N. FLAUM

THE BIRCHES

Bungalow Colony on Ulster Heights Lake

Ellenville, N. Y. Tel. 56 M

2, 3, 4 Room Bungalows completely furnished on the lake. All Improvements ■ Swimming ■ Boating ■ Fishing ■ Handball ■ Tennis ■ Recreation Hall ● Woodland ■ 1400 Feet Above Sea Level ■ Moderately Priced ■ 90 miles out ■ For Information: M. SLUTZMAN, 164 Bay 37th St., Brooklyn, New York. Tel. ESp. 2-4348.

Pine Hill Farm House

PLEASANT VALLEY, N. Y. Dutchess County
100 acres of secluded farm and woodland. Modern conveniences, open fireplace, homey atmosphere. Badminton, handball, boating, fishing, swimming. June rate, $18. Phone: Pleasant Valley 2741. Louis Sakow.

PRIMROSE FARM

New City, N. Y.

30 miles from New York City.
Swimming, Tennis, $30 Weekly;
$5 Daily—Open All Year
ROSE ROMAINE
New City, N. Y.
Telephone New City 2156

RESORTS

a Modern Camp IN THE ADIRONDACKS

TIMBERLAND
Booklet on Request
31 West 42nd Street
PEnn 6-7663
Directors:
Harry N. Boardman
Louis A. Rothblatt

The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group
(LIMITED TO 100)
●
[illegible] Clay Tennis Courts
Complete Sports and Social Activities
■
JUNE RATE: $24.50

TIMBERLAND

POTTERSVILLE · NEW YORK

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★

In the Glorious Adirondacks

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $25.00 weekly. New Bungalows, semi-private baths for couples—$27.50 per person.

Send for Booklet — New York Office
116 NASSAU ST., Room 802a, CO-7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays—PR 4-1390
Auto service from and to New York every Saturday and Sunday

Pauls

A BETTER RESORT
●
"ACCENT ON TENNIS"
●
SPECIAL JUNE RATES
●
SWAN LAKE, N. Y.

There is only one

RED OAKS

[illegible] Country Estate just 50 miles from New York
at ELBERON, NEW JERSEY
Under the Management of
MASCHA [illegible] HYMAN STRUNSKY
ALL SPORTS OPEN ALL YEAR
Tel. Long Branch 3330

BREEZEMONT PARK

ARMONK, N.Y.

A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County

Spacious modern house. Enchanting scenery. Library, Fireplaces. Small private lake. Horseback Riding, Tennis, Handball, Ping Pong, Golf nearby. Less than one hour from Grand Central. Make early reservations. Open All Year. Telephone Armonk Village 955.

UNCAS LODGE

A Camp for Adults

● Beautiful Private Lake
■ Excellent Sports Facilities

Dancing, Dramatics, Tennis, Horseback, Bicycles
New Low June Rate: $18.00 Weekly
Bungalows for 2, 3 or 4
DIANA & ABE BERMAN, Uncasville, Conn.
Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5

ROBIN HOOD LODGE

WARRENSBURG, NEW YORK

A delightful Adirondack resort one mile from village. Special June rate $20 weekly includes [illegible], meals, private beach on Echo Lake, canoes, tennis, handball, cabins with bath. Write for Booklet N.

RESORTS

ECHO LAKE LODGE

Warrensburg

A Gift to Newlyweds
JUNE Rates $21
HONEYMOONERS' PARADISE!
Send for Booklet N

SWIM, FISH, PLAY

CAMP ANNISQUAM

or rest in the salt air and sunshine of romantic Gloucester. Camp Annisquam—where young people keep young. Send for booklet.

A. RESNICK, Dir., Gloucester, Mass.
NEW YORK OFFICE: Tel.: COlumbus 5-7399.

THRILL TO THE JOYS OF SPRING AT

plum point

the year 'round vacation resort

Magnificent estate on the Hudson River. Only 53 miles from New York. All outdoor sports. Saddle horses on grounds. Fine Library. Musical Recordings. Superlative Cuisine. Booklet Sent on Request.

Write P. O. Box 471, NEWBURGH, N. Y.
Phone Newburgh 4270

TWIN PINES

An Adult Camp

"Shangri-La" of the Adirondacks. Accommodations designed for living—recreational facilities designed for doing. Intimate friendly atmosphere. June rate, $25 (main house).

N. Y. C. Tel. CI 5-6983
TWIN PINES
ON TROUT LAKE
P. O. Lake George, N. Y.

AN *ARTIST INVITES YOU

to . . . his 100-acre farm
. . . superlative cooking
. . . homey atmosphere
. . . books, fireplaces
. . . hobby house, sports

* GEORGE A. PODORSON, City Phone: PLaza 3-8926 or LOCUST GROVE FARM, Hopewell Junction, N. Y.

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE

For VACATIONS or WEEK-ENDS

featuring all outdoor and indoor sports.
Fare 65 cents
PEEKSKILL Phone 1403 NEW YORK
New York Central R. R. to Harmon

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

One hour from New York. A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. Swimming, boating, tennis and handball. Horses on grounds. Golf nearby. Library of current books. Symphonic recordings. All spell [illegible] perfect vacation.

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

MAMANASCO LAKE LODGE

RIDGEFIELD, CONN. PHONE: 820

A luxurious country estate converted into [illegible] vacation paradise. New, modern, convenient. Magnificent lake, water sports, tennis, golf, indoor sports. Sumptuous cuisine. 50 miles from N. Y.

Under the direction of B. Hilsenrad

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.

A reservation of 800 acres of field and woodland, with a mile of frontage on beautiful Highland lake. Due to high altitude and absence of offending weeds, campers find relief from hay fever at Merriewoode. All land and water sports including exceptionally fine fishing.

Rates: June 15 to July 1—$18 & $20 Weekly
July [illegible] August—$20—$22 & $25 Weekly
Booklet upon request. Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

While one may agree that anti-war writers have trained Young America to be wary of war incitements and distrustful of old slogans and emotional judgments, it is also true that many American novelists, playwrights, and poets have taken an affirmative role in relation to the deep moral and social issues of our day. "Plant in the Sun," "One-Third of a Nation," and "The Grapes of Wrath," to say nothing of MacLeish's own splendid poems, are expressions of the will to redeem the promises of America.

The question is: How long before these promises will be redeemed? Will our deepening economic crisis be solved only through war orders? The sooner the small but powerful minority in business, industry, and banking gives up hampering the efforts of our people to translate the American promise into practical sense, the sooner our people will rally to the values they will defend to the death. These values revolve around such common wants as nourishment, housing, and the human dignity that comes from a feeling of security. Democracy, like Christianity, must not be above revealing itself in daily realities if it is to have meaning for the whole of America. Countless American writers stress this view, and Mr. MacLeish's pessimism may be out of order.

HENRY GOODMAN

Brooklyn, N. Y.

The A.L.P. Progressives Present Their Case

Dear Sirs: The Nation's editorial comment, in its issue of April 20, reflecting on the Progressive Committee to Rebuild the American Labor Party was unfair, unreal, and distorted.

As to the claim of "victory" for the Rose-Dubinsky-Antonini group, 53,000 A. L. P. votes were cast in the party primary, and the Progressive forces obtained a majority of about 5,000. The question of control of the State Committee is now in the Supreme Court as the result of many charges of fraudulent and corrupt conduct by the Old Guard (in a seventy-page complaint); in New York, where the party voters knew them best, Alex Rose, Paul Blanchard, Julius Hochman, Frank Crosswaith, and many other so-called "leaders" of the party were defeated for the State Committee.

The implication that the Progressive forces engaged in "Trojan-horse" tactics is simply fantastic. The overwhelming sentiment of the party membership was against the Rose-Dubinsky misleadership; and the heads of the Progressive group have been in the party since its inception, have been themselves candidates for many party and public positions, and have had the support of most of the other recent A. L. P. candidates for similar positions.

As to "hamstringing" legal tactics—what would you do if you were faced by persons in control who utterly disregarded the election laws as well as party rules? Were the courts engaged in "hamstringing" tactics when they supported us in practically every instance because of the "flagrant" and "illegal" acts of the Rose-Dubinsky group?

The Nation stated that it had been informed by "Rose supporters" that the Progressive Committee spent some $30,000, and seriously inquired, "If this is true, it would be enlightening to find out who put up the money and whether there is more to come." No, we did not get "Moscow gold." In compliance with Section 323 of the election law, both the Progressive Committee and the so-called Liberal and Labor Committee to Safeguard the A. L. P. filed reports of their primary receipts and expenditures with the Secretary of State's office in Albany.

The Progressive Committee showed total receipts of $3,027.55 and total disbursements of $2,976.26. Receipts were as follows: dance at Savoy, $410.79; Herman Shumlin, $150; Morris Watson, $50; George Marshall, $50; Ray Torr, $100; loan from Amalgamated Bank, $480; Transport Workers' Union, $150; Local 65, United Wholesale and Retail Union, $200; three mass-meetings, $781. Miscellaneous contributions of $655.76 from smaller mass-meetings held by clubs brought the total up to $3,027.55. The expenditures of the Progressive Committee went for stationery, postage, repayment of the Amalgamated loan, printing, telephone, and telegraph. Not a single penny was spent in payment of salary to anyone.

The expenses of the so-called Liberal and Labor Committee, however, are vastly different. Mr. Rose's committee, whose supporters attributed the fantastic figures to us that made such an impression upon you, admits in its report to total receipts of $25,609.93.

SAMUEL M. BLINKEN,
EUGENE P. CONNOLLY,
For the Progressive Committee to Rebuild the American Labor Party

New York, May 29

Books for Chinese Students

Dear Sirs: An urgent appeal has come from the Chinese-American Institute of Cultural Relations at Chungking, China, for Western books on science, literature, philosophy, history, and particularly for up-to-date college texts and scientific journals. Single books from individuals as well as larger quantities from institutions or publishers will be welcomed.

Books should be sent directly to Chungking by parcel post, the rates of which are 12 cents per pound or 1½ cents for two ounces. However, they will be forwarded if they are sent befor October 1 and marked "Books for China" to the New York Public Library, at Forty-second Street and Fifth Avenue, or to the Associated Boards for China Colleges, at 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City. ALBERT E. KANE

New York, May 24

CONTRIBUTORS

CHARLES MALCOLMSON is a Washington newspaperman formerly on the staff of the Philadelphia Record.

RICHARD H. ROVERE is a free-lance writer living in New York. He was formerly on the staff of the New Masses.

HARRY BLOCK is The Nation's Mexican correspondent.

KATHERINE GARRISON CHAPIN is the author of "Time Has No Shadow" and other books of verse. "And They Lynched Him on a Tree" has been set to music for chorus and orchestra by William Grant Still, the Negro composer, and will be presented at the Lewisohn Stadium in New York.

MILDRED ADAMS was in Spain during the making of the constitution in 1931. She is the translator of "Invertebrate Spain," by José Ortega y Gasset.

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, received a Guggenheim fellowship for a study of the economic systems of Marx and Veblen.

DONALD A. ROBERTS is assistant professor of English at the College of the City of New York.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JUNE 15, 1940 NUMBER 24

The Shape of Things

AS WE GO TO PRESS, THE GERMAN ARMY IS almost as close to Paris as it was in 1914 before the Battle of the Marne turned the tide. But this time there is as yet no sign of a weak spot in the German line of the kind into which Joffre hurled his reserves in the last war. On the other hand, the French army remains intact and is exacting a heavy price for every yard of ground it yields. The most dangerous Nazi advance is the thrust across the Seine between Rouen and Paris, which threatens both to outflank the capital and to envelop the British and French forces in Normandy. Whether the movement can be completed seems to depend on German ability to maintain pressure at its present intensity. Hitler is expending men and material recklessly, and the extent of his reserve of both seems to have far exceeded the calculation of the Allied command. But there must be some limit, some point of exhaustion. If the stonewalling tactics of Weygand can once check the impetus of the German drive, Paris may be saved. But the prospects are admittedly dark, and while the loss of its capital and chief industrial center would not necessarily put France out of the war, it would alarmingly diminish the nation's power of resistance.

*

TWO SPEECHES WERE DELIVERED LAST Monday—one in Rome and one in Charlottesville, Virginia. Those who heard both must have been struck by the contrast. From the portentous balcony of the Palazzo Venezia came a declaration of war embodied in staccato, theatrical boasts and threats. "Clad in shining blackmail," as the New Statesman and Nation so beautifully described him, Mussolini proclaimed Italy's unbending adherence to sacred obligations, its determination to meet the supreme trial, and its intention to get a fat slice of the booty when the conquest of France and Britain is complete. He promised not to attack other nations or their possessions bordering on Italy "by sea or land," ruling out specifically Switzerland, Yugoslavia, Greece, Turkey, and Egypt. This promise is undoubtedly an effort to placate the two powers which most strongly oppose the extension of the war into Eastern Europe—Soviet Russia and the Vatican. Whether it can be kept, the next days will tell. Mussolini may also hope to keep Turkey and possibly Egypt out of the war by directing his attack toward the west, but it is more probable that he is counting on a German victory so swift as to spare him the necessity of a long struggle on any front. And he is gambling his country's whole future on Hitler's comradely willingness to reward him for his services first as a non-belligerent ally and now as a fellow-warrior. "When one has a friend," said Il Duce, "one marches with him to the end." But one does not begin marching, it seems, until one calculates that the end is very near.

*

FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA CAME a different voice, speaking soberly but with immense eloquence of the straits in which democracy today finds itself. The President's words mark a new phase of relationship of this country to the struggle in Europe. Plainly he warned the United States of the consequences of an Allied defeat; almost as plainly he warned the Fascists that the extension of the war might bring the United States in. He promised that the material resources of the nation would be put at the disposal of the opponents of "force and hate," while at the same time the United States would speed up its preparations for "every emergency" and for its own defense. These are strong words, but the reception of the President's speech should end any question whether the American people support his determination to give all possible aid to the Allies. The decision to send planes and arms from our army and navy reserves was the most realistic defense measure of the past week. We do not believe it was necessary to adopt the subterfuge—which deceived no one—of selling these machines to private manufacturers for immediate shipment to France and Britain; now that the President has clearly aligned the country on the side of "those beyond seas maintaining their battle for freedom," Congress and the Administration ought to be able to agree on a straightforward policy.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

ITEMS CULLED FROM THE RUSSIAN PRESS during the past three weeks point to a Soviet foreign policy with the flexibility of an amoeba. Caustic references are made to "defeatist elements" in high places in the Allied forces, but when appeasers are routed out Red Star reports that "the wave of arrests and shake-ups in the army in France and England bespeaks the growth of a capitulatory mood"—a mood, incidentally, which Communists in those countries do their utmost to induce. Tributes to the brilliant evacuation of Flanders are diluted with sour remarks that "British imperialism . . . attempts to compensate for a military defeat by reactionary measures within the country." Against the Italians a steady drumfire of hostility and scorn has been maintained, but on the eve of Italy's long-delayed plunge into the war diplomatic relations with Rome were renewed. This step, coupled with some relaxation of border tensions in Yugoslavia, Hungary, and Rumania during the past two weeks, implies an understanding between Quirinal and Kremlin by which peace is to be maintained in the Balkans and Italian attention directed west and south. This does not necessarily mean that Russia is interested in seeing France quickly crushed, but only that its chief interest is in keeping the war at a distance. But if there was such an agreement it was a green light to Italy and to that extent heightened the chances of a quick German victory. To offset this perilous development it would not be surprising to see the Soviets embark on another adventure in the Baltic area. Grievances against Lithuania are being cultivated and may serve their purpose shortly. In this connection the agreement signed with Japan over the demarcation of the Mongolian-Manchoukuoan frontier is worth noting. An armistice with Japan ended hostilities over this same issue on September 16, 1939; the Red Army marched into Poland on the seventeenth.

*

THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE has enlarged the original tax program and has approved imposts which it estimates will raise a billion dollars in new revenue. Most controversial, perhaps, is its proposal to lower income-tax personal exemption from $1,000 to $800 for single persons and from $2,500 to $2,000 for married persons. This provision, if adopted, would add 2,000,000 persons to the tax rolls and yield $82,500,000, most of which, however, would come from larger payments by present taxpayers. The actual return from those whose incomes have hitherto been below tax level would be very small and might fail to cover the additional cost of collection. Nevertheless, this proposal is being widely, and rather smugly, defended on the ground that payment of direct taxes would be morally healthy for persons with small incomes. This argument would sound less phony if it included proposals to diminish indirect taxes, which fall far more heavily, in proportion to income, on the poor than on the well-to-do. In fact, however, the program under consideration provides for a general increase in indirect taxes. So far it does not include any levy on excess profits, but according to Representative Doughton, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, this may come later. No doubt we shall be told that large incomes are already taxed to the limit. But it must be remembered that while a surtax rate of 73 per cent on an income of $1,000,000 sounds high it is not necessarily an effective rate. There are still many more or less legal methods of tax-dodging, not to mention the snug harbor for millionaires afforded by tax-free bonds.

*

WILLIAM GREEN KNIFED AMERICAN LABOR when he joined forces with its worst enemies to push the Smith amendments through the House of Representatives. These bills, as the A. F. of L. Executive Council recognized a few months ago, do more than amend the Wagner Act. They transform it into an effective means of discouraging collective bargaining and of oppressing labor. The thirty pieces of silver which passed in this transaction took the form of an additional amendment permitting a craft unit to bargain for itself irre-

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 721
EDITORIALS:
A DEMOCRATIC PROGRAM OF DEFENSE by Freda Kirchwey 723
PATRIOTISM PLUS 724
LABOR'S FRONT LINE 725
WHERE TRADE MEANS SAFETY by Charles E. Noyes 726
MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT
VIII. HULL CAN WAIT by Barnet Nover 729
THE CASE FOR BERTRAND RUSSELL by John Dewey 732
IN THE WIND 733
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 734
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
PLANNING FOR WAR by Lindsay Rogers 735
ANATOMY OF POLAND by Mildred Adams 736
ADVENTUROUS AMERICANS by Joseph Wood Krutch 736
LIBERAL—SOUTHERN STYLE by John Temple Graves 737
DRAMA: THE NAUGHTY SIXTEEN-NINETIES
by Joseph Wood Krutch 739
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 739

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

spective of the wishes of a majority of the men in the whole plant or industry. In return for this dangerous and dubious privilege, Green threw his support to a series of amendments that would butcher the Wagner Act to make a corporation lawyer's holiday. The present Labor Board would be abolished. Workers in agricultural processing industries would lose the protection of the Wagner Act entirely. Employers could refuse to negotiate with a union headed by an alien—a blow at Bridges's Longshoremen and Pritchett's Woodworkers. Any worker who could be proved guilty of "violence" would lose his right to reinstatement. The Labor Board's procedure would be hopelessly entangled in technical rules, and all its findings and actions could be reviewed in interminable litigation. We cannot believe that the Administration will permit the Smith amendments to pass the Senate, although the vote cast for them by Majority Leader Rayburn in the House may be a danger signal. The A. F. of L. rank and file, as Representative Mary Norton protested during the debate, has been sold down the river by its leadership. It had better make itself heard quickly, for passage of the Smith amendments by the Senate would be a calamity.

✶

WE DON'T LIKE DISAGREEING WITH FELIX Frankfurter, whose social wisdom has been tempered and tested in many honorable battles. But we are forced to join Justice Stone in dissenting from the opinion read by Justice Frankfurter last week in the Jehovah's Witnesses flag-salute case. The flag is, indeed, as the majority held, the symbol of our national unity, and that unity "is the basis of national security." But the unity itself is based upon the free will of free men, and the maintenance of that unity by compulsion, even if it were possible, would rob it of value. A girl of twelve and her brother aged ten refused to salute the flag in a Minersville, Pennsylvania, public school because the sect to which they belong, Jehovah's Witnesses, takes literally the Biblical injunction "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image. . . . Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them." They were expelled. Are we honoring the flag by punishing two small children because their conscience—or even their parents' conscience—will not permit them to salute it? Do we further national unity by exacting under penalty what is worthless unless freely given? Justice Stone covered himself with honor by his dissent. "History teaches us," he said, "that there have been few infringements of personal liberty by the state which have not been justified, as they are here, in the name of righteousness and the public good, and few which have not been directed, as they are now, at politically helpless minorities." It is disturbing to find that his colleagues are in need of so elementary a lecture.

ALL NORWAY IS NOW IN GERMAN HANDS. The Allies have withdrawn their forces from the Narvik region, and the Norwegian troops in the north have been instructed to lay down their arms. Abandonment of this campaign, only a few days after Narvik town had been captured, is clearly the result not of local military defeat but of the necessity for concentrating all resources on the western front and in the Mediterranean. In order to hold northern Norway larger numbers of planes and anti-aircraft guns than could well be spared would have been needed in face of the constant Nazi pressure. Even more decisive, perhaps, in view of Italy's entrance into the war, was the fact that the operations in Norway required the protection of important units of the British fleet. As it is, the withdrawal has involved severe naval losses, for the aircraft carrier Glorious, two destroyers, a large transport, and a tanker were trapped in northern waters by two German battleships and sunk. Thus proof is furnished of the help afforded to the German navy by control of the Norwegian coast and of the added difficulties of the Allies in maintaining a tight blockade.

A Democratic Program of Defense

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

A GREAT and expanding defense program is being built in Washington. It has been forced on an unwilling country by the pressure of monstrous events. Our people have always and properly feared the effects of militarization. We have known that military might and democratic freedom are uneasy partners. In the past we have—almost without thinking about it—opposed a large standing army and compulsory service. We are a civilian nation, and we have taken our security for granted, putting trust in our great ocean barriers rather than in strength of arms.

Today this complacent confidence is gone. It is buried in the ruins of Dunkerque. America is arming. The defense program faces no opposition that counts. Four billion dollars looks like, and is, a small price to pay for protection against Hitler's plans of world dominion. It is only a small fraction of the amount we shall have to pay in cash and living standards and human values if Hitler crushes France and Britain. We are arming, and the only question is how much of our democratic freedom will be able to survive our preparations to defend it.

In the days when a big, but one-ocean, navy and a small army seemed an adequate defense, nobody worried much about the relationship between democracy and defense. Our army and navy are not democratic organizations; they are rigid hierarchies of rank, concentrating and exaggerating the social distinctions that exist in civil life. But each is a separate society, cut off as in no other country from the general community. And the whole armed force is so small and so scattered that its social influence is insignificant. No officer caste claims powers and privileges superior to those of the ordinary citizen. The organization of the army has been a matter of indifference to most civilian Americans.

That can no longer be the case. Our preparations for defense, both economic and military, will affect the life of every one of us. Methods that were harmless in a small military establishment will be intolerable when the navy is greatly increased and the army doubled. The shift toward a war economy has begun. And already the threats inherent in the new order are starting to materialize.

Some of them are discussed this week in the editorials that follow. Assured high profits for the makers of arms and planes and tanks; threats to labor standards and labor's right to organize and bargain collectively—these are only hints of what is likely to follow in due course. In a series of editorial articles in this and later issues The Nation plans to take up the major problems that challenge those who want a genuinely democratic defense, who are determined that our national effort shall not be turned into a travesty of the institutions it is devised to protect.

The first requisite for a democratic program of defense is universal military training. This is a hard prescription for me to write, and it will be an unpalatable dose for many readers to swallow. Universal service, in the lexicon of liberals, has meant just one thing—state coercion of the individual. But new conditions demand the fresh examination of old dogmas. A small army could safely be a volunteer army. A large army must be based on the training and service of all citizens if it is to avoid military and class discrimination.

Already steps have been taken to dragoon the unemployed into the service. An amendment providing for "non-combatant military training" of members of the Civilian Conservation Corps—some 500,000 young men a year—was attached to the new relief bill by a Senate subcommittee on appropriations. Senator Byrnes has introduced a bill to train 1,000,000 men in "non-combat" subjects essential to the operations of the army and navy. This civilian corps would be recruited by the CCC and the NYA and trained by army and navy experts. Just the other day the State Director of Relief in New Jersey went to the shocking length of ordering that relief be withheld from single persons eligible for military service and that such persons be "required" to enlist.

This whole tendency is dangerous. Its logical result can only be an army recruited from the ranks of the unemployed under an officer class made up of West Point graduates and the products of the ROTC. No form of military organization could be more crudely undemocratic, more certain to encourage class distinctions and create discontent. By all means give military training, combatant as well as non-combatant, to young men in the CCC and to fit men on the relief rolls, but give it in equal doses to college students and employed workers and embryo stockbrokers. If training is properly planned to get the best possible results in improved physical stamina, in skill and self-reliance, as well as in military technique, it will benefit every young person in the country. The unemployed have surely no greater obligation to fight the nation's wars than other groups; a democratic defense system must call equally upon all citizens for service.

A movement for universal or selective training is growing, and its early sponsors, unfortunately though quite naturally, are mostly to be found among the conservative groups. But I shall be much surprised if the Administration does not soon come out for it, and I am certain that the issue will crop up during the Presidential campaign. I only hope progressives will rally to the support of universal training in time to make their influence felt. That such a system is compatible with democracy has been proved in other countries, notably in Switzerland. That it can be an effective tool of tyranny was proved in Germany long before Hitler. It serves, in fact, as an accurate gauge of the democratic strength of the nation that adopts it. It will be up to American progressives to see to it that we build a citizens' army designed to contribute to a secure and free national life.

Patriotism Plus

COMMENTING recently on the British decision to tax excess war profits 100 per cent, Carlton Shiveley of the New York Sun wrote:

> It will nevertheless be difficult for many Americans to understand how Britain can expect anyone to make the tremendous extra productive effort required by war without some stimulus other than the vague one that it is necessary to save the country. The first thing that capital will require to work harder in war time is some assurance of a larger return.

If a statement such as this had appeared in the pages of The Nation we would certainly have been accused of unjustly impugning the patriotism of a worthy class of persons. But Mr. Shiveley is so ardent a champion of business that one can hardly suspect him of wilful libel. Moreover, other publicists devoted to the welfare of capital have also been harping on the theme of the price which must be paid to the manufacturers of armaments if their cooperation is to be obtained for the defense program. Thus the Wall Street Journal of May 20 states that in return for a rapid expansion in production "undoubtedly industry will demand many concessions in the way of tax exemptions, amortization policies, relaxation of labor laws, et cetera."

PUBLIC LIBRARY

How far, at this time of crisis, the Administration and Congress are prepared to go in providing practical "stimulants" for business is not certain. The House Naval Affairs Committee, acting on a request by the Navy Department, has approved a bill which would make possible the replacement of competitive bidding for naval contracts by direct negotiations. It also provides for advance payments of 30 per cent of the contract price on naval business—that is to say, the government would contribute working capital to shipbuilders—and authorizes payment for special additional equipment and plant. Further, while the limit of a 10 per cent profit (12 per cent in the case of aircraft) prescribed by the Vinson-Trammell Act is retained, the proposed bill would allow contractors to deduct net profits of less than 10 per cent as well as net losses in computing profits in the next four years with a view to determining whether an excess has been earned. This is an important safeguard for a contractor who, by some accident, pitches his terms too low.

Similar protection seems likely to be extended to aircraft manufacturers, who are also looking for a change in Treasury policy which would enable them to write off the cost of expanding their facilities in a few years. The effect of this concession would be greatly to reduce their tax liability. According to the Wall Street Journal, agreement on this point would make the raising of additional capital "a relatively simple matter, since the companies could be sure of all the government business they could handle and would be allowed a 12 per cent profit under the Vinson-Trammell Act. In effect they would be operating under a cost-plus system, and if a guaranty could be obtained for a write-off of expansion costs, it is believed that bank loans would be easily obtainable."

They would, indeed, for any banker would be happy to finance at low interest the carrying out of such a gilt-edged contract, and there would be no need for any company to dilute the equity of its present shareholders by seeking new capital in the open market. On the other hand, it is difficult to see, if defense contracts are to be placed on such a safe basis for the manufacturers, why their patriotism should have to be sweetened to the extent of 12 per cent. After all, the theory of private enterprise looks on profit as a reward for taking risks.

We are not so optimistic as to believe that the new defense program can be carried out at high speed without a toll being paid to the shipbuilders, the aircraft companies, the steel mills, and the numerous other industries which control the capital equipment needed to manufacture armaments. For a shift to public ownership, however desirable in principle, would doubtless cause so much controversy and afford such opportunities for sabotage by the interests affected that it would result in delays intolerable at the present crisis. But we hope Congress is not going to give business carte blanche in the belief that it is the only way to get results. That was the British method under Chamberlain, and the results are to be seen in Flanders. Now Britain has had to turn to a wartime dictatorship over capital and labor alike, and output is soaring even if the stimulus of excess profits has been removed. "I think it is true to say," said Ernest Bevin, the new British Minister of Labor, "that the feeling of the people of this country is . . . that the system based on monopoly and big business has failed to deliver the goods in our hour of trial." Those words, and the experience which provoked them, are a warning which even business ought not to ignore.

Labor's Front Line

BUSINESSES working for the national defense are to be guaranteed their 12 per cent, but this is said to be no time for labor to try and "grab off 10 cents an hour" more in wages. The words are those of Representative Barden of North Carolina, commenting on the quickly settled C. I. O. shipyard strike at Kearny, New Jersey. The mood they reflect is being exploited to the utmost, and labor is in for a hard fight if it is to preserve even a part of the gains won under the New Deal. The amazing form in which the La Follette Oppressive Practices Act passed the Senate is only the most striking manifestation of the extent to which defense needs are being used to reduce labor standards and weaken the protection of workers. Labor's front line is on the Potomac.

It was the Chief of Staff, General George C. Marshall, who launched the drive on May 18. General Marshall complained to a Senate subcommittee on military affairs that the Walsh-Healey Act and similar legislation, combined with what he described as the high pay of officers and men, made it necessary for the United States to spend $21 for every $1 spent by a European nation to maintain an equal force of men. Congressional leaders were only dissuaded from offering a bill to suspend the Walsh-Healey Act by a plea from the White House that the President already had power to do so. Under Section 6 of the act the Secretary of Labor may make exceptions from the established wage and hour standards "when justice or public interest will be served thereby." We predict increasing pressure to use this loophole.

At a press conference on May 21 Mr. Roosevelt said that not a single war millionaire would be created. He also expressed his confidence that "labor will not attempt to take advantage of its collective power to foment strikes and interfere with the national-defense program to squeeze higher wages from employers in the so-called war industries." But while profit restrictions are being lifted, wage protection is being weakened. "An effort is being made," the Wall Street Journal reported on June 10, "to prevent labor from 'profiteering' in the defense industries, thus avoiding any likelihood of large-scale migrations from one industry to another."

The President has also said that he would not sanction the weakening of social legislation in the emergency, but it will take stout resistance to pressure to carry out the pledge. Laws need not be repealed to be negatived, and the Journal of Commerce on June 8 indicated one way in which labor standards might be modified. "Although the Administration opposes the relaxation of labor legislation to facilitate national defense," that newspaper reported, "the Wages and Hours Division of the Department of Labor is studying plans for meeting situations likely to arise in the defense industries." New industry committees may be appointed for the armament industries "to adapt wage and hour regulations to their special needs," and "in an industry which afforded extensive overtime, the wage minimum might be made lower than would otherwise be the case." Thus, unless labor is careful, the wage-and-hour law may be used to lower wages and increase hours.

Two main lines of attack on labor standards are visible. The first is indicated in an increasing volume of newspaper editorial comment to the effect that we must not make "the same mistake as France." "A moral is drawn," by the New York Times, "from the French Popular Front government, under which labor laws and restrictions on profits interfered with the nation's armament program." This suave version of "guns, not butter" has also been taken up by the Scripps-Howard press. The other line of attack utilizes fear of the fifth column. Thus the Merchants' Association of New York attacked the La Follette bill on May 25 as follows: "The fact that the bill specifies that a company's armed guard cannot lawfully operate outside of the company's property . . . is a practical invitation to subversive elements . . . to hamstring the employer for alleged 'oppressive labor practices' and to effect these fifth-column practices under the protection of the proposed law." But the treacheries that left the British and French so poorly prepared to meet the Nazi onslaught occurred at the top, not at the bottom, of their society, and if democracy is to make an effective stand in this country it will not be by attempting to appease the reactionary elements of business and finance. The difference between the worker's pay envelope under dictatorship and under democracy is one measure of freedom's value to the worker in self-respect and decent living. Let us keep the difference wide.

Where Trade Means Safety

BY CHARLES E. NOYES

DEFENSE of the Western Hemisphere has suddenly assumed vital importance to millions of people in the United States who never before devoted any serious thought to Latin America. The Monroe Doctrine has been transformed almost overnight from a principle of comparative isolationism to a statement of purpose essential for the safety of this country. The real danger of a hostile air base in South America gives it a wholly new significance. At the same moment it has become clear that the United States is not physically prepared to enforce the Monroe Doctrine. Even granting that battleships are still useful in modern total war, the American fleet is not strong enough to defend both the Atlantic and the Pacific coast of North America; it cannot be used to protect South America against a serious military threat from victorious totalitarian powers as long as our relations with Japan require its presence in the Pacific.

Our first reaction to this revealed weakness has been a demand for vastly increased armaments, and we shall undoubtedly get them. But ships, guns, and planes are not in themselves enough. We must also prepare ourselves mentally to live in a world which may be completely different from the one we have known. We must realize, to begin with, that to make our defense of the Western Hemisphere, or even of our own country, effective, we must work in close cooperation with twenty other American republics. This will be a novel idea to the citizen accustomed to thinking of the United States as a benevolent protector of the vaguely imagined lands to the south, but its acceptance is essential to an intelligent defense program. We are vulnerable if any part of the two Americas is vulnerable.

Fortunately, President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull have done more to promote pan-American good-will than all their predecessors for a hundred years; unfortunately, they have only begun to erase the justified suspicion with which the Latin American countries look toward the United States. And their efforts have had very little genuine popular support in this country. Perhaps the present danger will help the American public to understand that it is not in our interest to treat the other countries of this hemisphere like wayward step-children. If it does not bring about this understanding, our expenditures for ships and armament may be largely in vain.

Before the present European war Germany had been making phenomenal progress in developing trade with South America, and the Nazis were conducting a campaign of ideological penetration with considerable success. It is obvious that a victorious Germany would attempt to resume both processes immediately and on a larger scale. And it is equally obvious that the United States should make every possible effort now to forestall any such penetration. Aside from our national ignorance about the rest of the hemisphere, the chief trouble is that the United States does not provide a natural market for the bulk of Latin American trade, though we could profitably supply most of the things Latin America wants to buy if it could find the means to pay for them. We buy Brazilian coffee, some Bolivian tin, and some Chilean nitrates, among other things, but we do not want South American wheat, corn, or beef. In what we used to consider normal times, the United States was both the largest importer from and the largest exporter to Latin America, but we accounted for only about one-third of the total trade. In 1938 Germany bought more than 10 per cent of Latin American exports and sold more than 17 per cent of Latin American imports. In South America alone, the United States' share was smaller and the German share larger. Germany bought $41,000,000 worth of exports from Argentina, as compared with $29,000,000 worth bought by the United States.

The Western Hemisphere could be an economic unit in the sense that it can produce everything which is necessary for contemporary industrial civilization. It is not at present an economic unit in the sense of being able to carry on a satisfactory volume of trade wholly within itself. But this second type of economic unity is necessary to independence in a world which is threatened with domination by totalitarian powers. No country which becomes economically dependent upon a totalitarian nation can retain genuine political independence. Trade has become an integral part of international power politics.

Even the United States has serious weaknesses in its sources of supply. It used to be maintained, for example, that we were not vitally concerned with the ownership of the Dutch East Indies, since any owner, no matter who it was, would want to profit from the United States' market for rubber. That might be true in peace time, but the United States would be distressingly vulnerable if a hostile power were in a position suddenly to cut off virtually its entire rubber supply. Even in peace time, control of our sources of rubber by a totalitarian power would make us susceptible to the various forms of commercial blackmail which have been widely practiced during the past ten years.

We may be strong enough to resist such blackmail, perhaps by the threat of cutting off our trade with any power which tried to hold us up. The Latin American countries are not strong enough to resist. They must export wherever they can find a market, or suffer a drastic reduction in their already low standards of living. And if the countries which take a substantial part of their exports demand the right to sell them a large proportion of the manufactured goods which they buy, if totalitarian powers demand also the right to send propaganda agents and to receive friendly treatment in their newspapers, it is very hard for any Latin American government to oppose such demands. Interference with trade and lower standards of living are not popular even if their long-range purpose is national defense—unless, of course, they are imposed by governments which have themselves become totalitarian enough to use Nazi methods of influencing public opinion.

No Latin American government is as democratic as the more idealistic American liberals would like it to be; but neither is any one of them as yet fully totalitarian after the Italian and German models. At the present moment it behooves the United States rather to preserve such elements of democracy as do exist in the rest of the hemisphere than to scold our neighbors for not being more like us. There is no government in Latin America today which would prefer friendly relations with Germany to friendly relations with us, though they are not all as deeply antagonistic to the Nazis as we are. If they do become fully totalitarian, they will look to Europe rather than to us for support.

We have wasted eight months of golden opportunity. Last September the United States was flooded with glowing predictions that we might permanently capture a much larger segment of Latin American trade, although the more cautious experts pointed out the inherent difficulties resulting from the fact that a large proportion of Latin American exports are in direct competition with things which we ourselves produce, in some cases with foodstuffs and fibers of which we have an embarrassing exportable surplus. The experts were right: the expansion of our Latin American trade has been disappointing. And with the present disposition of American producers to demand full tariff protection for every single product which is grown, mined, or manufactured in this country, there is simply no chance that we can hold Latin American trade against European competition when the war is over. We are therefore faced with this question: If Germany wins the war, will it not be necessary for us as part of our own military defense, to make substantial commercial sacrifices in order to prevent the growth of German commercial and ideological influence in Latin America? And hadn't we better do something about it now, while we have the advantage? If Germany wins, there is no possible doubt that the Nazis will move much faster and more efficiently than the United States. We cannot even make a real start until we have educated American public opinion, particularly in the cattle, grain-raising, and silver-producing states, to understand that national defense is more important than our traditional system of tariff protection.

Of course, it would not be fair, or reasonable, or politically possible suddenly to lower the tariff on certain items which we might import from Latin America and to ask the producers of those goods in the United States to absorb the losses. We have had ample evidence during the last ten years that any sudden disruption of one or two segments of our economy is likely to have disastrous repercussions on the whole structure. The problem is nevertheless not incapable of solution. As a matter of fact, the combined exports of all the twenty other American republics in 1938 were valued at only $1,758,014,000, of which we bought $357,215,000 worth. If we bought all the rest and dumped it into the ocean, it would cost us only about $1,401,000,000, less than half of what we expect to spend on armaments this year, and it would probably be worth while from a strictly defense point of view. Fortunately, no such drastic step is necessary. Much of the first sum represents internal trading between the Latin American countries: the combined value of their exports to England, Germany, Japan, France, and Italy, their other five best customers, was only $581,388,000. Exports to Germany amounted to only $181,000,000.

If we had to take all the exports formerly going to Europe and Japan, they would not need to be a total loss. We might, for example, distribute the foodstuffs under some form of expanded food-stamp plan to needy families in the United States. We might reexport many of the products ourselves, absorbing a loss if necessary. Or we might pay the present tariff rates out of the United States Treasury, so as not to depress American prices. These are not meant to be more than suggestions, and each of them admittedly involves real difficulties. Perhaps a more painless plan can be devised. The main thing is to do something while we still have the chance. And on the bright side of the picture, any increase in our imports from Latin America should lead to a corresponding increase in our exports.

It is not even necessary to divert all Latin American exports away from the totalitarian countries. What we must do is to make sure that no country in Latin America becomes so dependent for prosperity on exports elsewhere that it will be unable to resist totalitarian commercial and ideological penetration. Every one of the American republics is anxious to resist. We can make it possible for them to do so at comparatively small expense to ourselves—perhaps without any expense, if we are clever and realistic enough. But we must understand that our Latin American trade cannot safely be left to the chance workings of conventional economics. The trade-agreements program, in practice, does not go nearly far enough. It is simply ridiculous for us to say, in the present state of the world, that we must allow trade to follow its natural course. In most of the world the natural course of trade no longer exists.

We do not have to adopt totalitarian methods of complete import, export, and exchange control in order to compete with the totalitarian countries. To do so would be to admit that their system is more efficient than ours. Actually, their methods have not worked any too well as a purely commercial policy. But neither have our own. And it is time for us to admit that our traditional tariff and trade policies, in so far as they may force our neighbors to trade with our potential enemies, are luxuries which we can no longer afford.

We have been pursuing a policy of economic nationalism while we were committed, under the Monroe Doctrine, to hemisphere defense. The two things can no longer be reconciled. Only because hemisphere defense was supported by the British navy were they ever able to exist side by side. As soon as we are threatened with removal of that support, it becomes apparent that our economic policy must be changed. We cannot defend the hemisphere without making such a change, and without defending the hemisphere we cannot defend ourselves.

As a first step we should immediately remove exasperating economic irritants in our relations with various Latin American countries. We should take advantage of Mexico's settlement of its controversy with the Sinclair oil interests to resolve the whole problem created by Mexican expropriation of American properties. We should cease to embargo Argentine beef on the insulting pretense that all Argentine cattle are diseased, and should ratify the sanitary agreement with Argentina which has been pending in the United States Senate for five years. We should immediately reopen negotiations for trade agreements with all Latin American countries which have not yet concluded such agreements with us. We might liberalize the policies of the Export-Import Bank and subscribe to the shares allotted to the United States in the proposed Inter-American Bank. These initial moves would afford a practical opportunity to educate the American public with respect to the importance of Latin America. When we are prepared to approach the various problems realistically, there should be a pan-American economic conference.

We must also develop plans for military cooperation throughout the Western Hemisphere. But unless we are willing to undertake a sound pan-American economic program, any preparation to defend more than the narrow limits of continental United States is likely to be a waste of money. The price of real military cooperation will be commercial concessions sufficient to make our military defense seem desirable to our neighbors. Our willingness to pay that price is a fundamental test of our understanding of what defense has come to mean.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Men Who Would Be President

VIII. HULL CAN WAIT

BY BARNET NOVER

CORDELL HULL has steadily denied that he is a candidate for the Democratic nomination. And there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his disclaimers. If the Presidential bee has ever stung him he exhibits none of the customary swellings. He has never spoken or acted like a would-be candidate. He has never made any open or covert bid for delegates, even on a when, as, and if basis. On the contrary, he has persistently discouraged admirers who have sought to line up delegates for him. I doubt very much whether he would give it a second thought if the Chicago convention passed him by. Yet it would be fantastic to assume that if his nomination became a possibility he would be unreceptive to the honor.

American history offers only one example of a man who, after being mentioned prominently for the Presidency, flatly said: "I will not run if nominated; I will not serve if elected." But Sherman was a soldier, with a soldier's impatience with politics. To Hull politics have been food and drink, vocation and avocation, for half a century. To have been Secretary of State for eight years is honor enough for any man, and both Hull and Mrs. Hull have frequently voiced to friends their eagerness, when the present Administration ends, to drop the cares of official life and seek the quiet of their Tennessee farm. But duty is the twin brother of ambition and its effective substitute; and if Hull lacks ambition he has a highly developed sense of duty.

Despite his very real handicaps Hull's chances of getting the Democratic nomination compare favorably with those of the men who have been openly campaigning for it. His chief handicap is his age. If he should be elected, Hull would be a year older at the time of his inauguration than was William Henry Harrison, the oldest of American Presidents, who survived his inauguration by just one month. He would be seventeen years older than the average age at which our last ten Chief Executives took office. Hull has a tough and wiry physique, has lived simply and carefully, and comes of a long-lived stock, but the Presidency is an office which has worn out far younger men.

A second obstacle is presented by geography. The United States has not had a President from south of the Mason and Dixon Line since the Civil War. And Tennessee is not a crucial state. Nevertheless, a combination of circumstances has thrust the Secretary of State into an especially favorable position, and a recent Gallup poll shows that his stock is rising with the people. With the exception of the President, he is the only outstanding Democrat whom the people recognize as experienced in the conduct of foreign affairs, and today America's international problems overshadow domestic issues. He has consistently opposed the isolationist point of view, and events have proved the tragic correctness of his contention that the United States cannot safely ignore or discount the impact of events in Europe. Because of the nation's preoccupation with external problems it is an asset rather than a handicap for Hull that throughout his tenure in the Cabinet he has maintained an unbroken silence on all questions not directly connected with the functions of his department. He took no public position for or against the devaluation of the dollar, the NRA, the AAA, the court-packing plan, and other great controversial issues. He has never given the slightest indication where he stands on the Wage-Hour Act, the Labor Board, relief, budget-balancing, pump-priming, the Walter-Logan bill.

This aloofness on his part has been perfectly natural; politics have, or should have, no place in foreign relations. And it has had a curiously favorable result on his prospects of obtaining the nomination. Because he belongs through age and past associations with an older and more orthodox generation of Democrats, critics of the New Deal regard his possible candidacy with favor. At the same time the New Dealers are unable to point to a single statement he has made or action he has taken which justifies any charge that he is or has been hostile to the New Deal. Thus up to the time of Hitler's assault on Belgium and the Netherlands and the consequent increased likelihood of a third term for the President, Hull was coming more and more into view as an almost ideal compromise candidate to head the Democratic ticket.

If he were a man less lacking in guile, the policy he has pursued might be regarded as one deliberately designed to achieve a maximum political effect with a minimum of political risk. Actually the reason why Hull has conducted himself as he has in relation both to the New Deal and to the Democratic nomination has nothing to do with calculation and a good deal to do with the kind of man he is. All his life he has been a specialist, with a specialist's timidity in stepping out of his field, and as Secretary of State he has had particularly strong motives for not breaking the habits of a lifetime. To an astonishing degree his career has been all of a piece. Over a period of fifty years his interests have been limited to the Democratic Party, tariff reform—with which at the outset he coupled advocacy of the income tax—and international cooperation.

Almost the first thing he did as a freshman member of Congress from Tennessee in 1907 was to introduce bills for the repeal of duties on agricultural implements, coal, and certain other articles and for levying an income tax. He was a specialist before he had cut his Congressional teeth, and he remained a specialist throughout his long service in the House and his later career as United States Senator. His guide and mentor had been Benton McMillin, for twenty years a Congressman from Tennessee and an indefatigable advocate of lower tariffs and an income tax. It was both a statement of his credo and a tribute to his teacher when, in his first important speech in Congress, Hull denounced the protective tariff and the Republican Party for having foisted the protective tariff on the nation. He went on to expound his underlying philosophy. "The Democratic Party," he said, "is conservative whenever conservatism will suffice. It is radical whenever radicalism is necessary to uproot deep-seated evils that afflict the country. It makes no war on wealth. While it declares eternal war on wealthy violators of the law, it guarantees to all law-abiding aggregations of wealth freedom from molestation. No party can be conservative on all policies at all times."

Hull has never ceased ringing the changes on these related themes. In the debate of March 29, 1909, for instance, he denounced "the spirit of greed and avarice" which, he said, permeated every schedule of the Payne-Aldrich tariff. In the session of June 9, 1911, in opening the debate on the wool schedule, he called the protective tariff "the king of all our evils," spoke of the "sleepless monster of protection," and declared that the underlying cause of existing economic, financial, and social ills was "this partnership of the government with crime—the protective tariff." At the same time he kept hammering away at the need of an income tax, and when, with the ratification of the Sixteenth Amendment, income-tax legislation became constitutional, Hull fathered the basic law. After the World War he denounced the Fordney-McCumber and Smoot-Hawley experiments in protectionism with his customary vigor. In these debates he has always revealed his thoroughgoing knowledge of the subject, but he is no orator. Witty, flavorsome, picturesque in private conversation, he tends to be deadly earnest and heavy in his public pronouncements.

By birth, upbringing, and demeanor Hull belongs in the log-cabin tradition. He was actually born in a cabin, in what is now Pickett County, Tennessee, and spent his early youth near the Obey River, where his father, William Hull, was engaged in logging. Young Hull became famous for two accomplishments—his skill in debating and his ability to pilot log rafts down the river. The latter required not merely physical strength but also endless patience. That patience has remained with him.

He attended Mount Vale Academy at Selina and received his higher education at Cumberland University in Lebanon, from which he was graduated with a law degree in 1891. By that time he was already knee-deep in politics. It is related of him that at the age of sixteen he used his pocket money to hire a conveyance in which he drove the governor of the state on a campaign tour of his district. At nineteen he took part in the state Democratic convention. He had been out of school only a little more than a year when he was elected to the state Legislature. On the outbreak of the Spanish-American War he organized a company which reached Cuba too late for the fighting. He returned to practice law, but in 1903 he was appointed to the circuit court of his state. After riding circuit for four years he was elected to Congress. To his old friends he is still Judge Hull, a title he relishes above all others.

The region where Hull was born and where he spent the years of his early manhood continues to this day to have something of the flavor of the frontier. The mark it left on him has not been erased by years of Washington living and high office. He remains today as he was when he arrived in the capital thirty-three years ago—a shy, unassuming, homespun individual. The quiet dignity of his manner is a native, not an acquired characteristic. There is more than a fancied resemblance between Hull and Lincoln, as Hull's admirers have repeatedly emphasized. Lincoln's humility, patience, and pessimism have their counterpart in Hull. Like Lincoln, Hull has never lost the common touch.

Hull's simplicity of character was manifested to best advantage, perhaps, at the Montevideo conference, the Roosevelt Administration's first venture in pan-Americanism. The story has often been told of his arriving at the Uruguayan capital as representative of the most powerful nation on the hemisphere and going at once, hat in hand, to make a personal call on the heads of the other delegations. It was a neighborly gesture which disarmed the Latin American statesmen, who were prepared at Montevideo, as at previous pan-American conferences, to show their hostility to the United States.

Hull's patience was demonstrated when in the middle of the international economic conference at London in 1933 President Roosevelt decided to change his policy and left his Secretary of State high and dry. Hull returned to the United States fighting mad, giving vent among intimates to that picturesque vocabulary of vituperation which he reserves for private use and which contrasts markedly with the language of his formal speeches. But he is a man who knows how to wait. He outwaited Moley. He outwaited George Peek, another victim of his terrible tenacity. He outwaited the skeptics who regarded him as a misfit in a New Deal Administration. In the end it was not the economic nationalism of Moley and the other early New Dealers but the economic internationalism of Hull, the stone rejected by the builders in 1933, which became the basis of the Administration's foreign policy.

The fate of the trade-agreements program which Hull fathered is now very much in doubt. Everything depends on what happens in Europe. If Hitler wins the war, the international economic system we have known will probably disappear completely, and with it Hull's painstaking efforts to remove the barriers of trade. If Hitler is finally smashed, the Hull program, capable as it is of indefinite expansion, may help to heal the wounds of war and restore trade to a normal basis. Unfortunately the program came too late, progressed too slowly, to remove the economic evils which Hull is convinced lie at the basis of international strife. For this, however, Hull is not to blame. Two years before Woodrow Wilson announced his Fourteen Points, one of which called for the removal of artificial barriers to trade, Hull suggested that after the war an international trade conference be held in Washington for the "purpose of establishing a permanent international trade-agreement congress, the functions of which should comprise the consideration of all international trade methods, practices, and policies of an unfair, unequal, and objectionable nature." He returned to that idea several times in later years, but it was not until 1934 that he brought it to even partial fruition in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. As a shrewd politician Hull had realized that he had to move slowly and carefully and provide no valid pretext to members of Congress to charge him with having sacrificed national interest.

The trade-agreements program could only have succeeded in laying the foundation of peace if it had been coupled with a far-reaching American program of action in international politics. Such a program, had it been feasible, Hull would unquestionably have supported. His attitude on foreign affairs has always been Wilsonian. In 1923, while holding the thankless job of chairman of the Democratic National Committee, he gave an interview to Collier's Weekly in which he declared that the Democrats would make the League an issue in the campaign of 1924. As Secretary of State he has given as much aid and encouragement to the League as was possible while the country remained virulently isolationist. No one saw the dangers of this state of mind better than Hull and Roosevelt, but the Administration's foreign policy was compelled to be, as Alsop and Kintner have aptly described it, an Ersatz policy. It could not be effective without action, and the American people were not ready for action. Therefore it had to take the form of educating the American people to the realities of the world situation, and while this process was going on, trying to stave off Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese with warnings, entreaties, expostulations, homilies, and cautious half-measures.

Under our system the President tends to be his own Secretary of State. With a Chief Executive as dynamic as Franklin D. Roosevelt this would seem to be particularly the case. Actually Hull has been no figurehead in the Administration. His influence on American foreign policy in this critical period has been very real. Roosevelt's boldness has been tempered by Hull's caution; Roosevelt's improvisations have been modified by Hull's common sense. Hull shares the responsibility with the White House for letting the neutrality legislation get out of hand, for submitting to what was thought to be an overwhelming popular desire rather than fighting it tooth and nail. He also shares the responsibility for the ineptitude of the Spanish policy, the rigid legislative basis of which was laid while Hull was at Buenos Aires attending the Inter-American Conference. His note to Senator Pittman opposing any action on the arms embargo by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee makes strange reading today.

Secretary of State Hull

But with these exceptions it can be said of Hull that long before public opinion became aware of the realities he saw the international picture clearly and did everything he could to stave off the catastrophe which now engulfs the world. "I have never been within a thousand miles of Munich," he once told a visitor. Peace can result only from a positive policy—this Hull has always understood. That is why he has placed such emphasis on his trade-agreements program, on efforts to build an inter-American system of cooperation.

But the people and Congress chose to make avoidance of war the be-all and the end-all of our relations with the world. And as a result we find ourselves today more threatened, more frightened, and less secure than at any other time in over a century. No wonder that Hull's native pessimism has taken a deeper hue. But he works and waits. He may outwait Hitler. Cordell Hull does not give up easily.

The Case for Bertrand Russell

BY JOHN DEWEY

THE defense of Bertrand Russell in connection with his appointment to the chair of philosophy in the City College of New York has quite properly centered about two points. One of them is the legal authority of a court to overrule and nullify the action of an administrative board created according to the statutes of New York State. The other is whether writings upon matters of great social importance addressed to adults shall be used to deprive the author of the power to teach his own special and very different subject in classrooms of higher institutions of learning. If courts have the power claimed for them, appointments in tax-supported institutions—and possibly in private institutions—will be thrown into a state of uncertainty till they have dragged through the courts, while educational administrative bodies are deprived of responsibility as well as of power. If Justice McGeehan's action is upheld with respect to the second point, the effect will be to muzzle university teachers on subjects not directly connected with their specialties of instruction.

There is another issue which should not be lost sight of. The profuse outgivings of the attorney for the complainant and of the justice who passed on the case have surrounded what Mr. Russell actually wrote with such a disgusting and loathsome aura that many otherwise fair-minded people have been misled as to what he said. The public interest in discussion of such matters of sexual morals as the use of contraceptives, the stability of family life, the sex education, direct and indirect, of children, the population problem, eugenics, and the like, even more than fair play to Mr. Russell—which has been conspicuously lacking in the treatment given him—raises the questions: What has Mr. Russell actually said and in what spirit has he said it? Neither of these questions can be even approached, much less settled, on the basis of passages torn out of their context.

In the first place, it is necessary to mention a few facts about moral theory which are elementary to all modern students not committed in advance to some scheme of supernatural and theological ethics. One fact recognized by such students is that the bases and sanctions of morals are found in human relations and their bearing upon human welfare. Another is that cultural lag is nowhere more evident than in the discrepancy existing between the conclusions of specialists in anthropology, medicine, psychology, and so on upon general matters of ethical theory—not just special matters of sexual ethics—and popular beliefs, which, when they have not been received from some dogmatic institutional source, have usually been picked up from the flotsam and jetsam of old traditions. Because of this discrepancy any public discussion based upon results reached by scientific investigators but couched in words that can be understood by those without specialized technical training is bound to be disturbing, and even shocking. This fact, especially weighty in connection with all matters of sexual morality, where in any case the discrepancy between actual social practices and traditional opinions is greatest, is easily taken advantage of by those who believe in the theological bases for the morality that is taught and sanctioned by ecclesiastical "authorities." Unless this fact is borne in mind, it is impossible to understand either the animus of the attack upon Mr. Russell or the effect produced by quotations from his writings upon the minds of those who do not share that animus.

Mr. Russell's discussion, in his writings, of the need for a new sexual ethic has been too successfully represented as if it were a repudiation of any sexual ethic whatever. His argument, based upon facts derived from a variety of sources, that the current sexual ethics, more honored in words than in fact, contain many elements of superstitious origin, while the social practices based upon them have lost their efficacy because of political and economic changes, is completely passed over. Emotional panic is aroused in the breasts of many good people by the mere suggestion that the old sexual ethics have broken down. The treatment that has been accorded Mr. Russell is then more significant as evidence of the gap that lies between the attitude of scientific students and the tenor of prevalent opinions than it is of anything else. And the basic issue is not whether Mr. Russell's own views are correct but whether efforts to bridge the existing gap shall be prevented or at least discouraged by abuse of anyone who engages in public discussion not couched in highly technical language.

The spirit in which Mr. Russell approached the topics discussed is important. To a student of social psychology there is nothing surprising in the fact that an audience which feeds willingly on flippant and easygoing discussion of sex in the novels it reads should be shocked by a serious discussion of sex. For Mr. Russell's discussion is serious in spite of an occasional regrettable asperity of tone. The following passages could be multiplied many times over: "I don't think that the new system any more than the old should involve an unbridled yielding to license, but I think the occasions for restraining impulse and the motives for doing so will have to be different from what they have been in the past"; and again, "The doctrine I wish to preach is not one of license; it involves exactly as much self-control as is involved in the conventional doctrine." For, as he says, "Sex cannot dispense with an ethic, any more than business or sport or scientific research or any other branch of human activity." He accepts the idea now generally held by competent students that impulses are to be trained rather than suppressed. He holds that very many of the evils which he in common with other moralists deplores are due to the existence of conditions which give misdirection to impulse and desire. Consequently there is something ironical in the attacks upon him which proceed from persons who hold that all natural tendencies are so inherently bad and all sexual impulses so intrinsically indecent that not only they but any reference to them should be suppressed.

Regarding the principles which are used in providing the criteria for a sound sexual ethics, Russell writes:

> Sex morality has to be derived from certain general principles, as to which there is perhaps a fairly wide measure of agreement, in spite of the wide disagreement as to the consequences to be drawn from them. The first thing to be secured is that there should be as much as possible of that deep, serious love between man and woman which embraces the whole personality of both and leads to a fusion by which each is enriched and enhanced. The second thing of importance is that there should be adequate care of children, physical and psychological.

As Mr. Russell indicates, not all who accept these principles and who attempt to draw consequences from them in the light of the best knowledge available will agree with all the conclusions upon special points which he reaches. It happens that personally I agree with some of his conclusions and disagree with others; and to me it appears that in the cases in which I disagree Mr. Russell adopts a logic more appropriate to mathematical than to social and moral subjects—a logic, that is, of one-way reasoning from a single set of premises. But any such difference in conclusions is not only no reason for penalizing one who discusses in a serious spirit the issues involved but is a possible reason for having the issues publicly discussed, so that light may be gained from a variety of sources. The only thing ruled out is the dogmatism and intolerance that would forbid discussion.

In any case the persons, if there be such, who go to Mr. Russell's writings in search of filth and obscenity will be disappointed. These things are so lacking that the intemperate and morally irresponsible way in which they are charged against Mr. Russell is good reason for believing that those who put them forth hold such an "authoritarian" view of morals that they would, if they had power, suppress all critical discussion of beliefs and practices they want to impose on others.

In the Wind

IF THE UNITED STATES gets into the war, Lowell Mellett, former editor of the Scripps-Howard Washington News, will run the government's "publicity" department—modern equivalent of the Creel committee. Mellett left the Scripps-Howard chain after the reorganization-bill fight, when he clashed sharply with the Howard policy.

THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE COMPANY of America has traditionally used as a trademark a picture of the Rock of Gibraltar with the motto, "The Prudential has the Strength of Gibraltar." Now that the threat of Blitzkrieg and Stukas has robbed the Rock of its symbolic meaning, it is rumored that the Prudential is contemplating a revised slogan.

WILLIAM GRIFFIN'S New York Sunday Inquirer—as passionately isolationist as it is anti-Communist—has worked out a new line. It contends that Communists really want the United States to go to war—so that they can make the revolution—and that the C. P. is advocating isolation because it knows the party is unpopular and wants to discredit isolationism.

THE PM STORY to end all PM stories: Ken Stewart, now of PM, formerly of the New York Times, went to a party shortly before leaving the Times. His host introduced him to guests as "Mr. Stewart of the Times." One of the guests said, "Oh, you mean that new paper that's coming out in New York?"

REPORTERS WEREN'T admitted to the recent meeting of the C. I. O. Executive Committee, but insiders say that the session started turbulently, ended placidly. At the outset Lewis clashed sharply with Sidney Hillman's representative, but peace gradually returned. C. I. O. leaders previously accused of "Stalinism" did nothing to challenge the committee's indorsement of the armament program. Lewis, for his part, turned thumbs down on a resolution denouncing aggressor nations. He is said to be still predominantly isolationist.

AT A RECENT meeting of the New York Society of the Pure-Minded, Bishop Manning spoke on The Need for Morals in Mathematics. The meeting was held at the Church of the Holy Innocents.

M. SARACOGLU, Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, received a Nazi journalist at Ankara recently. The Nazi expounded Germany's Lebensraum thesis, concluding, "The Balkans are Germany's lungs." "Indeed," retorted the Foreign Minister, "but why does your country have to breathe through other people's lungs?"

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE news from South America is anything but encouraging. I have just seen a letter from Edward Tomlinson, the writer and lecturer, written from Chile, in which he declares that, from the United States' point of view, the situation has grown markedly worse since his last visit some months ago—he has been traveling in South America annually for the last sixteen years. The effect there of Hitler's successes is quite evident, he reports, and he fears that when he reaches the east coast he will find things worse. Of course it is characteristic of a type of human nature to be found everywhere that it bows down before success. Plenty of persons even in the United States are beginning to admire Hitler because he appears now to be winning. What makes admiration for Hitler the easier in South America is that there are so few real republics there—the man on horseback is usually in control.

All in all, the South American situation is so complex that if the American government had nothing else to worry about than this, it would have its hands full. The more I study it and think about it the more difficult, yes, the more insoluble, it appears, despite the outward signs of unanimity, as in the matter of keeping this war away from American waters. With all respect for the desire of this country to safeguard itself, the nations to the south of us are bound to be made uneasy by our tremendous armament program. This is not because we shall be better able to subjugate Central and South America to our will than we always have been potentially, but because the visible signs of our power cause unfavorable reactions. Moreover, such open manifestations of our uneasiness as the hasty dispatch of a cruiser to South America and General Marshall's forthright statement that the President's demand for supreme power over the National Guard is due to a possible emergency in South America cannot but bring the issue of how far the United States shall take over the defense of its sister republics even more squarely before them.

That the assumption of the entire military responsibility for South America would be an enormous task is obvious, even though Major George Fielding Eliot has said that it would not be much harder than defending ourselves. Perhaps that is true from the navy's point of view, but if we are to be prepared to throw expeditionary forces into Patagonia or Brazil or Chile or Bolivia, it will mean keeping a large army "in being," together with the necessary fleet of transports ready to leave at a day's notice. What assurance could any American Administration give that some subsequent President would not use the vast armaments of the United States to put down a revolutionary government which it thought too friendly to dictatorships abroad?

Let us suppose that Hitler wins and that the Argentine dictator makes a hard and fast alliance with Hitler and Mussolini, or that Brazil sets up a totalitarian state, partly because of the vast numbers of Germans in that country. What would be the attitude of the United States? Would it tell the Argentine government to cancel that treaty, and would it send our battleships to Buenos Aires to see that this was done? Would it inform Brazil that it would seize and hold Rio de Janeiro until a republican form of government was established? These are not impossible suppositions. One of our highest officials assured me more than a year ago that Hitler could provoke a Nazi revolution in two South American countries by merely pressing a button on his desk.

And what would we do? The good-neighbor policy has transformed our relations with South and Central America and given them a confidence in our honesty and unselfishness that they never had before. If we intervened to dictate a form of government to one country, would we not destroy all the results of that policy and turn all our American allies against us? This danger may be remote, but we should not become the military custodian of all the Americas without most careful consideration of what it may involve. If I am reminded that the Monroe Doctrine has always implied that, my answer is that implication is one thing and action another. We have never before planned such armaments and never witnessed such a development as the totalitarian governments of today or the total war of this hour.

Personally I wholly approve of the declaration just indorsed by Congress that we shall view with disapproval the transfer of any territory now held by a foreign power in our sphere to any other foreign power; and I am glad that we are to associate the twenty-one republics with us in this matter. I have no fear that this might involve us in hostilities. About the major problem, however, which is whether we shall become not merely the defender of Latin America but the custodian of its member countries, pledged perhaps to prevent the rise of any totalitarian government, I have doubts, scruples, and apprehension. Yet so great is the panic in Washington that I have no doubt most people there will say: "Our safety comes first—we'll see to that whether anybody likes it or not."

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Planning for War

MOBILIZING CIVILIAN AMERICA. By Harold J. Tobin and Percy W. Bidwell. Council on Foreign Relations. New York. $2.75.

THE timeliness of this book is unquestioned. Whether it will have any effect on official or popular opinion is uncertain. Indeed, present indications are that the carefully laid schemes for mobilizing civilian effort, prepared over the years by the War Department's Planning Branch, are, for the time being at least, completely in the discard. They do not appeal to the President—the commander-in-chief of the army and navy. This is not surprising, for the plans were drawn up independently of him and with scant concern as to whether the blueprints were for an administrative edifice that he would like.

In the National Defense Act of 1920 Congress "undertook to establish efficient cooperation among the supply services of the army, and between them and the industrial plants. Acting under this authority, the Assistant Secretary of War set up the Planning Branch, the Army and Navy Munitions Planning Board, and the Army Industrial College." The resulting activity was great. But little attention was paid to the inherent undesirability of placing planning for the mobilization of civilian America under the direction of an assistant secretary in one of the service departments. Such an undertaking should have been under the President so that the imagination behind it would have been less military and naval and more civilian.

Naturally enough, perhaps, the War Department was reluctant to share its task with other departments of the government. It did consult them, and expert outsiders as well, but the resulting products were the War Department's own. They were made public several times, discussed and modified because some of the first proposals—for censorship and the control of labor—were affrighting. The Industrial Mobilization Plan of 1939—which is skeletonized and must be read in the light of previous drafts—proposes a number of special administrators of civilian activity not very dissimilar to the organization which finally evolved under President Wilson.

But President Roosevelt has other ideas. Apparently he wishes to rely as far as he can on existing agencies and have them perform the new tasks. Hence, in so far as his ideas seem to be clear, they go counter to the Planning Branch's proposals. But those proposals, as I have said, if excogitated under less particularistic auspices, might have made some compromise between the conflicting points of view. This would have been clearly desirable. Nothing is as wasteful and chaotic as the duplication of governmental machinery. On the other hand, as the failures of the much-vaunted administrative class of the British Civil Service have clearly demonstrated, men who have spent the formative years of their mature lives in the routine tasks of government bureaus cannot suddenly acquire the independence in thought, imagination in conception, and drive in execution which preparations for possible war demand of them in the fullest measure.

Under the sponsorship of the Council on Foreign Relations, Mr. Tobin had exceptional opportunities for finding out what the Planning Branch of the War Department had actually done. In preparing his book for the press he has had the collaboration of Mr. Bidwell, the Council's Director of Studies, who contributes an able discussion of economic problems relating to labor, priorities, prices, profits, and procurement planning. Here are to be found, at least in broad outline, indications of the problems that will have to be faced. So far, the debates in Washington fail to show that in high quarters there is adequate appreciation of the central issue: that successful preparation for defense must pay the price of a more totalitarian economy.

There are other important matters which are perhaps outside the scope of this volume, and they ought to be thought of before it is too late. British experience in the last war and in the halting preparations for the present conflict clearly shows that procurement—not only the process but the determination of what should be procured—cannot with safety be left to the soldiers and sailors. They are innately hostile to expenditures on new weapons either of offense or defense. "Each department and each section," Sir Arthur Salter has declared, "will obtain a financial provision, an allocation of resources and of personnel, which corresponds with its influence and prestige, that is, as a rule, with its record in the last war, and the newcomer will be given a grudging, gradually increasing, but always inadequate share. So it was feared; so it has proved."

President Roosevelt has recently expressed the view that generals and admirals are experts and know more than can laymen. That is a dangerous half-truth. There are few professions that cannot learn from laymen: "The fact of the matter is," President Wilson once said, "that almost every profession is pushed forward by the men who do not belong to it and know nothing about it, because they ask the ignorant questions which it would not occur to the professional man to ask at all." He himself had "had a great many of my preconceived conceptions absolutely destroyed by men who had not given half the study to the subject that I myself had given." But if the profession of arms is one that cannot learn from laymen, assuredly it needs to learn from others than its senior members who are approaching retirement. Perhaps the canonization of Herr Hitler as a military genius is premature, but it is worthy of note that Germany's military progress, which no one will say has not been remarkable, is not the achievement of the service hierarchies. They have been drastically reorganized—even purged. Jealousies between the services have been effectively suppressed. An air officer commands infantry and vice versa. The results are plainly visible in Norway, in Holland, and in Flanders. To counteract those results England and France have had to take extreme measures—to have purges of their own. It would have been better to discover the square pegs in round holes before they imperiled national safety.

LINDSAY ROGERS

"Canada makes isolation impossible for the United States. Canada makes neutrality a fiction."
—THE OPENING SENTENCES OF:

CANADA: AMERICA'S PROBLEM

by JOHN MacCORMAC
N. Y. Times Canadian Correspondent 1935-39

To what degree does the Monroe Doctrine pledge us to Canada's defense? What if the seat of the British Government moves to Canada — or if Canada seeks to join the U. S.?

THE BOOK ABOUT THE NATION WITH WHOM—COME WHAT MAY —OUR FATE IS MOST CLOSELY LINKED

"A book about one of the most urgent aspects of the overwhelming issues with which we are confronted. I wish that every American would read it."—Walter Millis, Herald Tribune.

THE VIKING PRESS $2.75

WHY FARMERS ARE POOR
The Agricultural Crisis in the United States
by Anne Rochester

A fundamental study with special chapters on land and rent, farm wage workers, small and commercial farms, prices and markets, current farm legislative measures and other problems. 2.75

The SECOND IMPERIALIST WAR
by Earl Browder

The Communist candidate for President summarizes the lessons of the war and the historic changes in the world situation. Groupings and currents in America are subjected to a penetrating examination. A basic contribution to the fight for peace. 2.75

Salute to SPRING
And Other Stories
by Meridel Le Sueur

CARL SANDBURG says of this outstanding Midwestern author: "She is a witness with a genius for moving and highly implicative testimony." 2.00

Dialectics of NATURE
by Frederick Engels

For the first time in English. J. B. S. HALDANE writes in his preface: "It is astonishing how Engels anticipated the progress of science. . . . Had his remarks on Darwinism been generally known, I, for one, would have been saved a certain amount of muddled thinking." 3.00

Send for free catalogue
International Publishers
381 Fourth Avenue, New York

Anatomy of Poland

POLISH PROFILE. By Princess Paul Sapieha. Carrick and Evans. $2.50.

THIS is no profile. Here is Poland itself, skin and ribs laid back and congested organs all exposed to view. "I realized," said Virgilia Petersen of Vassar and New York after she had been married to her Polish prince a year or so, "that boundaries between nations were human boundaries, too. You not only inherited family traits, but also national traits, and you carried this heritage, like a halter around your neck, forever." It is in the cool light of a fine modern American intelligence that she presents the inside of ancient Poland to American eyes.

Hers is a very different Poland from any we have met before. Not the heroic Poland of Paderewski, nor the sentimental Poland of the republic out of Versailles, nor the dictatorial Poland of Marshal Pilsudski, who, after death, was kept à la Lenin in a coffin open to public view until his badly embalmed ears began to go to pieces. It is not the cynical Poland of Colonel Beck's monocle, stripped of all illusions except the fatal one that it was as smart as Germany and Germany was its friend; nor, except in the last chapter, the battered Poland of the German Blitzkrieg and the Fourth Partition. Here is Poland at home—in a feudal castle, in a peasant's hut, in a cow barn ankle deep in muck, in a Warsaw apartment. This is the way Poland acts and thinks when its doors are shut and its people talk among themselves. Here are the prejudices that move it, and those that keep it from moving. More than its roads are of red mud. Its social attitudes are medieval, its education inadequate, its sanitation clogged or non-existent. Its religion is the dead weight of a Catholicism that, in the words of one of its priests, has had "no opposition to challenge the church here or to make it restate its faith. It has not needed to defend itself, and therefore it has grown soft and easy, and people have slipped into certain abuses which are taken for granted." So at the end the German planes came over, and the Ruthenian peasants stripped the great house of everything that the bombs had left intact. There is no apparent reason to believe that either the house or the peasants will undergo any vital change in Poland's next incarnation.

This is an extraordinary book, written with great economy and an apparent detachment that takes its strength from the depth of emotion controlled under its quiet surface. Gilly Petersen has learned many things besides the ways of Poland in these six years.

MILDRED ADAMS

Adventurous Americans

I MARRIED ADVENTURE. By Osa Johnson. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

THE Martin Johnsons were not and never pretended to be scientists, though the value of their work was recognized by Carl Akeley and other museum bigwigs. Still less, however, were they mere showmen or money-makers. They were simple people who loved adventure, who loved animals, and who, thanks to a quiet singleness of purpose, must have lived a very happy life until Martin was killed in the crash of an American air liner. Their story, as Mrs. Johnson here tells it, is almost as interesting for the picture it gives of two happy and likable people as it is for the account of adventures in Borneo, Africa, and the South Seas.

As a mere youth Martin, the son of a small-town jeweler in Kansas, wrote a letter to Jack London which won him a place on the famous cruise of the Snark. When Osa met and married him almost on the spur of the moment, he was showing in his home town some pictures taken on that cruise, and not long afterward she found herself in the Solomon Islands. Chic Sale had loaned them a little money to make a new set of pictures, and from then on they were leaders of increasingly elaborate expeditions which kept them most of the time in one remote region or another. "I Married Adventure" tells the whole story unaffectedly and with a simple charm that is highly engaging. It belongs in any list of Americana, for the Johnsons were as American as David Crockett.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Liberal—Southern Style

TAR HEEL EDITOR. By Josephus Daniels. University of North Carolina Press. $3.50.

IF THE term "liberal" has not been tortured beyond meaning "Southern liberal" has a meaning all its own. Through the seventy-seven years of his life Josephus Daniels has been a champion of freedom, education, justice, democracy. He is entitled to be understood when he calls himself a liberal. It was liberal of him to have been born at all, what with the Civil War raging all around the house there in the little town of Washington, North Carolina. His first thirty-one years, reported with extraordinary faithfulness in "Tar Heel Editor," were lived in a scene which fixed his liberalism with the special circumstance of a region and a history, making some of it easily recognizable to Northerners of the denomination but some not at all. As a boy editor (eighteen years old) of the Wilson, North Carolina, Advance, he found his philosophy in a maxim of Samuel Bowles: "No man is living a life that is worth living unless he is willing to die for somebody or something—at least to die a little." Throughout the North Carolina days covered by his book Mr. Daniels was willing to "die a little" for many things—for professional honesty against Louisiana Lottery advertising money, for prohibition of alcoholic liquor (he made his first speech about that), for home rule and the ousting of the carpetbaggers, for morality and the church, for release of North Carolina's government from railroad dominance, for protest against the tobacco trust, for the rights and needs of the farmer, for government by the people, and—most of all—for public education in North Carolina. He was one with Alderman, Aycock, and McIver in that cause, knowing it to be then—as it is now—the long answer to the problems of the South. He was a democrat with a small d as well as a big one, but he had, and still has, great pride in his ancestry, in the long residence of his family in the state and in the part it took. And he was as unwilling as most of his fellow-citizens in those days to have an ignorant and irresponsible Negro vote control. He was

Rodzinski Salutes the Tchaikovsky Centennial

"When you hear this recording of Tchaikovsky's Fifth it is like hearing us in person in Severance Hall. The new advance in recording tone-quality is amazing."

DR. ARTUR RODZINSKI
CONDUCTOR, THE CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

TCHAIKOVSKY'S FIFTH SYMPHONY! Columbia* Masterworks Records salute Tchaikovsky's Centennial with a magnificent recording of this great symphony by Artur Rodzinski and The Cleveland Orchestra. Hear it today. You will agree that this is "The Fifth" as Tchaikovsky would have wanted it played—"The Fifth" as you will want it.

Four Tchaikovsky Recordings You Should Own!

New! Symphony No. 5 in E Minor
Artur Rodzinski conducting The Cleveland Orchestra. Five 12-inch records in Album. Set 406 (M, AM, MM) $10.00

New! Quartet in D Major
Roth String Quartet. Four 12-inch records in Album. Set 407 (M, AM, MM) . . $5.50

Nutcracker Suite
Frederick Stock conducting the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Three 12-inch records in Album. Set 395 (M, AM, MM) . . $5.00

Concerto No. 1 in B-Flat Minor
Egon Petri, pianist, and the London Philharmonic Orchestra. Four 12-inch records in Album. Set 318 (M, AM, MM) . $6.00

COLUMBIA RECORDS Trade Mark

Columbia Recording Corporation • Subsidiary of the Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. • Bridgeport, New York, Hollywood

*Trade marks "Columbia", the symbol and "Masterworks" Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. by Columbia Phonograph Company, Inc.

A Great Conference—With Time for Fun

AMERICA, THE WAR AND THE ELECTION

SPEAKERS:

William Green
John T. Flynn
Henry Hazlitt
Robert J. Watt
Dr. Merle Vincent
Edward Keating
Henry F. Grady
Marquis W. Childs
Dr. Frank Bohn
Algernon Lee
Louis Waldman
Hon. R. G. Casey
Bela Low
Emanuel Stein
Rev. Wm. C. Kernan

Plenty of Leisure for Fun: Swimming, Boating, Games, Dancing, A Brilliant Max Liebman Revue on Saturday Night. Send for Folder.

Camp TAMIMENT
9 E. 15 ST., N. Y. ALgonquin 4-3441

JUNE 20-23
Special Rates for 3 Full Days
$5 per day or $14 week-end
De Luxe Accommodations Extra
■
Reservations at Camp Tamiment or at N. Y. Office

QUISISANA CAMPS

On Lake Kezar in Center Lovell, Maine

Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.) in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.

QUAINT ■ RESTFUL ● ROMANTIC ■ CULTURED COMPANIONSHIP

Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass, Brook Trout. Non-sectarian. Ownership-Management.

RATES: From $35.00 a week per person, including meals. WRITE FOR BOOKLET
N. Y. Address, 42 West 35th Street. Telephone WIsconsin 7-0200

LATIN AMERICA

MEXICO: 7 trips. 3 to 4 weeks in Mexico. Prices $228 to $541. More than mere sightseeing. Programs and contacts arranged by a distinguished committee, headed by the Minister of Education.

ECUADOR: A survey. Academic credit available. 1 month. $330.

THE OPEN ROAD
12th floor
8 West 40th Street New York

You may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

a champion of most of the things sought by the Farmers' Alliance and the Populist Party, but he was never persuaded to leave the Democratic Party for their sake. He loved freedom and personal liberty, but he never doubted the need of prohibition, and he was a leader in the fight that brought it to Raleigh in the eighties. The American embassy at Mexico City today is bone dry. He was broad-minded, but the nude pictures and statues at the Corcoran Art Gallery shocked him on his first visit to Washington in 1882, and still do. "Although I have visited famous galleries in Europe (since those days)," he writes, "where the female figure is admired most in near nudity, I have never felt that the September Morn type of art, naked female pulchritude, was quite the proper thing, although I do not blush as on my first introduction to it."

There is no literature in Josephus Daniels's book. But there are great honesty, much achievement, an uncrushed idealism, and a complete readability. It is crammed with the history, ways, days, names, and events with which this fine old North Carolinian was associated in the years before he became Cleveland's Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Wilson's Secretary of the Navy, and Roosevelt's Ambassador to Mexico. The after-years are to be reported in volumes to come, he says.

JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES

CONTRIBUTORS

CHARLES E. NOYES is a staff writer for Editorial Research Reports, a Washington newspaper service.

BARNET NOVER conducts a column on world affairs in the Washington Post.

JOHN DEWEY, distinguished philosopher, author, and teacher, has been a powerful and persistent defender of academic freedom.

LINDSAY ROGERS is Burgess professor of public law at Columbia University.

MILDRED ADAMS, translator and journalist, is a frequent contributor to the magazine and book sections of the New York Times.

JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES is on the editorial staff of the Birmingham Age-Herald and is author of "Tonight in the South."

In Early Issues of The Nation

"Health Is Wealth" by Paul de Kruif
REVIEWED BY KARL MENNINGER

"World's End" by Upton Sinclair
REVIEWED BY JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

"Joy of Man's Desiring" by Jean Giono
REVIEWED BY JUSTIN O'BRIEN

DRAMA

Naughty Sixteen-Nineties

THE Players' Club revival of "Love for Love" was scheduled for one week only and will have closed its run before this notice can be printed. But revivals of old plays are so rare in our theater that it is hard to resist the opportunity to talk about one when it does appear—especially if the play happens to be as famous as this. "Love for Love" seemed to Congreve's contemporaries an indisputable masterpiece, bringing to final perfection the style which a whole generation had been polishing, and it ultimately disappeared from the stage chiefly because it was more cynical than a tender-minded society could endure. We are no longer so easily shocked, but the play could hardly become a great favorite again for a different reason: we demand a more continuous dramatic movement and a tighter structure than most plays of the time achieved; and Congreve was conspicuously weak in these respects even by comparison with such a predecessor as Wycherley. He could give to short scenes like that between Tattle and Miss Prue what we call dramatic punch; perhaps because he was lazy, he could not arrange and link these scenes in such a way as to give the effect of continuity and climax.

Robert Edmond Jones, who was responsible both for the charming sets and for the direction of the play, announced in advance that the aim was to produce "a fantasy on a fantasy." Actually, however, the general intention at least seemed to me to achieve something a good deal nearer to the spirit of the original than this would suggest, and such weaknesses as appeared were the result of an inability on the part of some of the actors to catch a style so different from any to which they were accustomed. Nearly all the commentators agreed that Bobby Clark stole the show with his hilarious performance as Ben the sailor and that Dorothy Gish was very nearly as good in the other low-comedy part, that of the willing Miss Prue. Both, indeed, were so delightful as to suggest that they might do wonders in some of the other old plays which give opportunity for virtuoso acting of a sort few modern players are capable of. Dudley Digges also was good as Foresight, the astrologer, but on the whole the men who appeared as the wits and gentlemen were less satisfactory than were the ladies—Violet Heming, Cornelia Otis Skinner, and Peggy Wood—who played opposite them. They sometimes mumbled their lines, and they seldom seemed to me to get precisely the emphasis or intonation necessary if the lines are to mean what Congreve intended.

Let me take a single analyzable example—the rhymed tag at the end of an act which was spoken with the emphasis here indicated:

Women are like tricks by sleight-of-hand
Which to admire we should not understand.

But this, I submit, ought to be:

Which to admire we should not understand.

Congreve's fame was due largely to the fact that he was able to give just the slightest touch of novelty to themes, characters, and jokes which were perfectly familiar, that he could make them seem just a little more subtle and refined. The fact that women are admired but not understood is an old joke. The point of the comparison with tricks of sleight-of-hand is that we, in search of entertainment, seek out the occasion to be deceived. Or as the familiar phrase of the modern advertisement used to proclaim, "It's fun to be fooled." Perhaps this is not very important. But in any event it is pretty much all there is in Congreve, and if you miss that you miss everything.

Few persons have ever succeeded in writing anything about Congreve without making some reference to Charles Lamb's famous contention that the plays of the Restoration cannot be indecent for the simple reason that they are completely unreal, imaging a world which never existed and based upon premises which no one ever really accepted—almost what we would call pure poetry. His assumption, I think, is largely false so far as the founders of the tradition in which Congreve worked are concerned, and only half true when affirmed in connection with Congreve himself. The plays of Etherege and Wycherley, for example, are at least a recognizable picture of a real society and the clear expression of a set of convictions about basic human nature, convictions which include the belief that men and women cannot escape from the fundamental egotism which is born with them and also that, as one of Dryden's serious characters proclaims, "promiscuous love is Nature's general law." Congreve himself wrote at the end of an epoch, and it is true that in his plays the premises are tending to become mere dramatic convention, just as his personages are tending to become exquisite puppets imitating art rather than life. And it is just the resulting ambiguity which makes them hard to describe as well as hard to play. What is matter can never be surely distinguished from what is merely manner. Charles II, so we are told by a contemporary, did not believe that any man was honest or any woman virtuous out of principle. In one of the songs in "Love for Love" Congreve proclaims the truth which an oracle has spoken:

He alone won't betray in whom none will confide,
And the nymph may be chaste that has never been tried.

He is saying with witty ingenuity what Charles had made as a flat statement. Is he really saying the same thing or has it become, in the polished saying, something quite different? Charles spoke only because he believed something. Does Congreve pretend to believe only that he may say something well?

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

AMONG Victor's December and special releases that I was unable to comment on at the time they were issued is Haydn's Symphony No. 104. If you follow the course of the work from point to point in the Tovey manner—for example, from the entire orchestra's forceful opening call in D major to the immediately following D minor whisper of the strings, to mention only the first of the succession of breath-taking details in that powerful slow introduction—you will be inclined to accept

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK
Announce
A PRIZE OF
$2,500
FOR THE BEST
NON-FICTION BOOK
FOR THE GENERAL READER WRITTEN AND
SUBMITTED BEFORE
SEPTEMBER 1, 1941
BY A MEMBER OF
AN AMERICAN COLLEGE FACULTY

Write at once for brochure giving full details. Address Reynal & Hitchcock, [illegible] Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Tovey's estimate of the work as one of Haydn's two or three greatest. It is, nevertheless, rarely played, and has long been in need of a good recording. Not yet issued here by Columbia is the one made by Beecham, which will offer the work with his individual, dynamic phrasing and with the beautiful and imposing sonorities of his London Philharmonic. The Victor set (M-617, $5) made by Edwin Fischer with his chamber orchestra, on the other hand, offers a performance not only superb in musical outline, warmth, spirit, force, but enchanting in the way an ensemble performance by a small group of fine musicians can be—in the sensitiveness and fluidity of the perfectly coordinated functioning of the group, the balance of the instrumental lines, the blending of their colors and sonorities.

These things are achieved to the same enchanting degree by the coordinated functioning of Landowska's ten fingers in the polyphony of Handel's Suites Nos. 2, 5 (with the variations known by the title "Harmonious Blacksmith"), 7 (with the famous Passacaglia), 10, and 14 (M-592, $12). There are dull pages mingled with superb ones in these works; but the dullest passage has the exciting life that her fingers impart to it with their subtle inflection. By the evidence of these performances Landowska has no equal among players of the harpsichord, and only few equals among living musicians.

Lotte Lehmann's voice, her musical feeling, her dramatic imagination and temperament make her not only one of the supreme operatic artists of our time but also a deeply affecting singer of German Lieder—as one may hear in her singing of "Auf ein altes Bild," "Heimweh," and "Auch kleine Dinge" in her set of Hugo Wolf songs (M-613, $5). The emotional content of each of these songs is concentrated into a structure of tone and rhythm created by the vocal line and piano accompaniment; and for the most part Lehmann's interpretative equipment of voice, feeling, imagination, temperament is concentrated into the subtle coloring and accentuation of this vocal line within the tonal and rhythmic framework. In these records one hears only a few slight instances—for example, the words falsch, aber, fort of "Heimweh"—of the sharp audible intake of breath, the gasp, the dramatic whisper that are considered to be, like movement and gesture, more properly part of the means of the opera stage; only at the end of "Peregrina No. 1" is there an example of the emotional intensity that sometimes bursts through the tonal and rhythmic framework of a song; and here and there in "In der Frühe" one hears a few of Lehmann's constricted, shrill high notes. As for the songs themselves, I do not care much for "Peregrina" and "Frühling übers Jahr"; but the others are among Wolf's best.

Act III of "Die Meistersinger" contains passages that are among Wagner's finest, and that normally one begins to hear with ears and mind dulled by two hours and a half of the preceding acts. The Victor recording (the scenes in Sachs's workshop: M-537, $20; the scene on the banks of the Pegnitz: M-538, $10) enables one to listen to this music fresh and alert, to repeat a passage as many times as one likes, and in these ways to become aware of details one normally misses. This makes the set valuable despite its defects. Not only does a recording let one hear an opera under more favorable conditions than in the opera house; it can let one hear the opera sung as it normally is not sung in an opera house—sung, that is, by good singers assembled from different opera houses; but this "Meistersinger" set was made with the singers, good and bad, of the Dresden Opera. The Walther, the David, the Beckmesser are good or good enough; but in place of the fine voices, the finished singing, the sensitive phrasing of Schorr, Rethbergfi and Elisabeth Schumann on the old Victor records of "Wahn! Wahn," the Sachs-Eva duet, and the Quintet, the present set offers the rough voice and explosive singing of Hans Hermann Nissen as Sachs, the thin, shrill voice and the singing without musical significance of Margarete Teschemacher as Eva. Nor is the recording as good as it should be. There is better balance and clarity of the voices on the old record of the Quintet; in the new set there is again the defect of singers, apparently too close to the microphones, obscuring the fine orchestra; and the orchestral passage at Beckmesser's departure from Sachs's workshop is only the worst of the places where no amount of repetition—now with one type of needle, now with another, now with treble increased, now with treble reduced—gives anything but gritty sound. These are imperfections which I am bound to report; but I am bound also to add that they will not prevent the person who loves this music from enjoying it.

There are still a few releases that I will deal with later; and I will comment on the Victor Black Label Classics next week.

B. H. HAGGIN

HAY-ADAMS
HOUSE

In hospitality, charm and dignity as well as service and cuisine, the Hay-Adams House perpetuates these two great names. An ideal location, directly opposite the White House, overlooking beautiful LaFayette Park. Write for free "Guide to Washington."

From $3.50 Single $5. Double
Completely Air Conditioned

SIXTEENTH STREET AT H
WASHINGTON
D.C.

LANGUAGES

NOW LEARN A NEW LANGUAGE
in your own home quickly, easily, correctly by the world-famous LINGUAPHONE Method. Endorsed by thousands of students, schools and colleges.
SEND FOR FREE BOOK
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 R. C. A. BUILDING NEW YORK CITY

BARGAIN PHONOGRAPH COURSES. All makes. We sell, rent, purchase, exchange, Mail Orders. Booklet N. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 18 East 41st Street, N. Y. C.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

Handwriting scientifically analyzed. Detailed, sincere, helpful. $3. Questions answered. Send 15 pen-written lines. State age, sex. Dr. Alfred Reiss, Ph.D. Formerly Heidelberg. 1775 Broadway, N. Y. City.

BOOK

IT IS YOUR LIFE
Keep Healthy • Stay Young • Live Long
By M. M. Rosenberg, M.D.
"It is the best book of its kind in years."
Benjamin DeCasseres in his "March of Events."
23 Chapters, 475 pages, illustrated—price $2.50
SCHOLASTIC BOOK PRESS
156 E. 22nd St., New York Or Your Bookseller

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JUNE 22, 1940 NUMBER 25

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Shape of Things

THE FRENCH ARMY, BROKEN INTO FOUR fragments, is still fighting, as we go to press, and Foreign Minister Baudouin, speaking for the new government, insists that France will lay down its arms only "if we can get an honorable peace." Thus, if the Axis demands unconditional surrender as is expected, the French government may still reconsider the British proposal of complete union of the two empires and carry on the fight at sea and in the colonies. But it is also possible that the dictators will offer an armistice on relatively mild terms. Their immediate concern is to get France completely out of the war in order to concentrate all their forces for a rapid conquest of Britain. That achieved, they can revise their conditions without interference. But Britain has still to be crushed, and desperate as its situation appears, it may prove capable of resisting a prolonged siege. Much will depend on what happens to the French navy. If the British Admiralty can prevent the surrender of a major part of France's fighting ships it will have a chance to beat off invasion and maintain at least a partial blockade of the Continent.

*

RUSSIA HAS FOUND A PRETEXT EXCUSING its complete occupation of the Baltic states and the establishment there of puppet governments. According to Moscow the three little countries of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia had been intriguing together and had formed an alliance against the Soviets. There may be some truth in the charge, but it can be taken for granted that any plans that had been concocted were based on an understanding with Stalin's "friend" Hitler. The Baltic states are too weak to plot against any great power except in conjunction with another great power. The real significance of Russia's move, and of its reported concentration of troops in Russian Poland, is of course its fear that with the completion of Hitler's western campaign the Soviet-German pact will become another scrap of paper. There is little reason to hope that the U. S. S. R. is preparing to join the war with an attack on the German rear. Its concern, rather, is to bolster its defenses against the possibility of assault in the not too distant future. It would not be surprising if, in furtherance of this aim, it decided to occupy Bessarabia, so as to push its southwestern frontier back from dangerous proximity to the great port of Odessa. There are also rumors of new Soviet demands on Finland. Now that Germany has overrun all Norway and has Sweden under its thumb, the Nazis are in a position to outflank Russia's newly acquired strongholds in the Gulf of Finland.

*

IN AN EFFORT TO SAVE SOME CHILDREN, at least, from the Nazi juggernaut an organization known as "Save Europe's Children" was formed in Washington last week under the leadership of Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes. The immediate purpose of the organization is to bring British children to Canada out of range of Nazi aerial bombardment. The number of children who can be cared for in Canada is naturally limited, and it will be necessary to get special legislation before any refugees can be brought, even temporarily, to the United States. The obtaining of this legislation will, we trust, be part of the task of the new organization. To care for child refugees is the very least that this country can do for the preservation of European freedom. It would involve no possible threat to our security and place little, if any, burden on our economy. These children would not compete for American jobs; as consumers they would make jobs, not take them.

*

THERE IS NO REASON WHY TONY GALENTO should not periodically advise the American people on matters of taxation, social security, and naval affairs; why Colonel Lindbergh should not give us his views on foreign policy; or why anybody should pay the slightest attention to either of them. So far Galento has stuck to beer and boxing, but the Colonel's remarks have become front-page copy and are regularly refuted by United States Senators. They must therefore be treated with respect, if also with bewilderment. In his latest message to the nation Lindbergh warns us against "doing to England and France what they did to Abyssinia, to Czechoslovakia, to Poland, to Finland, and to Norway." Has the Colonel turned suddenly against that policy of appeasement which he himself did so much to promote? Not at all. Where Chamberlain and Daladier went wrong, according to Lindbergh, was not in failing those wretched countries, but in refusing to fail them quickly and firmly at the outset. He would have us treat the Allies better by telling them that they are not to buy our guns and supplies. Any other course would confront this country with generations of war against "the strongest military nation the world has ever known." Presumably Germany would declare this war, since we would have no reason to do so, and it would be up to Germany to take the initiative. Yet Lindbergh weaves a Buck Rogers fantasy about the prospect of our having to build an armada to transport millions of men and "several hundred thousand airplanes" for an attempted invasion of a continent armed to the teeth. We don't believe for a moment that Lindbergh puts any stock in such stuff. Our guess is that at the heart of his itch to appease is the conviction, expressed near the end of his speech, that Nazism is, after all, perfectly consonant with the civilization we have known. It is just a matter of adjustment.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

GETULIO VARGAS, PRESIDENT OF BRAZIL, seems to be a lying young man on a flying trapeze. The day after Mr. Roosevelt's "stab in the back" speech at Charlottesville, Vargas declared "the sterile demagogy of political democracy" dead, praised the "virile" dictatorships, and predicted a new world order on totalitarian lines. The speech, naturally, was regarded as a bid for the favor of the Axis powers. But Vargas cannot afford to bite the hand that is still on the verge of feeding him a $120,000,000 credit, and he now explains that his praise of the dictatorships "can in no sense be regarded as contradictory" to Mr. Roosevelt's attack upon them. The attempt to follow the Brazilian dictator's agile logic leaves us giddy, but his opportunist past and Brazil's economic position make it less difficult to understand his eagerness to be in the good graces of both the Axis and Washington at one and the same time. Brazil needs Hitler's good-will to pour its chief product into the coffee cups of Europe. Brazil also needs the financial and other favors showered upon Vargas by Washington in the past few years: three destroyers being built for him in our shipyards, ninety six-inch guns sold him last March, a $120,000,000 credit promised him when he reaches a debt agreement with the United States, conferences under way to build a $10,000,000 steel plant for him with American money. On November 27, 1937, The Nation questioned the wisdom of building warships for the South American dictator "most likely to line up with Hitler and Mussolini." The Vargas speech underscores the question.

OTHER LATIN AMERICAN COUNTRIES HAVE reacted strongly to Mussolini's "stab in the back" and the growing menace of Nazi victory in Europe. There have been widespread press condemnations of the Italian action and in many countries impressive anti-fascist demonstrations. New efforts to counteract Axis propaganda and subversive activities are reported. In Uruguay, where Nazi organizations have been particularly energetic, a Congressional investigation has resulted in numerous arrests. The German minister has dissolved the local branches of the Nazi Party and the Labor Front and taken charge of their records in an apparent effort to conceal damaging evidence. Mexico, which has been accused in the press of a dangerous degree of toleration for "fifth-column" elements, has pronounced Arthur Dietrich, press attaché and organizer of Nazi propaganda, persona non grata and requested his early departure. Even more significant are the statement by Secretary of the Interior Ignacio Tellez that Mexico's foreign policy is pro-Ally and the message sent to France by President Cárdenas expressing disapproval of the Italian declaration of war. Almost simultaneously Lombardo Toledano, secretary general of the C. T. M.,

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 741
EDITORIALS:
  WHAT NEXT? by Freda Kirchwey 743
  WHY FRANCE FELL 745
  OUR ENEMIES WITHIN 745
  DON'T APPEASE JAPAN 746
RITES FOR THE G. O. P. by Charles Malcolmson 747
YOUTH, WAR, AND FREEDOM by Raymond Gram Swing 749
MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT
  IX. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT by Max Lerner 752
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 755
IN THE WIND 756
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 757
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
  EMPIRE AND PEACE by Hans Kohn 758
  HEALTH AND THE STATE by Karl Menninger 758
  DISCOVERING CANADA by Maxwell S. Stewart 760
  BIOGRAPHY OF A MIND by Jacques Barzun 761
  IN BRIEF 763
  FILMS by Franz Hoellering 763
  RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 764

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

who had previously tended to follow the Moscow line in regard to the war, announced his sympathy with the Allies and asserted that "the workers of Latin America have always fought fascism and will continue fighting it." All in all, signs of a change of atmosphere in Mexico City lend support to the current rumors that Britain is seeking a renewal of diplomatic relations with Mexico and a settlement of the dispute arising out of the expropriation of the Royal Dutch Shell oil properties.

*

EVIDENCE THAT THE ITALIAN CONSULATE in New York directs at least three national Fascist organizations and is engaged in extensive pro-Fascist propaganda was revealed last week by Police Commissioner Valentine. New York City alone has been found to contain at least sixty Centri Educativi (cultural centers) devoted to the spread of Fascist doctrines. While the existence of these activities is not exactly news—as witness the extensive revelations regarding the Casa Italiana at Columbia University in The Nation some years ago—they take on a much more serious character as a result of Italy's entrance into the war. How many Italian-Americans actually support Italy is an open question. Captain Bertolini, Italian consular agent for eight New York counties, boasted that all of the 6,000,000 persons of Italian descent in the United States are backing the aspirations of Mussolini. This is refuted by the unmistakable demonstrations of loyalty to the United States of hundreds of thousands of former Italian citizens. But if there are only a few thousand Italians working under the direction of the Italian consulates, such activities constitute a genuine fifth-column danger, in contrast to the Trojan red herrings which are inspiring so many fishermen's tales. That such activities are also an illegal abuse of diplomatic immunity is beyond dispute. We are glad to note that Secretary Hull is conducting an investigation independently of the FBI. Having obtained the necessary information, we trust that he will not hesitate to act even to the point of breaking off diplomatic relations.

*

"A BILL TO DEPORT THE CONSTITUTION" ought to be the title of the bill just passed by the House to deport Harry Bridges. The vote, 330 to 42, in favor of a proposal which violates the most cherished of our constitutional safeguards, is a measure of the extent to which Congress is losing its head. Left wingers like Marcantonio and Geyer of California, middle-of-the-roaders like Sabath of Illinois and Martin J. Kennedy of New York, professional anti-Communists like Dickstein of New York, conservatives like Bruce Barton and Wadsworth, and even Hobbs of Alabama, author of the famous "concentration-camp" bill, were among those who found it impossible to vote for so shocking a measure as the Bridges deportation bill. Congressman Havenner of California ably argued the point raised by The Nation in its issue of May 25 that the measure was really a bill of attainder, notorious instrument of Tudor tyranny, forbidden by Article I of the Constitution. Thorkelson of Montana and Schafer of Wisconsin, whose peculiar brand of Americanism has a strong Munich accent, supported the bill as a way of fighting the fifth column. Sabath of Illinois, in a speech against the measure, called attention to Schafer's position and said, "I am commencing to feel strongly that this [stand taken by Schafer] may be for the purpose of distracting attention from the activities of the fifth columnists, namely, the Nazis."

*

HEADLINE READERS MAY BE STARTLED TO learn from the Department of Commerce that the net debt in the United States declined by $10,000,000,000 between 1929 and 1939. The $22,000,000,000 increase in the public debt during the period was more than offset by a $32,000,000,000 drop in debts owed by private individuals. It must not be assumed that the reduction in debt is entirely a gain. A large part of the reduction was achieved the hard way—through bankruptcy and foreclosures. To some extent it merely is indicative of lower prices and a lower level of business activity. The rise in government debt reflects the fact that the government is now engaged in many of the constructive activities formerly carried on by private enterprise. But there is room for gratification in the substantial lightening of the burden of indebtedness, particularly since carrying charges, owing to reduced interest rates, have been cut to an even greater extent. This situation has been further improved by the fact that the interest on government debts tends to be considerably lower than that on private indebtedness. For the real test of the burden of debt is not the amount of the debt but the amount of the carrying charges in relation to the population. But though we know that our per capita indebtedness was reduced from $1,410 in 1929 to $1,230 in 1939, we do not yet have figures on the annual savings involved for the American people.

What Next?

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

WHAT comes next? Let us hope that it will not be panic and a tidal wave of despair. The greatest disaster in the world would be, not the military defeat of France or even of France and Britain, but the acceptance by the United States of the myth that Nazi Germany is invincible. The terrifying union of organization and armed might with implacable aggression may overwhelm the unready European democracies. But it need not and must not overwhelm us. For we have their mistakes to warn and guide us. The record of the past four years, so packed with bitter wisdom, is open before us. We have only to study it without blinking and then act—confidently and strongly.

It is natural that the immediate reaction to the French surrender should be a feeling that the game is up, that Hitler can't be stopped this side of his ultimate desires. But fear can be as unrealistic as easy optimism. We can easily give the victory to Hitler by taking fright, and running for cover, and planning future concessions. If we do any of these things we shall be ignoring the example provided by France and Britain. Instead we should recognize certain basic facts and build on them our opinions and our policies.

The first fact is that the United States is at war with Germany and has been for years. So far the struggle has been carried on in the field of trade and finance, through diplomatic pressures and withdrawals, through the help provided, behind inadequate camouflage, to the Allies. The war was forced upon us by the very nature of fascism; and while we have tried to avoid the full implications of our involvement we have been driven further and further into the struggle. And now we are in for the duration. Hitler is not likely to modify his methods when his power on the European continent is supreme; nor will he forget the part the United States has played in the effort to prevent his full triumph. From the moment President Roosevelt announced his intention to quarantine the aggressors, our participation was settled. Unfortunately we did not implement these words with appropriate actions. Instead of promising to support any honest move for collective security, we duplicated the fatal procrastination of Britain and France. We allowed Hitler to pick off his opponents one at a time, pretending meanwhile that our share in the struggle was nothing more than a rather lopsided brand of neutrality. Our mistake lay in the pretenses and hesitations with which we clothed our commitment. At no time was there hope of a genuine peace with Hitler.

Today the chance and the time for pretense are gone. We have openly sided with France and Britain. We shall not by any last-minute repentance be able to dodge the consequences of that alliance. We should not, therefore, repent.

I do not say that we should, instead, declare war on Germany. To propose such a declaration at this time would precipitate a struggle which might prove a disastrous obstacle to continued aid for Britain and dramatize differences now buried, temporarily at least, under the general concern for American security. The proposal would probably be defeated and in its defeat carry down many necessary measures of defense. Even if it were carried, a declaration of war might have the undesired effect of deflecting effort toward the hasty mobilization of man-power and the hoarding of resources that should still be put at the disposal of the powers resisting fascism in the field.

And this brings me to the second fact on which policy should be based.

The British Empire has not been defeated. It is fighting. It is strong in resources and men; its fleets still dominate the oceans. Before this page is read we shall probably know whether the Admiralty can prevent the surrender of the French fleet to Hitler. If it can, Britain may hold out for a long time. The greatest weakness of the British defense is the shortage of trained man-power and of planes. The United States should pour into Britain the "redoubled" aid promised by President Roosevelt to France in its last fighting hours. The United States should look upon England as an American fortress standing off the coast of Nazi Europe, a bastion between our shores and the most powerful aggressor the world has known. As long as England resists we have armed protection and time to prepare to protect ourselves. In England and the British Empire survive, precariously, the last standards outside the New World to which free men can cling. The United States must help defend Britain as long as the British army and fleet defend it.

Mr. Roosevelt knows this. In spite of past errors and delays, the President has demonstrated more understanding of the nature of the struggle against fascism than any other public man in America. And this is the third fact on which policy should be based.

Franklin D. Roosevelt must be reelected. In an article on another page of this issue Max Lerner expresses his belief that a third term is certain. But the disasters of the past few days have raised doubts in many minds. It is being said that Mr. Roosevelt's policy is fatally identified with the defeated or beleaguered democracies of Europe, and that the President himself should favor the election of a man who will come into office untrammeled by such commitments. To accept this position is both to admit the triumph of fascism and to prepare to placate it. Until very recent weeks I have doubted the wisdom of putting Mr. Roosevelt in office for a third term. Today his reelection seems to me vitally important. No other candidate in either camp represents a vigorous resistance to the double danger of fascism working through reactionary forces inside the country and through pressure or attack from outside.

The fact is, Mr. Roosevelt stands alone as a symbol of the will to make democracy live. The most immediate danger that faces the United States is not military attack or political penetration. It is the growth of a spirit of acquiescence in the new order now being imposed upon the world by fascist arms. To replace Roosevelt with a man free of anti-fascist entanglements would be comparable to the replacement of Reynaud by Pétain. We are not yet ready to surrender to Hitler.

Why France Fell

EXHAUSTED by its vain efforts to hold back the endless waves of fresh Nazi troops and tanks, the French army has broken. Premier Reynaud, unable to rally his Cabinet for a no-surrender policy, has resigned, and the aged Marshal Pétain is providing a front for a government committed to peace at any price. At the time of writing we do not know what that price will be; we can only be sure that it will be crushing.

Why has France so tragically fallen? Why has the French army, so often proclaimed the finest in the world, collapsed a few weeks after the war started in earnest? We cannot at present give any adequate answer in military terms, for only fragments of the picture have yet become available. But we can see that the Allied High Command, no less than the majority of civilians in France, Britain, and America, has been blinded by wishful thinking. The training of the German army and the value and extent of its equipment were alike badly underestimated. Undue faith was placed in the Maginot Line, and a belief that it would make possible a cheap and safe war was fostered. Too little regard was paid to the possibility that the line would be turned by an invasion of the Low Countries, the defensive possibilities of which were grossly exaggerated. The strength of the famous Dutch water line and of Belgium's forts and canals were cheerfully assumed to be capable of delaying the invader for weeks. Thus, when Hitler did in fact strike through the Low Countries, the Allied armies left their prepared positions in the Little Maginot Line along the Belgian fronttier to march against the foe, leaving a weak spot in the Meuse valley through which the Panzer divisions were able to pour. Thereafter the Allies were never given a chance to establish a solid defensive position behind which they could rally their reserves.

But the defeat of France in the field is only the last link in a long chain. The weakness and unpreparedness which both Britain and France have shown have deep roots in the wilful blindness of the governing classes in both countries. Eager to be deceived, they gladly accepted Hitler's false façade of anti-bolshevism and on this pretext acquiesced in and even encouraged one aggression after another. They had a magnificent opportunity to make collective security a reality when Mussolini invaded Ethiopia, but they shirked it because they dreaded the possibility of an overthrow of Italian Fascism. In Spain they threw away perhaps their last opportunity, allowing the Germans and Italians to murder openly a friendly democracy and establish a totalitarian stronghold on the flanks of both the British and French empires. It is the bitterest irony of the French defeat that they should be forced to ask for Franco's mediation to obtain clemency from their conquerors.

An attempt is being made in this country to blame the lack of preparedness in France on the Blum government and its program of social reform and nationalization of the arms industry. This is a most unjust accusation obviously made for domestic political purposes. It takes no account of the fact that labor standards in France had been allowed to lag far behind those of other industrial countries. It omits to mention the pressure maintained on the workers by the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few families who had battened on French resources ever since the end of the last war. Nor does it explain the equal unpreparedness of Britain, where conservative interests had held political power for nine years and the task of building defenses was fully intrusted to private business interests which fell down on the job.

In so far as treachery has played a part in the French defeat it is the treachery mainly of those in high places who intrigued with the Nazis before the war and are now getting ready to creep back as Nazi puppets. It is the treachery, also, of those who placed class interests higher than the safety of their country, and in this category we must include the Communists, who betrayed France on Russian orders, as well as the reactionaries of the right. The great mass of the French people—peasants, workers, small business men—suffer from their guilt but do not share it. They have fought with magnificent courage. May those that survive live to see a new France which will be free both of Nazis and the native rats which have gnawed at its vitals.

Our Enemies Within

IF this country allows itself to be deceived by its real fifth column, American democracy will soon enjoy the privilege of choosing weapons for its own suicide. It may revoke the liberties which are its very essence in order to crush those who challenge the whole idea of liberty; or it may leave these liberties intact, enabling those same elements to dig deep into the life of the country against the day when they can betray a corroded American democracy to the enemy. Either way, hope the proponents of the "total state," we are doomed; either way, they win.

The time has come to show that this choice of alternatives is false to the core. If democracy can confront its enemies only with paralysis or tyranny, then democracy is no way of life, since it lacks the prime essentials of all living organisms: the will and means for self-preservation.

If the choice, as we hope to show, is false, the problem is nevertheless all too real. Norway fell overnight, the victim of an inside job; Dutch democracy, struggling manfully with the invader, abandoned hope when Dutch traitors lined the roofs of Rotterdam and The Hague to shoot down Dutch soldiers in the streets, and when Dutch homes, by prearranged plan, were thrown open to German parachutists. It was Belgian officers who failed to blow up strategic Belgian bridges before the oncoming enemy, and Republican Spain harbored in the highest ranks of its army the traitors who by the grace of foreign dictators now rule that ruined country.

These same treasonable elements are feverishly at work now throughout the Americas, and not least of all in the United States. Their presence raises two all-important questions: Who are fifth columnists? What can we do about them? The questions are of equal importance and complexity, and we propose here to discuss only the first, reserving for another issue an analysis of specific proposals.

What makes the problem of identifying fifth columnists and potential fifth columnists most difficult is the mounting fever of the country. In itself this popular revulsion is a tribute to the anti-fascist spirit of the people. But it is a spirit that is being brazenly exploited by the very forces against which it should be directed. The tinpot Hitlers and their more subtle counterparts in politics and industry have done a quick-change into the regalia of minute men and are off in full cry after the "fifth columns" of their choice—the New Deal, the trade unions, and every other genuine anti-fascist force in the country. The Hearst press, with its record of slobbering admiration for Mussolini over a period of years, now takes a bow for having set the country on the track of the fifth column, by which it means the Communists and only the Communists. The Associated Farmers of California, one of whose leaders returned from Germany several years ago expressing admiration for the works of Adolf Hitler, now announce "the most intensive American drive ever directed at a fifth column"—in this case the Okies and the Arkies and all who would protect them from the association's vigilante labor policies. Hamilton Fish, who busied himself in Germany last fall in desperate maneuvers to produce more appeasement for the Führer, wants Harry Bridges deported because he is "a symbol of the fifth columnists in our midst." J. Parnell Thomas, whose Congressional career has been confined to loud-mouthed attacks on everything that smells even faintly of democracy, tells the country over a national hook-up that "the surest way of removing the fifth column from our shores is to remove the New Deal from the seat of government." And as though to crown this monument of brass, former Magistrate Leo J. Healy demands that a jury free his warmly and avowedly pro-Hitler clients—the Christian Frontists on trial in Brooklyn—on the ground that it was natural for them to want to shoot Communists, who are the only true fifth columnists.

There are two great reservoirs of anti-fascism in this country: organized labor and the great body of aliens who fled before the fascist terror or who are close to those who suffered under it. Any attempt to cut off these groups from the fight against fascism and the fifth column is a deliberate weakening of the country against the real enemy. It is the strategy of the genuine fifth columnists, the men to be watched. They are not hard to identify: if you meet a labor-baiter, a union-buster, a racist of anti-Semitic or any other complexion, or one who would have you believe that the reds are the real and only danger, you are confronting a fifth-columnist, potential or full-blown. This is not to defend the Communists; if they are not the core of the fifth column, they are at least its fellow-travelers for the present and they must expect to bear the consequences. But it should be remembered that all the democracies which in these past few years have been delivered over to totalitarianism have been betrayed not by Communists but by fascists. Even in Finland, where the Communists had the great Red Army at their back, they were unable to deliver the goods, and their phony People's Government of Otto Kuusinen was so sorry a joke that Stalin had to inter it without so much as a prayer.

The feverish effort of America's fifth-column shouters must not be interpreted simply as an attempt to divert the lightning from themselves. It is deeper than that; it is a flanking movement to divest the country's anti-fascist forces of the only kind of leadership which can possibly be effective, the only leadership which hates fascism and can be counted on to fight it to the end. England and France had to free themselves of control by the Chamberlains, the Bonnets, and the Daladiers before they could really fight Hitler. Here we will have to keep our Fishes and J. Parnell Thomases, our Dieses and Healys, our Hearsts and our Associated Farmers from taking over if we are honestly to come to grips with our own fifth column. For whatever laws we pass, whatever precautions we take, will be no stronger than the men who administer and execute them. The first principle in combating fascism is to put the fight in the hands of anti-fascists.

Don't Appease Japan

As A by-product of the European crisis a movement has developed in the past few weeks in favor of making a deal with Japan. In the vanguard of this movement are papers such as the Chicago Tribune and leaders such as Senator Vandenberg, who have consistently opposed any action by the United States which might hinder the Japanese invasion of China. This group has now been joined by Walter Lippmann, who, while admittedly not a recent convert, has never before openly adopted the appeasement position. Mr. Lippmann's argument seems plausible because of its simplicity. He declares that we are faced with serious threats to our security from both Europe and the Far East, with incomparably the greater threat coming from Europe. Therefore it behooves us, according to Mr. Lippmann, to make terms with Japan so as to face one enemy at a time. This would permit us to move our navy into the Atlantic, and thus strengthen our national defenses.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Mr. Lippmann's argument rests on two assumptions, both of which recent experience has shown to be dangerous illusions. The first is that a military clique such as holds power in Japan is responsive to reason and conciliation; the second is that aggression can be held in check in one area while it is encouraged in another. For nearly three years Mr. Chamberlain struggled under these delusions in dealing with Italy, and the result is now fully apparent. To fascists an effort at conciliation is invariably a sign of weakness. The concessions offered are accepted as a sort of tribute from a weaker power and used to strengthen the armed force of the aggressor for the inevitable showdown.

Britain's capitulation to Japan at Tientsin last week on the issue of Chinese currency was perhaps inevitable for a country engaged in a struggle for its very existence. It was followed, significantly enough, by a Japanese demand that all Allied troops and warships be withdrawn from China. But the United States is under no such duress. Our fleet is not needed in the Atlantic at this moment. If we desire to aid the Allies to the utmost, our navy is still more useful in the Pacific than it would be in the Atlantic. The Japanese navy would dominate the Pacific if it were not for the American fleet at Hawaii. Withdrawal of the American ships, with or without an "agreement" with Japan, would invite the seizure of the Dutch East Indies, which would be a severe blow to the Allied supply lines in the East.

Presumably for just such realistic reasons the State Department appears to have turned a deaf ear to suggestions for appeasing Japan. Secretary Hull's statement denouncing the recent frightful Japanese air raids on Chungking indicated that there has been no substantial change in American policy. Passage of Senator Sheppard's bill empowering the President to impose discriminatory embargoes on munitions and war supplies to other than Allied countries may injure Japan far more than the moral embargoes now in effect. A complete stoppage of the shipment of scrap iron to Japan is in sight. Machine tools are already being held up, and the bill would permit even the embargo of oil exports, without which Japan could not maintain its invasion of China. The adoption of these measures will undoubtedly increase the pressure within Japan for the seizure of the Dutch East Indies. In the face of this threat, appeasement talk is especially dangerous.

The democratic countries might do well to tear a leaf out of the notebook of the fascist powers when it comes to strategy. For years the fascists gained considerable success and a reputation for infallibility by nibbling away at the weakest sectors of what might, for want of a better name, be called the democratic front. At present Japan is probably the weakest link in the fascist front. It is only sound sense, then, that the pressure on this link be accentuated rather than relaxed at this critical moment.

Rites for the G. O. P.

BY CHARLES MALCOLMSON

Washington, June 17

NOT that it matters much, but next Monday the Republicans open their convention in Philadelphia, where a national title—pugilistic or political—has not changed hands since Tunney licked Dempsey in 1926. Republicans, however, profess to be encouraged by their Philadelphia convention record, having won the election on the only other occasions (1872 and 1900) when the party convened on the banks of the Schuylkill.

But those were the days of Grant and McKinley. These are days when a minority party—the Republicans have at last accepted and are acting that role—can only pray for a miracle. Yet not prayer but deep melancholy will be the Leit-motif of next week's Philadelphia story, and so it is difficult not to describe convention arrangements in funereal terms. Services are expected to last about a week, with interment on Saturday, though the catafalque may remain on display longer if there is any real difficulty about selecting the pall-bearers.

Hardly any Republicans in Washington still believe that the convention will be a "quickie" or that the nomination will be won without a real fight. They are now convinced that if the Taft-Hoover-Willkie combine prevents a Dewey majority on the first few ballots, any one of these three has a good chance for the nomination. This is a sharp reversal of the picture of a month ago, when Buster Dewey was the odds-on favorite in the betting and nobody was taking Hoover or Willkie seriously except themselves. As for Senator Taft, he now feels that a ballot Blitzkrieg offers his best, and perhaps only, chance of victory. It is certain that in a deadlocked convention the prospects of Hoover and Willkie—in Washington Vandenberg and the others are regarded as washed up—would be vastly enhanced.

Hoover and Willkie present a remarkable political parallel. Six months ago they were the darkest horses in the Republican stable, and even now neither has more than a handful of pledged delegates. But the Great Engineer, an arch-conservative, and the Great Opportunist, who poses as a liberal, appeal strongly to the men of wealth and influence who actually run the Republican Party. As such, and thanks to the disorganized state of the party, either one is today a good "smart-money" bet to romp off with the nomination.

Of the two, Willkie has far greater appeal. He profits from the carefully nurtured myth that he is a "nonprofessional" politician and pretends to eschew the tricks and sophistry of the trade. Nothing, of course, could be farther from the truth. Willkie is a "smart operator" in every sense of the phrase. That he still has a great deal to learn about politics, however, is clear from the off-the-record address he made here last week at the National Press Club.

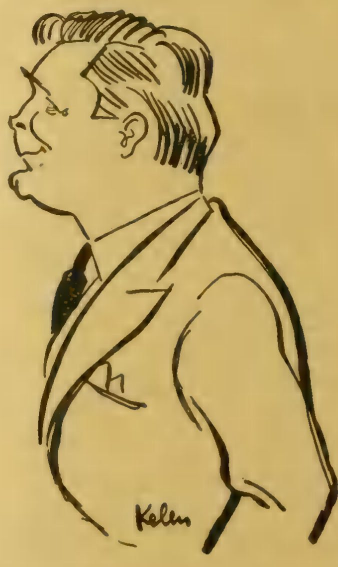
Willkie and his partisans may thank his lucky star that this speech was not delivered over a national radio hook-up, for if ever a public figure was guilty of indecent intellectual exposure it was Wall Street's new candidate. The address was blatant, intemperate demogoguery; it revealed Willkie as the closest thing to a native American fascist yet to receive serious consideration as Presidential timber. Even the customary Press Club audience —ten lawyers and lobbyists to one newspaperman—was stunned. It had come to applaud but remained to scoff.

Speculation in Washington, however, is concerned not so much with whom the Republicans will select at the convention next week as with the sort of program on which the nominee will have to base his campaign. The Republicans' position today, astride the horns of the foreign-policy dilemma, is desperate; but even worse is the prospect, once they decide to jump, of landing in a bed of cactus.

The policy-makers at Philadelphia have three choices. They can denounce the President as a warmonger and place the party frankly in the isolationist camp. This, however, would alienate the mass of independent voters on whom the only Republican chance of success depends and acutely embarrass those candidates — including Dewey, Taft, Willkie, and Vandenberg—who have indorsed the Roosevelt foreign policy in essence. They can accept the "all means short of war" position of the President as indecisive and insufficient and demand that the United States participate more effectively in the war and provide more substantially for national defense. This, of course, would oblige them to repudiate isolationist sentiment and at the same time ignore the fact that isolationist Republican administrations have been largely responsible for our present national-defense weaknesses. Or, third, they can take a weaseling middle course, compromise with both isolationists and interventionists, and advance as the keynote of their platform the cry that Republican "professionals" can do a better job of national defense than New Deal "amateurs."

This will satisfy nobody, though it already appears that just such a program, with certain refinements, will emerge in Philadelphia next week. Colonel Lindbergh in his radio address of last Saturday supplied some unmistakable clues to the working of Republican minds The Colonel, who a few weeks ago told everybody to keep calm and not to worry, warned that when and if we enter the war we must be prepared to fight "the strongest military nation in the world." In which case, he declared, "we must turn to a dictatorial government."

Lindbergh's conclusion, though unstated, was inescapable: We should attend to our knitting and do nothing to offend "the strongest military nation the world has ever known," but if we decide to fight we must turn to a dictatorship run by those who really know how to dictate and not by New Deal theorists.



Wendell Willkie

Even more significant for the light it sheds on forthcoming Republican strategy was the Colonel's implied insistence on an American policy of appeasement toward Hitler Germany. Now that France has fallen, this may well turn out to be the real issue of the campaign. Republicans have already organized a whispering campaign which follows a tack something like this: We have to go on living in the same world with Nazi Germany; therefore our best chance of survival lies in electing a President who is not an outspoken enemy of the Hitler regime. Lindbergh's speech served to force this issue out into the open and to lend a touch of plausibility to what might otherwise be dismissed as an ineffective fifth-column attempt to undermine American morale.

Youth, War, and Freedom

BY RAYMOND GRAM SWING

A FEW weeks ago Dr. Robert Ley, chief of the German Labor Front, in the course of a broadcast gave this definition of freedom. "A man is free," he declared, "first, when he can eat, drink, dress, and live as and where he pleases or finds necessary; second, when he can wander out into the world whenever and however he pleases; and, third, when others honor and esteem his labors. That is the true meaning of freedom." I am not going to criticize this definition at length for what it says, though it is worth pointing out that it does not define such freedom as exists in a totalitarian state, where there is a distinct limitation on earning power; so that a man has to eat, drink, dress, and live according to an income set by the state, and not according to his pleasure or ability. In the Germany of today all young men and women, as labor conscripts, have to give outright of their services to the state, and later in life they are subject to the state's dictated rules as to how long and under what conditions they shall work, and as to the prices at which they must buy their food, clothing, lodging, and travel. But this freedom, Dr. Ley may say, if it does not now exist in practice, will be put into practice as Germany prospers. It is the Germans' ideal. It is what they are striving for. And I want to examine it first of all as an ideal.

The world, at this hour, is in dreadful chaos. It is in the grip of a conflict which bespeaks more than a competition for political power, more than a shift of world markets. Also at stake, besides political and economic power, is a concept of life, its establishment not for this year and next but for many years to come. For this reason, because the concept of life on which our nation was founded is the one that is being challenged, we are involved in this conflict, no matter how much or how little we may decide to do in defense of our concept. Even if the war in Europe ends in the defeat of the democracies, our concept of life will be still intact. But the challenge to it will continue, and either our concept of life or the challenging concept of the totalitarian order will prevail in the end.

Dr. Ley has defined freedom as Germany intends to establish it. It consists of economic security, the ability to travel, and the respect of the community. These are worthy objectives. But they are not the American concept of freedom, not because of what Dr. Ley says, but because of what he omits. For in his doctrine of freedom the individual is not free to think, free to speak, free to read, free to formulate his own experience of truth, free to contribute responsibly to the community, to help shape its life and direct its affairs. His freedom gives man an economic minimum and a sense of satisfaction in his labor, which surely is good. But it disregards his individual spiritual life, and the cooperation of men's individual spiritual lives for the benefit of the community and of the state. To put it bluntly, man is economically free but politically and spiritually enslaved. And there is the conflict of concepts.

A great many persons in this country have tried to evade facing the choice. They have told themselves that they were not involved in the struggle in Europe. They have ascribed other issues to the war. They have said it was a war between imperialisms, and so in a sense it is. They have said it was a war brought on by a peace treaty after the last war which did injustice to Germany, and so in a sense it is. They have said it was a war being fought a long way off. But what no one can deny truthfully is that the outcome of the war, whatever its origins, will be to establish or destroy in Europe a concept of individual and political freedom. And if it is destroyed there, it already is partly destroyed in all the world. For unless all civilized countries are free, no one country, nor even a single continent, can progress in freedom. It will be on the defensive. It will go into a stage of striving to preserve a freedom which is on the wane, which has lost its appeal to modern men.

I think all of us are reluctant to admit to ourselves just how much we care about certain values in life. It is a deep process to square away to certain truths and to know that in necessity one would not flinch in defending them. Life is precious to us. Anyone who says light-heartedly that he would be ready to die for something can't be very sensitive or very honest with himself. We hope that when a test comes of our courage and our loyalty we shall not fail, but we don't go about advertising the aching conquest of ourselves. I believe that most enlightened men and women, young and old, when the emergency arises would make any sacrifice, even of life itself, to preserve a right to freedom. I believe this because it is the revelation of the ages. Many men have died to attain freedom, and to many men in the long past the necessity of freedom was the necessity of life itself.

There is a great deal of talk these days, particularly among young people, about what they are not willing to die for. I cannot criticize the younger generation for saying that they have no intention of dying for the contribution made to civilization by the older generation. As I look back upon that contribution I can well understand and respect their attitude. The generation to which I belong has done some splendid things. It has mechanized life, which is not to be sneered at. It has reduced space. The airplanes which are dropping bombs in Europe mustn't obscure our vision of the airplanes that are making the unification of China possible, that are bringing Latin America into close neighborhood with us, that have reduced the Atlantic ocean to one-fifth its breadth, that are making all men close to all men, as few men who lived in the same province a century ago were close to one another. Modern communications systems have pulled us still closer together; news, music, discussion draws every home into the vortex of art and current thought. Our newspapers and periodicals, our radios and television have annihilated the sense of separation. We all have access to the same things. We have untold opportunities of participation. The world has been given the physical integration which had to come before the development of the still more important spiritual integration.

This has been a contribution, made with initiative, resource, devotion, with an abounding energy and optimism rarely if ever duplicated by any generation. But I admit as I survey these achievements that young people who fall heir to them should not be expected to feel like dying for them. They are resplendent, but they do not evoke the deepest sense of need and gratitude. One would not die for a newspaper, not willingly, or for an automobile plant, or an airplane design, or for the stark beauty of that monument of a prosperous, mechanized America, the buildings that make up Rockefeller Center in New York. Nor have the other works of beauty of my generation been inspiring and enlisting. We have our literature, our painting, our contemporary music and verse, but we could, in necessity, dispense with them, as some men in times past could not dispense with their Scriptures and their psalms. The older generation has also spread before the new generation the riches of education, and done it lavishly, as in no other time in the long history of human society. Millions today have the equipment to understand the intricate complexities of this mechanized society. I do not say the education has been available to all, or has been always wise. The educational process is slow, but it is the only known process by which man does finally pull himself up by his bootstraps. Thus in appraising the older generation one must admit that it was not concerned wholly with mechanism. It had reverence for learning and beauty. It strove to make them accessible to all young people as their common right.

But the devotion and loyalty of young people to the world handed on to them has been weakened by two tremendous factors. One of these is the World War and its consequences. The other is our loss of our sense of personal validity. The second point I shall come back to later. The World War should have been the last great war and it wasn't. If the generation that fought it couldn't learn the lesson of that war, it was far too innocent and timid to deserve devotion and respect. The very first opportunity to organize peace that ever presented itself to a modern, almost integrated world came as the result of the World War. My generation botched the job. It not only botched it badly, but did it with sublime indifference, letting the strands of a golden opportunity slip through its hands without clutching at a single thread. But it was not an experienced world. Never had the organization of peace in a democratic civilization been faced, thought through, and understood. People had gone through a war, had detested it, had suffered death, desolation, poverty, and they believed that to resolve not to fight another war would be enough. They put war down as an evil in individual and national thought. They did not understand that war, whatever it may be in terms of evil, is simply the consequence of the breakdown of peace, and that peace is something that must be built, understood, practiced every day, wisely cultivated, constantly and consciously nourished.

It is the fashion today to decry the Treaty of Versailles and find in it the root of the present war. But that is superficial thinking. A treaty does not produce a war in a democratic world. There can be no great war in a democratic world in which peace is maintained with the same scrupulous opposition to lawlessness and the same devotion to justice as in the domestic life of a democratic nation. Peace is an international responsibility. Its maintenance is a function of a modern society. One cannot enjoy the fruits of freedom in a world made safe for democracy unless there is social organization to dispense justice and to curb lawlessness. The failure after the World War was not the Treaty of Versailles but the inadequacy of the organization of peace. That inadequacy was in the League of Nations, both in its constitution and in its membership. Before the League could work—and it was man's first experiment with an organized peace—old nations, with long memories of wars, had to be certain of their security. Lloyd George and Wilson undertook to guarantee France's security, as the precondition to the launching of the League. But Wilson's pledge was repudiated by the United States Senate, and this country was kept from membership in the League by a minority of the Senate. So the French entered the League determined to make it, not a new experiment in organized peace, but an instrument of security. Through the League the French nation of forty millions was to be kept as strong as the German nation of sixty-five millions. If the United States had joined the League, even with the reservations worked out in the Senate, France would have been secure, and the League might have grown from its imperfect beginnings into a workable system of peace. The origins of this war include the failure of the United States to understand that you can't have a democratic world unless you have organized a peace in which every free nation assumes its share of the responsibility.

I think the people of this country were ready to join the League. It is a myth that they weren't. If four men in the Senate had changed their votes, we should have entered, for those four men would have completed the two-thirds' majority needed. I don't think the people of this country realized in the election of 1920 that they were voting on the League. Harding promised them a society of nations, and the leading Republicans of the day—among them, Root, Hughes, Hoover—gave their indorsement to the Harding pledge. Only after the election was won was the public told that the League had been repudiated. And having been told so, it didn't stop to read the record and check the facts. Somehow membership in the League, and with it organized service for peace, eluded the people of this country.

The breakdown of peace didn't begin at once, not till 1931, when Japan invaded Manchuria. If we had been in the League, this hardly would have been dared. If Japan had not demonstrated that peace could be broken down in safety, Mussolini would not have dared the theft of Ethiopia, Hitler would not have dared the militarization of the Rhineland, the disarmament conferences would not have collapsed because of the growing sense of national insecurity. And the world would still be enjoying the blessings of peace. I say that the older generation fought the war and lost the peace. And the new generation must either fight the war now, as it is doing in Europe, or stand to fight it later. For there is no organization of peace today, no democratic world, no system of society where power is diffused so that no single man and no little oligarchy can drive men into conquest. Unless the Allies win, peace and freedom will be on the defensive in this nation for as long as the mind can foresee. There can be only two kinds of peace—the one imposed by concentrated power, the peace of tyranny, and the peace of a free society where power is vested in free individuals, and where justice and the observance of law are organized as a social function in which all bear their responsibility. Only if the younger generation has learned that, and will set out to find the peace that alone can be tolerable—peace in a free world—can it scorn the older generation for failing to find it.

I said above that there are two factors which make it hard for young people to treasure their immediate heritage. The loss of the peace is one of them. The other is the loss of the sense of personal validity. I suggest that more destructive than the mechanized equipment of the modern army have been certain branches of the modern so-called sciences of psychology and economics. They have produced a revolution in man's attitude to himself, and it has not been, like some revolutions, a constructive influence, though I think it will be in time. Fifty years ago it was fairly easy for a person to think things through and reach a conclusion that rang as clearly as a bell. Those were the days of intellectual security. And they are gone. In their place we have the overwhelming sense that nothing is what it seems to be. We distrust all outward evidences; we look in all corners for hidden motives; we know that nothing that man tells himself is quite so, nothing that he tells others is really dependable. We have found out that the human mind works in layers, that man's thought is molded by inscrutable influences of which he himself is unaware. The modern psychologist can demonstrate that one's subconscious life is the product of emotional influences, of patterns out of childhood or infancy, and that one's conscious thought is a counterfeit, which one tries to pass off on a suspicious world. The psychologist has destroyed man's faith in the other fellow's sincerity, and to some extent man's faith in his own sincerity.

The branch of economics in which the term economic determinism was developed has done for social thinking what psychology has done for individual thinking. We are told that society never acts as it does for the reasons it gives itself. History is just the result of economic motives which men have not recognized, and history is what it is, not because of these and those individual actions, but because vast impersonal forces have played upon men. Thus there can be no national policies; there are only sinister conspiracies working beneath the surface, against which the educated person can defend himself only by utter skepticism and indefatigable suspicion. Now I think that this conception has finished off everything handed on to the new generation by the old. Why should young men revere the values of such a world, acknowledge to their depths the dignity and beauty of individual life, and be grateful for that world, if need be to the point of sublime sacrifice?

But here again, the young have no right to scorn the confusion of the old unless they are keen and talented in rediscovering the validity of the individual. If they must question all outer semblances, have they learned to trust the processes of establishing truth, which can be demonstrated in the research laboratory and in the recesses of their own souls: trial and error, the humility to be wrong and the greatness to learn from being wrong, the faith in there being truth? Do they know that the truth lies within them or does not exist for them? That for each there is no truth save that of his own experience? And can they have faith in the process of their own lives by which they steadily become more free as they become more wise? And can they have faith in the process which makes society free, the democratic process, the process of social trial and error, in which all individuals share in the trials and errors and the accruing social insight?

To come back to Dr. Robert Ley and his definition of freedom in a totalitarian state. It will be recalled that this definition omitted the freedom to think and speak and to participate in the process of government. Only individuals who have lost faith in themselves and in their individual validity would accept such a disguised enslavement. If a man does not believe in the godhood that is in him, he is going to believe there is godhood in the dictator. If he is confused and suspicious, if he can't trust the processes of experience, if he can't rely on his own judgments, in humility but always in fervent faith, he is going to give himself up, abandon himself as a worthwhile possession, give himself by default to a national leader. Not having cared for responsibility, which is the other meaning of freedom, he will have thrown all the responsibility on the leader. And he will be secure, he will have no responsibility, but he will not be free. That is what it means to be a man or woman in a totalitarian state. It is a police state. You either believe what you are told to believe or you are purged.

In conclusion I would ask young people not to form a judgment of the times by looking too closely at what has been given them by the preceding generation. It is true that generation has not added much to freedom and has prepared people poorly to have faith in themselves. But we have a longer heritage. And the freedom that we possess and that young persons exercise with all the unconsciousness of good health came, not with the wind and rainfall, but out of human effort and anguish, out of great striving, great believing, and great sacrifice. Man was not always free. He did not always have the right to say, think, read what he pleased, or to have a responsible part in making and enforcing the laws to which he is subject. Men died for these things. And the soldiers of George Washington who went through the winter of Valley Forge liked the idea of dying, just as dying, no more than young men do today. They, and the men who founded this Republic, prized some things more than life itself. We are their heirs; they have no other heirs but ourselves. And if we can't be proud to be the heirs of our immediate parents, we can look farther back along the line of human endeavor and find cause to be grateful that we are free and that there were those willing to pay for that freedom. The ancestry is long, and men strove to be free, died to be free, long before Karl Marx depersonalized history with his partly true aphorisms about economic determinism, and long before Sigmund Freud made us aware of the complexities of thought processes. No label that can be glued over the freedom for which men have died can hide the reality of it. It is freedom. And it is individual freedom. They cared for it, and unless we care for it we are going to lose it.

Men Who Would Be President

IX. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

BY MAX LERNER

FROM the very beginning Franklin Roosevelt has been a crisis President, and there is little reason to suppose that he will cease to be President at a time when the crisis is deepest. This is bitter hemlock for reactionaries of every stripe to drink. But let us be clear at the outset: the chances are overwhelming that the next President of the United States will be that man now in the White House.

He will be there for four more years, not because he wants to, but because the people want him there. I don't need the Gallup or Fortune figures to prove it, although they do help confirm something we would know without them. The people want him there, not because the New Deal has been a success, or because we fear to swap horses while crossing a stream. For the first, there is the persistent fact of some eleven million unemployed and the extremes of wealth and poverty as accented as ever. And for the second, in a democracy the time when you are crossing a stream is exactly the time when you are forced to swap horses—if the horse you are riding is not much good. Only the Hitler Blitzkrieg availed to force Chamberlain out and Churchill in. And to steer close to a grim play on words, without the change of horses the large part of the British army which crossed the Channel back to safety in England would today be mingled with the soil of Flanders and France. The point is that, for the people's purposes today, Mr. Roosevelt is a good horse. And they know it.

That knowledge goes deeper than party politics, deeper than political and economic experience. It reaches down to the prerational stuff in us out of which symbols are fashioned. It is the surge of these impulses that has already as good as swept aside the third-term tradition. I do not mean to be mystical: the events which have made the President the only possible Democratic choice are clear enough. They are the war in Europe, the onward thrust of Nazi power, the new awareness of the revolution in war technology and of the nakedness of our defenses, the persistence of the world-wide forces out of which the Nazi revolution arose—all converging with the Presidential election. But this forms only the outer framework. Within it there have been our own inner tensions at work. With the crumbling of what had seemed the enduring bastions of the European order, our deepest political emotions have been released. I mean the blank fear of our failure to survive as a tolerably democratic society; and the urge toward group cohesion, which means in this era the urge toward national unity; and—so rare in a democracy—the desire to submit to a leadership great enough to match the great times; and, finally, the longing for a symbol at once of security and forward movement, of moderation and yet of aggressiveness.

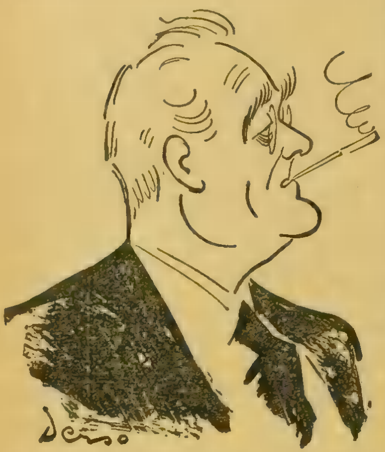
Mr. Roosevelt comes closer to being such a symbol than anyone within our experience. Yet if he falls short of it—and how should he not?—measure by how much less he falls short than the other candidates. This is the ninth and last of The Nation's series on "Men Who Would Be President." It is only a few months that the series has been running. Yet, in comparison with Roosevelt's, how far away and archaic some of those names already seem in these post-May-10 days. Who was Garner? Was McNutt once taken seriously as Presidential timber? What graveyard crew will undertake to exhume Vandenberg and Taft? Was that Tom Dewey and Bert Wheeler that the Nazi tanks rolled over as they swept on to Paris? What are "Jedge" Hull's chances in a world that demands in its leaders, if not youth, then at least color and forcefulness? The fact is that Hitler and Stalin and Churchill now dominate our imaginations so monstrously, and the harsh age in which they have become leaders has so stretched our political horizons, that men of ordinary candidate stature seem puny. Roosevelt alone among the candidates can claim our attention as a leader-symbol alongside the Europeans.

Who will oppose him? It still requires, despite Dorothy Thompson, two to make an election. The Republicans, confronted by the clear probability of Roosevelt's nomination, have striven desperately to find the other man. But Roosevelt has had so big a lead that their hearts have simply not been in the effort. Even as I write, only a week before the opening of the Big Show at Philadelphia, there is a funereal air about the preparations. The only real candidate the Republicans have is Willkie, and—despite his being a former Democrat and a big public-utility man, both circumstances violating the outward political decencies—I would stake a good deal that he will be the choice. Willkie has brought novelty and freshness into Republican politics; his outward limitations have been in themselves challenges; he has known the value of mingling candor about his hopes with skepticism about his chances—an irresistible combination whether in a lover or a candidate. If it is Willkie who is picked to oppose Roosevelt in the election, it will not be a wholly uneven battle. For Willkie has middle-class "independent" appeal. His strategy will be to go along with Roosevelt on the intervention issue, but play himself up as the younger and stronger man for the war crisis. The theme will be a dual one: that the problem now is to organize American industry for defense, and to do it without embracing economic collectivism—and who could be more ideal for both purposes, we shall be asked, than a shrewd and successful utility executive? If Willkie is nominated, only Roosevelt can beat him. And there can be little doubt that he would.

What sort of President would Roosevelt make? This is not a whimsical question, despite our having had two terms of him. For he would be President in a world half lost to Nazism, in which whether we go to war or not we shall have a war economy and a political organization of concentrated powers. How does the Roosevelt we know look in the light of the new world we can only dimly discern?

The Roosevelt we know is a mirror of our own best energies, our own possibly fatal confusions. Perhaps because of that fact no one has yet taken the dimensions of the man in an enduring study. It is not that our writers lack the art, but that in the face of so elusive a figure they lack the confidence to use it. The political portraits, whether done in bile or saccharine, are dismal things. Emil Ludwig's full-length study was pretentious as well as inaccurate. But John Chamberlain, although working as usual within too limited a medium, has done a canny job in his last book in showing Roosevelt as a master tight-rope walker. And Harold Laski's forthcoming book, "The American Presidency," while in form a study of the Presidential office, is in effect a commentary on the most fateful American President.

I say "fateful" as applying both to the time itself and to the man's apprehension of it. Roosevelt has always had a sense of history. The well-worn story of his remark to newspapermen during the bank holiday of 1933—"I shall be either America's greatest President or its last"—is typical of a perspective few Presidents have had. One thing Roosevelt has said clearly: he has no intention of being another Buchanan. Which implies that all the basic conditions that characterize a country on the eve of civil war are true of our period. But to avoid being a Buchanan in the face of impending civil war one must be something of a Lincoln. How much of Lincoln does Roosevelt have in him? More, I am convinced, than any President since Lincoln or before. I know that in externals they are poles apart. In the one an easy graciousness, in the other a clumsy grace; the one modern, alert, cosmopolitan, and the other a backwoodsman even for his own day; the one aristocrat, the other plebeian. Yet the resemblances are real. Each of them managed somehow to catch the accents and express the aspirations of the ordinary people of his day. But beyond that and more important, each was forced by the exterior tension of events to complete an interior crisis out of which his real greatness emerged. Lincoln was a brooding man of thought whom the Civil War compelled to action. Roosevelt is a man of action whom the crisis of the depression years and the international collapse have compelled to thought. The more memorable figure is undoubtedly Lincoln, the more effective President probably Roosevelt.



Franklin D. Roosevelt

Yet Roosevelt has not been effective on the crucial question of unemployment, which is America's dynamite dump. Nothing can be clearer than his failure to translate his own deepening perceptions and his generous sympathies into a working program. I need not spell out that fact here. What needs, however, to be said is that while Roosevelt will no doubt be linked in history with the pragmatic and piecemeal reforms of the New Deal, he is at once smaller and bigger than the New Deal. Smaller because the New Deal is not one man's creation but the product of mass aspirations. Bigger in the sense that his personal stature has survived the relative failure of the New Deal and the scattering of its battalions. It may not be rational but it is true that many would vote for Roosevelt who would reject most of his works. His Presidential tenure offers an uncanny perspective: here is a man who lost or had to compromise on most of his goals, yet he has emerged with prestige and popular appeal probably as great as ever.

But to the unemployed and the disinherited, to WPA workers, and to youngsters just out of school and without a job, it is scant consolation to have symbol without substance. They still cling to the Roosevelt banner, partly because Europe has become a word of fear and bewilderment, partly because a war economy might make jobs for them, mainly because they are still convinced that Roosevelt will somehow keep moving forward without revolution or dictatorship. In short, the Roosevelt following today more than ever is a following based on fear, faith, and expectation rather than works. Nor have these people ever really been taught either the elements of the Roosevelt achievement or the sources of the Roosevelt failure. They do not know the great forward stride made in the development of the administrative agency; few of them understand that the President managed somehow to resolve a great constitutional crisis; many are forgetting the solid achievements in the protection of the worker, the farmer, the investor against the more obvious harshnesses of capitalism on the decline. And as for the springs of failure, no one has pointed out to the people the role played by the opinion industries in bolstering every reactionary movement, by big-business sabotage, by the demoralizing anti-labor and anti-alien agitation, by the lack of audacity in genuine economic planning, by the failure to build enduring political support in a party realignment, by the crumbling of administrative morale.

When the people support a political leader through fear and faith, ignorant both of the sources of his past failure and of the conditions of his future success, that leader is in a dangerous position. He has as a politician encouraged expectations which as a policy-maker he will probably be unable to fulfil. I believe Roosevelt must know that. I think this insight, rather than the persistent rumors about physical exhaustion or some new ailment, goes far toward explaining the sense of tiredness the Administration conveys, and the very real and not feigned unwillingness of the President to stand for a third term. Being a political leader is at best one of the loneliest things in the world; but being one under the conditions Roosevelt has recently had to face must be desolating. Having to cajole a hostile and often stupid Congress and handle a bitter and sometimes venal press, having to mend political fences while building administrative structures, having to keep in sight the forest of national welfare despite the trees of special interests, having to see more clearly than most the logic and stakes of the international scene and finding oneself balked in translating that insight into foreign policy—all that does not make a President's lot a happy one.

I do not know whether Roosevelt himself is conscious that if his past role as President has been difficult, his future role as President would be even more so. Thus far he has relied mainly on two techniques. One has been the balancing of interests between various groups, always with an eye to getting out of the trading of gains and concessions as much as possible for the underprivileged. The second has been the alternation of periods of swift legislative and administrative advance with "breathing-spell" periods of consolidation. And usually there has been the understanding that even the best army is as weak as its officers, and therefore a concern for filling the key administrative posts with progressives. These standards seem now in process of abandonment. If gains have come out of the recent attempts to balance interests in Washington, they have not been for labor and the low-income groups. The last two years have been a long and continuous breathing-spell, with almost no advance toward economic planning or social legislation. And the key posts, especially in the new war-industry structures, are coming increasingly to be filled by men who can by no stretch be called New Dealers.

Burlingame, Cal.

I think I can guess what rationale might be offered for these moves. The important thing, we might be told, is the supreme national effort in the international emergency; party lines and class lines must be transcended, and along with others the Administration must give up its pet preoccupations and its social hobbies; the new powers the government is getting in the national-defense economy are inherently mistrusted by the corporate capitalists, and their consent must therefore be wooed; when we have met the immediate emergency and can come back to interior problems, we shall have an administrative plant that is a going concern and can then be turned to the uses of economic democracy. And the New Deal can then go on to its most daring phase—of attempting to run a peace machine with the same efficiency and the same sense of national welfare that a war machine is run with.

I do not know that anyone in the Administration actually thinks this. I do know that the next President, if he is a liberal, will have to face the issue raised above. Mr. Roosevelt has always been a master of the strategic retreat. Perhaps the present New Deal doldrums fall under that category. But surely he must know that the world America faces in the next decade bears few resemblances to the world of the twenties or even of the thirties. He must know that whether we go to war or not we are already at war in the realest sense, because under any contingency we shall have to embark on a national-defense program which will channel from a third to a half of our national income into war preparations, reduce living standards and real wages, transform our economy into at least a semi-planned war economy, play ducks and drakes with our civil liberties, and sweep Latin America into the ambit of something approaching a good-neighbor imperialism. We have all been forced to grow up in the last months and can afford to call things by their right names. If, as seems increasingly clear, American survival depends upon such swift and heroic measures, I had rather have Mr. Roosevelt in the White House than anyone else who would stand a chance of being elected. (I assume Roosevelt has given up his hope of getting the political boys to accept Jackson or Douglas.) But I pray that it be a Roosevelt like the one who from 1934 to 1936 put through the basic program of New Deal social legislation, a Roosevelt who understands with Churchill that wars are never won by retreats and evacuations, no matter how brilliant. That applies to war on the social and economic fronts as well as the military. For there is as surely a world revolution today in economics and politics and social morale as there is in war technology, and the Liddell Hart defensive theory won't work in these areas any more than it did on the battlefields of Europe.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Foul Trade Winds

DESPITE the fact that America's foreign trade, as a whole, has greatly expanded since the outbreak of the war, importers and exporters are hardly a class to be envied. Never has their business been so blown upon by the winds of circumstance. Overnight whole groups of countries cease to be practicable markets and long-standing and reliable sources of supply are wiped out.

In the past seven days Italy has entered the war and France, its armies broken, has capitulated. Exactly what these stupendous events will mean in terms of trade cannot be foreseen as yet, for much will depend on whether Britain is able somehow to carry on the fight alone. Immediately, of course, there will be cancelation of the huge orders placed here by France for war goods, but most of this material is likely to be taken over by the British or by our own government. And with the increasing tempo of our defense program there will be no occasion for the industries which have been supplying the French to slow down. France, however, is temporarily closed as an outlet for agricultural products and other peace wares, and there is no substitute market in sight. At the same time we have to cope with the closure of the Mediterranean to our ships, which involves the effective stoppage of business with all the countries bordering that sea.

Under peace conditions the Mediterranean countries accounted for about 5 per cent of our total export trade, but in the first quarter of the current year, with other suppliers hindered by the war, they were buying at twice their normal rate. About 60 per cent of their purchases consisted of raw cotton, petroleum products, and iron and steel scrap. Italy, in particular, largely increased its takings of these strategic raw materials, which it was able to bring through the blockade thanks to the futile appeasement tactics followed by the Daladier and Chamberlain governments in the vain hope of detaching Mussolini from Hitler. Other important American exports to the region as a whole included wheat, apples and pears, automotive products, and machinery.

In 1939 the Mediterranean area consumed only 3.5 per cent of all American agricultural exports, but when this shrinkage is added to that suffered in Scandinavia and the Low Countries, it constitutes a severe blow to the producers of farm staples. Nor have they the same prospects of compensation in other directions as have many manufacturers. The lost market for American automobiles is being partially replaced by Allied orders for trucks and tanks; the makers of cotton cloth who can no longer sell to Greece or Turkey have new possibilities in Latin America, owing to the fact that Italian competition there is removed for the duration; oil companies expect a much larger demand from the Allies, who are now cut off from their Near Eastern resources. But where is a new market to be found for wheat, corn, or tobacco? Only the California fruit farmers can hope for some improvement in conditions. Early in the war they were hit by a cessation of British buying dictated by the necessity of saving both freight space and dollars. But Britain continued to obtain quantities of citrus fruits from Italy and Palestine and dried fruit from Turkey and Greece, and if it can still afford to buy such goods it may again turn here.

Our imports from Mediterranean countries have been considerably smaller than our exports, but they include certain strategic raw materials which we may have difficulty in replacing from other sources. An important part of our manganese supplies—essential for steel production—has been derived from Russia and shipped via the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. Fortunately, we have something over a year's normal consumption in hand, and there is a deposit in Cuba, recently developed by the Freeport Sulphur Company, with an output of 100,000 tons annually. This, together with much larger deposits in Brazil, can provide half our annual needs, and we can still draw on supplies in South and West Africa. However, with Russia out of the market we shall have to pay a higher price for this essential mineral, and it is noteworthy that since Italy declared war ferro-manganese quotations have been raised 20 per cent. The situation with regard to mercury, which is indispensable for explosives and for anti-fouling paint for warships, is even more serious. Italy and Spain between them control a major part of the world's supplies, and even before the war spread, the price had soared sky high. As a result attempts are being made to reopen old, high-cost workings in California, and if these are successful, we may be able to supply our needs in part domestically. But it will be very expensive.

A third vital raw material from the Mediterranean war zone is chrome, also used widely as a steel alloy, of which we have hitherto imported substantial quantities from Turkey, Greece, and Yugoslavia. There are large alternative sources of supply in the Philippines and South Africa, but in this instance too a shift is likely to prove costly.

In this summary I have only picked out a few highlights to illustrate the changes in our overseas business wrought by Italy's plunge into war, but they are enough to explain why foreign traders get headaches. Unhappily there is no reason whatsoever to think that the war has now done its worst and that the situation will henceforth be stable. In view of the rate at which the German armies are advancing, we are bound to think immediately about the possibility of a Europe with which we could not trade at all except on Hitler's terms. Our merchants, who have had to adapt themselves to so many bewildering changes in the past few months, would then have to forget all their traditional ways of doing business and attempt to gear themselves into a barter economy. Moreover, if Hitler wins the war, we may well have to face a huge Nazi trade drive in Latin America. For political purposes it might be the German strategy to boycott the United States as far as possible, directing orders for foodstuffs and raw materials to our southern neighbors and offering them in return manufactured goods on terms with which we could not compete. As events are moving, it is in no way "alarmist" to visualize the possibility of developments along these lines and to consider ways and means to meet them. Our economic defenses are no less important than our military ones, and it is not too soon for business and government to get together and devise methods for strengthening them.

In the Wind

HENRY LUCE, chairman of Time, Inc., returned from Europe with a drastically altered view of things. For one thing, as Life has indicated, he is staunchly supporting F. D. R.'s foreign policy. Not yet made public is his change of heart concerning the 1940 campaign. He has informed staff members that he wants F. D. R. to run and will support him vigorously. (Russell Davenport abandoned the managing editorship of Fortune to boom Wendell Willkie.)

LAST WINTER the Infantry Journal, semi-official army magazine, prepared an article with an elaborate art spread on the modern German army. Before it was published, the picture lay-out was submitted to Hans Thomsen, counselor of the German embassy, for approval. Thomsen spotted three shots of Nazi parachutists in action and urged that they be eliminated as "not really very important—the emphasis should be elsewhere." The Journal took his word for it; its editors now think they missed the major scoop of World War II.

HEARINGS ON exceptions taken by the New York Times to a Labor Board decision affecting that newspaper's employees were held in Washington last week. Attorneys for the Times protested against an order directing reinstatement of an employee allegedly dismissed for his activity in the American Newspaper Guild. The employee, they argued, "now has a new and better job." He works for the Guild.

IN AN EDITORIAL on the conquest of Norway published on June 8, Collier's blamed not only fifth columnists but "class hatred," which had widened the split in Norwegian ranks. Taking this as a warning to the United States, it continued: "To neutralize class-hate peddlers we can carry on our efforts to raise American mass living standards." In the next editorial the following appeared: "The House is launching a five-member committee charged with looking into the alleged problem of migrant population. At the risk of seeming flint-hearted whatnots to people who have taken 'The Grapes of Wrath' to heart, we'll suggest that this committee not take its job too seriously."

SUPREME COURT JUSTICE DOUGLAS'S name remains close to the President's heart as the convention approaches. The rumor that Roosevelt favors him as his successor, reported in this column several weeks ago, has gained strength; and White House intimates believe that it is more than a trial balloon.

LABOR LEADERS, aroused by Thurman Arnold's prosecutions of union officials under the anti-trust laws, now call the Sherman Act the "Thurman Act."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

FOR the last time* I wish to write a few words about the new military policy of the United States—if one may dignify the mad rush to spend money for defense with the name of policy—words based upon a lifelong study of military affairs in America and in some parts of Europe. The present drive for arms, which The Nation now so whole-heartedly espouses, is based obviously on the theory that sooner or later we shall have to fight the dictators who have at this moment apparently won the war in France—I am sure that they cannot win in the long run. If that is the prospect before us, then what we are doing amounts to nothing at all. Hitler has achieved his victories by creating literally a nation in arms, in which every single phase of industrial and economic life is subordinated to the military machine. If the Allies are now losing this war, it is because they failed to do the same thing, failed to sacrifice democracy, freedom of the press, the right to criticize the government, personal liberty, to arming so that they could successfully fight the dictators in their own way. If we are to have any hope of success in the military field against these same dictators, Hitler and Mussolini, we too must go the whole hog. It will mean farewell to democracy. But that does not appall a great many Americans. They are so certain of the menace of victorious dictators abroad that they are willing to have this Republic go down fighting.

In order to compete with Hitler and Mussolini, if they survive five or ten years longer, which I for one do not expect, we shall want universal military service. Since Hitler makes his boys serve six months in a work camp and two years in the army, ours, in order that we may have better soldiers, should work nine months in a labor camp and spend two and a half years in the army. An officer of the General Staff in Washington who is giving special attention to anti-aircraft guns told me a year ago that America was not rich enough to buy the anti-aircraft guns needed to protect our 7,000 miles of coast from air raids, to say nothing of defending Alaska and Hawaii and the Panama Canal. That is of course nonsense. If we are going to plan to beat Hitler in the Hitler way, then the United States will certainly raise the money to protect itself. We should have one anti-aircraft gun for every ten feet of our 7,000-mile coast, and we should have thousands of them protecting our cities, as I saw them protecting factories and even apartment houses in the Ruhr last fall. We should have at least five times as much coast defense as now and make it fifty times as efficient. Our regular army should comprise at least 2,600,000 men, aside from the aviation forces, which already are to be brought up to 1,600,000 under the Roosevelt program. We ought, indeed, to go farther and make America really air-minded; no American boy physically capable of flying should be given the right to vote on coming of age unless he could prove on registering that he was a certified pilot or trained to enter the ground force, in addition to having served his two years with the colors. That should make Hitler sit up.

As for the navy, I still believe in the defense afforded us by the Atlantic Ocean, but as the masters of America no longer do, it is obviously ridiculous to talk of a two-ocean fleet. It should be a five-ocean fleet if we are to sleep comfortably at night and not in terror of Hitler. How otherwise could we ward off Hitler if he suddenly appeared off the Chilean coast with 2,000 bombers and a fleet composed of the German, French, British, Italian, Danish, and Norwegian warships, plus the Swedish probably? It would be manifestly impossible for our Pacific fleet, if it were then as now protecting Hawaii and Samoa from the Japanese, to get to Chile in time to prevent its subjugation in a Blitzkrieg. So we ought to have a great fleet in the South Atlantic and one in the South Pacific, one in the North Atlantic and one in the North Pacific, and a fifth based on Greenland and Iceland, for of course we should annex those islands promptly if we are going in for 100 per cent defense. Finally, we should train 2,000,000 women annually to protect us from parachutists, fifth-column workers, and labor malcontents; of these women many should naturally be trained for ambulance and hospital work.

I hope no one who is really militaristic now and determined to defeat Hitler will object to this program on the ground that the cost will be prohibitive. That argument will not weigh with Mr. Roosevelt, who has never allowed his policies to be affected by any financial consideration whatsoever. And don't pay any attention to anybody who may remind the President that at Buenos Aires he said that arming "builds no permanent structure and creates no consumer goods for the maintenance of a lasting prosperity," and that "nations guilty of these follies inevitably face the day either when their weapons of destruction must be used against their neighbors, or when an unsound economy like a house of cards will fall apart." Times were different then.

---

* Mr. Villard's last regular contribution to The Nation will appear next week.—EDITORS THE NATION.

Empire and Peace

THE BRITISH EMPIRE. ITS STRUCTURE, ITS HISTORY, ITS UNITY, ITS STRENGTH. By Stephen Leacock. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

GREAT BRITAIN. EMPIRE IN TRANSITION. By Abert Viton. The John Day Company. $3.

THE QUEST FOR PEACE SINCE THE WORLD WAR. By William E. Rappard. Harvard University Press. $4.

THERE is a definite need for books on the British Empire. The average reader has fewer misconceptions of National Socialist Germany, of the Soviet Union, or of Latin America than he has of the role and nature of the British Empire. These two recent additions to the literature on the subject will therefore be welcome. They are written from different points of view and by men widely different in age and origin; nevertheless, the conclusions at which they arrive are not so far apart.

Professor Stephen Leacock, best known to the broad public as a humorist, surveys the achievements of the British Empire with the love of a Canadian proud of the traditions within which he lives, and with the mellow wisdom of a man matured by study and thought and a rich sense of humor, rare in scholars. His book is packed with material, but it is presented in a form easily digested by the general reader. Mr. Viton's book is much more detailed and more critical. It is written by a young scholar who looks at the British Empire from the outside and sometimes with the eyes of the races under imperial control, but it is a solid achievement, based on reliable research and on years of first-hand observation in parts of the world under British influence or domination. The reader will learn much from both books, although he may disagree with certain passages in both: with Mr. Leacock because he sometimes understates the dark side of British rule, a side which every earthly rule must have; with Mr. Viton, not because his criticisms are unfounded, but because they sometimes overlook the specific conditions of time and environment. Mr. Viton's book is on the whole to be highly recommended to the student and to the general reader as the most recent and most comprehensive guide to the intricate problems of the British Empire.

Of special value are its excellent last chapters, in which the author discusses the present situation and the prospects of the empire with a deep insight into its nature and its changing character. Most of the critics of the British Empire of 1930 speak of it as if it were still the empire of 1890. Many people are so fascinated by the past that they do not recognize the deep changes going on at present and do not understand the new forces and tendencies which are changing the situation so completely that slogans valid in 1914 have not only lost their meaning in 1940 but are becoming positively dangerous to thought and action. Mr. Viton's book has additional value at the present time in that it will help the reader to arrive at a clear understanding of the world situation. It was the Pax Britannica which in the long century starting in 1815 made possible the development of demands for self-government and the growth of liberal ideas among the colored races of the earth. It was the Pax Britannica which furnished the shield behind which Norway and the Netherlands and Portugal could lead an independent and peaceful existence and the Americas feel safe and maintain the Monroe Doctrine at very little cost or risk.

For in a world as united as this planet has become since 1815 peace cannot exist without some leadership. The question is today whether this leadership is to be exercised, as Professor Leacock proposes, by America, Great Britain, and France, or by Germany in collaboration with Japan. There is no doubt that not only most of the smaller European peoples, but also the Indians, the Chinese, the Arabs, and the Turks, as well as the Africans, prefer for very understandable reasons leadership of the former type. The tragedy of the present situation is that after 1918 the British and the Americans were not willing to assume the responsibilities of world leadership. That is the reason why the "quest for peace" of which Professor Rappard has written has ended in failure.

Professor Rappard tells the same story as Professor Toynbee told in his "Surveys of International Affairs," or Professor Schuman in his "Europe on the Eve," but he tells it in a different way, preferring understatements; nevertheless, his indictment is as strong as theirs. His book is the work of a scholar and will be indispensable to the scholar who looks for a documented discussion of the last twenty years; the general reader will probably content himself with reading the last thirty pages of the volume—but these he should read. They sum up in a cool and judicious way the tragedy of the last twenty years, of the lack of leadership, courage, and insight on the part of the democracies. In 1919 freedom had made bold and unexpected conquests. The generation which had achieved 1919 was unable or unwilling to live up to its own ideals. How this happened is told in Chapter VI, A Retrospect and a Prospect, briefly and concisely.

HANS KOHN

Health and the State

HEALTH IS WEALTH. By Paul de Kruif. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

IN THIS collection of essays, most of which were published in the Country Gentleman, de Kruif's thesis is that health is not only "the fifth human right of citizens"—along with food, clothing, shelter, and fuel—but a vital concern of the state because it costs the nation more to let people stay sick than to keep them well. He believes this is strikingly evident to anyone who examines the statistics, and he feels, therefore, that it is a colossal tragedy that an issue should have arisen between groups of men with a common purpose. Although not himself a physician, he seems to understand the psychology of physicians, and does not once impugn their idealism, ability, or integrity. He feels that it is absurd to propose legislation which depends upon the coöperation of physicians for its success but antagonizes them by its spirit.

He believes, although he does not explicitly acknowledge this, that the real obstacle to carrying out any far-reaching program of public health is not the ignorance but the indifference or the uncritical enthusiasms of the public. He therefore appeals to the public in these essays, calling attention to the enormous unnecessary waste of human life and outlining practical ways of salvaging it through better application of the continuing accomplishments of medical science. Following the lead of Surgeon General Parran, the vote of the American Medical Association's House of Delegates approving an immediate health bill, and the proposals of the Michigan State Medical Society for a non-controversial national health program, he outlines a compromise plan to which probably few doctors would make serious objection.

De Kruif is wise enough to recognize that there are basic difficulties not referable to the stupidity and greed ascribed by some authors to the doctors. With an almost pathetic dignity he registers the bitter disappointment he himself experienced on two occasions. On December 13, 1939, after being chosen to confer with the President on a very carefully worded non-controversial health program, he was told that this was not the time to begin it. And his earlier articles in the Country Gentleman received such a negligible response that he asked himself, "What's wrong with the way those stories were written? Why didn't they click? Was the psychology wrong: talking of life and death in terms of dollars, and really meaning it? . . . Did anybody getting indignant about the money-waste of death really become more enthusiastic for life, more sentimental about it?"

There is an answer to these questions which would shed light on the whole problem, but it is an answer which one hesitates to give. It is related to a fundamental defect in all public-health proposals, including even the tempered, thoughtful program recorded by de Kruif. I refer to the fact that medical science has not yet fully assimilated psychology as a basic science. De Kruif himself is a bacteriologist, an ultra-empiricist, who naively and enthusiastically believes that the problems of physical health are something like those of automobile manufacturing, and can be settled by a proper application of physics, chemistry, administrative efficiency, and common sense. The psychological factors in disease and in the healing process, in the wish to be cured and in the wish to heal, do not enter into his calculations. If they did, he would realize that doctors have certain objections to the proposed changes which their lack of psychological education prevents them from verbalizing in any convincing way but which have great validity. Most doctors know that many persons have toward doctors an unconscious hostility which is dissolved in the moment of necessity for their aid but recurs as soon as health is reestablished. The conviction of the validity of science, which is basic for de Kruif, is by no means a guiding principle in the lives of most human beings. This is one thing which makes doctors skeptical of the assumption that it is only necessary to make medical service cheap, if not actually free, for all people to rush in and be scientifically treated for whatever ails them.

"Knocks into a cocked hat most of the histories of our time."
—GEORGE SELDES

The FAT YEARS and THE LEAN

A History of Post-War America

by Bruce Minton and John Stuart

The authors of Men Who Lead Labor have written a factual, hard-hitting story of the past twenty years in American life. It digs beneath the surface, bares the forces that have struggled and are struggling for mastery of our country. Thoughtful readers will find here the background of the questions that are now troubling America. $3.75

Modern Age Books 432 4th Ave., N. Y.

GOT THE HEADLINE JITTERS?

Explore a saner, better-ordered fascinating world in

THE FIRST to AWAKEN

A Novel of the Year 2040

by GRANVILLE HICKS with R. Bennett
author of I Like America

This is the absorbing story of George Swain who shut his eyes on our mad world to open them a hundred years from now on a world strangely like yet amazingly different from our own. "It is in the real tradition of William Morris's News from Nowhere. The same spaciousness and sunlight is in it and the same quiet sense of humanity."—MAX LERNER. 40 illus. $2.50

Modern Age Books 432 4th Ave., N. Y.

Philosophies of

STRUGGLE

Waldo Frank until his recent resignation a contributing editor of The New Republic, voices a warning against the seeds of fascism which lie close to the surface of the American scene, and an impassioned appeal that the will to freedom become an articulate force in the fight to preserve this country's democratic heritage.

●

Max Lerner author of Ideas Are Weapons, develops a challenging theory of the war and America's relation to it. Cutting through the arguments of isolationists and interventionists, he analyzes the impact of the present revolutionary changes in Europe on American democracy.

●

Reinhold Niebuhr traces the collapse of contemporary social utopianism as revealed in four letters which the day's post brought to him. Against it he sets the common sense view of common folk whose sound political instincts will guarantee the survival of just values.

●

Read these provocative articles in coming issues of

THE Nation

SEND THIS COUPON TODAY

THE NATION, 55 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK
6-22-40

Please enter my Nation subscription for the term checked below. I inclose payment of $................

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
Introductory Offer: ☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name..

Address..

....

Extra postage per year: Canada, 50c; Foreign $1.

On the other hand, it is also true that doctors frequently tend to identify themselves with God. Historically the medicine men were priests with supposed supernatural powers, and it is easy for some physicians to revert to a tacit acceptance of this role. To have the privilege of making benefactions taken from them and turned into a matter of public support hurts them as badly as does impugning their technical ability. All these ideas are far outside the content of the present book. They are connected rather with certain fundamental philosophical problems which most writers in this field consistently ignore.

The reviewer is not competent to examine critically the specific merits and defects of de Kruif's program. His honesty, his lack of bitterness, his sensible attitude toward the sensitiveness of the medical profession commend the book to readers interested in the problem. On the negative side de Kruif at times overrates certain new ideas; conservative physicians know of the disappointment which such strong indorsement is bound to produce. Also he dismisses health insurance a little too abruptly, ignoring the possibility that it has some preventive value. It is not quite accurate to assume, as he does, that opposition to organized medicine comes only from labor groups and social-service enthusiasts; many physicians themselves are dissatisfied with the economic complications bound up with its extension. Some who have studied the Wagner bill believe that de Kruif does not do it justice in his account of it here. Finally, the list of medical authorities and associates to whom he refers with rather extravagant praise is certainly not a very wide or very representative list.

In spite of these things, however, the book is valuable because it gives further ventilation to an important social and scientific problem which deserves the thoughtful attention of every American at a time when the welfare of our nation must be supported from within as well as from without.

KARL MENNINGER

Discovering Canada

CANADA: AMERICA'S PROBLEM. By John MacCormac. Viking Press. $2.75.

WINSTON CHURCHILL'S hint that the center of the British Empire might be shifted to the New World focuses attention on the issues covered in this provocative volume. Even at the present time, according to Mr. MacCormac, Canada makes isolation impossible for the United States. The Monroe Doctrine virtually commits the United States to resist any attack on Canada by a European power, a pledge which has been explicitly reaffirmed by President Roosevelt. Yet Canada, as part of a political system having its center adjacent to Europe, is already deeply involved in Europe's war. It is serving as the chief training ground for empire aviators and is providing a large proportion of the empire's war equipment. Should it become the political center as well, American isolationism could no longer exist. Since we dare not allow Canada to fall into the hands of a hostile power, we are committed, in effect, to the support of one of Europe's belligerents.

Mr. MacCormac rightly points out that Americans as a whole know surprisingly little about this northern neighbor who so seriously compromises their neutrality. The United States has never taken Canada seriously. Prior to the war there was less Canadian news in the average American newspaper than news about China, and such items as appeared were usually of a trivial nature. The war has changed this to a degree, but most Americans have still but the sketchiest of ideas about the background of Canada's present-day political and economic conditions. To such persons' needs the present volume is admirably suited. Although it examines the fundamental problems that the war has created in Canadian-American relations, it is not primarily either a war book or a study of international relations. Rather it is a brilliantly written Canadian handbook covering all aspects of Canadian life—with almost equal emphasis on the political and the economic. The chapters on the Dominion's economic resources and prospects are especially startling to an American, but they appear to be accurate and dependable. In Mr. MacCormac's judgment Canada could provide for a population of 60,000,000, though the extent of its prosperity would depend largely on the maintenance of relatively free world trade.

Canada's economic potentiality is of particular importance in view of the Nazi threat to Great Britain. While it is difficult to picture the mass emigration of millions of English workers and their families to Canada, a very considerable influx may occur. Such immigrants would bring with them highly developed industrial skills and a certain amount of capital. Some of the remaining capital needed could be obtained in Canada, but the greater part would presumably be provided by the United States. Thus while Canada's political link with the empire would be greatly strengthened, its economic ties with the United States would also be reinforced. How this paradox will ultimately be resolved Mr. MacCormac does not predict. Outright annexation by the United States is rejected on the ground that most Canadians are, above all, loyal to the Crown, though it is hinted that the United States may be forced to adopt an imperialist policy if Germany wins the war. Reading between the lines, it would seem that Mr. MacCormac foresees an ultimate Anglo-Saxon Union embracing the United States, its possessions, and the self-governing dominions now associated in the British Commonwealth of Nations. A further examination of this possibility, in all its implications, would have made this volume more provocative, but would not have added appreciably to the body of significant and useful information which it so ably presents.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Biography of a Mind

THE REAL BERNARD SHAW. By Maurice Colbourne. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.75.

THOSE who saw the second act of Shaw's "Geneva" before it closed in New York will remember the remarkable "Hitler" played by Maurice Colbourne. Once upon a time Mr. Colbourne also impersonated Shaw, which would be enough to prove his versatility, even if we did not have before us his entertaining and thoughtful book on the more amiable of the two originals.

When I say thoughtful I do not mean "heavy," for the

"A book of arresting facts marshalled with militant words."
—SATURDAY REVIEW

Paul DeKruif's
HEALTH IS WEALTH

The author of Microbe Hunters, The Fight for Life is the spokesman for a non-controversial national health program which is sponsored by a group of public-spirited doctors, and healthmen. It recognizes this astoundingly simple fact: that it costs the nation more to let people stay sick and bury them when they die than it would to keep them well. $2.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO., 383 Madison Ave., New York

THE GUILLOTINE AT WORK
Twenty Years of Terror in Russia
By G. P. Maximoff 628 pages. $3.50
" . . . valuable source material which no student of Soviet administrative methods should overlook."—W. H. Chamberlin.
"An invaluable book for which future historians will be grateful."—E. Lyons.
ALEXANDER BERKMAN'S FUND, PUBLISHERS
2422 No. Halsted Street Chicago, Illinois

You may order
BOOKS
from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation ■ 55 Fifth Avenue ● New York

QUISISANA CAMPS
On Lake Kezar in Center Lovell, Maine
Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.) in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.
QUAINT ● RESTFUL ● ROMANTIC ● CULTURED COMPANIONSHIP
Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass, Brook Trout. Non-sectarian. Ownership-Management.
RATES: From $35.00 a week per person, including meals. WRITE FOR BOOKLET
N. Y. Address, 42 West 35th Street. Telephone Wisconsin 7-0200

The promise of American life is threatened from abroad.

For a sound armament program see the special issue of

The New REPUBLIC
(dated July 1)

A National Policy for Defense

Contents

I. The Possibilities We Face
by Bruce Bliven

II. How Can We Help the Allies?
by Jonathan Mitchell

III. What Can We Defend?
by Fletcher Pratt

IV. The Defense of a Free Nation
by Fritz Sternberg

V. The Future of Pan Americanism
by Howard Trueblood

VI. The United States and the British Empire
by Hartley Grattan

VII. Foreign Trade After the War
by George Soule

VIII. Our Democracy in a Totalitarian World
by Max Lerner

Don't miss this issue!

13 WEEKS' TRIAL OFFER $1

THE NEW REPUBLIC, 40 East 49th St., New York, N. Y.

For the enclosed $1, send me The New Republic for the next thirteen weeks.

Name ....

Address ....

N-6-22

style and plan of the work must on the contrary be likened to the light seriousness characteristic of the subject himself Mr. Colbourne easily achieves that tone which comes from self-possession no less than from possession of one's facts, and which is to academic solemnity what a steel suspension bridge is to a cast-iron stove. "The Real Bernard Shaw" is consequently the first book to deal with Shaw as one trusts that posterity will deal with him—critically, sympathetically, and telescopically: I mean, as if he were already among the Immortals that inhabit the star Sirius, striding about between Voltaire and Swift, perhaps, but speaking a language of his own, clear and distinct despite the interval of (equally) light years.

Mr. Colbourne's chapter headings sufficiently reveal his method and his views. I choose at random: Critic, Dramatist, Is Bernard Shaw Conceited? Has Bernard Shaw Changed? A Religious Man, Economist, Program. This simplicity and directness permeates the discussion of all the great issues raised by Shaw, and infallibly results in the reader's being refreshed, reoriented, and instructed about the man who owns the most comprehensive brain on this planet and has worked it hardest and longest. Let us hope the reader of the book likewise remains permanently weaned from the desperate clichés invented fifty years ago by dramatic critics—the notion that Shaw is all talk though "Candida" shows what he could have done if he really had set his mind on writing plays; and the notion that Shaw is a trifler in ideas who has spent an extraordinarily active life standing on his head in order to advertise himself as better than Shakespeare.

The only drawback to Mr. Colbourne's pioneer attempt is that he overdoes the simplicity, and in trying to woo his readers, makes too many concessions about his subject. This may in fact account for his contradicting himself on important points. At the outset he tells us that Shaw has made the mistake of writing too much. He must be figuratively boiled down for convenience. Yet later on Shaw's four million words are salvaged and placed, quite rightly, in the great corpus of Western literature. Again at the outset Shaw is represented as an unpassionate man with a strong animus against all that is "romantic"—whatever that word may mean. Farther on the plays are admirably proved to embody an infallible sense of how men of opposite tempers actually feel. All the characters in Shaw's plays are in the right; which is of course the simplest definition of drama and the widest expression of perceptive feeling.

Moreover, although Mr. Colbourne has read an enormous amount of Shaw—he is often able to expound his author in a sort of echo of Shaw's own words—he has not read or remembered quite enough. Shaw's views on love, on evolution, on socialism, on art for art's sake are thereby slightly distorted in the retelling. I could wish also that Mr. Colbourne were not so militantly against "the nineties" or "the romantics" as to caricature them for Shaw's supposed benefit But these limitations do not hold a large enough place in the present work to mar it. It remains in spite of them a beautifully balanced biography of a mind. The only fear I have in praising it is that, following his actor-author, impersonator biographer precedent, Mr. Colbourne will next give us "The Real Adolf Hitler" or "The Real Happy Hypocrite."

JACQUES BARZUN

IN BRIEF

TREES OF HEAVEN. By Jesse Stuart. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

The author of "Man with a Bull-Tongue Plow" and "Head o' W-Hollow" tells a fragrant, earthy tale of farm folk in the Kentucky hills, where judges perch their feet on the courtroom desk and plaintiff and defendant (and their families) frequently fight it out after the verdict. "Trees of Heaven," however, runs a smooth, idyllic path with no bloodshed; even hard-handed old Anse Bushman finally learns to tolerate a shiftless squatter family, and his son marries their purty gal.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. With Sayings of Poor Richard, Hoaxes, Bagatelles, Essays, and Letters. Selected and Arranged by Carl Van Doren. Pocket Books. 25 cents.

The noted biographer of Franklin has arranged selections from his writings, including several items never before printed in a popular selection, so as to outline Franklin's whole career in his own words. The Autobiography is unabridged. The book is worth a great deal more than its price.

ETHAN ALLEN. By Stewart H. Holbrook. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This lively biography of the lusty hero of Ticonderoga has the advantage of being written by a Vermonter whose forbears were contemporaries of the Green Mountain boys. Mr. Holbrook has made a thorough study of the records, but the book is so "lively," the author's language so colloquially modern, the incidents so "realistic" that the total effect is of something acted by Spencer Tracy.

TIXIER'S TRAVELS ON THE OSAGE PRAIRIES. Edited by John Francis McDermott. Translated from the French by Albert J. Salvan. University of Oklahoma Press. $3.

Volume IV of the "American Exploration and Travel" series, this book is the first English translation of the journal of a young French physician who traveled up the Mississippi in 1840. His experiences included a summer passed with the Osage Indians while they were on their buffalo hunt. So interested in all he saw that he hardly mentions himself, he gives a closely observed description of the Indian country and customs, illustrated by some of his own drawings, and an account of life on the Creole plantations. The book was well worth republishing in English.

A QUAKER CHILDHOOD. 1871-1888. By Helen Thomas Flexner. Yale University Press. $3.

The Baltimore of 1871-88 is the background of Mrs. Simon Flexner's story of the large Quaker family of which she was a member; an older sister was M. Carey Thomas, the late president of Bryn Mawr. In essence the book recalls Gosse's classic "Father and Son," to which it is certainly not inferior in emotional interest, though the situations are somewhat different. The gentle reminiscences, simply and directly rather than nostalgically presented, are overshadowed by the compelling story of mother and daughter.

PERSIAN PAINTING. Miniatures of the Twelfth to the Sixteenth Centuries. With an Introduction by Basil Gray. Oxford University Press (Iris Books). $2.75.

The brief Introduction and Notes combine essential information with art criticism of a high order. The twelve color plates, cleverly chosen to highlight epochs and painters, are not only beautiful but greatly superior as reproductions to those in far more expensive publications in which some of the same subjects are to be seen.

FILMS

NONE of the major movie companies dared to touch the Pulitzer prize play "Our Town" by Thornton Wilder. Sol Lesser, an independent producer, had the courage to attempt a movie version and succeeds with it to a high degree. If the picture, in spite of its general excellence, is not what it aspires to be or could be, the reason seems to rest rather with the limited scope of the original and with the shift from a tragic to a happy ending. The impact of the story is thereby lost.

There is, of course, no objection to changes which become necessary in the course of the transformation of a stage production into a picture. On the contrary. The camera, with its freedom of space and action, quite naturally demands such changes. The mere photographing of a stage production never makes a good picture however fine the original may have been. But in this case the insertion of a happy ending has nothing to do with the fact that the film is a different medium but only with the circumstance that the movies are a different business. In the film Emily survives her second childbed; we hear the newly born son cry and see the doctor slap his backside. The whole third act of the original—the cemetery scene and Emily's return to life for a day—has been transformed into a fever fantasy. What Thornton Wilder dreamed and made real to a certain extent, the small-town girl now conceives. This shift in authorship is unconvincing and is probably one of the deeper reasons why in the film the cemetery scene strikes one as false. An otherwise excellent and very ingenious production fails here at an essential point.

Forgetting Jed Harris's scenery-less stage production, the director, Sam Wood, moves the camera about freely in the little New Hampshire town and captures its everyday moods with unerring precision. We see everything through the eyes of the town druggist, who functions as the commentator of the original play. Frank Craven plays the part on the screen as he did on the stage—superbly. The playing of Martha Scott, also of the stage production, is simple yet full of nuances, establishing her as a coming star but pointing at the same time to another weakness of the picture—a sweetening of the wedding scene which gives almost no emphasis to the original satirizing of the conventions and mediocrities of the small town. The many smaller parts are played by a competent cast. In addition, Mert Glennon's photography and Sam Wood's interesting and often successful experimentation with a new technique of story-telling make "Our Town" the outstanding movie of recent months; and the enterprise as a whole represents a courageous break with many taboos of the great industry.

"Brother Orchid" (Warner Brothers) is a routine gangster picture with the semi-new twist that the gangster is converted and becomes a brother in an order of monks devoted to growing flowers. This sounds more terrible than the film really is. Nevertheless, to see Edward G. Robinson, after his great performance as Dr. Ehrlich, in such a conventional role is a painful experience.

"Edison, the Man" (MGM) is a picture similar to "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet" in so far as the formula is concerned, but it has less force and is less dramatic because the obstacles Edison had to overcome seem mere trifles in comparison with the forces of reaction which Dr. Ehrlich encountered. The production is elaborate, and there is suspense in the re-creation of the long process of the invention of the electric bulb. Spencer Tracy as Thomas Edison is effective and heart-warming, though a deeper understanding of the great inventor seems to be missing in his interpretation as in the whole script. Edison cannot have been so mediocre as all that.

FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

THE Victor Black Label Classics ($1 for the twelve-inch record, $.75 for the ten-inch) are mostly old recordings previously withdrawn from the catalogue, but also include two recent recordings now issued for the first time. They are not, then, analogous to the book publishers' "reprints of standard works at lowered prices" which Victor refers to; for the new ones are not reprints and the old ones are not standard works. The value in a set of records is not only in the music but in the performance—which may mean only the name of the performer—and in the quality of the recording. Performances and recording make Stokowski's early set of Beethoven's Seventh and Toscanini's of Mozart's "Haffner" still valuable today—still standard items; and if Victor were now, after all these years, to issue them as Black Label Classics it would be doing what a publisher does when he issues a cheap reprint of "The Magic Mountain." Actually the Black Label reissues are sets that were withdrawn to make room for better ones—bigger-name performances, improved recording; and the less than standard price is for less than standard value. There are people with limited budgets who will not object to this, and who will only want to know whether the value is enough even for the lower price.

AS PART OF YOUR TRIP TO THE WORLD'S FAIR
SEE WASHINGTON D.C.

★A splendid opportunity to become acquainted with your government while on your World's Fair holiday. You will enjoy the Hay-Adams' luxurious environment, dignified service and superb cuisine. Write for complimentary booklet of Washington, D.C.

From $3.50 Single $5. Double
Completely Air Conditioned

HAY-ADAMS
HOUSE
SIXTEENTH STREET AT H

To consider the new recordings first: Bruno Walter's performance (G-9, $3.25) makes the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony highly effective, but his unsteadiness of pace—especially evident in the first measures—does the second movement no good. The set has the fidelity but also some of the reverberation of Walter's recordings with the Vienna Philharmonic, and not complete clarity. With its virtues and faults it is, however, certainly good value for the price. Goossens's set of Tschaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite (G-5, $3.25) is the one I would recommend of this work, for its simple performance and clear recording.

As for the reissues, Coates's performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" and the recording (G-2, $6.25) are atrocious. The recording of Tschaikovsky's Fifth (G-4, $6.25) has more clarity and fidelity to tone color, but no greater volume for fortissimo than for piano, so that climaxes sound as though one were looking at them through the wrong end of an opera glass; and Stock's monkey-business with tempo makes hash of the music. Abendroth's leaden-footed performance of Brahms's Fourth (G-7, $6.25), the finest of Brahms's symphonies, makes it a very dull work; and the deficiency in highs, in the recording, produces faulty balance and obscures some of the texture. One does better to pay $7.50 for the superb Columbia set made by Weingartner. The recording of Mozart's G minor (G-3, $3.25) is quite satisfactory, especially on a machine that can boost the treble a lot; but here again Stock indulges in the tasteless monkey-business with tempo; and the New York Post and the National Committee for Music Appreciation offer a much better set for an even lower price (the Black Label side of the third movement has a repetition and an objectionable cut that were not on the corresponding Red Seal side). The set of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony (G-8, $4.25) offers clear recording of a good performance by Panizza, but nothing comparable with the marvelous Koussevitzky version at $6.50.

Single records offer clear recording of Artur Rubinstein's excellent performances of Brahms's Capriccio Opus 76 No. 2 and Debussy's "Cathédrale engloutie" (36289, $1); slightly dim recording of Paderewski's performance of Chopin's Polonaise Opus 26 No. 2, which I consider ineffective (36288, $1); clear recording of Barbirolli's performance with chamber orchestra of Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" (36283/4, $2)—good except for a tasteless burst of speed in the middle of the slow movement, which leads me to suggest paying an additional dollar for the two Bruno Walter Victor records without album; dim recording—unless one can boost the treble—of Stock's adequate performance of Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture (36290, $1), in place of which I recommend Harty's Columbia record at $1.50; not too clear recording of Casals's good performance of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture (36291, $1; my sample had two B sides), in place of which I recommend Boult's Victor record at $1.50; and clear recording of several vocal performances of varying merit: Toti dal Monte's version of the Mad Scene from "Lucia," which is quite good (36285, $1); Matzenauer's of "Ah! mon fils!" from "Le Prophète," which suffers from a strong tremolo, and "Mon coeur" from "Samson," in which the voice is steady and opulent (36287, $1); and Jeritza's version of the Finale of "Tristan" (26567, $.75) and Ina Souez's of "Casta Diva" from "Norma" (36286, $1), in both of which the tremolo is excessive.

Among the better jazz performances of recent months have been the Muggsy Spanier "Black and Blue" and "Dinah" (Bluebird 10682) and the Basie Orchestra "Easy Does It" (Columbia 35448). And there is exciting piano-playing by Earl Hines in "Boogie Woogie on St. Louis Blues" (Bluebird 10674) and by Bob Zurke in "Tea for Two" (Victor 26561). Of the Decca Chicago Jazz Album only two records turned out well: "Bugle Call Rag" and "Sister Kate" (18044) and "Darktown Strutters' Ball" and "I've Found a New Baby" (18045), both made by George Wettling's Chicago Rhythm Kings. "Wettling," someone observed grimly, "was always what you would call a good loud drummer"; and it is the rest of the group—notably Jess Stacy, Charlie Teagarden, and Floyd O'Brien—who are important in these performances.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Friendly Redcap Service

Dear Sirs: The railroads of America have taken cover under the protective mantle of the fair minimum-wage law, and consternation and gloom have entered the hearts of more than 7,000 redcaps from Seattle to Maine.

Redcaps had their day in court when a suit was brought by the Wage-and-Hour Board against the Cincinnati Union Terminal. Just before this case came to trial, the Cincinnati Union Terminal officials decided that redcaps should be made to charge a flat rate of 10 cents an article—whether the article were a hundred-pound trunk or an umbrella. Each article was to be tagged with company seals in lieu of receipt checks, and all moneys collected in a redcap's eight-hour tour of duty were to be turned over to the company, which in turn would pay the bag-carriers the lowest wage permissible under the minimum-wage law—$2.40 a day.

At the trial the defense pointed out and satisfactorily proved that redcaps were now being paid salaries. This made the complainant's case fall flat. Big business had defeated, temporarily at least, the Wage-and-Hour Board.

Immediately after this ruling the Amalgamated Railroads of America followed the Cincinnati Terminal's example, and pamphlets littering every seat in passenger railroad cars informed the traveling public that a uniform charge of 10 cents per bag or parcel would soon be made. The reasons given for the change were that it would (1) improve and standardize redcap porter service; (2) place all redcaps upon a regular and uniform wage basis, (3) substitute a fixed-payment plan for the irregularity and inequality of tipping. These reasons were listed under the caption: "Your Friendly Redcap Service," but it is hard to conceive how a panting redcap, carrying a couple of eighty-pound bags two city blocks to the nearest taxicab, can cherish friendly feelings toward mankind when he knows that 20 cents is all that will be handed to him and that that will be for the company.

In small towns the minimum wage might serve the porter, but in the larger cities it entails untold hardships. In New York City's Harlem, for instance, where the burden of high rents presses more unbearably upon the tenant than in any other section of the United States, such a salary would not be as adequate as home relief. Moreover, out of this minimum wage a monthly average of $3 for retirement-tax and insurance premiums is taken, and from time to time uniforms must be replaced.

In the new set-up the companies are prepared to pay additional salaries to well-tried and seasoned "company-men"—that is, porters who eschew organization and indorse the status quo.

Willing and efficient service from redcaps is what the American traveling public is accustomed to receive. Since it is evident that under the new set-up this service must be impaired, the public should make every effort to obtain the repeal of this oppressive enactment.

New York, June 10 A REDCAP

Answering the Progressives

Dear Sirs: I feel compelled to answer several assertions made by the misnamed "progressives" in a letter which appeared in your correspondence columns on June 8.

In reference to the meeting of the State Committee of the American Labor Party which was held on April 13 in New York, it is well to bear in mind that Herman Hoffman, well-known New York attorney, acted as unofficial impartial supervisor by consent and agreement of both parties. Mr. Hoffman is the same person so lavishly praised by the so-called "progressives" after he supervised a meeting of the New York County Committee of the American Labor Party on February 29, at which meeting they won. This time they lost, and Mr. Hoffman has now been subjected to a typical Communist smear drive. Mr. Hoffman's report shows that on the roll-call vote for state chairman of the American Labor Party Mr. Antonini won by 406 votes to 303 for Watson. Similarly the claim that the "progressives" secured a majority vote in the primaries is obvious nonsense.

As to the court victories won by the "progressives," the truth of the matter is that in every action, four in all, started against the officers of the State Committee of the American Labor Party, the "progressives" lost their case.

Concerning the sum spent in the primary campaign, the Liberal and Labor Committee to Safeguard the Labor Party had nothing to hide. It fully reported the sums received from affiliated unions of the Labor Party which had supported the party in the past and were determined to prevent Communist control. Although the Progressive Committee, on the other hand, may have been technically within the law in filing a statement showing expenditures of approximately $4,000, this sum represents only a fraction of the amount actually spent for its campaign. It does not include, for example, the cost of publishing eight issues of an eight-page tabloid newspaper which was sent to an extensive mailing list throughout the state. Nor does it include the large campaign expenses of various local "progressive committees" which technically had no connection with the main "Progressive Committee." When all these items are taken into account, the amount spent by the "progressives" will be seen to approximate the $30,000 estimate attributed to us in The Nation's comment.

LESTER ROSNER,
Assistant State Secretary,
American Labor Party

New York, June 12

Are Aliens People?

Dear Sirs: As an alien who certainly does not want to overthrow the American government—I have been fighting for the American way of living in my own country for the last twenty years—I wish to express my sincere gratitude for The Nation's kind words in the interest of refugees. If there is a prejudice against aliens in this country, it is perhaps due to the scanty knowledge of the Latin sentence, "Humani nil a me," the alien-haters. They probably know the Latin sentence, "Humani nil a me alienum puto," and translate it as "No alien is a human being."

RUSTEM VAMBERY

New York, June 6

Is This Hypocrisy?

Dear Sirs: In your issue of May 25 you have permitted one of your readers to describe my article of May 11 as "sheer hypocrisy." Her thesis is that if one is a pacifist one must not venture to pass a favorable judgment upon the German war machine as such, nor contrast unfavorably with it the Allied bungling.

I am accused of professing pacifism and applauding successful militarism. I have never applauded militarism, but when a soldier does a good job, whether he be American or French or English or German, I believe in saying so, which is the reason why, for one example, I have so steadily praised General Pershing's leadership of our army in France. Naturally that praise does not mean that I believe we should have sent an army to France, or that I think any lasting good can come out of war and mass murder. But one who seeks to be an objective journalist must, in judging military events, write not as a protagonist of peaceful methods, or as a propagandist, but as an informed commentator. I am opposed to our prison system as it generally is in the United States, but that does not keep me from praising a Warden Lawes, or a penitentiary like that at Lewisburg, Pennsylvania.

Your correspondent's second point is that England is inefficient in military matters "because the nation has been weakened by peace talk such as Mr. Villard advocates and by a belief in the League of Nations." How absurd that is! The British government sabotaged and then abandoned the League. It has each year, even under Ramsay MacDonald, spent enormous sums for preparedness, as has our own government; it has never, any more than our own, outlawed war as an instrument of national policy, not even when it and we were signing the Kellogg-Briand Pact. It has kept the largest navy in the world in a high state of efficiency. It is, to every American's grief, thus far losing the war upon which it has embarked, not, however, because its soldiers and sailors have failed to show the historic British courage, but because its statesmen could neither preserve the peace nor provide competent military leadership and organization for the event of war, which it always kept before its people as a possible contingency.

I suppose your correspondent will also criticize me for praying for an Allied victory. Must one who hates the system of war therefore wish for victory for the worst kind of criminals? Is my prayer also "sheer hypocrisy"?

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

New York, June 7

More on Mr. MacLeish

Dear Sirs: Archibald MacLeish's article The Irresponsibles, in The Nation of May 18, seems to me to be merely another attempt, of a sort peculiar to our time, to lower the values of knowledge before the values of action.

In the first place, the statements that the man of letters once existed and exists no longer, having "been driven from our world and our time by the division of his kingdom"; that "neither the modern scholar nor the modern writer admits responsibility" for the defense of culture, now "destroyed in Germany, Russia, Spain, and elsewhere"; that "the invisible world, the intellectual world, the world of the relation of ideas, the world of judgments, of values, the world in which truth is good and lies are evil, this world has no existence for the honest artist or for the honest writer who takes the artist as his model"—all these statements are falsehoods.

On the contrary, one may assert:

First, the division of the "man of letters" into the artist and the scholar, if it took place at all, took place in the sixteenth century, long before our time.

Second, culture is not something that can be defended against destruction by means of direct action. It can only be defended by upholding in one's own work a given tradition or by adding something to it. The tradition of the Western European nations certainly has nothing whatever to do with the pseudo-culture of the "Nordic Aryan," as in Germany, or of the "proletariat" as in Russia, or of a Catholicism emptied of local folk differences and regional autonomies, as in Spain. All these pseudo-cultures are based, not upon human sympathy or comprehension, but upon action for the sake of action. Mr. MacLeish wants us to oppose them by the means of more action. It cannot be done.

Third, the statement that "the invisible world . . . the world in which truth is good and lies are evil . . . has no existence for the honest artist or for the honest writer who takes the artist as his model" is the greatest falsehood of all. How, if this world has no existence for the honest writer can that writer be honest about his own work? Mr. MacLeish has apparently never even seen the distinction between doing and being, between the writer as writer and the writer as man. Or if he does see it, as in the case of Francisco Goya, who surely passed a moral judgment on a war, then it is only to avoid it.

Does Mr. MacLeish recommend that we should all work ourselves up to a state of emotional frenzy in order the better to fight the frenzy loosed upon the world by Adolf Hitler? And if so, what then becomes of our culture—our culture which has given us, not only Voltaire as he says, but the virtue which Voltaire prized so highly, to see things clearly, to uphold the rights of freedom of speech, thought, judgment, and conscience? Are we, because other cultures have been regimented, to regiment ours?

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

Roland, Ark.

Dear Sirs: Mr. MacLeish reveals himself a true laudator temporis acti. There are no more Miltons, he complains, but only pedantic scholars on the one hand and superficial scribblers on the other; history, he believes, will indict the present generation for producing no men of letters to guide the destinies of nations.

He is absolutely right: Milton was the last of the great humanists. But the

Glenmere

A New Experience in Fine Vacationing

- Located at Chester, New York, in the Ramapos, 51 miles from New York City.
- Only 1¼ hours by newest motor highways direct to Glenmere.
- 1600 Acres of Vacationland, 7¼ miles of lake shoreline. Private forests, orchards, stables! 12 miles of bridlepaths.
- Private golf course; 6 tennis courts; all athletic facilities.
- Unexcelled accommodations. Superior cuisine. A la carte service.
- New ideas in entertainment and social life.

Write or phone for descriptive booklet and full information; low June rates. New York City Phone: REctor 2-5045

GLENMERE, Telephone Chester 200 Chester, New York

"Where the Fountain of Happiness Flows Unceasingly"

PUBLIC LIBRARY

ECHO LAKE LODGE
ADIRONDACKS
Warrensburg
N.Y.

A Gift to Newlyweds
JUNE Rates $21
HONEYMOONERS' PARADISE!
Send for Booklet N
N. Y. Office—VA 6-4888

TIMBERLAND
POTTERSVILLE, NEW YORK
ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
31 W. 42nd - PE 6-7663
Directors:
HARRY N. BOARDMAN
LOUIS A. ROTHBLATT
(Limited to 100)
Complete Sports and Social Activities
•
JUNE RATE: $24.50
"The rare charm of [illegible] intimate congenial group"

AN *ARTIST INVITES YOU
to . . . his 100-acre farm
. . . superlative cooking
. . . homey atmosphere
. . . books, fireplaces
. . . hobby house, sports
*GEORGE A. PODORSON, City Phone: PLaza 3-8926 or LOCUST GROVE FARM, Hopewell Junction, N. Y.

THRILL TO THE JOYS OF SPRING AT
plum point
the year 'round vacation resort
Magnificent estate on the Hudson River. Only 53 miles from New York. All outdoor sports. Saddle horses [illegible] grounds. Fine Library. Musical Recordings. Superlative Cuisine. Booklet Sent [illegible] Request.
Write P. O. Box 471, NEWBURGH, N. Y.
Phone Newburgh 4270

A Summer Retreat, the Vacation Complete
The LITTLE CLUB
ON SCHROON LAKE
In the Adirondacks
NEW YORK
GOLF ■ RIGHT ON LAKE ■ PRIVATE BEACH
Hotel with All Sports, Excellent Cuisine
SPECIAL JUNE RATES T. N. FLAUM

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
One hour from New York. A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. Swimming, boating, tennis and handball. Horses on grounds. Golf nearby. Library of current books. Symphonic recordings. All spell [illegible] perfect vacation.
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

LEAGUE FOR LABOR PALESTINE
SUMMER SEMINAR and CAMP
SPRING GLEN NEW YORK
JUNE 28 - SEPTEMBER 2
Lectures, Concerts, Social Programs. All Sports Facilities, in a gay Labor-Palestinian atmosphere not to be found elsewhere.
$18 per week $6 per week-end $4.50 4th of July
Phone or mail reservations to:
LEAGUE FOR LABOR PALESTINE
275 7th Ave., N. Y. C. WA 9-5288

MERRIEWOODE
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
A reservation of 300 acres of field and woodland, with a mile of frontage on beautiful Highland Lake. Due to high altitude and absence of offending weeds, campers find relief from hay fever at Merriewoode. All land and water sports including exceptionally fine fishing.
Rate: June 15 to July 1 — $18 & $20 Weekly
July & August — $20 — $22 & $25 Weekly
Booklet upon request. Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

Additional Resort Advertising
will be found on
The Inside Back Cover

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG
A Delightful Hideaway in the Mts.
You CAN have EVERYTHING!
— MENU —
Swimming: in our filtered luxurious pool
Boating: on "Lake Godsend" right on premises
Plus: all 18 other sports & pastimes
Vacation time here means [illegible] incomparable setting, abundant sports and adult diversions, fascinating friendships, inviting quarters (new 'Luxury Lodge' [illegible] ready) tempting vittels—EVERYTHING! Write or fone Fallsburg 53.
OPEN ALL YEAR WOODBOURNE, N. Y.

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★
In the Glorious Adirondacks
Between Thousand Island and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $25.00 weekly. New Bungalows, semi-private baths for couples—$27.50 per person.
Send for Booklet — New York Office
116 NASSAU ST., Room 802a, CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — [illegible] 4-1390
Auto service from and to New York every Saturday and Sunday

Invitation to Rest, Recreation, and Health
COME TO HILLTOP LODGE
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N .Y.
On Beautiful Sylvan Lake
Partake in Tennis, Handball, Ping Pong, Basketball, Golf (free), Baseball, Ride a Bike and [illegible] Horse, Swim, Row and Canoe.
Not to Forget: OUR SUPERLATIVE CUISINE
[illegible] miles from New York
R. R. Station: Pawling, N. Y. Tel.: Hopewell Jct., 176. Paul Wolfson and Sol. Rothauser, Directors. New York Office: 170 Broadway. CO 7-3958
RATES: $23.50 and up
WEEK-ENDS—$4.50 Per Day
SPECIAL — July 4th Rates
2 days, 10.00; 3 days, 14.50; 4 days, 18.50

Birdland
Open all year. Formerly Lewisohn's Estate. Central Valley, N. Y. 1 hour from N. Y. 225 acres in fascinating hiking country, 5 miles of paths. Tennis, Handball, Golf, Riding, Swimming, Bicycles, Roller Skating, Library. Congenial Atmosphere. Excellent Cuisine. Adults
Tel.: Highland Mills 7895. Mgt. FANNIE GOLDBERG.

ZINDOREST PARK
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7755
A resort of unusual beauty and charm, 150 acres of beautiful trees, lakes, and brooks. Only 40 miles from New York.
We just completed a New House luxuriously equipped with up-to-the-minute conveniences. Each room, accommodating two guests only, has private bath and shower.
ALL FACILITIES FOR SPORTS
OPEN ALL YEAR

UNCAS LODGE A Camp for Adults
■ Excellent Sports Facilities
■ Beautiful Private Lake
Dancing, Dramatics, Tennis, Horseback, Bicycles
Very Low June Rate Bungalows for 2, 3, or 4
July 4th Week-end: $16 for four full days
DIANA [illegible] ABE BERMAN, Uncasville, Conn.
Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.
Newly completed theatre, lounge, social hall, cocktail bar, sundecks. Log Cabin Clubhouse, each room with private bath. Private golf course, lake, 13 championship tennis courts, all on premises. Excellent food.
Attractive June rates include free use of golf course
LENA BARISH : SAM GARLEN
Directors
N. Y. C. Office: 11 West 42nd St.
Telephone BRyant 9-1738
Write or phone for booklet

UNITY HOUSE
Forest Park
PENNSYLVANIA
"SHOW PLACE of the Vacation World"
Camp Facilities - Hotel Comforts
Unexcelled Cuisine
Special Entertainment Features
All Land and Water Sports
■
RATES: Weekly, $28. June, $25.
De Luxe slightly higher.
(Lower to Union Members)
Write for information and Illustrated Booklet to UNITY HOUSE, FOREST PARK, PENNA.
New York Office: 3 West 16th Street
Telephone: WAtkins 9-6868
Owned and operated by I. L. G. W. U. on non-profit basis.
Alfred A. Taxin, Manager
Make Reservations NOW!

Pauls
A BETTER RESORT
●
"ACCENT ON TENNIS"
●
SPECIAL JUNE RATES
●
SWAN LAKE, N. Y.

SWIM, FISH, PLAY
CAMP ANNISQUAM
or rest in the salt air and sunshine of romantic Gloucester. Camp Annisquam—where young people keep young. Send for booklet.
A. RESNICK, Dir., Gloucester, Mass.
NEW YORK OFFICE: Tel.: COlumbus 5-7399

world moves on. Mr. MacLeish misses the point. For there can be no men of letters in a world in which literature, through no fault of its own, has lost its effectiveness, its monopoly of the minds of men. The pen is no longer mightier than the sword. Men are now swayed by the unpremeditated word, the immediate message, carried around the world in the twinkling of an eye by radio, telephone, and newspaper. That is not literature and never can be, for literature is a fine art.

As for scholarship, again Mr. MacLeish is right—but beside the point. Nine-tenths of the scholarship of the world has always been pedantic and always will be. Time winnows the wheat from the chaff. The great scholars of past ages stand out like giants; we forget the horde of little minds who clustered in their shadow. Knowledge expands; individuals shrink.

I am a teacher of the past; and I say that above all we need today to learn the lessons of the past—but that does not mean preserving or reviving the patterns of the past.

DEAN P. LOCKWOOD
Haverford College

Dear Sirs: I am neither a writer nor a scholar, but Mr. MacLeish's clarion call makes me want to tell you what I think. Mr. MacLeish refers to Milton and Voltaire as men of learning who accepted responsibility for the defense of our culture; at the present time we have Thomas Mann, Archibald MacLeish himself, Rockwell Kent, Paul Robeson, Harold C. Vrey, Franz Boas, Robert Sherwood, Bertrand Russell. But Max Lerner effectively showed that individual geniuses cannot, merely with ideas, rescue us unless we militantly and aggressively organize to translate their ideas into action. As Mr. Lerner points out, it "would be dangerous" for scholars and writers to turn the light of truth on the problem—dangerous to what Mr. Lerner calls "corporate capitalism," but more dangerous to the individual writer or scholar, because of the risk of being labeled "Communist," "fifth columnist," or "un-American."

What is the answer then? No one step or measure can possibly be sufficient—but here is my suggestion: a strong, democratically run labor movement—I mean a real one! Let no one forget that, whether his collar is white, or blue, or celluloid, or absent altogether, if a man has to hold out his hand for a pay-check, he is in the ranks of labor. Labor has been divided and weakened in its fight by specialization. Let us learn from this and unite our specialties in writing, painting, composing, researching, teaching for war on the "anti-civilizations," on the "anti-cultures," on the "againsts." And we had better begin right now!

M. A. HUBERMAN
New Haven, Conn.

CONTRIBUTORS

CHARLES MALCOLMSON is a Washington newspaperman formerly on the staff of the Philadelphia Record.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING is well known as a radio commentator on foreign affairs.

MAX LERNER, professor of political science at Williams College, is the author of "It Is Later Than You Think" and "Ideas Are Weapons."

HANS KOHN is professor of modern European history at Smith College.

KARL MENNINGER, a director of the famous Menninger Clinic in Topeka, Kansas, is the author of "The Human Mind" and "Man Against Himself."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

Handwriting scientifically analyzed. Detailed, sincere, helpful. $3. Questions answered. Send 15 pen-written lines. State age, sex. Dr. Alfred Reiss, Ph.D. Formerly Heidelberg. 1775 Broadway, N. Y. City.

LAND FOR SALE

Acreage, Building lots for sale. Swimming privileges. 30 miles from N. Y. C. Box 1243, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT

114 St., 508 W.—Arizona, $5 and up. Opposite Columbia; Luxurious studios, housekeeping; 24-hour elevator, switch-board service; special monthly rates.

FURNISHED STUDIO

Exceptionally large; Hudson breezes; artistiacly furnished, private bath; maid. Steinway; telephone, central location; complete privacy; quiet. SU 7-9880.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

Lady to share beautifully furnished four-room garden apartment or rent room. Pines, 318 Second Ave., near 19th St.

WANTED—TO RENT

Taos, N. M., residents want airy, furnished apartment. 2 rooms, kitchenette, private bath. July—August. Prefer near Columbia. Box 1261, c/o The Nation.

SUMMER RENTALS

Bungalows, studios, all conveniences, electrical refrigeration; tennis, swimming, 10 minutes walk to stores; 30 miles from N. Y. Primrose Farm, New City, N. Y.

Beautiful new six-room country home near Peekskill, furnished. Open fireplace, sleeping porch, all improvements, bathing, bus line to door. Call White, CI 6-1250.

Lake cottage near Albany. Modern five rooms. Bathing, boat. Very reasonable. Write 9501 165th Ave., Howard Beach, N. Y.

The Birches, Warrenburg, N. Y. To rent, 4-room bungalow with bath, 2 screened porches, furnished, housekeeping privileges. Electric lights, hot and cold water. Near Echo Lake and Indian Head Camp. $200 season. Maud Noble.

Farmhouse surrounded by woods and fields on beautiful New Hampshire lake. 4 bedrooms, running water. July 10-August 15. CH 2-5173.

Peekskill. Log cabin, 4 rooms, bath, 2 porches, swimming pool, furnished. Beautiful country. Reasonable. RE 4-4022.

TRAVEL

Girl (possibly also gentleman driver) wishes join car owner touring country or Mexico. Summer, share expenses. MO 2-6772.

Chauffeur-guide available tour West, especially Yellowstone Park. Box 1260, c/o The Nation.

SUB-LET

4 rooms, modern, well furnished, grand piano, airy, elevated, near park. Very reasonable. Lipshitz, 4 W. 93rd St.

Spacious studio room. Complete kitchen, bath. 2—4 persons. $50 monthly includes gas, electric and service. Near Central Park. July—August. Warner, RI 9-8981.

Summer, 3 rooms, cool, delightfuly furnished. Telephone, modern house, excellent location. Sacrifice. $60 month. Weiner, 181 East 93rd St.

Columbia, facing park, 5 rooms, cool comfortable, cross-ventilation, books. $150. 110 Morningside Drive, Apt. 41. MO 2-2729.

FORUM

"MUST WE HELP SELL THE WAR?"

(A Roll Call of American Culture)

An Anti-War Forum

To Be Held Under the Auspices of

The League of American Writers and The Theatre Arts Committee

Wednesday, June 26th, 1940—Admission: 40c

Led by Vito Marcantonio, Michael Quill, John Howard Lawson. Outstanding representatives of every branch of the cultural field will be on hand to answer the burning question of the day.

MANHATTAN CENTER

34th Street, west of 8th Avenue—8:30 P.M.

Tickets available at Theatre Arts Committee, 1233 Sixth Avenue; Worker's Bookshop, or Progressive Bookshop

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JUNE 29, 1940 NUMBER 26

The Shape of Things

NEITHER THE RAPID COLLAPSE OF THE French army nor the abject surrender of the Pétain government can be fully explained except in terms of widespread treachery. The brave and steadfast men of France have been sold out, their means of defense sabotaged "right" and "left." The aged Marshal Pétain himself seems to have reenacted the part of Hindenburg in Germany and perhaps was only partly conscious of his role. Just as he was used as a figurehead in the Cagoulard plot a few years ago, he has now been pushed forward as cover for such fascist tools as Pierre Laval, who, now that the armistice has been concluded, emerges as Vice-Premier and the real head of the government. The brave words of a few days ago about "peace with honor" are exposed as camouflage by the actual instrument to which this French government has put its hand. For there is nothing honorable about an agreement which splinters a solemn oath between Allies to conclude no separate peace and turns France into the passive accomplice of the dictators. It is true that hopes of prolonged resistance inside the country had been shattered, but the navy, the air force, and possibly large land forces might have been withdrawn to the African colonies and employed in a strong campaign against Italy—the weak end of the Axis. That would not have saved France from occupation, but even the armistice terms leave most of the country in the hands of the invader. The French people have been given no opportunity to make their views known, and, indeed, every effort has been made to keep them from learning the price they are to pay for peace, by suppressing the terms until forty-eight hours after the armistice with Italy was signed. Moreover, no attempt has been made to obtain the approval of the Chamber of Deputies for the Pétain Cabinet. Only at some unspecified date in the future is parliamentary indorsement to be sought. Thus the Cabinet's constitutionality is doubtful, and our own Administration must seriously consider whether it can continue to recognize a rump government which, at best, is the prisoner of the invaders.

CONGRESS HAS DONE WISELY TO RATIFY the refusal of this nation to recognize any change in sovereignty of European possessions in the Americas. But we do not think that this resolution fully meets the problem presented by these colonies if and when the dictators complete their conquest of Europe. It is most unlikely that Hitler or Mussolini would make any direct claim on territory in this hemisphere. On the contrary we can expect a smoke screen of assurances that they are completely in accord with the policy of "America for the Americas." We have little doubt that fascist peace terms will leave Britain, France, and Holland as nominally independent states with nominal control of part of their empires, including their American colonies. The catch will be that they will be forced to adopt totalitarian institutions and the rule of men who owe allegiance to Berlin. Such governments, exercising authority over Martinique or Trinidad in accordance with Hitler's desires, will provide the necessary cover for Nazi activities. In view of this prospect we suggest that our government should be prepared to assume guardianship of the colonies in this hemisphere of any European country which abandons a democratic form of government under duress. It would be unrealistic to leave them in hands subservient to the dictators just because their nominal sovereignty had not been affected.

*

THE ONLY CREDIBLE EXPLANATION OF THE Russian Gleichschaltung of the Baltic states is fear of the German military machine. The rapidity with which France has been beaten to its knees may have been provided for in Hitler's time-table, but it is sadly at variance with that of Stalin. However, both dictators are anxious to maintain the façade of friendship. Moscow minimizes the number of troops sent into the Baltic region and denies that they are concentrated near the German border. Berlin insists officially that it is unperturbed, and Ralph Barnes, who courageously cabled to the New York Herald Tribune news of German annoyance at the Russian moves, has been expelled. Meanwhile, there are indications of growing rivalry in the Balkans. The opportunist King Carol has landed heavily on the German side of the fence and is busy organizing a one-party, anti-Semitic, totalitarian regime, hoping that Hitler will be flattered by this imitation and will help him to guard Bessarabia from Russian invasion. Rumanian oil is now reported to be moving into Germany in much greater quantities and at greater speed. Turkey, unable to count on either military or economic aid from the Western powers, is returning to the Russian orbit and is fortifying its northern border against Bulgaria, fearing a German-inspired coup. This suggests that the Nazis are once again in the ascendant at Sofia. They have always been well intrenched in official circles there, but mass opinion is pan-Slav and looks to Moscow for guidance.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

INDO-CHINA SEEMS DOOMED TO BE THE next victim in the non-stop series of fascist aggressions. Although the government of this French territory has submitted to Japanese pressure to the extent of permitting Japanese inspectors to make sure that all trade with China is stopped, extensive Japanese troop movements are reported near its border. A new totalitarian political party has been established in Tokyo under the leadership of Prince Konoye, who is expected to head another administration shortly. Shares of companies interested in the economic development of the South Seas, as well as those concerned with eastern Asia, have risen sharply on the Tokyo Stock Exchange. This suggests a move against the Dutch East Indies following that on Indo-China. A few weeks ago it seemed unlikely that Japan would attempt a southern adventure until it had liquidated the China "incident," but the situation has drastically changed since that time. The collapse of France leaves the American fleet the only effective military bar—apart from the Chinese army—to Japan's long-planned expansion southward. And there are reports that the American fleet may soon be moved to the Atlantic. Such action would be an open invitation to Japan to consolidate its power in the eastern Pacific by seizure of all French, Dutch, and possibly British possessions in that area. The Philippines might be spared for the time being, but they would be completely at Japan's mercy.

*

IF THE APPOINTMENT OF COLONEL KNOX and Colonel Stimson appeared smart politics it was because the Republicans made it so. Instead of squealing in anguish and anger the G. O. P. chieftains would have done better to applaud the President's move as proving that, in an emergency, the country could not get along without Republican aid. However, this line was precluded by the wrangling over a foreign-affairs plank which was already in full blast in Philadelphia. The subcommittee headed by Mr. Landon, playing the usual political game regardless of the crisis, was trying to synthesize a policy which would be equally attractive to isolationists, believers in full aid to the Allies, and those in between. That is politics at its worst. On the other hand the President, by choosing for his Cabinet men strongly committed to every measure that would help to stop Hitler, short of an expeditionary force, was underlining his own stand on a plank bound to be unpopular with large numbers of voters. In their blind reaction to the news the Republicans almost swung around to indorsing "peace at any price," but the efforts of a few leaders who saw how events could outflank that line long before November resulted in a wishy-washy compromise. Now the subcommittee has agreed on a program of such aid to the "oppressed nations" as is not inconsistent with international law, keeping America out of war on other continents, and full preparedness. We are sure this is poor statesmanship and we suspect it is poor politics as well.

*

NOT SINCE THE NAZI-SOVIET PACT HAVE sharper political corners been turned than those negotiated last week in Philadelphia by John L. Lewis. Startling was the surprise ending of his bitter attack on President Roosevelt before the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The white man in the Lewis woodpile turned out to be Herbert Hoover, the man who had us practically out of the depression when F. D. R. came along and ruined everything. On the next day Lewis—who was a Republican until 1932—gave a repeat performance in expectation of fatted calf from the Republican Resolutions Committee. And the convention, to show its gratitude, will probably go on record as heartily in favor of labor. Everyone knows that the G. O. P. not only favors labor but favors more labor; it was a Democratic Administration that churlishly enacted a law that forty hours a week of labor was enough. What effect Lewis's indorsement of Hoover will have on the nomination was not known as we went to press, but it was thought to insure Hoover's non-nomination. One wag suggested that perhaps the Republican and Communist parties would now join in an Unpopular Front; E. L. Oliver, executive vice-president of Lewis's Non-Partisan Labor League, quit in disgust; and Lewis's outbreak was diagnosed as part pique (over Hillman's many favors from Roosevelt), part Gompersism, part annoyance with the New Deal's recent trend toward appeasement of business. John L. Lewis's affections are not to be trifled with.

*

THE PAN-AMERICAN CARTEL OUTLINED BY President Roosevelt last week represents the most daring international economic development ever undertaken by non-totalitarian states. In essence it is an example of cooperative economic planning. Each of the twenty-one American republics is to be invited to pool its surpluses in a gigantic export corporation which will seek to dispose of them either through the interchange of goods or through the creation of markets outside the Western Hemisphere. The corporation will presumably direct its chief efforts to increasing trade between the United States and Latin America, but if it is to serve its real purpose, its operations will be subordinated to the needs of hemisphere defense. Goods of strategic value should not be sold to countries threatening the security of the Americas. At the same time, the production of vital raw materials, supplies of which may be threatened by Nazi victory, should be encouraged. In this category tin, manganese, chrome, and rubber are of outstanding importance. The chief obstacle to the cartel plan lies in the peculiar position of Argentina. Its products have long been marketed chiefly in Europe, and they are largely competitive with those of our own farmers. To make matters worse, the United States has recently taken steps which are interpreted in Buenos Aires as discriminatory against Argentine trade. If the support of the strongest of the Latin American republics is to be obtained for any basic plan of hemisphere defense, we shall have to adopt a less exclusive policy.

*

THE POOREST LESSON IN AMERICANISM WE could give to aliens would be to pass the bill for the deportation of Harry Bridges. Attorney General Jackson's courageous letter to Senator Russell of Georgia declares that this would be the first time Congress "without changing the general law, simply suspended all laws which protect a named individual and directed the Attorney General to disregard them and forthwith to deport. . . ." Mr. Jackson points out that Bridges has been "accused, investigated, and tried at great length," and found not guilty. How can we teach aliens "respect for our processes and traditions," the Attorney General asks, "if the government itself will not abide by a decision in an individual case?" By passing this bill Congress may expel the alien Bridges, but it will be opening our doors to a far more dangerous alien practice. The only body we know of that suspends general laws at will to pronounce whatever verdict it chooses and to impose whatever penalty it pleases is not one with which the Congress of the United States would care to be compared. It is the "People's Court" of Nazi Germany.

*

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS IS SERIOUSLY endangered by the sweeping terms of the Smith bill, which has now passed both houses of Congress. It provides for a federal criminal-syndicalism law of the widest and loosest kind, a $10,000 fine and ten years in jail for causing military disaffection, and the fingerprinting and registration of all aliens. The first two sections of the bill, of course, apply to citizens as well as aliens; the second is so drawn as to make criminal any publication or utterance which a court may hold inciting to disobedience in the army or navy. The American Civil Liberties Union declares that the bill "opens the door to prosecutions of any literature critical of defense or opposed to war preparations." We join the Union in urging a Presidential veto.

*

TWO CHILDREN DIED AFTER EATING SALAD sandwiches spread with Miracle Whip dressing in 1934, according to testimony by their mother at the Federal Trade Commission hearing in New York City on charges against Hearst's Good Housekeeping. The dressing had been given the magazine's seal of approval. Counsel for the mother of the children testified that $4,000 had already been paid to the family by the Kraft-Phenix Cheese Corporation, makers of the dressing. These facts were not considered "news" by the press, although they are tragic and important. Only PM, New York's newest daily, accorded the story the treatment it deserved. The New York Times gave it four paragraphs on the retail-business page. No other papers, not even the "liberal" World-Telegram and Post, mentioned the hearing or the testimony.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS: 769

EDITORIALS:

"CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER" 772
BRING THEM OUT! 773
ESCAPE AND APPEASEMENT by Freda Kirchwey 773
IS BRITAIN DOOMED? by Albert Viton 774
THE POPE REGRETS A poem by Stuart Cloete 777
AN END TO ILLUSIONS by Reinhold Niebuhr 778
SLAVE MARKETS IN THE BRONX by Carl Offord 780
IN THE WIND 781
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 782

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

FRENCH MYSTICISM by Justin O'Brien 783
HOW THE LABOR ACT WORKS by Robert R. R. Brooks 783
OSCAR AMERINGER—IN PERSON by Oswald Garrison Villard 784
IN BRIEF 786
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 786

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

"Clear and Present Danger"

FIFTH columns cannot be exorcised by shrugging shoulders and mumbling "hysteria"; neither can they be defeated by indiscriminate name-calling, by loose legislation, or by suspicious hostility toward foreigners. They must be blocked specifically in the areas in which they operate. What are these areas? There are the illegal fields of sabotage, espionage, and conspiracy, the legal realm of propaganda activity, and finally that shadowy middle ground in which there is no overt act but propaganda which skirts dangerously along the edge of incitement and recruits strength through use of the hate motif and monumental deception.

Despite their notorious penchant for fatal division in a crisis, small "d" democrats are in agreement that no fifth-column threat in this country—certainly as long as we remain out of the war—is enough to warrant any interference with a man's right, or an organization's right, to urge upon Americans the beauties of fascism, communism, or cannibalism. Where this advocacy takes the form of incitement to violence, present laws call for prosecution. Here it is up to the courts to decide whether violence has been incited. The Nation has always warmly supported the classic Holmes doctrine that a "clear and present danger" must be demonstrated to warrant a prosecution on this count. But the Nazis, from Norway to Uruguay, have taught the world a good deal about clear and present dangers, and it is incumbent upon judges to take these facts of life into account.

Similarly, disorderly-conduct charges admit of a wide latitude in interpretation. Inflammatory statements which are "offensive, disorderly, threatening, abusive, or insulting" come properly within the scope of police regulations and have been repeatedly held to be a breach of the peace, regardless of whether or not they precipitated violence. A drunk who uses questionable language is liable to arrest even if he hasn't provoked anyone to punch him in the nose, and a street speaker who talks hopefully of Jewish blood—or Catholic blood—flowing in the streets is equally guilty of breaking the peace even though no drop has been spilled.

Various forms of group-libel legislation have been proposed from time to time, and if carefully circumscribed, a law designed to check mongers of race hatreds might prove a valuable weapon with which to confront our Gauleiters in the making. On the whole, the theory of group libel will not be warmly embraced by liberals since it extends the undesirable principle of criminal libel. Libel laws were conceived to provide compensation for the injured party rather than to exercise a punitive control over utterances, and a group-libel law would tend to give new life to the distortion of this principle. To be safe, a group-libel law would have to be so framed that it would allow true comment on a religious group—consider the case of the Buchmanites or perhaps even the Christian Front. It would have to allow, moreover, for the good faith of a defendant who had ground to believe that his statements were true, however false they may actually have been, and who made them without obvious animus against the group. These are narrow limits, but they are the broadest which are compatible with a free expression of legitimate opinion. Such a law would have obvious drawbacks, such as making a court of law an agency for determining the truth or falsity of charges difficult to determine under the rules of evidence. Nevertheless, we believe that the merits of a group-libel law offset its weaknesses. In establishing the truth of harmful allegations the burden of proof should under this law be placed upon the defendant. If the Coughlins and the Thorkelsons had to prove their Jewish-Communist-banker fantasies they might be less imaginative. Campaigns of race hatred are designed, as we now well know, to split the unity of a free people and pave the way for its downfall; democracy can risk this degree of flexibility as an alternative to impotence.

Aside from supporting the checks on these more obviously criminal forms of propaganda, we believe that the time has come for federal and state governments to protect the American public from anonymous propaganda. Magazines and newspapers are obliged to print periodic statements of ownership, in which names are listed and financial responsibility is fixed. The same requirements should be demanded of those who distribute handbills on the street corner and circulars through the mails. There is no legitimate reason for anonymity or deception in distributing propaganda in a democracy.

America's fifth column presents no new problem to the country with regard to espionage, sabotage, or conspiracy against the government. The laws to cover such activities are more than adequate. Vigilance, not legislation, is the watchword in this field, and little as we relish some of the recent activities of the FBI we can take no exception to its protection of armament plants.

If it is true that we need vigilance more than legislation to curb the fifth column, it is of vital importance that such vigilance be the function of the proper people. A continuing Congressional committee to keep watch and, equally important, to provide merciless publicity is theoretically an excellent provision for the safety of the republic; in practice it is as good or as bad as the men who make up its personnel. The Dies committee has been a menace to democracy; a joint Congressional committee composed of men whose devotion to the best in the American tradition is above question—men like La Follette and Norris—would be the country's strongest protection against a genuine fifth column.

LIBRARY

Bring Them Out!

THE NATION appeals to the President of the United States and to the American people in behalf of the anti-Nazi and anti-Fascist refugees in France. What we do for these brave men and women will be a test of our own democracy's power to act and will to win. These were the first to fight fascism and the first to fall victim to it. These were the earliest barricades of flesh and blood and heroic gesture against the tide we are now spending billions to hold back. These are the men who gave up fortune and family and career, the men who risked their lives in Italy, in Germany, in Austria, in Czechoslovakia, and in Spain, in that struggle for the preservation of liberty and of humanity to which our own country is finally being aroused. The future will pay tribute to their heroism; the present cannot ignore their plight without revealing its own spiritual bankruptcy.

Those who look back on the great struggle now raging will see its beginnings not on May 10, 1940, or September 3, 1939, but in the Promethean figures of the Matteottis and the Ossietzkys, in the brave workers of the Karl Marx Hof in Vienna and the dinamiteros of the Asturias, in the offensive of the International Brigade on the Ebro and the stubborn resistance of the people of Madrid. Many of their comrades, their survivors—professors who had the courage to say Nein instead of Heil, writers whose names will yet grace a greater Germany, intellectuals who answered Fascist taunts by proving their worth as soldiers—were trapped in concentration camps near Paris. Today we have no way of knowing whether the many camps in southern France have been opened or whether their keys will be turned over to the German and Italian invaders, as the armistice terms seem to demand. In either case hundreds of thousands face capture and death. Most desperate of all is the plight of the marked men, the leaders, the Negrins, the Heinrich Manns, the Sforzas.

The President is aware of their danger but needs strong popular support for quick action. Mexico has offered to take 200,000 of these refugees. We cannot honorably afford to do less. At the very least we can offer them transit visas and a temporary haven. Portuguese-chartered ships could be used to bring them to the New World. Without some such concrete proposal it may be impossible to prevail upon the French government to facilitate the escape of those in greatest danger. The reactionary and pro-fascist elements composing the Pétain Cabinet represent factions which have always been hostile to these refugees. But the Cabinet may well be glad to be relieved of responsibility for their maintenance and anxious not to evoke universal disgust by giving them up to the Gestapo. If we are not to be accessories to such a crime, there must be immediate action.

Escape and Appeasement

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

WHEN I read an article like Mr. Villard's Valedictory in this week's Nation I feel as if I had been transported into a dream world. It is a world created and inhabited by a considerable assemblage of good people—isolationists and pacifists, many of whom are also reformers or radicals. It is a world in which recognizable things happen: Hitler's legions conquer France by means of unspeakable methods of slaughter and terrorism; Jews and liberals and leftists are hounded into exile or death; rooted ways of living and feeling are torn up and discarded by a despotism that acknowledges no boundary lines. These things are set down in the record and duly deplored. But they happen at a great distance; they are our concern only if we choose to make them so.

The people who inhabit that dream world naturally choose not to be concerned. They note the all-too-obvious imperfections in the democracies which are in process of being crushed and point out, comfortably, a host of reasons why their extermination was inevitable. They also note the imperfections in our own country and urge, reasonably enough, the need for eradicating them. But they do not consider the question whether even the most nearly perfected state is secured by its virtue against the possibility of annihilation. And they stubbornly refuse to look at the hard facts which Hitler's triumph in Europe has thrown into their faces.

It frightens me to read such articles. They represent, to my mind, a danger more present than fascism. They represent a retreat from the grimmest reality that has confronted our nation in many generations, a reality so plain that one would hesitate to state it were it not for the fact that so many good people refuse to admit it. The reality is that a system of highly organized tyranny has now established its control over the continent of Europe and is attempting to impose itself on the world. France has been subjugated to the point of becoming Germany's "non-belligerent ally." The lesser states are tumbling over themselves to accommodate their political and economic life to that of the Reich. Russia is attempting to barricade its western frontier by occupying the Baltic states and, if possible, building up its strength in the Balkans; but its maneuvers look miserably ineffective. It is a captive of Hitler, and it has its own fatuous policy of appeasement to thank for its present servitude. Japan is rapidly reconstructing its government on fascist lines apparently in anticipation of receiving favors from the victor.

Britain remains—supported by the empire and what goods the United States is willing and able to send. Whether Britain can survive is uncertain. The empire alone, as Mr. Viton shows in an article this week, cannot deliver sufficient material to be of much use within the next crucial weeks. Nor can the United States adequately supply Britain's immediate needs. What is necessary, if Britain is to continue the struggle against present overwhelming odds, is an assurance that the United States will send planes and guns—and later food as well—in increasing amounts as production rises in response to war-time demands. A beleaguered country can resist only if it has hope of ultimate rescue.

This is the present reality. The future is little brighter. If Britain is defeated, its fleet may be sunk or surrendered to Hitler. Should Hitler take over the French and British fleets, his sea power, together with Japan's, would be three times that of the United States. Our shipbuilding program, now barely under way, will be of no considerable value for three or four years. The Atlantic Ocean, buttressed by our present naval strength, should be sufficient for the present to discourage any direct attack from Europe. But direct attack is the least of our dangers. Hitler is already speeding up his agents in Latin America. Their activities in Uruguay have been exposed in the press and have occasioned the visit of United States cruisers to Montevideo. German officers and Gestapo agents are cooperating with native sympathizers and resident Nazis in every country below the border. What they hope to bring about in each case is the establishment of a government which Hitler can dominate. This the United States cannot and will not allow without a struggle—and the hour of struggle has already arrived.

This is the reality—or a fraction of the reality—that faces us now and in the immediate future. This is the reality from which our good pacifists have fled into a dream of isolation. It would be unkind to ask them just how, if they had to, they would confront these facts. They could only answer as they have answered in the past—as Mr. Villard answered in last week's Nation—"I still believe in the defense afforded by the Atlantic Ocean." Or they could propose the only real alternative to a vigorous resistance to the inroads of fascism—a policy of appeasement. That proposal is being heard today in strange and disturbing quarters. It presupposes the defeat of Britain, the loss of the fleet, the total European triumph of the fascist system. And it accepts the necessity of American surrender. For appeasement means surrender for the United States as surely as it did for Britain and France. It means in concrete terms that we shall recognize Hitler's conquests, deal with his puppet governments, and adapt our economic system to the controlled, coordinated state capitalism of Nazi Germany. It means that the American standard of living will be leveled to meet the competitive methods of a system built on forced labor. It means the end of democracy. This, and not a vague devotion to peace and social justice, is the true alternative to a policy of stout-hearted resistance. As to which course should be chosen, The Nation has no doubt.

Is Britain Doomed?

BY ALBERT VITON

THE next three or four months—possibly as many weeks—will decide the fate of the world. If Nazi airplanes succeed in doing to Britain what they have been able to do to Belgium, Holland, and parts of France and if Hitler manages to land a sizable expeditionary force, the fight will be over and Hitler will stand master of the world. Theoretically, there would still be the British Empire to carry on the struggle; probably the empire would not lack the courage to do so, especially if the Crown and the British government took refuge in one of the dominions. Actually, however, the empire without Britain would be completely ineffective. It is not only that hitherto Britain has coordinated the various parts and given them a certain amount of unity; more significant is the fact that Britain is the sole surviving possible point of attack against the Nazis. If England succumbs, Germany will be invulnerable to any force operating from outside the Continent.

Fortunately, Britain may prove a tougher nut to crack than any Hitler has handled thus far. Britain's doom is by no means inevitable. The chances at the present moment are certainly uneven, but they are not overwhelming; and the British have more than once turned the scales with uneven chances. Hitler has three, or perhaps four, ways of attacking the British Isles. First, he can try to starve them out by means of a blockade, operating chiefly from the newly acquired French Channel ports. Second, he can attempt to land parachute troops. Third, he may attempt another landing of strongly equipped troops as in Norway. Fourth, he may use a secret submarine flotilla to transport large masses of troops to some sparsely inhabited part of the country. That German dockyards have been busy building some new kind of subsurface craft is almost certain. The decline in submarine activity during recent months has been interpreted as a sign that the dockyards have been busy with something else. So far, however, all this is a matter of speculation.

Britain's food problem is no doubt very serious, and it has been aggravated by the occupation of Denmark and Norway. England obtained half its bacon from Denmark, over a third of its eggs, a quarter of its butter; from Norway half of all imports of ferro-manganese, 80 per cent of molybdenum and similar metals that go into the making of aircraft, and acetylene products necessary for shipbuilding, while about 40 per cent of the special-grade iron ore for which British industry is equipped came via Narvik. The occupation of the Netherlands has aggravated the supply problem further. Unfortunately, it is true also that government plans for increasing home food production have been too optimistic and have to a large extent miscarried. Instead of two million acres being put to the plow by the spring of this year as was planned, it is doubtful whether more than half that figure was actually cultivated. The crops planted do not seem to have been selected very wisely; there has been a serious labor shortage on the farms; a deficiency in tractors has caused much delay and will undoubtedly cause more in the future. One finds it difficult to believe that at the outbreak of the war Britain had no more than 53,000 tractors at work, a quarter of which had been bought more than seven years ago, while at least 10 per cent were of pre-1925 vintage. Instead of a minimum of 30,000 to 50,000 new machines in the field this year, it is doubtful whether there will be even half of the smaller figure.

However, the record is not entirely black. The resourcefulness and independence of British farmers have done much to overcome the effects of government muddle-headedness. Drastic rationing has worked fairly smoothly; considerable stocks of all sorts of foods have been accumulated, mainly through the foresight of Winston Churchill while he was at the Admiralty. According to private information from London, the lull in sea warfare has been put to good use, and there is probably sufficient food on hand to tide the country over during the coming critical months. The autumn crop, larger than any since 1918 though not as large as it could have been, will come in at a very opportune time.

It is not merely wishful thinking that enables London to minimize the danger of a mass invasion by sea. The British navy is still intact, and it is probably stronger now as compared with the German than at any time since the outbreak of war. Germany has only two large battleships; its losses in Norway were heavy and have not been replaced. Small rapid craft, such as Germany has been building recently, are excellent for torpedoing and raiding shipping, but they cannot transport heavy artillery and tanks. And mechanized troops cannot be landed either quietly or quickly: but for treachery the Nazis would have had vastly greater difficulties even in undefended Norway. I have seen British transports trying to land at fairly well-equipped docks somewhat less than 10,000 troops, accompanied with only medium-sized artillery, yet the job took almost two days. British experiences at Trondheim and Narvik, as well as in the Netherlands, where they had to leave all their equipment, shows what an immense job it is to disembark a modern army. Troops landed on beaches cannot be very effective.

The greatest danger confronting Britain is from the air, and here the enemy has still a considerable advantage. Not much is known about the size of the metropolitan air force or about Britain's production capacity. Figures of production have hitherto been way off the mark. Official spokesmen, in Parliament and outside, always talk in percentages, which is usually completely misleading. The statement, for example, that production of machine-guns has increased by 400 per cent as compared with production last September turns out to be unimpressive when the base index is shown to have been terribly low.

Judging on the basis of a mass of disjointed and often conflicting private information, the trouble seems to be not only that the Royal Air Force is still inferior in numbers to the German air force, but, what is far more important, that Britain's productive capacity is less than half and possibly as low as a third of that of Germany alone. This is where the real danger lies. Moreover, being uncertain about replacements, the British authorities have tried to hold on to every plane they have. The R. A. F. would be a far more effective weapon both for offense and defense if London knew where planes would be coming from after a month or two. Hence the small number of planes sent to bomb Germany; hence the economy exercised when sending up fighters to engage invading bombers; hence the failure to strengthen posts in outlying parts of the empire. Indications are that even the sea patrol has been weakened during the past few weeks.

Failure to construct a great aviation industry is one of the gigantic failures that have marked the Allied efforts. It was obvious long before the outbreak of war that in this field especially the empire could render immense and decisive service. Far removed from the scene of conflict, the empire could have trained airmen in peace, assembled the necessary raw materials for plane construction, and developed the technical labor force. Unfortunately, the British government has shown extraordinarily little enthusiasm for using the human and material resources of the empire. Britain could have had those resources for the asking; newspapers and official spokesmen in all dominions have repeatedly demanded to be assigned greater tasks; public opinion everywhere has been visibly restless under the imposed lethargy. "Get on with the war" campaigns have swept across Canada as well as the Antipodes. But London retained its glorious detachment; and there is too much truth in the assurance of the Canadian government, when replying to critics in Parliament, that it was doing all Britain had asked.

Britain tried to carry on a war of limited liability, with at least one eye on the aftermath. Having experienced the disastrous effects of the last war on trade and on the imperial connection generally, Britain hoped that a passive policy would prove less costly at the end of this war. Munitions and aircraft orders have been withheld in order to avoid dominion industrialization; to conserve its investments, England did not place the large orders for goods expected in the first few weeks of the war. Canada, to cite one example, had foreseen the establishment of a large shipbuilding industry. None has materialized. Incredible confusion has retarded dominion arms productions, especially in Australia. Even the empire air-training scheme has not been carried through at the required tempo. I believe that not a single airplane from any self-governing dominion has yet taken up service in the British Isles; instead of 25,000 pilots, it is doubtful whether the empire will deliver as many hundreds during the present war.

Greater even has been the lethargy shown toward India and the colonies. Instead of making far-reaching political concessions to associate India in the war effort, in which its contributions could be gigantic, London merely congratulated itself when India decided not to make any special difficulties. India has therefore not yet started producing war goods in large quantities; the inexhaustible human resources still await tapping. The Near Eastern army could have had a different appearance if a million, instead of less than 100,000, men had been stationed there. Here, as in all other parts of the empire, London has thought in terms of money, not in terms of production, resources, and men.

The colonial empire has—difficult as it is to believe—contributed almost nothing to the prosecution of the war, except indirectly. London's policy has been neither enlightened nor imaginative. The British have done their best to make this war just "another white man's quarrel." Ceylon, the Malay States, and other colonies have contributed some two million dollars each; and London thought that wonderful. No attempt has been made to develop production, to establish industries, to train soldiers.

Britain now recognizes that its failure to associate the empire more actively in the war is a blunder of the first magnitude. Hasty and radical efforts are now being made to place relations on a new footing. The King's call on Empire Day marked a turning-point. But many months will have to elapse before the effects of the new policies can make themselves felt at the theaters of war. If the present tempo is maintained, Britain will have by next spring enough planes and armaments of all sorts to maintain an effective defensive and perhaps to launch an offensive as well. Next spring, however, is a long way off, and today, after the collapse of France, it is difficult to visualize a front on which a successful offensive could be launched, particularly if the French Mediterranean colonies accept Pétain's surrender.

But to survive the next few months Britain will undoubtedly need help from outside the empire. The R. A. F. needs to be assured that its present first-line planes will be replaced as soon as lost; only on that condition will it be able to counteract effectively the German inroads. Churchill and the Labor members of the Cabinet certainly think in terms of goods, resources, and men, not in terms of money. They have also ceased worrying about the aftermath if the war is won. The thing that needs to be made doubly certain is that these efforts do not come too late; and under present conditions only the United States can do that. There can be no doubt that if Britain is helped to cope effectively with the air menace—and that means the menace of bombs, not parachute troops—it will be able to hold out during the summer and next year can search for weak spots against which to direct an offensive.

All this, even under the best circumstances, does not, of course, add up to victory. The most Britain can hope to accomplish during the coming months, even with aid from this country, is to forestall a knockout blow. Meanwhile, destruction will continue, for many planes will get through the best defenses. Nor should the advantage to the Nazis of control over the Continent be underestimated. They will now have at their disposal supplies which hitherto were only partially available to them, and for which they had to pay with valuable exports. Equally important is the almost unlimited manpower that they can now apply to agriculture and mining.

There has been a dangerous tendency in England and this country to overrate the organizational difficulties confronting the Nazis. England has consoled itself with the thought that the Nazi super-machine is bound to break down. The Nazi record should make us skeptical of such a view. Certainly parts of the European industrial machine will break down as a result of Nazi domination; other parts will be discarded intentionally. But the fact is that Czech, Polish, Norwegian, and Danish agricultural and industrial production has been coordinated in an incredibly short time. There is no ground for hope that the Nazis will be unable to do the same for the rest of Europe.

Although not yet subjugated by arms, the Balkans, too, will henceforth send all their products to the Reich. The Balkan countries know now that Britain cannot possibly help them any longer, and all grains, meats, oils, and other agricultural products will be at the disposal of Berlin. Reports indicate that Berlin has complete plans ready for coordinating the whole Balkan economy with its own, and for increasing production of essential goods. German technical publications estimate that the agricultural productivity of the Balkans could be doubled or even tripled. They do not even attempt to estimate industrial potentialities.

All these factors have to be considered in estimating the chances for ultimate Allied victory; but the picture is by no means as dark as the preceding account might indicate. Control of Europe is not without serious dangers to the Nazis if Britain retains control of the seas. First of all it should be borne in mind that Europe has not been self-sufficient in foodstuffs since the middle of the eighteenth century. There are simply too many people per square mile of agricultural land. Secondly, European industry is based on a number of key products which have to be imported from the outside, and for which no effective substitutes have yet been found, certainly not in quantity. But even if substitutes could be found for all imports, a fundamental revolution in the whole economic structure would be necessary to change the system from one based on world trade to one of continental radius. The amount of misery, dissatisfaction, and revolt which such a change would cause might tax even the Nazi police system.

Almost half of the foreign trade of European countries between 1925 and 1938 was carried on with nations outside the European continent; and the percentages have shown remarkable stability. In 1937, 47.2 per cent of Europe's imports came from beyond the seas, and almost 36 per cent of all exports was sent outside the Continent. It is impossible to see how this vast trade—amounting to about $12,000,000,000—could be absorbed by Europe. Grain, sugar, coffee, tea, cocoa, and other foods have to be imported—many of these cannot be produced on the Continent; 80 per cent of silk has to be imported from overseas, as well as almost all of the three million tons of cotton consumed annually, a large part of the tobacco, all oil-seeds and vegetable oils, a large part of essential woods. Rumania is the only significant Continental producer of gasoline and lubricating oils. More than three-quarters of the Continental need for these things would have to remain unsatisfied.

There are other key products the need for which will constantly increase, especially if the Nazis are to increase food production. Europe cannot raise sisal and other fibers; rubber production has thus far been negligible. Tin, nickel, antimony, asbestos, chromite, manganese, tungsten, vanadium, molybdenum—for all these essential raw materials Europe has to depend entirely or almost entirely on the outside world. Europe is not self-sufficient in wool, hides, and skins; it is entirely dependent on imports for a great number of medical herbs. At present there are still large stocks of these materials on the Continent; but they will be used up very quickly.

This situation presents Britain with great opportunities; and certain it is that the British are not blind to them. Men in the Admiralty began to speculate months ago about the possibility of an iron ring around the Continent. There has been some talk of a double blockade—one from long distance in which the navy will play its traditional role, and one around the shores of the Continent carried on by air patrols. Such a task may not be too great for the resources of the empire, provided of course the French fleet does not fall into Nazi hands.

The situation is no doubt paradoxical. From a long-range point of view the Allied cause is by no means beyond hope. On the contrary, there are solid elements of strength. Only the immediate situation seems well-nigh hopeless. The great problem is how to get through the next few months; and an objective analysis shows that this problem is insoluble without substantial aid from the United States. In the immediate future the empire will not be of much use. Australia, Canada, and the other dominions may send a few more divisions; but it is not divisions of infantry that will be needed. Aircraft, ships, and certain types of cannon constitute the demand of the hour. The divisions of infantry and other resources will not be needed till later, probably not till next year.

The Pope Regrets

BY STUART CLOETE

Without partisanship unmoved
by consideration
Bemused
The representative of Christ
regrets from the Vatican
the plight of refugees regrets
from the Vatican rivers of blood and towns flaming
Regrets
where he could forbid
Regrets
in the name of Jesus Christ
The fall of Christendom

An End to Illusions

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

THE morning newspaper brings reports of disaster everywhere. The morning mail acquaints me with the confusion created by these reports. My mail this morning, for example, contains four significant communications. The first is a letter from the Socialist Party informing me that my views on foreign affairs violate the party platform and asking me to give account of my non-conformity. The party position is that this war is a clash of rival imperialisms in which nothing significant is at stake. The second letter asks me to support an organization which will bring peace to the world by establishing "world education" and erecting a "world radio." It fails to explain how its world education is to seep into the totalitarian states and wean them from their mania. The third letter is from a trade union under Communist influence asking me to speak at a union "peace" meeting. The fourth is from a parson who wants me to join in an effort to set "moral force against Hitler's battalions," but it fails to explain just how this moral force is to be effective against tanks, flame-throwers, and bombing planes.

This mail increases the melancholy prompted by the morning's news. I answer the Socialist communication by a quick resignation from the party. I inform the trade union that my views would not be acceptable at its peace meeting. The proposal for a world radio is quickly consigned to a file which already contains eighty-two different recipes for world salvation. I start to answer the parson who wants to set "moral force" against Hitler, but overcome with a sense of futility and doubting my ability to penetrate the utopian fog in which the letter was conceived, I throw my reply into the wastebasket. Thus I save some time to meditate upon the perspective which informs this whole morning's mail and upon the vapid character of the culture which Hitler intends to destroy. This culture does not understand historical reality clearly enough to deserve to survive. It has a right to survival only because the alternative is too horrible to contemplate. All four letters are but expressions of the utopianism which has informed our Western world since the eighteenth century.

The Socialists have a dogma that this war is a clash of rival imperialisms. Of course they are right. So is a clash between myself and a gangster a conflict of rival egotisms. There is a perspective from which not much difference may be perceived between my egotism and that of a gangster. But from another perspective there is an important difference. "There is not much difference between people," said a farmer to William James, "but what difference there is is very important." That is a truth which the Socialists in America have not yet learned. The Socialists are right of course in insisting that the civilization which we are called upon to defend is full of capitalistic and imperialistic injustice. But it is still a civilization. Utopianism creates confusion in politics by measuring all significant historical distinctions against purely ideal perspectives and blinding the eye to differences which may be matters of life and death in a specific instance.

The Socialists rightly call attention to the treason of the capitalistic oligarchy which has brought the cause of democracy to so desperate a state. But we are defending something which transcends the interests of Mr. Chamberlain and the venality of M. Bonnet. Furthermore the Socialists have forgotten how much they contributed to the capitulation of democracy to tyranny. It was a Socialist Prime Minister, Paul-Henri Spaak, who contrived the unrealistic neutrality policy of Belgium which was responsible for the German break-through at Sedan. The policy was unrealistic because it was based upon the quite untrue assumption that Belgium was imperiled equally by rival imperialistic powers. The peril was not equal at all, and history has avenged this lie in a terrible way. The Socialists of the Scandinavian countries were deeply involved in the parasitic pacifism of these small nations which scorned "power politics" and forgot that their security rested upon the British navy and the contingencies of a precarious balance of power. The Socialists of Britain willed to resist Hitler but did not will the means of resistance. As for Munich, I heard American Socialists give thanks that a madman with a gun was met by a man with an umbrella. If there had been two guns, rather than an umbrella and a gun, they said, the world would have been plunged into conflict. European Socialists have learned to repent of these errors under the pressure of tragic events, leaving only American Socialists to indulge the luxury of their utopianism.

The proposal for "world radio" and "world education" is merely a particularly fatuous form of the utopian rationalism and universalism which have informed the thought of liberal intellectuals in the whole Western world. These liberals have always imagined that it was a comparatively simple matter for the human mind to transcend the welter of interest and passion which is the very stuff of existence. They have not understood that man's very capacity for freedom creates the imperialist will to dominate, as well as the desire to subordinate life to universal standards. The five hundred American scientists who recently presented a memorial to the President favoring neutrality in the name of scientific impartiality seem not to have the slightest idea that scientific freedom is dependent upon the vicissitudes of political history. Their illusions reveal that modern culture completely misunderstands history precisely because it has learned a great deal about nature and falsely imagines that the harmonies and securities of nature are a safe asylum for man.

LIBRARY

There seems to be absolutely no end to the illusions of which intellectuals are capable and no height of unrealistic dreaming to which they cannot rise. Aldous Huxley dreams in Hollywood of a method of making man harmless by subtracting or abstracting the self from selfhood, and stumbles into a pseudo-Buddhistic mysticism as the way of salvation without understanding that this kind of mysticism annuls all history in the process of destroying the self.

When the intellectuals are not given to a vapid form of universalism they elaborate an impossible individualism. Bertrand Russell, who has now repented of his pacifism, wrote in an article recently reprinted in The Nation that any political view which made individuals the bearers of ideological forces was outmoded. The fact is that Nazi collectivism with its primitive emphasis upon "blood and soil" is but a cruel and psychopathic emphasis upon organic and collective aspects of life which liberal individualism has outraged. As late as last February the New Republic promised to stand resolutely against any moral urge that might carry us into war because it knew so certainly that the "evils of a system" could not be cured by "killing the unfortunate individuals who for a moment embody the system." It failed to tell us that the individuals who for the moment embody a system might possibly fasten a system of slavery upon us which would not be for a moment. When Germany invaded Holland and Belgium and the situation of the Western democracies became precarious, the New Republic forgot these individualistic scruples and solemnly warned that we could not afford to allow the British navy to be destroyed, though it did not tell us how we were to prevent it without imperiling the lives of unfortunate individual sailors and soldiers "who for the moment embody a system." The real fact is that we have no right to deal with the rough stuff of politics at all if we do not understand that politics always deals with collective action and that collective action invariably involves both guilty and guiltless among the individuals who for the moment embody a system.

The letter from the communistic trade union in my mail can stand as a symbol of the aberrations of those who frantically cling to Russia as their hope of salvation. The fear that a triumphant Germany will invade the Ukraine may bring Russia back on the side of the angels shortly, and then the rest of us will be told how wrong we were in judging Russia prematurely. Fortunately we have no intellectuals of the standing of George Bernard Shaw and J. B. S. Haldane who, under the influence of the Russian obsession, talk such nonsense as these two men have permitted themselves.

The letter from the parson who wanted to set "moral force" against Hitler's battalions is a nice example of the sentimentalized form of Christianity which has engulfed our churches, particularly in America, and which has prompted them to dream of "spiritualizing life" by abstracting spirit from matter, history, and life. It is significant that this kind of "spiritual" religion identifies religious perfectionism with the morally dubious and politically dangerous dogmas of isolation. If we could only keep free of this European struggle we might still indulge our illusions about the character of human existence, which Christianity at its best illumines.

A survey of our culture gives us the uneasy feeling that Hitler was not quite wrong in his boast that he would destroy the world of the eighteenth century. In its more articulate forms our culture suffers from illusions which weaken its will and its right to survive. One can only be grateful for the common sense of common folk which has not been corrupted by these illusions and which in the hour of peril expresses itself in sound political instincts. But for this common sense we might capitulate to a system of government which declares war to be normal, because we do not believe in war. We might submit to a culture which glorifies force as the final arbiter, because we thought it a simple task to extricate reason from force. We might allow a primitive collectivism to enslave us, because we had false ideas of the relation of the individual to the collective forces of life. We might submit to tyranny and the negation of justice, because we had an uneasy conscience about the injustices which corrupt our system of justice.

Hitler threatens the whole world not merely because the democracies were plutocratic and betrayed by their capitalist oligarchies. His victories thus far are partly due to the fact that the culture of the democracies was vapid. Its political instincts had become vitiated by an idealism which sought to extricate morals from politics to the degree of forgetting that all life remains a contest of power. If Hitler is defeated in the end it will be because the crisis has awakened in us the will to preserve a civilization in which justice and freedom are realities, and given us the knowledge that ambiguous methods are required for the ambiguities of history. Let those who are revolted by such ambiguities have the decency and consistency to retire to the monastery, where medieval perfectionists found their asylum.

Slave Markets in the Bronx

BY CARL OFFORD

THE slave market in the Bronx is different. You don't see the husky auctioneer; you don't see the whip. You don't see a line of half-naked Negroes with chains about their wrists and ankles. But you see hundreds of Negro women, thin, tattered, haggard, sitting on soap boxes or leaning against lamp posts, begging some white woman to buy their services for as little as fifteen cents an hour.

In the early morning the alarm clocks rattle through the Harlem tenements. School children lie half awake. Unemployed fathers, unemployed sons sleep on. Mothers, grandmothers, wives, and daughters get up. They pack an apron, a piece of bread, and a pair of slippers in a brown-paper bag and hurry out to the Lenox Avenue subway, each bound for what seems to her the most promising slave market.

Practically nobody in New York will hire a Negro woman for anything but domestic work; only .04 per cent of the Negro women in New York have white-collar jobs. And ever since the 1929 stock crash the pressure of mass unemployment has shunted Negroes out of the better domestic positions. Fortune noted in December, 1931, that "in the North colored servants can hardly find positions because so many whites are taking jobs at Negro wages."

Park Avenue, the wealthy eighties, Long Island, and Westchester let them out. They turned to the Bronx in growing numbers; the slave markets developed and flourished. Today more than a hundred such markets are scattered through the Bronx. They may be found at Burnside and Davidson Avenues, Simpson Street and Westchester Avenue, Allerton Avenue and White Plains Road, Fordham Road and Jerome Avenue, Kingsbridge Road and Jerome Avenue, Cruger and Lydig Avenues, Claremont Parkway and Third Avenue, Mosholu Parkway and Jerome Avenue, 161st Street and River Avenue, 167th Street and Grand Concourse, and other corners.

Here the women gather and here they wait, old women, young women, young girls. Some will get jobs, many will not. The young girls have a hard time turning down "man after man trying to jibe you with an easy dollar." The old women have to be careful to keep their gray hair well covered because "most employers take the young ones." The flower-shop proprietor protests that they are blocking his window display. They shift a little to one side, but they don't go away. Hours pass, they wait; it rains, it snows, yet they wait.

The housewife comes out to do her morning shopping. The wife of a skilled worker or a small business man, she counts her pennies carefully. She haggles with the fruit vendor over the price of strawberries; she haggles with the meat dealer about the lamb chops. Then she looks for a domestic worker.

"You girls want to work?" She singles out the youngest, the strongest-looking: "How much do you work for?" The worker states her price. The housewife exclaims, "Twenty-five cents an hour!" and turns away. She will try waiting, too. She knows that by twelve o'clock they will be anxious to work for fifteen cents; and if she can put her hands on one that came up on her last nickel she can get her to work for ten cents.

One of the ugly features of the slave market is the practice of welching on the pay-off. Many housewives who contract to pay fifteen cents an hour use one method or another to rob the worker of her due. Sometimes after working for four or five hours the Negro woman finds that the housewife has set the clock back an hour. Or a worker is offered a snack of lunch, and if she unwittingly accepts, fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five cents is deducted from her pay at the end of the day. Quite a number of housewives insist that the domestic worker accept cast-off clothing in part payment, and many deduct money from the day's earnings on the ground that the work wasn't done satisfactorily.

These practices create an undercurrent of bitter hatred for the Bronx housewives. The Negro women return to Harlem, and whenever they get together swap stories of oppression. And because these Bronx housewives are almost invariably Jews, the bitter feelings of the workers are easily steered into the broad channel of anti-Semitism. Political charlatans of every stripe, from the outright professional Hitlerite to the Blackmanite,* capitalize upon "the Jewish oppression in the Bronx."

Recognizing the undesirable political consequences of this feeling, citizens of the borough organized last December the Bronx Committee for Improvement of Domestic Employees, headed by Rabbi Jerome Rosenblom of Tremont Temple; the Reverend Elder G. Hawkins, representing the Bronx Clergy Association; and Wilbur D. Simmonds, assistant district superintendent of the Division of Placement and Unemployment of the Bronx. This committee planned to establish centers "to shelter the domestic workers in bad weather and to see that prospective employers pay a fair wage." "Fair" wages were to be obtained by educating Bronx housewives

---

* A Blackmanite is a person who advocates the annihilation of the whites, beginning with the Jewish business man in Harlem—C. O.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

to realize that "this system of employing is economically unsound both to themselves and to their employees." Education alone, however, never won a wage increase for anybody. What is needed is education-and—education and union organization.

An attempt at such organization has been made by the Domestic Workers' Union, an affiliate of the A. F. of L., but the difficulties in this field are legion, and much cannot be hoped for without the active cooperation of neighborhood religious and civic leaders. No two persons work together; workers can be obtained from a hundred different places scattered over a whole county; it is house service, not article production—call a strike and the housewife will clean her own pots and pans and nobody can shout "scab." If a particular block is organized, the housewife calls her married daughter on the phone, and the married daughter sends over a cheaper worker from her section.

In 1937, when the Domestic Workers' Union established offices at Allerton Avenue and White Plains Road, in immediate proximity to a flourishing market, domestic workers joined up by the score. Employers, however, didn't appear. One member aptly summed up the situation: "I sit and sit in the union and nobody comes. Them women won't hire nobody from the union; not when they can pick up a gal on the corner for fifteen cents." After some months nobody sat in the union, and a "To Let" sign was put up on the premises. The union rate for the Bronx was forty cents an hour, and window-cleaning, blanket-washing, and floor-waxing were forbidden. The housewife couldn't be induced to agree to such conditions. Leaflets were distributed, mass-meetings were held, speeches were broadcast. But the housewife clung to her position—that she was going to get as much as possible for the least possible amount of money.

The union is preparing to launch another organizing campaign this summer. Organizers will concentrate on those houses where elevator operators and porters have already joined the Building Service International Union, and the union will do its utmost to cooperate with the Bronx Committee for Improvement of Domestic Employees. But, as Dora Jones, president of the union, points out, to eradicate the slave market government aid is needed. Both the state and the national government should realize the plight of these workers and do at least as much for them as for others. Extension of the Wage-Hour Act to include domestic workers or the establishment of a state minimum wage would provide an effective weapon against the evils of the slave market. There is also need of legislation to bring these women under the workmen's compensation law and to make them eligible for unemployment insurance and old-age security. Until such government action is taken, it is feared that the slave market will continue despite the union's best efforts.

In the Wind

IN THE TUMULT aroused by John L. Lewis's speech absolving Herbert Hoover of depression-guilt, the man to watch is Phil Murray. Murray is reported near the breaking-point and may admit it any day. If he does, he may be the C. I. O.'s next president, C. I. O. insiders feel.

MOST PAPERS carried the news that the Republican National Convention, which used "A Ballad for Americans" as an opening note, asked Paul Robeson not to sing because of his pro-Soviet sympathies. All papers overlooked the fact that the chorus which appeared—minus Robeson—had sung at virtually none but Communist functions prior to its Republican debut.

OVER CHICAGO'S Station WBBM the morning of June 10 the announcer thanked sponsors of the program called "Life Can Be Beautiful" for relinquishing their time. Substituted for the program was Mussolini's message declaring war.

WHILE MRS. ROOSEVELT does not show it, she is not oblivious to heckling by youth. When she visited the City College recently, a group of students began to chant: "The Yanks Are Not Coming." To her companion Mrs. Roosevelt commented: "No, but the Nazis are, aren't they?" She said it smilingly.

TAKING GALLUP polls in war time is precarious business. The last published survey showed a rise in war sentiment to 7 per cent. Another survey was being taken when the French surrender was reported. Before the surrender, the ballots indicated that war feeling had jumped to 14 per cent. The bad news brought an immediate diminution of the fever, and compelled the institute to start its poll all over again.

A BUCHAREST bookseller, reports the Paris Tribune, has found a new device for booming business. He buys large lots of Rauschning's "The Voice of Destruction," and the German legation promptly buys up each consignment. It has been going on for months.

WASHINGTON IS trying at the same time to prevent sabotage and to calm hysteria, and has therefore concealed some startling facts. It is reported on good authority that there have been "accidents" in sixty plants making national-defense equipment since the real war started. Almost all have been hushed up.

WHEN ROBERT JACKSON denounced the Bridges deportation bill he was pinch-hitting for F. D. R. The President opposes the bill, fears tremendous reaction if he vetoes it. So he's hoping it won't reach him.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Valedictory

IT IS nearly forty-six and one-half years since my first contribution appeared in The Nation—January 11, 1894. In it I reported my observations of the Spanish army deep in mud in Melilla, North Africa, during an armistice in one of the periodic wars between the Moors and the Spaniards. It is a coincidence that my last articles have dealt with the greatest and most calamitous of all wars. At any rate, it is the differences of opinion which have arisen between myself and the present editorial board as to the relation of the United States to the catastrophe in Europe which has led me to ask for the acceptance of my resignation. Since January, 1933, Issues and Men has been a weekly feature of this journal, and during that time I have had the luck never, in sickness or in health, whether I was here or in Europe, to miss a single issue.

That in the nature of things this series of articles was nearing its end is obvious. I regret all the more, therefore, that my retirement has been precipitated at this time by the editors' abandonment of The Nation's steadfast opposition to all preparations for war, to universal military service, to a great navy, and to all war, for this in my judgment has been the chief glory of its great and honorable past. As I said in my address at the recent Seventy-fifth Anniversary dinner, I have realized that times change and also the views of owners, and that with new editors come new policies. My own making over of The Nation when I became editor in 1918 pained many of its devoted readers. Yet I can truthfully claim that under my guidance it held to the fundamental principles of the founders and was conducted in their spirit, in fullest support of their correct conception of what the liberal world should be.

They knew war, many of them at first hand, and their detestation of it was beyond any yielding to such a pitiful, craven fear of the modern Napoleon as is now sweeping over the United States. They founded this journal within three months after Appomattox for the purpose of championing the freed slaves and helping to steer the country back to the ways of peace, to the Bill of Rights, after four years of bloodshed. To them and to me war was never anything else than "the sum of all villainies," out of which at best only an occasional modicum of good could come; in modern times it only engenders worse evils than those sought to be ended by mass murder. To permit The Nation, for which some of us labored and sacrificed so heavily for so many years, now to become recreant to those ideals and beliefs, embracing for the purpose of saving our democracy the very evils certain to destroy it either in peace or in war, is the privilege of the present ownership. But it has made impossible the continuance of a relationship which would be as unfair to the editors as to myself and the public.

That I end my regular contributions with deep regret everyone will understand. For better or for worse I put into The Nation, especially during the years when I was solely responsible for it, 1918-1933, the best that I had to offer for our country's welfare and advancement. Whether that contribution was worth while others have judged and will judge in the future—perhaps when the history of these times is written by men marveling that a Hitler beyond seas could so have swept the greatest republic from its moorings. I can only ask that there may be recorded then the causes that were successfully championed by my predecessors, by me, and by my many associates. I hope, too, that there will be just recognition of the efforts of the many men and women who have written in these pages with complete honesty and sincerity, just as their consciences dictated. At least the record is there, for as long as there are critics to examine it, of a free and untrammeled journal.

I have no doubt that the present hysteria will pass and with it the fear which has already gravely endangered the liberties of America and led to steps which will as inevitably wind up the New Deal as our entering into the first World War finished Wilson's New Freedom, now totally forgotten, and made inevitable the coming of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover—reaction at its worst. I believe, too, that the present editors will some day awake to a realization that the course they are now proposing will inevitably end all social and political progress, lower still further the standard of living, enslave labor, and, if persisted in, impose a dictatorship and turn us into a totalitarian state. America is to be safeguarded, not by guns and warships that may be rendered valueless overnight by new inventions and new tactics, but only by greater economic and industrial wisdom, by social justice, by making our democracy work. That the United States has the genius, the power, the resources, and the vision to accomplish this I cannot question, if only it is not again betrayed in the White House and by the politicians.

With this statement of a veteran journalist's faith in his country this long record closes.

BOOKS and the ARTS

French Mysticism

THE STAR OF SATAN. By Georges Bernanos. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

JOY OF MAN'S DESIRING. By Jean Giono. The Viking Press. $2.50.

AT ANY other moment these two novels would deserve, and probably receive, much serious attention. Each is an excellent novel and representative of a significant current in contemporary literature. But right now when all my attention is focused on the bitter struggle of Western civilization against the barbarian hordes, I do not find them absorbing. "The Star of Satan" takes place in a part of France already overrun by the Germans; "Joy of Man's Desiring" is laid in the foothills of the Alps where Italian bombers may be passing overhead tomorrow. I cannot forget those invading tanks and planes as I read about these village priests struggling with the devil or about these hardy peasants discovering beauty and joy. To anyone familiar with current literary production in France, moreover, these novels, published respectively in 1925 and 1935, are just old enough to begin to take their place in history. They deserve a rereading certainly, but this is not the moment I should choose. Reading them now is a little like thumbing through one's photograph album of past travels in France.

The world of Georges Bernanos is a priest-ridden world, though he would not approve of that expression. All his major characters wear the cloth, which serves to insulate them from our world. But they are not ordinary priests either. Father Donissan, who becomes the saint of Lumbres, is as unusual a specimen as that other country vicar who fails of his mission and dies miserably of cancer in "The Diary of a Country Priest." But Father Donissan is a saint in the old manner who scourges himself with chains, grapples with the devil on a lonely moor at midnight, and lives to confess and convert his little flock. Probably nothing in the modern Catholic novel is at once more stirring and more convincing than his final attempt to perform a miracle. Convinced that he has been delegated by God to raise a dead child, he is nevertheless assailed by the doubts and jibes of his old enemy. Here Bernanos has dealt with the most difficult material in a masterful fashion. His saint is utterly convincing because he remains a poor man struggling with himself. Catholics call this a novel of great spiritual power; to the rest of the world it certainly is a work of profound psychological insight.

Jean Giono's world, on the other hand, is one of idealized peasants, living a life and speaking a language which represent in schematic form the life and language of all French peasants. To a windswept plateau almost as sparse as the one we have seen in "Harvest" comes an itinerant juggler who speaks in parables and brings beauty and joy into the drab lives of Jourdan and Randoulet and Jacquou and Carle. He teaches that "what you give makes you rich," shows the beauty in the useless—in flowers, stars, wild birds, and the forest. A tame stag named Antoine, significant only for his beauty, becomes the center of the community, and all the men bend their efforts to finding him some does before the mating season. Little by little the plateau discovers a new joie de vivre. Each of Giono's novels is built upon a very simple theme like this one, which lends itself to symbolism. But Giono always runs the risk of simplifying his themes and his characters to the point of turning his novel into a thesis. Here the characters are reduced to the minimum until they have become but the necessary illustrations of a Rousseauist thesis. In the artificial simplicity of the language spoken by these peasants, and in the poetic overtones which the author puts into their mouths, there is great power; but no peasants ever spoke that language. The best portion of the book is the thirty pages describing the Rabelaisian outdoor feast spontaneously organized by all the inhabitants of the plateau, who have come together without knowing why, as if in answer to a mysterious call.

Both of these novels deal with mysticism. The French, an eminently logical people who prize clarity above other virtues, are not known for their mysticism. Yet we have here two modern French mystics, a traditional Roman Catholic and an equally traditional pagan. For if Giono's Bobi does not show the cleft foot of Pan, the stag Antoine supplies that property. Both Bernanos and Giono believe in miracles performed through faith, and in their novels present such miracles as credible human experience. There may, after all, be a moral in this for the present state of France. While acting as if they did not believe in miracles and exerting their own prodigious energy to the utmost, the French always leave a small loophole for the intervention of the supernatural, if and when it becomes absolutely necessary.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

How the Labor Act Works

THE NATIONAL LABOR POLICY AND HOW IT WORKS. By Joseph Rosenfarb. Harper and Brothers. $5.

THE phrase "definitive study" is badly overworked, but it is hard to see how it can be avoided this time. Joseph Rosenfarb's study of the National Labor Relations Act and Board is "definitive" by every test one can think of. It is long, massively footnoted, perfectly indexed, heavily appendixed; it contains a twenty-page outline table of contents, a preface by Senator Wagner, a foreword by Chairman Madden, hundreds of pages of trenchant, lucid prose, and an exhaustive exposition, solidly grounded in law and economics, of the background, character, policies, consequences, and prospects of the act and the board.

It is hard to read a book like this without feeling sick. Sick, not just politely ill. Sick, that it will reach so few, that its documentation won't make a single headline, that it will take the many law schools who will use it years to influence the popular mind as deeply as Mr. Toland of the Smith committee can do in a single press conference. For the last three years law schools all over the country have been grinding out full-size articles upon almost every possible aspect of the board's work. It would be hard to find in all of this literature enough criticism of the board's policies and practices to make half a column on page 27 of the daily paper—almost any daily paper. The popular press, consequently, has elected to ignore what the lawyers of the future think about the most crucial of all New Deal legislation and to concentrate upon the personal difficulties of a handful of board employees who have been lined up under the calcium light of publicity by the Smith committee. Mr. Rosenfarb's book is far more readable than most law-journal articles, but it will be astonishing if it has any more effect.

It is an understatement to say that Mr. Rosenfarb is not unaware of this difficulty. He discusses the matter with a restraint which only occasionally becomes acid. He remarks that "the 'hate Roosevelt' campaign furnishes material for a study of brotherly love compared to the démarche [by the press] against the board and the act." "The world has not beaten a path of approbation to the portals of the board." "The doctrine that truth will triumph in the end is an expression of undue optimism." And he tells stories which should not be repeated by anyone intending to document the integrity of the Fourth Estate.

Nor is Mr. Rosenfarb altogether uncritical of the olympian detachment of the judiciary. In reviewing the past he notes with accuracy the conscious and unconscious, but effective restraints which the courts have placed upon the advance of industrial democracy. He records with relief that for the moment at least they have stayed their hand. But his brilliant discussion of the proper relationship between the administrative agencies and the courts illuminates current Congressional efforts to clamp the hand of the courts again upon the shoulder of the administrators. And in speaking of the future he remarks, "The American judiciary is the last shore from which the tide of reaction ebbs and among the first to feel its flow."

Perhaps the only shortcomings of this immense work are the author's neglect of the problem of securing and training administrative personnel and his failure to treat at length the behind-the-scenes aspects of informally settled cases, that is, those which are dismissed, withdrawn, or adjusted. Since Mr. Rosenfarb is himself a board employee, he could scarcely be expected to discuss the board's personnel problems. The second, and related, problem of informal settlements is one which lies far beyond the scope of any single individual—even one with Mr. Rosenfarb's abilities. It is a task to which the Smith committee might well have devoted itself. In this connection, it may be pertinent to inquire what ever became of the replies to the immense number of questionnaires sent out by the Smith committee to employers and unions. These questionnaires were designed, in part, to provide answers to the charge that many adjusted cases are really shotgun weddings between employers and unions, with board zealots holding the gun. Didn't the committee's questionnaire prove this charge? Or what?

The individual student is compelled to devote himself primarily to the formal aspects of the board's work. This Mr. Rosenfarb has done with great skill. But there is more in this book than a complete survey of board policy and practice. There is a critical review of every proposed amendment to the act. There are competent and often almost epigrammatic comments about the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. split, the effect of war on industrial relations, the depth and intensity of contemporary reaction, the relations of farmers and workers, union responsibility, European labor relations, domestic fascism, intra-union democracy, labor politics, and civil liberties. This book has taken years in the writing. It takes hours in the reading. The developments which it records have required generations. But those who would discard most of that for which it stands won't give it a moment's notice. The author knows this. But his belief in democracy, industrial and civic, nevertheless remains firm.

ROBERT R. R. BROOKS

Oscar Ameringer—in Person

IF YOU DON'T WEAKEN: THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF OSCAR AMERINGER. With a Foreword by Carl Sandburg. Henry Holt and Company. $2.75.

FROM every page of this bright and sparkling book Oscar Ameringer "in person" shines forth, and his is a very attractive personal appearance. Here is what an autobiography should be—an authentic reproduction of the man himself in his dulness or brilliancy, his drabness or breeziness. Breeziness is the chief charm of Oscar Ameringer, and his narrative of a life which, if told by others, might have been boring and have seemed hardly worth recounting, makes gay and inter-

In the Heart of the Adirondacks

SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL SCHROON LAKE N.Y.

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
9 CLAY TENNIS COURTS
8 HANDBALL COURTS

OPEN-AIR AMPHITHEATRE

DANCING UNDER THE STARS

Write for booklet U J
NEW YORK OFFICES: MU 2-4083; CO 7-2471

You may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

esting reading. He has humor, philosophy, and good nature. He has never been cast down by the defeat of the innumerable lost causes he has espoused, and he has triumphed again and again over ill-fortune which would have disheartened most others.

More than that, this is another story of an immigrant from Germany who has given much more to his adopted country than he has received from it. His brand of Americanism does not commend itself to our conservative press or to our masters of privilege since he is a Socialist, but it is squarely based on a rare knowledge of the country and of the common man's daily struggle—his vicissitudes, his uncertainties, his limited hopes and aspirations. For Oscar Ameringer has been about everything that one man could be except a soldier. He has been a musician and a painter, the leader of a band, a vaudeville "artist," a labor leader, a politician-reformer and an office seeker, a reporter, a contributor at an early age to humorous publications, a job printer, a lecturer, a ship's steward and doctor, a leader in a resettlement project, a newspaper founder and manager. Today he is the editor of the American Guardian. Of this he boasts that it is the only Oklahoma newspaper with a national circulation. Probably the people who live on our Park Avenue never heard of it, and would be shocked to death if they saw some of the copies. Yet it has a great and valuable influence in its territory, where men know Oscar Ameringer and how honest and unpurchasable and devoted to America he is. Just now, when he is over seventy, he is putting on another grand fight to keep this country out of war. Incidentally, some of the most valuable chapters of his autobiography are devoted to the story of how in the first World War foreign-born Americans in Wisconsin and other states were browbeaten, tortured by mobs of patriots, compelled to subscribe to Liberty Bonds at the pistol's point, and in some cases even killed. No one who desires to portray that war as it was should overlook this first-hand testimony.

Those of us who know Ameringer agree with Carl Sandburg that he holds a "supreme position in the American labor movement as a man of laughter, wit, and satire" and that at his best he is equal as a humorist to Artemus Ward or Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby. But, most important, he is a truly great, warm-hearted, courageous man, with sympathy for everybody. He can even understand those against whom he battles and know how it is that they are as enmeshed or as privileged as they are. He tells his story with complete modesty and endless humor. You laugh at and with him and at the world—if you don't stop to wipe away a tear that this crashing globe can be so stupid and have failed so utterly to develop its vast human resources. The book is not a "literary gem," and yet in another sense it is, since, as I have said, it is Oscar Ameringer himself. It contains a wealth of humorous anecdotes, such as a telegram he received from Governor Culbertson of Texas when in 1898 he offered the services of his band for the war in Cuba: "Sir, we want men to fight and not to blow"—this in a war in which there was more blowing and boasting and less fighting than perhaps in any other on record. But read the book for yourselves. It is a true American story and to me a precious one.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Combine

and save over 30%

The Nation . . . . . . (alone, $5.00)
Harpers Magazine . . (alone, $4.00)
Consumers Union . . (alone, $3.50)
A Total Value of $12.50

FOR ONLY $8.50

A Saving of Four Dollars

(Your Consumers Union membership includes both the unabridged monthly Reports and the Annual Buying Guide.)

BUT if you prefer to order with The Nation only Harpers or only a membership in Consumers Union, you can still effect a large saving, as follows:

The Nation and Harpers $6.50
The Nation and Consumers Union $6.50

Enter new subscriptions or renew your regular subscriptions at these money-saving combinations. All offers are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

Mail the coupon promptly as we cannot guarantee these rates after September 1, 1940.

THE NATION 55 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK CITY
6-29-40

For the inclosed $.................. please enter my subscription to The Nation, to ....
and ....

Name..
Address..
....

Foreign postage extra: Nation $1; Harpers, $1; C. U. 50c.
Canadian: Nation, 50c; Harpers, 50c; C. U. 50c.

IN BRIEF

AS LONG AS THE GRASS SHALL GROW. By Oliver La Farge. Photographs by Helen M. Post. Alliance Book Corporation. $2.50.

This new volume in "The Face of America" series deals with the Indians as they are today and with the complex causes of their present situation. Mr. La Farge is steeped in the subject and makes every word tell; the photographs are very fine pictorially and supply dramatic documentation.

THE LONG WATCH IN ENGLAND. By Eugene and Arline Lohrke. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

The authors of "Night Over England" here set down the insights gained from years of residence on a Sussex farm. It is a sad book for those who share the authors' love for the positive values created by the English way of life, but the truth of their observations on the alarming effects of an out-of-date complacency must be acknowledged, though with reservations.

RECORDS

IN RODZINSKI'S performance of Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony with the Cleveland Orchestra (M-406, $10) the music proceeds without the violent changes in pace with which conductors have seen fit to convert Tschaikovsky into a hysteric; but this is carried to the point of stiffness and rigidity, and while there is no excess in pace there is excess in force. The stiffness is most evident in the Valse of the third movement; there is tenseness even in the rubatos of the waltz-like passage of the first movement, where there should be a relaxed suppleness; and in the first phrase of this passage, marked p with a swell, the p explodes into f. The recording is admirable in its clarity, its fidelity to instrumental timbre, its freedom from the reverberation that has afflicted the Chicago Symphony records; but it is not a completely satisfactory job. For one thing, if you set the volume for the p of the introductions of the first and second movements you do not get sufficient volume for the climaxes later on. In the second movement, also, the first entrance of the solo oboe, marked p, is almost f; a moment later the solo clarinet, marked mf, is softer than the oboe; a moment later the basses, beginning the climb of the strings back to the first theme, are almost inaudible; later in the movement, on side five, two phrases for solo bassoon, marked mf and f, are a barely heard pp; and there are other instances. And finally there is the same barbarous cut of the development section of the last movement as in the Mengelberg version, which eliminates one of the finest passages in the entire symphony—the quiet passage that just precedes the beginning of the recapitulation. The new set is the best of those now available; but I hope for something better in the Beecham recording recently issued in England.

Columbia also has released Tschaikovsky's String Quartet Opus 11, of which the popular Andante Cantabile proves to be the only valuable part. In this set (M-407, $5.50) it is the one movement in which one's ear is not hurt by the coarse-grained playing of the new Roth Quartet and the harsh recording. There have been rumors of the Budapest Quartet shifting to Columbia—something I have hoped for, since it meant that this greatest of all quartets might at last record the works that H. M. V. has been assigning to the inferior Busch and Pro Arte quartets. But I have no desire for Budapest performances of these works recorded with the harshness of Columbia's recent recording in its sets of Haydn's Opus 76 No. 5 and Tschaikovsky's Opus 11—and even, to a lesser degree, Smetana's "From My Life." And I think the Budapest group ought to wait until Columbia acquires at least the skill for the purpose that Victor has shown in the Coolidge Quartet recording of Beethoven's Opus 18 No. 3.

The best of Columbia's June releases, then, is the single record (69876-D, $1.50) of Haydn's beautiful Andante and Variations in F minor, played on the piano with excellent musical taste by Ernst Victor Wolff. Another single (69875-D, $1.50) offers Eduard Commette's arrangements for organ of the fine slow movement of Bach's Italian Concerto, which he plays simply but a little too quickly, and a passage from the Cantata No. 140. The songs in the set of Old World Ballads in America (M-408, $4.50) are enjoyable but—as far as I am concerned—for only one or two of the many stanzas; and they are well sung by Andrew Rowan Summers to his own dulcimer accompaniments. Liszt's "Orpheus," well played by the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony under Barlow and well recorded (X-165, $3.50), you can neglect.

The Oxford University Press has published not only writing on music as distinguished as Tovey's but the long succession of sloppy jobs by Percy Scholes. The latest is "A List of Books About Music in the English Language" ($.75), prepared as an appendix to his "Oxford Companion to Music." If you are interested in books that discuss modern or contemporary music you will have to guess that they are listed under "History." Under "Criticism" you will find only the writings of the two British critics, Chorley and Davison, who were mentioned in the article in the "Companion," and not the music criticism of Bernard Shaw, which you would not have to be told about if you knew enough to look for it under his name, nor the collections of articles by W. J. Turner, which, like Turner's books on Beethoven and Mozart, are not listed at all. Pardonably curious about my own book on the symphony, I found it listed as a book about records under Gramophone; and my book about records is not listed at all.

Oxford also has issued a second edition of Kolodin's "Metropolitan Opera" ($3.75), in which the added pages carry the account through the season of 1938-39. There is brief and just appraisal of tendencies in these recent seasons—of what has and has not been achieved in repertory, personnel, orchestra, staging. But, as before, the bulk of the writing is an excessively detailed statement of everything that happened, involving endless unimportant details of casts and including trivialities of reviewers' gossip. Mr. Kolodin's argument is that this is a book of reference. But I find it difficult to believe that anyone ever will consult the book to find out that in the performance of "Das Rheingold" on February 9, 1939, "Schorr was the Wotan, with Maison, Branzell, Stevens (Erda), Laufkötter, List, Alsen (Fasolt), Witte, Burke, and Huehn (Donner)," whereas in the performance of February 18 "Witte was the Loge, with Schorr, Thorborg, Stevens (Erda), Burke, Laufkötter, and Beattie (Fafner)"; or that in a performance of "La Bohême" Kiepura and Grace Moore "exchanged obviously arranged amenities after the first act, permitting each to take a bow alone." On the other hand I have myself had occasion to want to know the personnel of the company owning the Metropolitan Opera House and the personnel of the producing company in the last ten years, in order to know to what extent they have been identical; and this important information I have not found in Mr. Kolodin's book.

B. H. HAGGIN

BLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Letters to the Editors

The Goal in the Struggle

Dear Sirs: Like the editors of The Nation and many other progressives I believe that the defeat of Hitler is a necessary condition to any discussion of a better ordering of society. But it is also true that the defeat of Hitler will not of itself assure a more equitable society or a more durable peace than Versailles gave us. That will depend on the emergence within nations of systems that will make available to all the people the benefits of mass production and technology. It was the failure to solve this problem in Germany that originally produced Hitler. It was fear of a solution of this problem in the interests of the common man that induced conservatives in England and France to help build up Hitler.

The management of our productive forces in the interest of the community as a whole is what we have been fighting for here at home since 1933. If Hitler is victorious, our chances of winning that fight are irreparably compromised. But we may also lose it as we gird for the struggle against Hitler. The way reaction is trying to move back into power on the excuse of an emergency is sufficient proof that not even the horror of the present war will persuade it to relinquish a privilege or mitigate its acquisitiveness.

I have been reading the literature of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. I am in sympathy with the purpose, but I am deeply disturbed by the arguments used. The central theme is that the victory of Hitler would jeopardize "freedom of speech, of religion, of the ballot, and of every freedom that upholds the dignity of the human spirit." But if after the experience of the Fourteen Points and the "war to make the world safe for democracy" we have not learned that the defeat of Germany will not assure those principles, we are incapable of learning anything.

Can liberals subscribe to a document which does not say clearly and unmistakably that the struggle against Hitler must be a struggle for economic as well as political democracy? Can liberals abandon for a moment the purposes which separate them from those who identify democracy with monopoly capitalism? Now less than ever must liberals subordinate their independent point of view; the men of the right—anti-Hitler though they may be—have no answer.

JOSEPH P. LASH

New York, June 12

The Real "Irresponsibles"

Dear Sirs: Mr. MacLeish seems to blame the scholars for the plight in which the world finds itself. May I suggest that he is barking up the wrong tree? Does Mr. MacLeish mean "detached," as he seems to, when he uses "irresponsible" to describe the scholar? Detachment of the right kind is not too common today, but too rare. It is, of course, evident that much of the day's Ph.D.-factory product is futile; but the trouble does not lie in its detachment but in its insincerity, in its prostitution of the methods of scholarship—that is, truth-seeking—to the aims of "fitting" youths to fundamentally non-scholarly teaching jobs.

Of true detachment there can never be enough. The true scholar—that is, the real truth-seeker—is mankind's only defense against the insidious power of the slogan. Detachment gives the rabble-rousers, the would-be führers, the power of criticism; criticism checks the insensate exploitation of human life in the name of ill-defined, emotional catchwords which are essentially meaningless.

Who are the real "irresponsibles"? Not the scholars, I believe, who in their fields strive always toward clearer knowledge, more unbiased vision; not the writers who have taught youth to examine before it accepts, to question before it rushes pell-mell to violence. Are not the real irresponsibles those who have sold their power with words as a mere commodity, and so debauched the whole concept of language? What of advertising writers? What of editors or journalists who write as they are paid? What of the bright young men who "ghost" articles and speeches in which they do not believe? What of the college presidents who say—as one did—that colleges should be drafted during the war, with intellectual life merely incidental? Can democracy live under such influences? Criticism is the essence of democracy, and the ultimate criticism must be a matter of intellectual, not merely of emotional, activity.

There will be a peace after this war. Its quality will be only partly conditioned by military might. If we today give up that devotion to the idealism of candid truth of which true scholarship is but one mark, if we allow the same disintegration in thinking to overwhelm us that overwhelmed us in the last war, we shall have lost the true battle of democracy already; we shall have already accepted the ways of totalitarianism which we profess to abhor.

TALBOT HAMLIN

New York, June 17

Marked Men

Dear Sirs: You have been assailed by so many requests for aid to various causes that only a profound confidence in the human spirit emboldens us to flash this distress signal. Americans are on a luxury liner that has just received a cry for help.

There is a group of almost forgotten men and women in the catastrophe enveloping Europe. They are the anti-fascist Germans who were fighting Hitler long before the armies went into the field. Driven from their own country, shunted about from one place of refuge in Europe to another, they have persisted in the courageous work of building the anti-Hitler underground movement in Germany. Some have been lost already—those who were in the countries so quickly occupied by the Nazi armies. Others are in danger of being overtaken by Hitler's advance. Once caught they have no chance of survival; marked men and women, the firing squad or decapitation will be their fate.

We owe it to these people who have sacrificed themselves to carry on the fight for freedom—most of them could have emigrated to safety in the New World, but elected to stay and continue their work—to exhaust every possibility to effect their rescue. More than two score outstanding German anti-fascists can be saved if money can be raised to bring them away. This is not only a humanitarian plea; these men and women represent the best of the younger people who will be needed to build a new Europe.

We are trying to aid these people, and need for that purpose $15,000. Will you do all you can to help?

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, Chairman
American Friends of German Freedom
New York, June 19

Caricature of the Bible ?

Dear Sirs: In her Notes by the Way in The Nation of April 6 Margaret Marshall compares "Stalin's Kampf" with the Book of Mormon, saying that "Stalin's book is to Marx what the Book of Mormon is to the Bible, a dull caricature." As a person who reads both the Bible and the Book of Mormon, and occasionally The Nation as well, I am wondering why she needed to display her ignorance of this remarkable companion record with the Bible. If she has not read the Book of Mormon all the way through with a real desire to know the truth, I most sincerely recommend her to do so. That book has been in existence for 110 years and still stands after the literally billions of "cracks" such as she made, and other efforts to disprove that it is what it purports to be, have fallen to the ground.

It would appear from Miss Marshall's article that she reads the Bible. If so, may I suggest two references which speak of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon: one is in Ezekiel 37:15-21. The Book of Mormon is the stick of Joseph, and the Bible, as all students agree, is the stick of Judah. Read John 10:16.

And finally, again, I hope Miss Marshall will accept my invitation to read the record of Christ's visit to these other sheep. It is the record of the people who built the wonderful monuments archaeologists have been uncovering in Central America. After reading it, perhaps she will tell me whether she thinks her statement that this record is a "dull caricature" of the Bible is justifiable.

EUGENE HILTON
Oakland, Cal., June 6

[Although no longer a member of the church, Miss Marshall comes of a family of devout Mormons.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Mark Twain Anecdotes

Dear Sirs: I am editing a collection of Mark Twain anecdotes. Any stories readers of The Nation may care to send will be appreciated and due acknowledgment will be made.

CYRIL CLEMENS
Webster Grove, Mo., June 12

CONTRIBUTORS

ALBERT VITON has just published "Great Britain: An Empire in Transition." He is a member of the Department of Political Science at Northwestern University.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, has written many articles for The Nation on the conflict of morals and politics. He delivered the Gifford Lectures at Edinburgh last year.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN is assistant professor of French at Columbia University.

ROBERT R. R. BROOKS, a member of the Department of Economics at Williams College, has written several books on labor problems, the latest of which is entitled "As Steel Goes . . ."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

LANGUAGES

NOW LEARN A NEW LANGUAGE
in your own home quickly, easily, correctly by the world-famous LINGUAPHONE Method. Endorsed by thousands of students, schools and colleges.
SEND FOR FREE BOOK
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 R. C. A. BUILDING NEW YORK CITY

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

Handwriting scientifically analyzed. Detailed, sincere, helpful. $3. Questions answered. Send 15 pen-written lies. State age, sex. Dr. Alfred Reiss, Ph.D. Formerly Heidelberg. 1775 Broadway, N. Y. City.

TRAVEL

Trip, New England and New York by auto early July. Accommodate two. Share expenses, driving. Address Box 1262, c/o The Nation.

Classified Advertisements

62 cents a line (six words)
MINIMUM—3 lines
$6.16 per inch

•

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue, New York City
Algonquin 4-3311

FOR SALE

Berkshires. Farm Bargains New roads opening hitherto inaccessible spot between Austerlitz and New Lebanon (near Stockbridge, Mass.). Colonial houses $2,000 up; land $15 acre. Terms. Scenery unexcelled in all New England. Scofield Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

IDEAL COUNTRY HOME for family of moderate means. Near interesting small village in beautiful Wyoming valley of western New York, within 50 miles of Buffalo and Rochester; new central school, community hall, churches, inn, etc. Handsome comfortable Colonial style 12-room house and adjacent guest cottage; full repair, all modern conveniences. Eleven acres land, terraced lawns, rose garden, small home orchard, picturesque views. Sacrifice price. Address owner, Box 1265, c/o The Nation.

LAND FOR SALE

Acreage, Building lots for sale. Swimming privileges. 30 miles from N. Y. C. Box 1243, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT

114 St., 508 W.—Arizona, $5 and up. Opposite Columbia; Luxurious studios, housekeeping; 24-hour elevator, switch-board service; special monthly rates.

2 single rooms, private apartment, family of 3 adults, semi-private bath. Near Columbia. $6 and $7. King, UN. 4-5783.

FURNISHED STUDIO

Exceptionally large; Hudson breezes; artistically furnished, private bath; maid. Steinway; telephone, central location; complete privacy; quiet. SU 7-9880.

SUMMER RENTALS

Bungalows, studios, all conveniences, electrical refrigeration: tennis, swimming, 10 minutes walk to stores; 30 miles from N. Y. Primrose Farm, New City, N. Y.

New studio. Lake. Gardens. Beautifully furnished. Reasonable rent. Geddes, Brookfield, Connecticut.

Modern bungalows, 2-3 rooms, porches; quiet country, lake nearby; ping-pong, badminton. $150-$250. S. Kirshman, New City, N. Y. Phone, 2297. 25 miles from George Washington Bridge.

Beautiful new 6-room home near Peekskill. Furnished. Bathing beach, sleeping porch. All improvements. Bus line to door. Reasonable. Call Peekskill 2931 J.

Two-room apartment, modern conveniences, lovely country, brook, woods. 50 miles from city. $200 long season. GR 3-4525.

Harmon Station. Modern cottage, 4 rooms, porches, children's day camp, adult recreational facilities. $450. AT 9-0424.

WANTED—TO RENT

Business woman interested, living quarters, country; commuting distance. Would rent small guest house or studio on estate. Address Box 1263, c/o The Nation.

Wanted to rent, August 1st, seven-room flat or apartment, vicinity Brooklyn College. Some garden space. About $75. Address Box 1264, c/o The Nation.

Additional Resort Advertising
will be found on
The Inside Front Cover